GRAMOPHONE

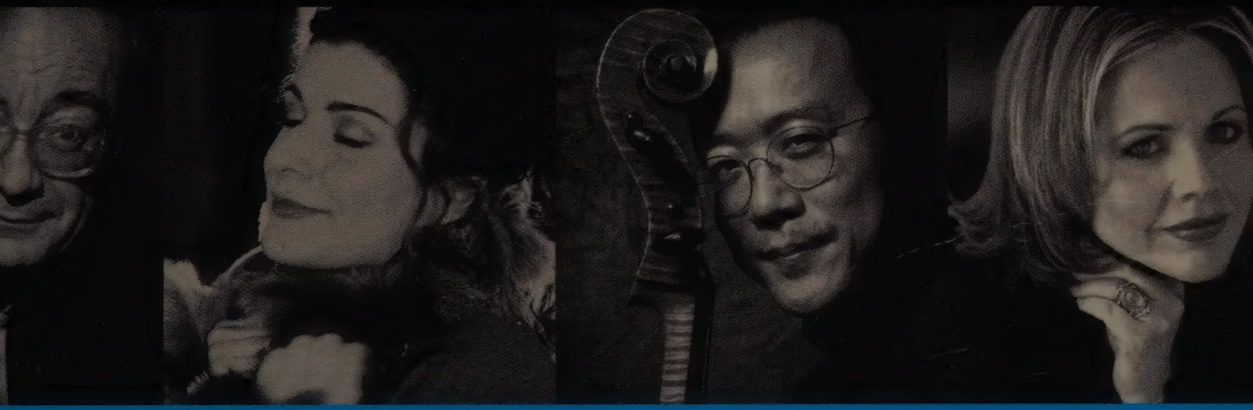
THE CLASSICAL MUSIC MAGAZINE

UNIVERSITY OF ARIZONA LIBRARY
3 9001 04685 0445

Classical GOOD CD GUIDE

2004

Includes FREE LSO Live CD



THE FINEST PERFORMANCES
OF THE GREATEST CLASSICAL WORKS ON CD AND DVD, REVIEWED BY THE WORLD'S LEADING CRITICS

---

o GREATEST RECORDINGS • COMPOSERS' LIVES
ASIC LIBRARY GUIDE • PERFORMANCE RATINGS

In association with
BOSE®
Better sound through research®

Home cinema from two speakers

The New Bose 3·2·1 digital home entertainment system

'Home cinema just got a whole lot easier.'
Stuff Magazine.

Bass module not shown

To request a dealer list and brochure call 0800 317 942 quoting ref. CD03. Alternatively, visit our website at www.bose.co.uk

Left
Centre
Right
Surround left
Surround right

Hear it! Believe it! Ask for a demonstration.

BOSE
Better sound through research®
www.bose.co.uk

Lifestyle®
Home Entertainment System
Setup Disc 1
DVD
BOSE
Better sound through research.

NOW IT EVEN DOES THE LISTENING FOR YOU

THE BOSE ADAPTiQ™ SYSTEM

BOSE
Better sound through research.

BETTER SOUND THROUGH RESEARCH®

There are two secrets to getting a great sound from your favourite DVDs and CDs – the right equipment, and knowing how to set it up correctly. Bose® celebrates its 40th anniversary in 2004, and since the mid-1960s the company has been developing equipment to make better sound easier to achieve at home.

But there's more to the way the company thinks about its products, from loudspeakers to complete multimedia systems, than simply technology: open the box in which any Bose® product is delivered and you'll find a quick set-up guide designed to ensure you have everything connected correctly, and are ready to enjoy your product with a minimum of fuss. Demonstration and check discs are usual with Bose® systems, but with its latest models the company has gone even further: once you've got everything connected, the product can take over, setting itself up to suit your room and the way you listen and view.

The secret is ADAPTiQ™ technology, combining purpose-made test discs with a clever 'listening' headset and advanced digital processing. This enables the system to listen to itself and adapt to the different positions you and your family usually sit in to enjoy home entertainment – up to five locations can be accommodated – while it works out settings guaranteed to ensure everyone enjoys their favourite music or DVDs.

Connect up a system like the Lifestyle® 35 and the discs provided take you step by step through the set-up, playing sound through each speaker in turn to check you've got all the wiring right – though it would be hard to go wrong thanks to the simple 'plug and play' Bose® hook-up – and then using ADAPTiQ™ to do all the fine-tuning that can often take the experts hours. And if you want to move your room around in a few months time, to accommodate a new piece of furniture or just to get a new look, you just run ADAPTiQ® again, and the system re-tunes itself.

THE STYLISH LIFESTYLE® 35 SYSTEM COMBINES EVERYTHING YOU NEED FOR GREAT MUSIC WITH A DVD PLAYER AND FULL SURROUND SOUND CAPABILITY. AND THE USE OF THE BOSE® ADAPTiQ™ SYSTEM ALLOWS IT TO TUNE ITSELF TO YOUR ROOM - AND EVEN WHERE YOU AND YOUR FAMILY SIT TO LISTEN!

BOSE®
Better sound through research®

SYSTEMS TO SUIT EVERY NEED, FROM A SIMPLE TWO-SPEAKER SURROUND SOUND SET-UP TO A FULL-BLOWN HOME CINEMA

From the entry-level 3-2-1 system, with its amazing ability to create surround sound from CDs and DVDs using just two speakers, right up to the incredible Lifestyle® 35 and 50, Bose has a system to suit every room – and every pocket. And that's particularly true of the new Lifestyle® 18 system, which fits in below the Lifestyle® 28 and 35 models, and yet brings all those qualities for which Bose systems are famous.

At the heart of the Lifestyle® 18 is a Media Centre able to play DVDs, CDs and even CD-R discs loaded with MP3 music files made on your home computer, as well as having an FM/AM radio built in. This sleek unit is truly the heart of the home entertainment system, and draws on the company's four decades of research and development to deliver an excellent sound.

It does this using a familiar Bose® combination of an Acoustimass® powered bass module, small enough to be hidden away behind a sofa or under a coffee table and yet capable of real weight and substance, and five Virtually Invisible® cube speakers. Amazingly these stand just 7.6cm tall, and yet working with the Acoustimass® unit they can present full, rich and dynamic surround sound, whether from films or concerts on DVD or even standard CDs. Videostage® 5 processing can be used with stereo signals, creating a captivating surround experience.

And the sound isn't limited to just one room: thanks to the use of radio-frequency remote control and expansion sockets, the Lifestyle® 18 – like most Bose® systems – can be expanded into a full multiroom system simply by adding an extra speaker package and another remote handset. You can even play radio in one room and CD or DVD in another, if you want, with each room having its own control of the system.

It's not hard to see why systems like these have such appeal: they're easy to install and operate, and deliver an exciting, involving sound without the need to fill the room with big, bulky speakers. Virtually Invisible® indeed – mount the speakers on shelves or the optional wall brackets, and your friends won't be able to work out where the music is coming from. That's what Bose® has achieved in 40 years of research: systems to fill your home with sound without filling it with equipment.

VIRTUALLY INVISIBLE® IS HOW BOSE® DESCRIBES THE SPEAKER TECHNOLOGY USED IN THE SLEEK LIFESTYLE® 18 SYSTEM: THE TINY CUBE SPEAKERS ARE ALL BUT IMPOSSIBLE TO SEE ONCE THEY'RE SET UP IN THE ROOM, WITH JUST THE MEDIA CENTRE ON SHOW FOR YOUR FRIENDS TO ADMIRE

BOSE®
Better sound through research®

SPEAKERS: AT THE HEART OF 40 YEARS OF MUSIC

Speaker technology has always been at the heart of Bose® – the company started as a result of founder Dr Amar Bose's dissatisfaction with the way conventional speakers played music, and some 35 years later one of its seminal products, the 901® Direct/Reflecting® speaker, is still in production. Of course, since 1968 the design has undergone a lot of development, but it's still recognisably the same product, and its innovative technology has 'trickled down' to ever more affordable speakers in the range.

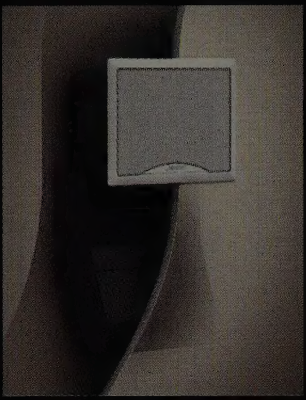
As an example, take some of the newest Bose® speakers, the 201® and 301® models, now in their Series V form. To anyone used to conventional loudspeaker design they certainly look unusual: they're wider than they are tall, and have their treble drive units mounted at an angle on the inner face of their cabinets. This is part of that Direct/Reflecting® technology – another horizontally opposed drive unit bounces sound off the walls, emulating the way we hear sound in the real world: some directly from the source, the rest by reflection from nearby surfaces.

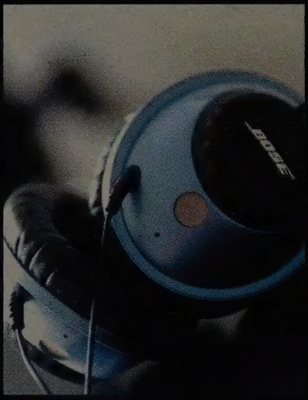
But this arrangement also spreads the 'sweet spot': the ideal listening position in which the best stereo sound is heard. With some conventional speakers you lose the sense of a sonic image before you when you move a short distance away from the perfect 'hotspot': with the 201® and 301®, as with all Bose® speaker designs, the idea is to give a coherent stereo image across as much of the room as possible. The company calls this technology Stereo Everywhere® and this, coupled with those inward-firing Stereo Targeting® tweeters, allows several listeners, sitting on a sofa for example, to hear a clear stereo sound, with none of that old problem of great stereo for one listener and one-speaker sound for everyone else.

Add to that rich bass from a built-in forward-firing main drive unit, and the freedom to place the compact speakers almost anywhere in the room, then the appeal of the 201® and 301® speakers isn't hard to see. No wonder Gramophone said of the 301® speakers that 'many listeners will find they bring a magic of their own to the way music is played'.

THE COMPACT 301® SPEAKERS, DESIGNED FOR BOTH MUSIC AND SURROUND SOUND APPLICATIONS, USE A COMBINATION OF TWO BOSE® TECHNOLOGIES – STEREO EVERYWHERE® AND STEREO TARGETING® – TO GIVE A COHERENT SONIC IMAGE FOR SEVERAL LISTENERS

BOSE®
Better sound through research.





FROM ITS NOISE-CANCELLING HEADPHONES TO THE SOUND SYSTEMS FOR SOME OF THE WORLD'S MOST LUXURIOUS CARS AND THE REMARKABLE ACOUSTIC WAVE® SYSTEM, BOSE® APPLIES LEADING-EDGE TECHNOLOGY TO EVERY ONE OF ITS PRODUCTS

GREAT MUSIC – WHEREVER YOU'RE LISTENING

There's much more to Bose® than just speakers and systems for home use, because the company's continuous investment in research and development in one field often finds applications in another. That's why you'll find Bose® headphones in use by airline pilots, Bose® speakers in use in sound reinforcement systems in concert halls, arenas, clubs and other locations around the world, and Bose® systems offered either as standard or a premium option in some of the most luxurious cars on the road.

From the innovative Wave® Radio and CD players, designed to give big-system sound from a compact table-top product, right through to whole-house music systems and PA speakers, Bose technology is everywhere you can listen.

Slip behind the wheel of a top Audi, Cadillac or Mercedes, or splash out on vehicles as diverse as the Porsche 911 Turbo or the massive Hummer SUV, and the chances are you'll be listening to a Bose sound system, fitted as standard equipment.

And you can even enjoy the fruits of Bose® research for your personal listening: the company's QuietComfort® headphones draws on the technology developed for pilots' noise cancelling headsets – vital for safety – to ensure those down the back of the plane can enjoy their music or movie soundtracks in peace, too. Using Acoustic Noise Cancelling®, the QuietComfort® phones monitor the noise inside the headphone enclosure with microphones, then apply electronic processing to correct the difference between the input signal and what's being heard. This combines with the company's Tri-Port® design, a further passive system to reduce the intrusion of external noise to create a design that can effectively silence aircraft engines or the rumble of a train. And being battery powered, the QuietComfort® headphones can be used with your own personal music player as easily as they can be plugged into an airliner's entertainment system.

That's just another example of Bose® technology in action – and it's all about bringing you the best possible sound, wherever you are.

BOSE®
Better sound through research

LSO

LSO Live

GRAMOPHONE
CLASSICAL GOOD CD GUIDE
2004

THE ENERGY
AND EMOTION
YOU EXPERIENCE
LIVE

LSO Live

LSO Live is the London Symphony Orchestra's own recording label and uses the latest recording technology to capture the orchestra's finest performances.

You can enjoy recordings with the unique energy and emotion that you only experience live in concert.

All the recordings featured on this free CD, available exclusively with the Gramophone Good CD Guide 2004, were recorded live in London between 1999 and 2003, and many have received Awards and accolades:

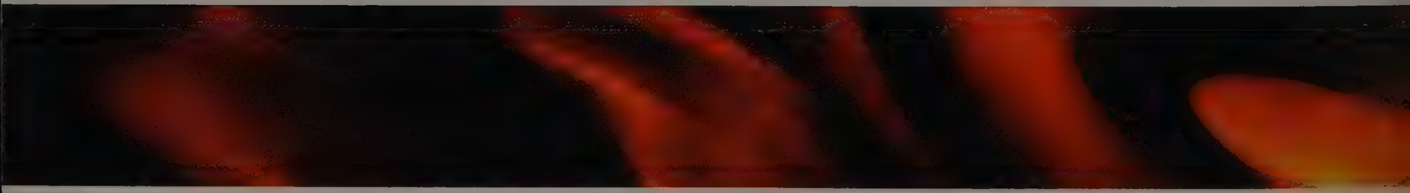
EDITOR'S CHOICE
BERLIOZ La damnation de Faust - Sir Colin Davis (LSO0008)
MAHLER Symphony No 6 - Mariss Jansons (LSO0038)
ELGAR Symphony No 1 - Sir Colin Davis (LSO0017)
BERLIOZ Les Troyens - Sir Colin Davis (LSO0010)

RECORD OF THE MONTH
BERLIOZ Harold en Italie - Sir Colin Davis (LSO0040)

GRAMOPHONE AWARD (BEST OPERA)
BERLIOZ Les Troyens - Sir Colin Davis (LSO0010)

TWO GRAMMY AWARDS (BEST OPERA, BEST CLASSICAL ALBUM)
BERLIOZ Les Troyens - Sir Colin Davis (LSO0010)

Forthcoming releases feature Sir Colin Davis, Bernard Haitink and Mstislav Rostropovich, as well as other highlights from the LSO's 2004/5 Centenary season.



LSO Live CDs are available from all good stores including Tower Records, Borders Books & Music, Virgin Megastores and Amazon.com

For further information on LSO Live CDs and LSO concerts, including performances in the USA, visit www.lso.co.uk

LSO Live is distributed in the USA by harmonia mundi usa

All tracks © London Symphony Orchestra Ltd, London UK

INTRODUCTION

We are delighted once again to be publishing the Gramophone Classical Good CD Guide in association with Bose, whose dedication to producing fine audio equipment closely matches the ideals of Gramophone itself: the nourishment of expertise based on experience, consistency and an awareness of the needs of the consumer.

The Gramophone Classical Good CD Guide is designed to eliminate the confusion of record buying and unite you, quickly and painlessly, with the best in classical music on disc. Drawing on the expertise of an unequalled panel of critics and on the magazine itself, the Classical Good CD Guide will, we are sure, become a trusted friend as you expand your collection of CDs and DVDs.

Classical GOOD
CD
GUIDE
2004

Published under licence by Haymarket Magazines Ltd

Gramophone Publications Limited
38-42 Hampton Road
Teddington
Middlesex TW11 0JE
Great Britain

COVER: SIR SIMON RATTLE: KLAUS RUDOLPH; ALFRED BRENDEL: SIMON FOWLER; CECILA BARTOLI: SIMON FOWLER; YO-YO MA: OLLIVIER HERSART; RENÉE FLEMING: DECCA / NIELS BUSCH

EDITOR	Emma Roach
EDITORIAL CONSULTANT	James Jolly
PRODUCTION EDITOR	John Bryant
IT PROJECT MANAGER	Tim Casey
ART EDITOR	Patricia Soler
PRODUCTION MANAGER	Lisa Harris
PUBLISHING DIRECTOR	Nicole LeVesconte
PUBLISHING MANAGER	Sharon Todd
PUBLISHING EXECUTIVE	Isla Ruane
CIRCULATION CO-ORDINATOR	Sandy Davies
GROUP ADVERTISING MANAGER	Simon Temlett
ADVERTISING MANAGER	Lucy Caller
FINANCE DIRECTOR	Brian Freeman
DESIGN DIRECTOR	Paul Harpin
EDITORIAL DIRECTOR	Mel Nichols
MANAGING DIRECTOR	Kevin Costello
CHAIRMAN	Eric Verdon-Roe

© Haymarket Magazines Limited 2003

ISBN 0 86024 997 2 (UK)
GG20040 (USA)
ISBN 0 86024 997 2 (Australia)

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system or transmitted in any form, or by any means electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise without the prior permission of the Copyright owner.

Recording companies reserve the right to withdraw any Compact Disc without giving prior notice, and although every effort is made to obtain the latest information for inclusion in this book, no guarantee can be given that all the discs listed are immediately available. Any difficulties should be referred to the issuing company concerned. When ordering, purchasers are advised to quote all the relevant information in addition to the disc numbers. The publishers cannot accept responsibility for the consequences of any error.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

Material from GROVE reproduced from The Concise Grove Dictionary of Music under licence from Oxford University Press, New York, USA

SALES AND DISTRIBUTION

North America
Music Sales Corporation
257 Park Avenue South
New York, NY 10010 USA
Telephone (212) 254 2100 Fax (212) 254 2013

UK and Rest of World
Gramophone Publications Limited
38-42 Hampton Road
Teddington, Middlesex TW 11 0JE
Great Britain
Telephone +44 (0)20 8267 5136 Fax +44 (0)20 8267 5844
e-mail gramophonesales@haynet.com

Printed in England by William Clowes Limited,
Beccles, Suffolk NR34 9QE

CONTRIBUTORS

Andrew Achenbach
Nicholas Anderson
Mary Berry
Alan Blyth
Joan Chissell
Robert Cowan
Peter Dickinson
Duncan Druce
John Duarte
Adrian Edwards
Richard T Fairman
David Fallows
David J Fanning
Andrew Farach-Colton
Iain Fenlon
Hilary Finch
Fabrice Fitch
Jonathan Freeman-Attwood
Edward Greenfield
David S Gutman
Martyn Harry
Stephen Johnson
Lindsay Kemp
Tess Knighton
Andrew Lamb
Robert Layton
Ivan March
Ivan Moody
Bryce Morrison
Patrick O'Connor
Michael Oliver
Richard Osborne
Tim Parry
Stephen Plaistow
Nicholas Rast
Guy Rickards
Marc Rochester
Julie-Anne Sadie
Stanley Sadie
Lionel Salter
Alan Sanders
Michael Scott Rohan
Edward Seckerson
Robert Seeley
John Steane
Michael Stewart
Jonathan Swain
John Warrack
Richard Whitehouse
Arnold Whittall
Richard Wigmore
Barry Witherden

CONTENTS

Classical GOOD
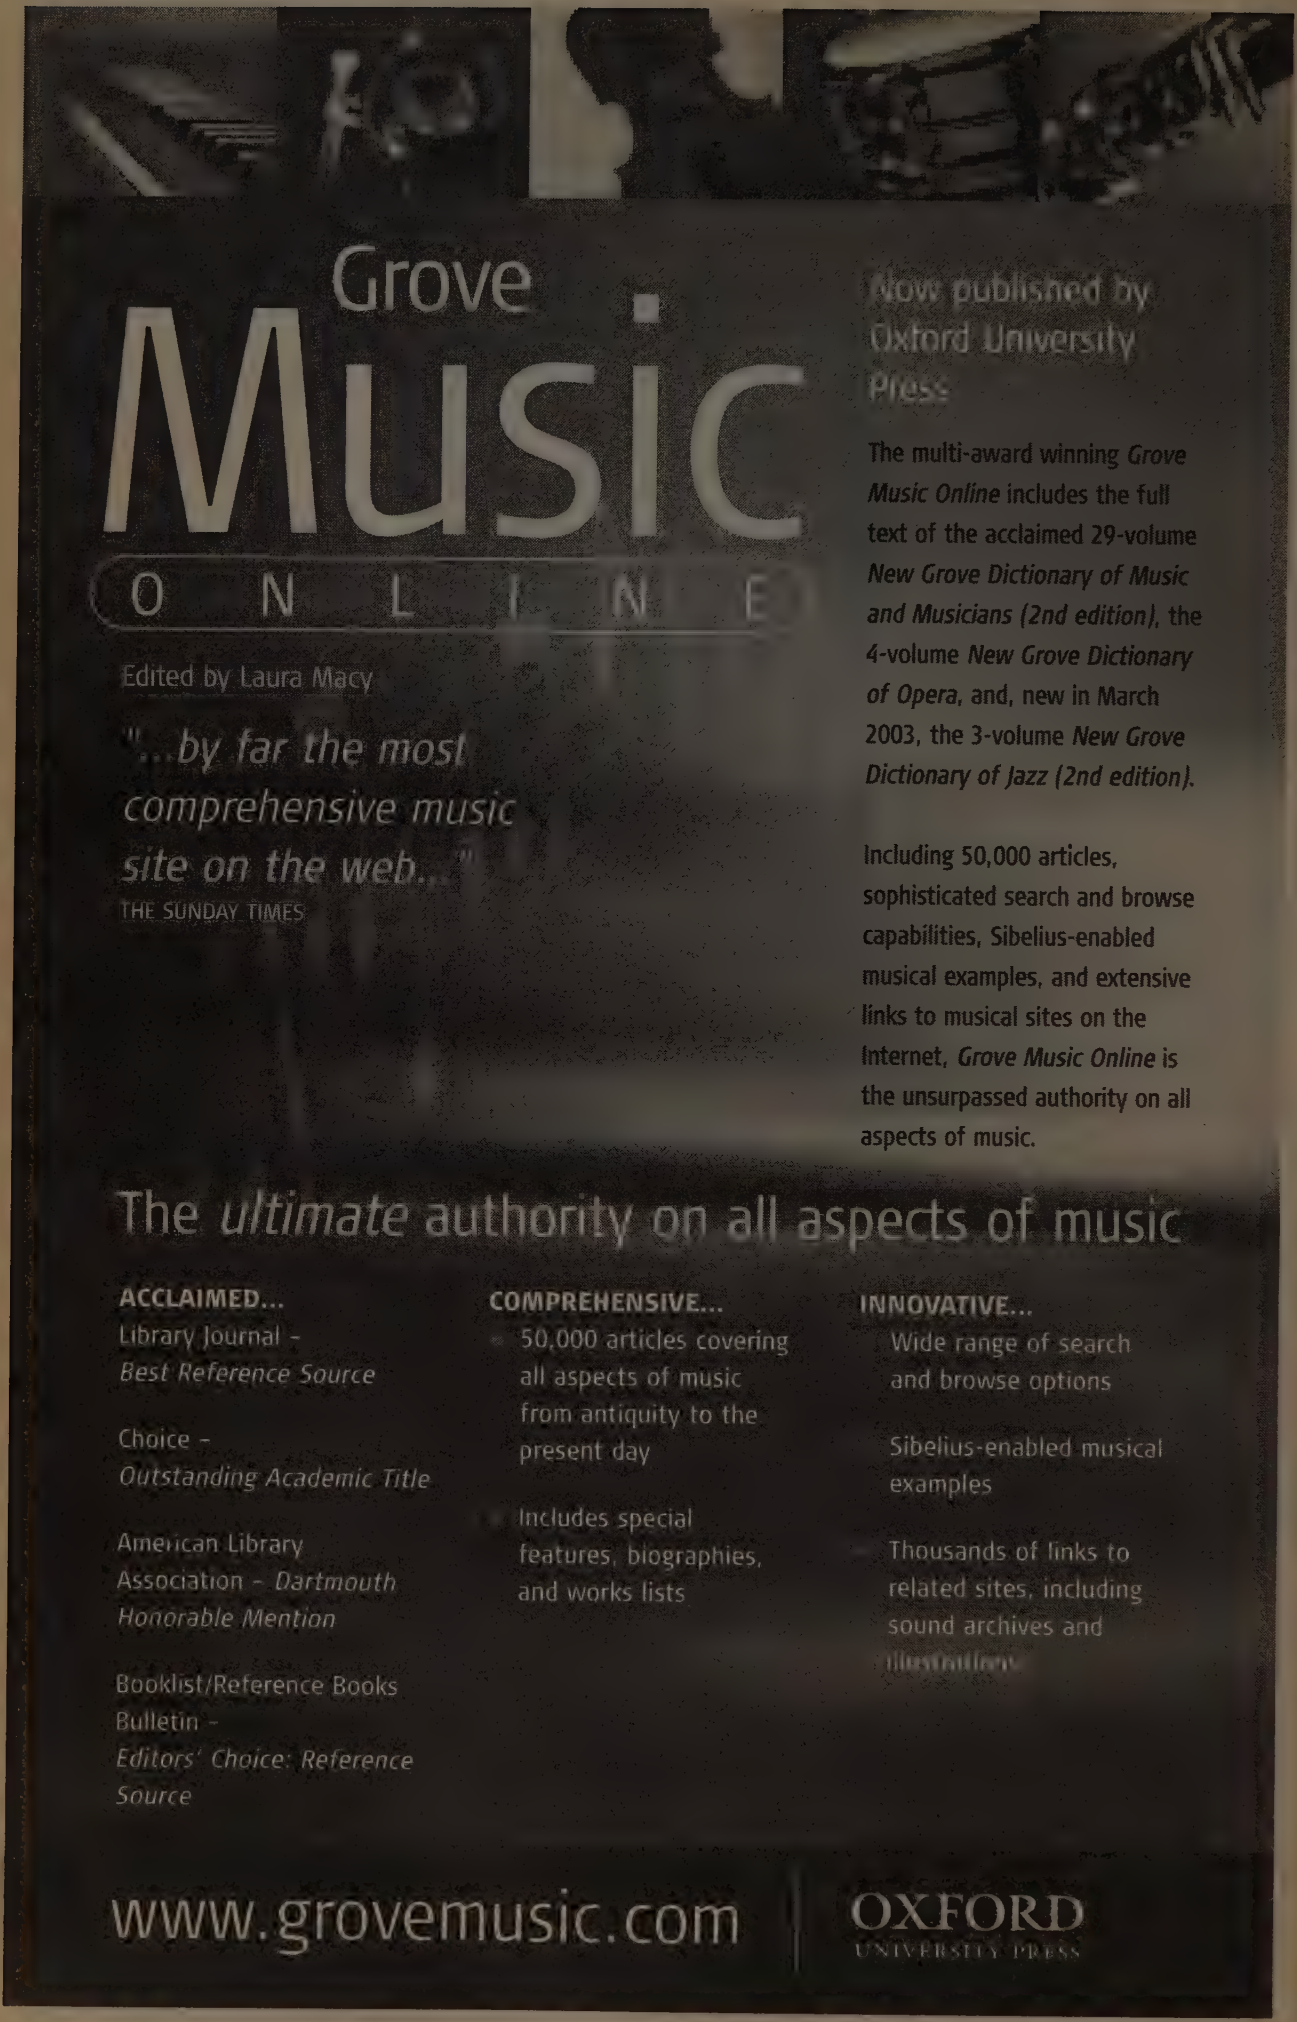
CD
GUIDE
2004

How to use the Guide V
Abbreviations VI
Gramophone Records of the Year X
100 Great Recordings XII
Suggested Basic Library XIV
What next? XVI

The Reviews

A-Z by composer 1
Collections 1161
DVD 1321
Indexes 1365



Grove
Music
ONLINE

Edited by Laura Macy

"...by far the most comprehensive music site on the web..."
THE SUNDAY TIMES

Now published by Oxford University Press

The multi-award winning Grove Music Online includes the full text of the acclaimed 29-volume New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians (2nd edition), the 4-volume New Grove Dictionary of Opera, and, new in March 2003, the 3-volume New Grove Dictionary of Jazz (2nd edition).

Including 50,000 articles, sophisticated search and browse capabilities, Sibelius-enabled musical examples, and extensive links to musical sites on the Internet, Grove Music Online is the unsurpassed authority on all aspects of music.

The ultimate authority on all aspects of music

ACCLAIMED...

Library Journal –
Best Reference Source

Choice –
Outstanding Academic Title

American Library Association – Dartmouth Honorable Mention

Booklist/Reference Books Bulletin –
Editors' Choice: Reference Source

COMPREHENSIVE...

- 50,000 articles covering all aspects of music from antiquity to the present day
- Includes special features, biographies, and works lists

INNOVATIVE...

- Wide range of search and browse options
- Sibelius-enabled musical examples
- Thousands of links to related sites, including sound archives and illustrations

www.grovemusic.com

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

HOW TO USE THE GUIDE

The presentation and design of this Guide is similar to that of its parent publication, Gramophone. Reviews of works generally appear in the following sequence: Orchestral, Chamber, Instrumental, Choral and Opera.

The title for each review contains the following information: composer(s), work(s), artist(s), record company or label, price range, disc number and, where known, the recording date. The circled numeral before the catalogue number indicates the number of discs (if there is more than one), while the timing and mode of recording are given in brackets afterwards. (The abbreviations AAD/ADD/DDD denote analogue or digital stages in the recording/editing or mixing/mastering or transcription processes in CD manufacture.) All other abbreviations used in this Guide are given below.

Where three or more composers are represented on a single disc, the review generally appears in the Collections section which starts on page 1161. On page 1321 you will also find a much expanded DVD section.

The indexes are divided into an artists' index and an index to couplings – an index of works reviewed under other composers. For example, you'll find Stravinsky's Violin Concerto with Viktoria Mullova reviewed under its Bartók Concerto No 2 coupling; to find the page number simply look in the couplings index under Stravinsky.

All recordings are flagged with one or more of the symbols explained below.

KEY TO SYMBOLS

Ⓕ Full price £11 and over
Ⓜ Medium price £7-£10·99
Ⓑ Bargain price £5-£6·99
Ⓢ Super bargain price £4·99 and below

H Denotes a Historic recording and generally applies to pre-1960 recordings. It can also be an indication that the recording quality may not be up to the highest standards

P Denotes recordings where period instruments are used

Gramophone* Award winners
The winning year is indicated on the plinth

●●● Classic
Gramophone Award winners and recordings of legendary status

●● Outstanding
Outstanding performance and fine sound/transfer

● Strongly recommended
Not a top choice but none the less a fine recording

No disc
Recommended
Good performance with the odd reservation

Value for money
An exceptional recording at bargain price or below

ABBREVIATIONS

aas	all available separately
alto	countertenor/male alto
anon	anonymous
arr	arranged
attrib	attributed
b	born
bar	baritone
bass-bar	bass-baritone
bn	bassoon
c	circa (about)
cl	clarinet
clav	clavichord
compl	completed
cont	continuo
contr	contralto
cor ang	cor anglais
cpsr	composer
cpte(d)	complete(d)
d	died
db	double bass
dig pf	digital piano
dir	director
ed	edited (by)/edition
exc	excerpt
fl	flute
fl	flourished
fp	fortepiano
gtr	guitar
harm	harmonium
hn	horn
hp	harp
hpd	harpsichord
keybd	keyboard
lte	lute
mez	mezzo-soprano
mndl	mandolin
narr	narrator
oas	only available separately
ob	oboe
Op	opus
orig	original
org	organ
perc	percussion
pf	piano
picc	piccolo
pub	publisher/published
rec	recorder
recons	reconstructed
rev	revised
sax	saxophone
sngr	singer
sop	soprano
spkr	speaker
stg	string
synth	synthesizer
tbn	trombone
ten	tenor
timp	timpani
tpt	trumpet
trad	traditional
trans	transcribed
treb	treble
va	viola
va da gamba	viola da gamba
vars	variations
vc	cello
vib	vibraphone
vn	violin
voc	vocal/vocalist
wds	words

GRAMOPHONE

THE CLASSICAL MUSIC MAGAZINE

Gramophone was established in 1923, the idea of novelist and writer Compton Mackenzie and broadcaster Christopher Stone. In the decades since its foundation it has become the world's leading authority on classical recorded music. The finest writers have contributed to the magazine, and while we have spawned numerous imitators none have overthrown Gramophone's trusted position as the pre-eminent guide to classical music on disc.

Gramophone has grown up alongside the record industry. It witnessed the birth of electrical recording, the LP, stereo, digital recording, the CD and DVD. In the 19 years since the release of the first CD, the range of music available has expanded exponentially. Never has there been such baffling choice at such a variety of prices. Hence the Gramophone Good CD Guide 2004, which unites the classical music enthusiast with performances of the finest music in the best interpretations.

We have been as diverse in our choice of repertoire as possible – if there are omissions, the chances are there is no entirely recommendable recording of that work available. One guide to our selection of the most outstanding recordings has been the annual Gramophone Awards, a celebration of the previous year's finest recordings. Each spring we draw up a vast list of the best recordings in a range of categories which include Orchestral, Concerto, Opera, Vocal, Chamber and Instrumental. After two rounds of voting – the second of which involves all 45 regular contributors to the magazine voting on the final six CDs per category – the Award winners emerge, and one is named Record of the Year (see the previous winners on page X). All these recordings are flagged in the Guide.

The Classical Good CD Guide embraces a wealth of great music and great music-making. We trust that our eminent reviewers will lead you to many hours of outstanding musical enjoyment.

FOREWORD

By James Jolly, Editor of Gramophone

The past year has been an exciting one for classical music: many of the top conducting posts have been taken up by dynamic young maestros (and in one notable instance, 'maestra'); and more and more orchestras are making their own recordings and challenging the traditional record industry business model – notable among these go-it-alone ensembles is the London Symphony Orchestra whose successes in the concert hall under their music director Sir Colin Davis are being mirrored on record with a series of major recordings that will be joined in 2004 by a couple of operatic recordings – a deserved 100th birthday present from this century-old orchestra. (And on the US's West Coast, another exciting musical partnership – Michael Tilson Thomas and the San Francisco Symphony – is being celebrated on the orchestra's own label in a Mahler cycle.)

But it is not just the international conducting stars who are stepping into the limelight – though Sir Simon Rattle's arrival at the head of the Berlin Philharmonic has been hard to miss. A new generation of outstanding younger musicians is being given opportunities on record. A number of companies have introduced special labels for débutant performers, often at highly competitive prices. DG, for many the flagship for classical recordings, resplendent under its yellow sails, has made a point in the past few months of entering into new arrangements with a host of artists from a younger generation. The Chinese-American pianist Lang Lang made a splash with his DG début release of concertos by Mendelssohn and Tchaikovsky; the American violinist Hilary Hahn makes her début on the yellow label with Bach concertos, and the Russian soprano Anna Netrebko, too, released her first solo album for the label in the autumn of 2003.

Continuing to dominate the record stores the world over is the remarkable success story that is Naxos. When Naxos launched one might have been forgiven for thinking that it would concentrate on the major works of the repertoire to the exclusion of the more interesting byways of classical music. Well, a major re-think has been in order – as I write, in front of me is a disc of string quartets by Frank Bridge, a collection of orchestral works by Leonard Bernstein and a disc of Schubert songs in piano transcriptions. Naxos provides a treasure trove of delights and barely a month goes by without the company carrying off an Editor's Choice.

As the major companies focus their artist rosters, working with tightly knit groups of musicians, the larger independents appear to be blossoming in this new – and somewhat straitened – climate. With lower overheads and little of the infrastructure that so often slows down the bigger companies, the indies are continuing to delight. Hyperion, Chandos, ASV, ECM, Harmonia Mundi, Naïve, Ondine and Telarc, to name just a few, are doing what they've always done well – making great records really well. The record catalogue would be a very dull place without them.

So what is 2004 likely to bring? The next big thing will be the format to succeed CD – will it be SACD or will it be DVD-A? Many of the major companies, and not a few of the larger independents, are pursuing the SACD route, a (for the time being) audio-only format with surround sound facility and, even if listened to in a traditional stereo environment, a noticeably enhanced sound quality. DVD-A, emerging from the video-focused world of DVD-V, also offers improved sound. At the moment SACD players offer the ability to play your old CDs alongside the new format: DVD-A doesn't. But things are changing so fast, and players that will handle all kinds of discs are beginning to emerge, that soon the format issue could become an irrelevance.

Whatever happens on the 'hardware' front, the actual music you listen to will continue. Record companies may have pruned their output but there are some tremendous discs being released every month – simply don't believe anyone who says there aren't. So what should we as music-lovers do? Support an industry that has provided so much pleasure for the past century. It needs our support. And buying an extra disc every so often isn't such a terrible burden, is it?

RECORDS OF THE YEAR

The annual Gramophone Awards celebrate the best in recorded music – listed below are the best of the best, the winners of the Records of the Year

1977 (Opera)
Janáček
*Káťa Kabanová
Vienna State Opera Chorus; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Charles Mackerras
Decca ② 421 852-2DH2 (10/89)

1978 (Opera)
Puccini
La fanciulla del West
Soloists; Royal Opera House Chorus and Orchestra, Covent Garden / Zubin Mehta
DG ② 419 640-2GH2 (11/87)

1979 (Chamber)
Haydn
*Piano Trios
Beaux Arts Trio
Philips ⑨ 432 061-2PM9 (7/92)

1980 (Opera)
Janáček
From the House of the Dead
Soloists; Vienna State Opera Chorus; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Charles Mackerras
Decca ① 430 375-2DH2 (10/91)

1981 (Opera)
Wagner
Parsifal
Soloists; Chorus of the Deutsche Opera Berlin; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
DG ④ 413 347-2GH4 (10/84)

1982-83 (Concerto)
Tippett
Triple Concerto
György Pauk; Nobuko Imai; Ralph Kirshbaum; London Symphony Orchestra / Sir Colin Davis
Philips 420 781-2PH (3/89)

1984 (Orchestral)
Mahler
Symphony No 9
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
DG ② 474 537-2 (7/84^{R})

1985 (Concerto)
Elgar
Violin Concerto
Nigel Kennedy vn London Philharmonic Orchestra / Vernon Handley
EMI Red Line 573750-2 (12/84^{R})
HMV Classics HMV5 72483-2 (12/84^{R})

1986 (Opera)
Rossini
Il viaggio a Reims
Soloists; Prague Philharmonic Chorus; Chamber Orchestra of Europe / Claudio Abbado
DG ② 415 498-2GH2 (1/86)

1987 (Early music)
Josquin Desprez
Masses – Pange lingua; La sol fa re mi*
The Tallis Scholars / Peter Phillips
Gimell CDGIM009 (3/87)

1988 (Orchestral)
Mahler
Symphony No 2, 'Resurrection'
Soloists; City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra and Chorus / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI ② 747962-8 (12/87)

1989 (Chamber)
Bartók
String Quartets Nos 1-6
Emerson Quartet
DG ② 423 657-2GH2 (12/88)

1990 (Opera)
Prokofiev
The Love for Three Oranges
Soloists; Chorus and Orchestra of Lyon Opéra / Kent Nagano
Virgin Classics ② 759566-2 (12/89 – nla)

1991 (Choral)
Beethoven
Mass in D, 'Missa solemnis'
Soloists; Monteverdi Choir; English Baroque Soloists / Sir John Eliot Gardiner
Archiv Produktion 429 779-2AH (3/91)

1992 (Orchestral)
Beethoven
Symphonies Nos 1-9
Chamber Orchestra of Europe / Nikolaus Harnoncourt
Teldec ⑤ 0927 49768-2 (11/91^{R})

1993 (Solo vocal)
Grieg
Songs*
Anne Sofie von Otter mez Bengt Forsberg pf
DG Grieg Anniversary Edition 437 521-2GH (6/93)

1994 (Instrumental)
Debussy
Préludes*
Krystian Zimerman pf
DG ② 435 773-2GH2 (3/94)

1995 (Concerto)
Prokofiev Violin Concerto No 1
Shostakovich Violin Concerto No 1
Maxim Vengerov vn
London Symphony Orchestra / Mstislav Rostropovich
Prokofiev No 1: Warner Elatus 0927 49567-2 (^{R}2/95)
Shostakovich No 1: Warner Elatus 0927 46742-2

1996 (Concerto)
Sauer. Scharwenka
Piano Concertos
Stephen Hough pf City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Lawrence Foster
Hyperion CDA66790 (11/95)

1997 (Opera)
Puccini
La rondine
Soloists; London Voices; London Symphony Orchestra / Antonio Pappano
EMI ② 556338-2 (5/97)

1998 (Choral)
Martin
Mass for Double Choir. Passacaille.
Pizzetti Messa di Requiem. De Profundis
Westminster Cathedral Choir / James O'Donnell
Hyperion CDA67017 (3/98)

1999 (Opera)
Dvořák
Rusalka
Soloists; Kühn Mixed Choir; Czech Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Charles Mackerras
Decca ③ 460 568-2DHO3 (11/98)

2000 (Orchestral)
Mahler
Symphony No 10 (ed Cooke)
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI 556972-2 (5/00)

2001 (Orchestral)
Vaughan Williams
A London Symphony (original 1913 version)
London Symphony Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9902 (7/01)

2002 (Concerto)
Saint-Saëns
Piano Concertos Nos 1-5. Wedding Cake. Rapsodie d'Auvergne. Africa
Stephen Hough pf City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Sakari Oramo
Hyperion ② CDA67331/2 (11/01)

denotes a disc listed among the 100 greatest classical recordings of all time – see overleaf*

100 GREAT RECORDINGS

Bach Goldberg Variations
Glenn Gould pf
(Sony Classical, r1981)

Bach Cantatas 78 and 106
Felix Prohaska cond
(Vanguard, r1954)

Bach Cello Suites
Pablo Casals vc (EMI, r1936-39)

Bartók Concerto for Orchestra
Fritz Reiner cond (RCA, r1955)

Boulez Répons
Pierre Boulez cond (DG, r1996)

Beethoven Fidelio
Christa Ludwig sop etc
Otto Klemperer cond
(EMI, r1962)

Beethoven Piano Sonatas
Artur Schnabel pf (EMI, r1932-35)

Beethoven Piano Concertos
Nos 1-5 Wilhelm Kempff pf
Paul van Kempen cond
(DG, r1953)

Beethoven
Violin Concerto
Itzhak Perlman pf Carlo Maria Giulini cond (EMI, r1953)

Beethoven Symphony No 3
Otto Klemperer cond
(EMI, r1954)

Beethoven
Symphonies Nos 5 and 7
Carlos Kleiber cond
(DG, r1974, 1976)

Beethoven Symphony No 6
Karl Böhm cond (DG, 1971)

Beethoven Symphony No 9
Wilhelm Furtwängler cond
(EMI, r1951)

Beethoven String Quartets
Quartetto Italiano
(Philips, 1967-69)

Berlioz Les Troyens
Jon Vickers ten etc
Colin Davis cond (Philips, r1969)

Brahms
Ein deutsches Requiem
Elisabeth Schwarzkopf sop etc
Otto Klemperer cond
(EMI, r1961)

Brahms
Piano Concerto Nos 1 and 2
Emil Gilels pf
Eugen Jochum cond (DG, r1972)

Brahms Piano Concerto No 1
Clifford Curzon pf
George Szell cond (Decca, r1955)

Brahms Symphony No 4
Carlos Kleiber cond (DG, r1980)

Britten Peter Grimes
Peter Pears ten etc
Benjamin Britten cond
(Decca, r1958)

Britten War Requiem
Philip Langridge ten etc
Richard Hickox cond
(Chandos, r1991)

Bruckner Symphony No 4
Karl Böhm cond (Decca, r1973)

Bruckner Symphony No 8
Herbert von Karajan cond
(DG, r1988)

Bruckner Masses
Edith Mathis sop etc
Eugen Jochum cond
(DG, r1962, 1971-72)

Chopin Piano Concerto No 1
Maurizio Pollini pf
Paul Kletzki cond (EMI, r1960)

Chopin and Grieg
Piano Concertos
Dinu Lipatti pf Otto Ackermann, Alceo Galliera conds
(EMI, r1950, 1947)

Chopin
Walzes
Dinu Lipatti pf
(EMI, r1947-50)

Debussy Orchestral works
Guido Cantelli cond
(Testament, r1954-55)

Debussy and Ravel
Orchestral Works
Herbert von Karajan cond
(DG, 1964-65)

Debussy Orchestral works
Bernard Haitink cond
(Philips, r1957, 1976-77, 79)

Debussy
Pelléas et Mélisande
Irène Joachim sop etc Roger Desormière cond (EMI, r1941)

Debussy Préludes
Krystian Zimerman pf (DG, r1991)

Delius Orchestral works
Sir Thomas Beecham cond
(EMI, r1956-57)

Dvořák Cello Concerto
Mstislav Rostropovich vc
Herbert von Karajan cond
(DG, r1969)

Dvořák
Symphonies Nos 8 and 9
Rafael Kubelík cond
(DG, r1966, 73)

Elgar Cello Concerto
Jacqueline Du Pré vc
Sir John Barbirolli cond
(EMI, r1965)

Elgar Violin Concerto
Yehudi Menuhin vn
Edward Elgar cond (EMI, r1932)

Gershwin Porgy and Bess
Willard White bass etc
Simon Rattle (EMI, r1988)

Grieg Peer Gynt
Sir Thomas Beecham
(DG, r1992)

Grieg Songs
Anne Sofie von Otter sop
Bengt Forsberg pf (DG, r1992)

Haydn Piano Sonatas
Alfred Brendel pf
(Philips, 1979-85)

Haydn Piano Trios
Beaux Arts Trio (Philips, r1970-78)

Hildegard of Bingen
'A Feather on the Breath of God'
Gothic Voices (Hyperion, r1981)

Honegger Symphonies
Herbert von Karajan cond
(DG, r1969)

Janáček Káťa Kabanová
Elisabeth Söderström sop etc
Charles Mackerras cond
(Decca, r1976)

Josquin Desprez Masses
The Tallis Scholars (Gimell, r1986)

Kern Show Boat
Frederica von Stade sop etc
John McGlinn cond (EMI, r1987)

Liszt Piano Concertos
Sviatoslav Richter pf
Kyrill Kondrashin cond
(Philips, r1961)

Mahler
Das Lied von der Erde
Kathleen Ferrier contr Julius Patzak ten Bruno Walter cond
(Decca, 1952)

Mahler Symphony No 5
Sir John Barbirolli cond
(EMI, r1969)

Mahler Symphony No 6
Herbert von Karajan cond
(DG, r1978)

Mahler Symphony No 9
Herbert von Karajan cond
(DG, r1982)

Massenet Werther
Georges Thill ten etc
Elie Cohen cond (EMI, r1931)

Mendelssohn
Symphony No 3 etc
Peter Maag cond (Decca, r1960)

Mozart Horn Concertos
Dennis Brain hn Herbert von
Karajan cond (EMI, r1953)

Mozart Piano Concertos
Murray Perahia pf/cond
(Sony Classical, r1975-84)

Mozart String Quintets
Grumiaux Ensemble
(Philips, r1973)

Mozart Die Zauberflöte
Tiana Lemnitz sop etc
Sir Thomas Beecham cond
(Pearl, r1937-38)

Mozart Don Giovanni
Joan Sutherland sop etc
Carlo Maria Giulini cond
(EMI, r1959)

Mozart Le nozze di Figaro
Cesare Siepi bass etc
Erich Kleiber cond (Decca, r1955)

Mussorgsky Songs
Boris Christoff bass with various artists (EMI, r1955-57)

Prokofiev
Symphonies Nos 1 and 5
Serge Koussevitzky cond
(RCA, r1945-46)

Puccini La bohème
Jussi Björling ten etc
Sir Thomas Beecham cond
(EMI, r1956)

Puccini Tosca
Maria Callas sop etc Victor
de Sabata cond (EMI, r1953)

Rachmaninov
Piano Concerto No 3
Martha Argerich pf
Berlin RSO / Chailly
(Philips, r1982)

Ravel and Rachmaninov
Piano Concertos
Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli
pf Ettore Gracis cond (EMI, r1957)

Ravel
Daphnis et Chloé
Pierre Monteux cond
(Decca, r1959)

Rossini
Opera arias
Cecilia Bartoli sop
(Decca, 1991)

Schoenberg Verklärte Nacht
Herbert von Karajan cond
(DG, 1973-73)

Schubert
Symphonies Nos 3, 5 and 6
Sir Thomas Beecham cond
(EMI, r1955-59)

Schubert
String Quartet, D887, 'Death and the Maiden'
Busch Quartet (EMI, r1938)

Schubert Winterreise
Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar
Jörg Demus pf (DG, r1965)

Schumann Fantasie etc
Sviatoslav Richter pf
(EMI, r1961-62)

Shostakovich
String Quartets
Fitzwilliam Quartet
(Decca, r1975-77)

Sibelius
Symphonies Nos 3 and 5
Robert Kajanus cond
(Koch, r1932-33)

Sibelius and Nielsen
Violin Concertos Cho-Liang
Lin vn Esa-Pekka Salonen cond
(Sony Classical, r1989)

Smetana Má vlast
Václav Talich cond
(Supraphon, r1954)

R Strauss Orchestral works
Rudolf Kempe cond
(EMI, r1971-74)

R Strauss Ein Heldenleben.
Also sprach Zarathustra
Fritz Reiner cond (RCA, r1954)

R Strauss Four Last Songs
Elisabeth Schwarzkopf sop
Otto Ackermann cond (EMI, r1953)

R Strauss Salome
Birgit Nilsson sop etc
Sir Georg Solti cond
(Decca, r1961)

R Strauss Der Rosenkavalier
Elisabeth Schwarzkopf sop etc
Herbert von Karajan cond
(EMI, r1956)

Stravinsky
Stravinsky Edition
Stravinsky cond
(Sony Classical, r1930s-60s)

Tchaikovsky Francesca da
Rimini, Hamlet – excerpt
Leopold Stokowski cond
(dell'Arte, r1958)

Tchaikovsky Symphony No 5
Mariss Jansons cond
(Chandos, r1884)

Tchaikovsky
Symphonies Nos 4-6
Evgeny Mravinsky cond
(DG, r1960)

Tchaikovsky Symphony No 6
Mikhail Pletnev cond
(Virgin Classics, r1991)

Verdi Aida
Montserrat Caballé sop etc
Riccardo Muti cond (EMI, r1974)

Verdi Otello
Ramon Vinay ten etc
Arturo Toscanini cond
(RCA, r1947)

Verdi Falstaff
Giuseppe Valdengo bar etc
Arturo Toscanini cond
(RCA, r1950)

Verdi Falstaff
Giuseppe Valdengo bar etc
Arturo Toscanini cond
(RCA, r1950)

Verdi La traviata
Callas sop Chor & Orch La Scala,
Milan / Giulini
(EMI, r1955)

Wagner Tristan und Isolde
Kirsten Flagstad sop etc
Wilhelm Furtwängler cond
(EMI, r1952)

Wagner Der Ring des Nibelungen George London
bass-bar Hans Hotter bass-bar
Régine Crespin sop Wolfgang
Windgassen ten Birgit Nilsson
sop etc Sir Georg Solti cond
(Decca, r1958-65)

Walton Violin and Viola
Concertos Kennedy vn/va André
Previn cond (EMI, r1987)

Webern Opp 1 and 2
Pierre Boulez cond
(Sony Classical, r1969-70)

Martha Argerich pf
Début Album (DG, r1960, 71)

David Munrow var instrs/cond
The Art of the Netherlands
(EMI, r1975)

Maurizio Pollini pf
20th-century piano music
(DG, r1971, 86)

Joan Sutherland sop
Art of the Prima Donna
(Decca, r1960)

SUGGESTED BASIC LIBRARY

ORCHESTRAL

Bach Brandenburg Concertos
Bach Concerto for two violins
Bach Orchestral Suites
Barber Adagio for strings
Barber Violin Concerto
Bartók Concerto for Orchestra
Bartók The Miraculous Mandarin
Bartók Violin Concerto No 2
Beethoven Complete symphonies
Beethoven Piano Concertos Nos 4 and 5
Beethoven Violin Concerto
Berg Violin Concerto
Berlioz Symphonie fantastique
Brahms Complete symphonies
Brahms Piano Concerto No 1
Brahms Violin Concerto
Britten Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra
Bruch Violin Concerto No 1
Bruckner Symphonies Nos 4, 5, 8 and 9
Chopin Piano Concertos
Copland Appalachian Spring
Copland Fanfare for the Common Man
Corelli 12 Concerti grossi, Op 6
Delibes Coppélia
Debussy Jeux
Debussy La mer
Debussy Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune
Dvořák Cello Concerto
Dvořák Symphony No 9, New World
Elgar Cello Concerto
Elgar Enigma Variations
Elgar String music
Elgar Symphonies Nos 1 and 2
Elgar Violin Concerto
Falla Noches en los jardines de España
Gershwin Rhapsody in Blue
Górecki Symphony No 3
Grieg Peer Gynt Suite
Grieg Piano Concerto
Handel Fireworks Music
Handel Water Music
Haydn Cello Concerto in C
Haydn London Symphonies
Haydn Trumpet Concerto
Holst The Planets
Ives Three Places in New England
Mahler Symphonies Nos 5 and 9
Mendelssohn A Midsummer Night's Dream
Mendelssohn Hebrides Overture
Mendelssohn Symphony No 4 , 'Italian'
Mendelssohn Violin Concerto
Messiaen Turangalîla Symphony
Mozart Clarinet Concerto
Mozart Horn Concerto No 4
Mozart Piano Concertos Nos 20-27
Mozart Serenade for 13 Winds
Mozart Symphonies Nos 40 and 41
Mussorgsky Pictures at an Exhibition
Pärt Tabula rasa
Prokofiev Lieutenant Kijé
Prokofiev Peter and the Wolf
Prokofiev Piano Concerto No 3
Prokofiev Romeo and Juliet
Prokofiev Symphonies Nos 1 and 5
Rachmaninov Paganini Rhapsody
Rachmaninov Piano Concertos Nos 2 and 3
Rachmaninov Symphony No 2
Ravel Boléro
Ravel Daphnis et Chloé
Ravel Piano Concerto in G
Respighi Roman Trilogy
Rimsky-Korsakov Scheherazade
Rodrigo Concierto de Aranjuez
Rossini Overtures
Saint-Saëns Le carnaval des animaux
Saint-Saëns Piano Concerto No 2
Saint-Saëns Symphony No 3
Schoenberg Five Orchestral Pieces, Op 16
Schoenberg Variations for Orchestra, Op 31
Schubert Symphony No 8, 'Unfinished'
Schumann Piano Concerto
Shostakovich Cello Concerto No 1
Shostakovich Piano Concerto No 2
Shostakovich Symphonies Nos 5 and 10
Sibelius Finlandia
Sibelius Symphonies Nos 2 and 5
Sibelius Tapiola
Sibelius Violin Concerto
Smetana Má vlast
Strauss J II Waltzes
Strauss R Alpine Symphony
Strauss R Also sprach Zarathustra
Strauss R Till Eulenspiegel
Stravinsky Agon
Stravinsky The Rite of Spring
Stravinsky The Firebird
Tchaikovsky Romeo and Juliet
Tchaikovsky 1812 Overture
Tchaikovsky Ballets – The Nutcracker, Sleeping Beauty and Swan Lake
Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto No 1
Tchaikovsky Symphonies Nos 4-6
Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto
Vaughan Williams Symphony No 2, 'London'
Vaughan Williams Symphony No 5
Vaughan Williams Tallis Fantasia
Vaughan Williams The Lark Ascending
Vivaldi The Four Seasons
Walton Violin and Viola Concertos

CHAMBER

Bartók String Quartets
Beethoven Piano Trio in B flat, Op 97, 'Archduke'
Beethoven String Quartets [late]
Beethoven Violin Sonatas
Borodin String Quartet No 2
Brahms Clarinet Quintet
Debussy Sonata for Flute, Viola and Harp
Debussy String Quartet
Dvořák String Quartet No 12
Franck Violin Sonata
Haydn String Quartets, Opp 20 and 76
Mendelssohn Octet
Mozart Clarinet Quintet
Mozart String Quartet in C, K465, 'Dissonance'
Mozart String Quintet in G minor, K516
Ravel String Quartet

Reich Different Trains
Schubert Piano Quintet, 'Trout'
Schubert Piano Trios
Schubert Arpeggione Sonata in A minor, D821
Schubert String Quartet No 14
Schubert String Quintet
Shostakovich String Quartet No 8

INSTRUMENTAL

Bach Cello Suites
Bach Das wohltemperierte Klavier
Bach Goldberg Variations
Bach Solo Violin Sonatas and Partitas
Beethoven Complete piano sonatas
Beethoven Diabelli Variations
Biber Mystery Sonatas
Brahms Variations on a Theme of Paganini
Chopin Nocturnes
Chopin Piano Sonata No 2
Chopin Preludes
Debussy Children's Corner Suite
Debussy Préludes
Grieg Lyric Pieces
Haydn Piano Sonata E flat major, HobXVI/52
Liszt Piano Sonata
Mozart Piano Sonata No 11 in A, K331
Paganini 24 Caprices
Prokofiev Piano Sonata No 7
Ravel Gaspard de la nuit
Satie Piano works
Schubert Impromptus
Schubert Piano Sonata in B flat, D960
Schubert Wandererfantasie
Schumann Carnaval
Schumann Kinderszenen
Schumann Kreiserleriana

VOCAL

Allegri Miserere
Bach Cantatas – No 82 'Ich habe genug' and 140 'Wachet auf'
Bach Magnificat
Bach Mass in B minor
Bach St Matthew Passion
Beethoven Missa solemnis
Berlioz Grande messe des morts
Berlioz L'enfance du Christ
Berlioz Les nuits d'été
Bernstein West Side Story
Brahms Ein deutsches Requiem
Britten Serenade
Britten War Requiem
Bruckner Motets
Byrd Masses for 3, 4 and 5 voices
Canteloube Chants d'Auvergne
Duruflé Requiem
Elgar The Dream of Gerontius
Fauré Requiem
Handel Coronation Anthems
Handel Dixit Dominus
Handel Messiah
Haydn Nelson Mass
Haydn The Creation
Howells Hymnus Paradisi
Mahler Das Lied von der Erde
Mahler Kindertotenlieder
Mendelssohn Elijah
Monteverdi 1610 Vespers
Monteverdi Madrigals, Book 8
Mozart Mass in C minor
Mozart Requiem
Orff Carmina burana
Palestrina Missa Papae Marcelli
R Strauss Four Last Songs
Rachmaninov Vespers
Ravel Schéhérazade
Schubert Winterreise
Schumann Dichterliebe
Tallis Spem in alium
Vaughan Williams Serenade to Music
Verdi Requiem
Victoria Requiem
Vivaldi Gloria in D, RV589
Walton Belshazzar's Feast

OPERA, OPERETTA &STAGE WORKS

Bartók Duke Bluebeard's Castle
Beethoven Fidelio
Bellini Norma
Berg Wozzeck
Bizet Carmen
Bizet Les pêcheurs de perles
Britten Peter Grimes
Britten Turn of the Screw
Debussy Pelléas et Mélisande
Gershwin Porgy and Bess
Gluck Orfeo ed Euridice
Handel Alcina
Handel Giulio Cesare
Handel Rinaldo
Janáček The Cunning Little Vixen
Lehár Die lustige Witwe
Leoncavallo Pagliacci
Mascagni Cavalleria rusticana
Monteverdi L'Orfeo
Mozart Die Zauberflöte
Mozart Don Giovanni
Mozart Le nozze di Figaro
Mussorgsky Boris Godunov
Puccini La bohème
Puccini Madama Butterfly
Puccini Tosca
Puccini Turandot
R Strauss Der Rosenkavalier
Rossini Il barbiere di Siviglia
Strauss J II Die Fledermaus
Sullivan The Pirates of Penzance
Tchaikovsky Eugene Onegin
Verdi Aida
Verdi Il trovatore
Verdi La traviata
Verdi Otello
Verdi Rigoletto
Wagner Der Ring des Nibelungen
Wagner Tristan und Isolde
Weber Der Freischütz

WHAT NEXT?

Have you fallen in love with a piece of music and wondered what to explore next? Here, we offer some ideas which emerge from ten of the most popular works of classical music

VIVALDI FOUR SEASONS

For rhythmic vitality, poetic imagination and a breathtaking variety of solo effects, Vivaldi's ever-popular sequence of concertos has captured the affections of music lovers like few other Baroque works. For sheer excitement, his Op 4 group, entitled La stravaganza, runs the Four Seasons close – they deserve to be much better known. Corelli was celebrated during his lifetime as the violinist par excellence and his concerti grossi took solo writing to new heights. Handel and Bach apply their particular genius to their orchestral works – Bach's Orchestral Suite No 2 is full of subtlety and enchantment, and Handel's Concerti grossi, Op 3, replete with invention. And leaping forward a few centuries, Stravinsky pays his own sprightly tribute to the Baroque era, with a modern-day concerto grosso that fuses 18th-century manners with 20th-century angularity and invention.

Vivaldi La stravaganza
Corelli 12 Concerti grossi, Op 6
Handel Concerti grossi, Op 3
Bach Orchestral Suite No 2
Stravinsky Dumbarton Oaks

VIVALDI GLORIA

The thrill of massed voice, raised in religious rite, has few equals. Vivaldi's Gloria is justly popular for its combination of excitement and colour. Handel's two great choral masterpieces, Dixit Dominus and Zadok the Priest, draw on a similar source and create a sense of anticipation unequalled in music of the period. Haydn wrote his Masses for the Esterházy Court in what is now lower Austria; Hummel wrote his for Vienna. Both are works of genius, written with a real feeling for the Mass setting and the drama it can sustain. Finally, from the 20th century, Walton's Coronation Te Deum, a joyous outpouring set off by his own uniquely spicy rhythmic language.

Handel Dixit Dominus
Handel Zadok the Priest
Haydn Nelson Mass
Hummel Mass in D
Walton Te Deum

MOZART PIANO CONCERTO, K467

Mozart's celebrated C major Concerto (No 21) was made famous through its use in the film Elvira Madigan, above all for its flowing, song-like slow movement. Haydn's D major Concerto, HobXVIII/11, similarly employs a classical orchestra to enchanting effect. In a comparably chamber music-like vein, Hummel's Piano Concerto No 2 is a charmer, a stream of delicious melodic invention. A work of genius, Beethoven's Third Piano Concerto has some glorious ideas – the return of the orchestra after the first movement cadenza is one of the composer's most extraordinary imaginings. Capturing some of the songfulness of the Mozart, try Schumann's ever-enchanting Piano Concerto. And taking a bit of a punt, sample Moscheles' piano concertos – undemanding music but full of joie de vivre – the Seventh has a particularly exciting opening movement.

Haydn Piano Concerto in D
Hummel Piano Concerto No 2
Beethoven Piano Concerto No 3
Schumann Piano Concerto
Moscheles Piano Concerto No 7

BEETHOVEN SYMPHONY NO 5

For drama and concentration, Beethoven's Fifth can't really be followed by anything else, but if you want high drama in orchestral guise, Brahms's tragic Fourth is a worthy successor. Schumann's Rhenish (No 3) has some of the impetus and driving energy of the Beethoven and some very particular joys of its own. Tchaikovsky's Fate-dominated Fourth opens like the Beethoven with a gauntlet-throwing gesture and keeps the tension tightly wound right until the final chords – as does the Mahler which expands the symphonic structure to ever-greater dimensions. From our own time and for orchestral thrills, try Walton's dynamic, high-energy First Symphony.

Brahms Symphony No 4
Schumann Symphony No 3, 'Rhenish'
Tchaikovsky Symphony No 4
Mahler Symphony No 5
Walton Symphony No 1

BORODIN STRING QUARTET NO 2

Easeful melodies and an atmosphere of almost carefree enjoyment have made Borodin's Second Quartet such a favourite. Turn back the clock a few years, and Tchaikovsky's First Quartet offers comparable melodic freedom and charm. Another justly popular quartet is the single one composed by Ravel (very much influenced by Debussy's). It, too, spins melodies aplenty but the textures are very obviously Gallic and the lightness of touch particularly charming. Benjamin Britten's Third Quartet dates from late in the composer's life and enbraces some extraordinary shifts of mood from a poised serenity to an anguish that is all the more poignant when put into biographical context. Samuel Barber's single String Quartet was where the celebrated Adagio (for strings) originated; it has a spareness and intensity in this version for the four instruments that the lusher, full-string version lacks. And the outer movements are full of febrile excitement. Finally, for something a little more off the beaten path, the Tenth Quartet by the Dane, Vagn Holmboe, might satisfy a desire for an appealing lyricism given a touch of astringency via the string quartet writing of that great composer for the medium, Dmitri Shostakovich.

Tchaikovsky String Quartet No 1
Ravel String Quartet
Britten String Quartet No 3
Barber String Quartet
Holmboe String Quartet No 10

BRUCH VIOLIN CONCERTO NO 1

The most popular classical work according to the listeners of Classic FM. Why? Great melodies, thrusting orchestral accompaniment and bold gestures, perhaps. Berlioz's Harold in Italy, a symphony with solo viola, has many of the same qualities as well as a powerful Romantic undertow thanks to the inspiration of Lord Byron's poem. Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto shares with the Bruch a similarly glorious melodic invention combined with soaring phrasing. The Brahms Double Concerto (for cello and violin) has a wonderful sense of solo lines intertwining in some entrancingly tuneful writing. The Bartók Second brings the concerto into a modern age, but never abandons the solo violin's ability to sing out. And why not try a mid-20th-century concerto with a truly appealing way of expressing itself? Miaskovsky's concerto from 1938 is rarely encountered in concert – a shame because it woos its listeners from the very first notes.

Berlioz Harold in Italy
Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto
Bartók Violin Concerto No 2
Brahms Double Concerto
Miaskovsky Violin Concerto

HOLST THE PLANETS

What is it about Holst's suite that gives it its enduring popularity? The otherworldliness of the slow sections, the majesty of the great tunes and the sheer variety of the composer's imagination are just three of its obvious attractions. Mahler's Second Symphony – which obviously predates it – shares some of the same cosmic ambition. It's another work guaranteed to thrill its audiences. Sibelius's last symphony, No 7, on the other hand, is a compact, compressed work but one of huge concentration and full of the most extraordinarily bleached-out colours. Debussy's La mer, a quasi-symphony, that portrays the play of the sea is one of the great works of the dawning of the last century. For another work of cosmic vision turn to Richard Strauss's Also sprach Zarathustra, a tone-poem whose opening bars are now inextricably linked to footage of space exploration, but whose 45-minute journey has many equally rewarding ideas. Messiaen's Turangalîla Symphony employs harmonies and colours that are a galaxy away from the Holst, but it shares a similarly colossal range and vision. It is a 20th-century classic, and provides rewards on every hearing.

Mahler Symphony No 2
Sibelius Symphony No 7
Debussy La mer
R Strauss Also sprach Zarathustra
Messiaen Turangalîla Symphony

DEBUSSY LA MER

A work of genius (see the entry above), Debussy's La mer – his evocation of the sea and its various moods as a day progresses – has been followed in the 20th century by a number of other great seascapes. Sibelius's The Oceanides is a long arch of sound building to a climax and then easing back, as much a portrayal of light as of the sea. Bax's Tintagel is of comparable length and paints a portrait of the Arthurian castle on the Cornish coast. Britten's four interludes are mood pictures that punctuate his opera Peter Grimes and portray the tormented emotions of the work as vividly as any vocal setting could hope to do. Walton's Cello Concerto, while not a seascape at all, seems to be aware of the play of sunlight on water so vivid is its language. George Benjamin's Ringed by the flat horizon is a portrait of a storm building and then subsiding and shares with the Debussy a fascination with the variety of nature as portrayed in music.

Sibelius The Oceanides
Bax Tintagel
Britten Four Sea Interludes
from 'Peter Grimes'
Walton Cello Concerto
G Benjamin Ringed by the flat horizon

RICHARD STRAUSS FOUR LAST SONGS

For sheer vocal opulence, few works can come close to Strauss's settings of poems by Hermann Hesse and Josef von Eichendorff, made right at the end of his life. They look back over a lifelong love affair with the soprano voice and have understandably found a place in the affection of lyric sopranos for the past 50 years. Jumping back in time, Wagner's Wesendonck Lieder – supremely concentrated settings of words by his then-mistress – capture an intensity of emotion rarely encountered in non-operatic works. Berlioz's song-cycle Les nuits d'été similarly entwines word and music in a fabric of equally heady vocalism. Ravel's exotic cycle Shéhérazade gives the soprano song repertoire an alluring orientalism that's hard to resist. While one could never claim that the Glière piece is on the same level of achievement as any of these recommendations, it is none the less a work that allows the soprano full flight – it is, though, very cholesterol rich: so only for the sweet-toothed! Samuel Barber's seting of a prose-poem by James Agee is an enchanting outpouring in song of a young girl's observations, hopes and aspirations.

Wagner Wesendonck Lieder
Berlioz Les nuits d'été
Ravel Shéhérazade
Glière Concerto for Coloratura Soprano and Orchestra
Barber Knoxville: Summer of 1915

GÓRECKI SYMPHONY NO 3, SYMPHONY OF SORROWFUL SONGS

Though composed in 1976, the Third Symphony of the Polish composer Henryk Górecki had to wait until 1993 for recognition on a hitherto undreamt of scale. Subtitled the Symphony of Sorrowful Songs, it touched the hearts of a vast number of people and went on, thanks in large part to the advocacy of Classic FM, to become a modern-day classic. For a work that also meditates on loss and grieving, turn back the clock to the early years of the century and the Violin Concerto by Alban Berg written 'to the memory of an angel', the angel being Manon Gropius. It too taps into a vein of restrained yet healing grief. Richard Strauss wrote his Metamorphosen for 23 solo strings as a response to the destruction caused to Germany during the Second World War. It is a concentrated threnody, an outpouring of grief and loss with little hope of relief. The famous Barber Adagio has acquired a vast following for the simplicity of its message and the economy of its means. Arvo Pärt, whose language has some of the same inflections as Górecki's, wrote his Cantus in memory of Benjamin Britten on learning of the death of the British composer, someone he knew only through the music. It is a beautiful cascading lament and, like the Górecki Third Symphony, has acquired a similar iconic status. Finally, another popular contemporary composer, Sir John Tavener, wrote his Protecting Veil for cello and orchestra. It was a sensation at its Proms première with soloist Steven Isserlis and it still speaks with a power and directness that will surely lend it longevity and continued popularity.

Berg Violin Concerto
R Strauss Metamorphosen
Barber Adagio for strings
Pärt Cantus in memory of Benjamin Britten
Tavener The Protecting Veil

CD Reviews

Classical GOOD
CD
GUIDE
2004

Adolphe Adam

French 1803-1856

GROVE Adam studied at the Paris Conservatoire with Reicha (counterpoint) and Boieldieu (composition). A prolific composer, he wrote more than 80 stage works, some of which, especially those produced for the Opéra-Comique such as Le châlet (1834) and Le postillon de Longjumeau (1836), had considerable and lasting success. Other notable works, showing a natural sense of theatre, fresh invention and graceful melody. include the opera Si j'étais roi (1852) and the well-known ballet Giselle (1841).

Le corsaire

English Chamber Orchestra / Richard Bonynge
Decca ② 430 286-2DH2 (131 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1990 ●

Adam's Le corsaire was first heard in Paris during 1856 and was his last ballet score. Although eclipsed by the popularity of Giselle, it is superbly crafted and deserves to be more widely recognised. Richard Bonynge's realisation is excellent in every respect, and includes later additions by Léo Delibes for the revival of 1867. Stylistically, his 'Pas de fleurs' divertissement, interpolated into the final act, hardly reveals an alien hand at work, and could easily pass as part of Adam's original score. The highlights are the splendid bacchanal of the pirate Conrad and his crew, and the 'Pas des éventails' from Scene 2. The Second Act takes place at the Pasha's palace in Adrianople, as Conrad and his men, now disguised as pilgrims, plan to rescue the beautiful Medora from the harem. Due to the treachery of Conrad's henchman Birbanto, he is taken prisoner, and the final act recounts his efforts to escape, returning to his ship with Medora. Arguably the finest music is that portraying the lovers' premature rejoicing at their freedom, and the depiction of the storm which leaves them stranded together upon a rock following the destruction of the ship, reaching safety just as the final curtain falls.

Bonynge draws the diverse threads of the score together with a degree of expertise acquired from a lifetime of involvement with music of this nature, enabling the listener to follow the plot without difficulty. He obtains notably superior playing throughout from the ECO.

Giselle (complete)

Royal Opera House Orchestra, Covent Garden / Richard Bonynge
Double Decca ② 452 185-2DF2 (126 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1986 ●

Adam's celebrated score has educed harsh words from the more superior music critics, but the public has rightly taken it to heart for its atmospheric writing and tender and haunting themes. The text used for this recording is Adam's complete original score, and Bonynge's desire to re-record it lies in matters of performance and interpretation. (His previous recording, also for Decca, was made with the Monte Carlo Opera Orchestra in 1970.) Reviews of the previous version, on its original appearance and reissue, spoke of the limitations of the woodwind and brass, and suggested that a little more rehearsal time might have brought benefits. Here the musicians of the Royal Opera House bring both a confidence of attack and a refinement that are not quite achieved by the Monte Carlo players. Moreover, that same extra confidence of attack is displayed by Bonynge himself. Each of the discs of this issue is between one-and-a-half and two minutes longer than the older recording, but the dramatic moments are more vigorously attacked and the slower ones more lovingly caressed – always to considerable effect. Add recorded sound that is warmer and more spacious, and there is no hesitation in acknowledging the superiority of this version over the old. Without a doubt, this represents the first-choice version of Adam's complete score.

Slovak Radio Symphony Orchestra / Andrew Mogrelia
Naxos ② 8 550755/6 (114 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1994

Naxos also offers the complete version of Giselle to challenge comparison with Bonynge's recording. Give or take some slight variances in the Act finales, both offer essentially the same text, complete with traditional interpolations. In the ultimate comparison there can be little doubt that Bonynge gives more point to the contrasts in the score, and that the playing of the Covent Garden orchestra and Decca's recorded sound give just the edge over this set. Yet this is a highly enjoyable alternative, with some especially rewarding passages such as the Act 1 'Pas seul'; many collectors will be more than happy to settle for it as a record of the complete text, and at super-bargain price.

Le toréado

Michel Trempont bar Don Belflor; Sumi Jo sop Coraline; John Aler ten Tracolin; Welsh National Opera Orchestra / Richard Bonynge
Decca 455 664-2DHO (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included.
Recorded 1996 ●

Richard Bonynge's ability to persuade Decca to record out-of-the-way, 19th-century, French stage works has been to our repeated benefit over the past 40 years. Yet few results have been more welcome than this delightful operatic soufflé. Despite the title, there is little specifically Spanish about the piece beyond the Barcelona setting and the cuckolded elderly husband, who just happens to have been a toreador. The love interest is between the former opera-singer wife and her flautist admirer, and it is the important contribution of the flute that accounts for much of the incidental music. The admirer identifies himself by assorted operatic airs and grades the seriousness of the husband's infidelities by whether he plays a fandango or a cachucha. The score's most familiar number is a set of variations on Ah, vous dirai-je, maman; but there is much else that brings out Sumi Jo's crystal-clear, effortless coloratura to marvellous effect, as well as showing off John Aler's ardent, elegant tenor and Michel Trempont's well-practised comic baritone. A delightful recording.

Further listening
Le postillon de Lonjumeau
Stuttgart Choristers; Kaiserslautern Radio Symphony Orchestra / Arp
Capriccio ② 60 040-2 (97 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Celebrated for the fiendishly difficult tenor solo 'Mes amis, écoutez l'histoire', Adam's opera has a lot of charm. This German language recording must be considered a stop-gap until a French version returns to the catalogue.

John Adams

American b1947

GROVE Adams studied at Harvard with Kirchner, Kim, Del Tredici and Sessions, and in 1972 began teaching at the San Francisco Conservatory. He became interested in electronics (Onyx, 1976), then, influenced by Reich, turned to minimalism. His works, in an elegant minimalist style, include Shaker Loops for strings (1978), Harmonium for orchestra with choir (1981), the exuberant, parodistic Grand Pianola Music (1982), the opera Nixon in China (1987) – summary of his musical languages over 10 years – and a violin concerto (1994). His second opera, The Death of Klinghoffer (1991), is again based on recent events; the story unfolds in meditations and narratives, punctuated by choruses, rather than in action.

Violin Concerto

Violin Concerto[a]. Shaker Loops[b]
Gidon Kremer vn
[a]London Symphony Orchestra / Kent Nagano; [b]Orchestra of St Luke's / John Adams
Nonesuch 7559-79360-2 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ●

This superb CD displays two very different aspects of Adams's evolving art: Shaker Loops dancing to a minimalist pulse, lean, fidgety and cleverly designed; and the altogether deeper, more intimate Violin Concerto. The concerto brings Berg to mind – not his Violin Concerto, but Wozzeck, Act 3 Scene 4, where an eerie 'drainage' effect symbolises Wozzeck's drowning beneath a blood-red moon. This aural fluidity is common to both works (the scoring is similar, too), although Adams keeps up the momentum for the entire duration of his long first movement, shifting colours constantly until a brief solo passage marks a slowing down in preparation for the ensuing Chaconne. Adams floats his mysterious textures above a quietly undulating accompaniment. The Sibelius of Tapiola seems to hover somewhere around five minutes into the first movement (just as parts of Shaker Loops suggest an up-tempo Lemminkäinen) and the concerto ends with a fast, dancing toccata. In the hands of Gidon Kremer – whose sinewy, lightly bowed tone suits the piece perfectly – it is a compelling monologue.

Shaker Loops is earlier, easier and rather less durable than the Violin Concerto. It started life as a string quartet (Wavemaker), then – beyond drastic recomposition – filled out to a septet which, suitably augmented, is how we hear it here. The term 'Shaker' refers to the frenzied dancing of a religious sect and Adams's four-part structure sets up a varied roster of tempos and textures. There have been other recordings of it, but this is surely the best – agile, precise and extremely well balanced. The sound is excellent.

Chamber Symphony

Chamber Symphony. Grand Pianola Music
London Sinfonietta / John Adams
Nonesuch 7559-79219-2 (53 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●

A loud bash on an old tin can, and they're off – yelping, tapping, chattering, chasing to and fro, like a barn-yard full of loopy professors. And to think that the prime mover for John Adams's madcap Chamber Symphony (1992) was its 'eponymous predecessor', Schoenberg's Op 9. Even the instrumentation is similar, save that Adams has added synthesizer, jazz-style percussion, trumpet and trombone. It's a raw piece, with the merest suggestion of repose in the central 'Aria with Walking Brass' and a 'Roadrunner' finale that includes a manic violin cadenza followed by an ingenious passage where synthesizer, bass clarinet, bassoon and horn crank up for the panic-stricken home straight. Granted, it might not be exactly rich in tunes, but it is maddeningly moreish, a high-speed comedy where all the characters are temporarily on holiday from their more serious selves.

In complete contrast, the far gentler Grand Pianola Music (1971) provides a relatively 'easy' listen, what with its smooth-driving motor rhythms, sensual female voices, warming waves of brass tone and occasional bouts of thumping excitement. Clichés there certainly are, especially the 'big tune' that crowns the third section, 'On the Dominant Divide', and which is probably most effective when, towards the end of the work, it slims down to basic harmonic constituents. Grand Pianola Music is a sort of aural truck ride, with smooth tarmac, plenty of scenic incident, a glowing sunset on the far horizon and a closing cadence that recalls – rather unexpectedly – Sibelius. Both performances are fine and the recordings are superb.

El Dorado

Adams El Dorado
Busoni Berceuse élégiaque, Op 42 (arr Adams)[a]
Liszt La lugubre gondola, S200 No 1 (arr Adams)[a]
Hallé Orchestra / Kent Nagano; [a]London Sinfonietta / John Adams
Nonesuch 7559-79359-2 (47 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●

El Dorado is a dramatic commentary on irreconcilable opposites: chromaticism versus pure modalities, malignancy versus rude health, and man's destructive impulses versus the unspoiled glory of unpopulated landscapes. Adams claims to have composed the second movement, 'Soledades' – the one 'without man' – in seven days. Indeed, the whole work appeared to him as a sort of apparition, 'alarmingly complete in its details, even before I wrote down a single sketch'. The first movement, 'A Dream of Gold', opens to sinister held chords, pensive shufflings and rising clouds of string tone. The last section charges forth like some maniacal spectre, racing out of control then stopping dead. By contrast, 'Soledades' weaves a delicate web of sound, at least initially, with unmistakably Sibelian undertones. The ending, however, suggests a tranquil death. Overall, the recording of El Dorado reproduces a dynamic sound curve. The performance itself is deft and well paced, very much on a par with Adams's own performances of his Busoni and Liszt arrangements.

The Berceuse élégiaque is beautifully realised, while the richly coloured orchestration of Liszt's late La lugubre gondola is in total contrast to other, more austere, readings. Winds and solo strings are used to sensitive effect and the playing is uniformly excellent.

Gnarly Buttons

Gnarly Buttons. John's Book of Alleged Dances
Michael Collins cl Kronos Quartet (David Harrington, John Sherba vns Hank Dutt va Joan Jeanrenaud vc)
London Sinfonietta / John Adams
Nonesuch 7559-79465-2 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●

It is fascinating to hear the way John Adams works the prepared piano into his Book of Alleged Dances. The original idea was to make a digitally sampled loop of the piano part which would then be triggered by one of the quartet members. However, practical considerations necessitated recording the loops, which the quartet now perform live. John's Book of Alleged Dances (the equivocation in the title refers to dance steps that have yet to be invented) is prime-cut Adams – fidgety, tuneful, teeming with invention and all-but tactile in its aural variety.

We start by following a streetcar from town to coast and back again, then visit 'Toot Nipple' with 'chainsaw triads on the cello'. There's a raw-edged 'Hoe-Down' for leader David Harrington, a 'Pavane' for cellist Joan Jeanrenaud and a doleful Habanera. 'Hammer & Chisel' are contractor friends who construct to a knotty toccata; a slithery 'Alligator Escalator' employs reptilian harmonics and a chirpy 'Serenade' pays subtle homage to Beethoven and Schubert. These and more are kept on a high flame by the Kronos Quartet, whereas Gnarly Buttons calls on the combined talents of Michael Collins and the London Sinfonietta. A more intense piece by far, its dry but colourful demeanour occasionally recalls Schoenberg's similarly spice-flavoured Serenade. The first movement is based on a Protestant shape-note hymn; the second is a 'Mad-Cow' hoe-down; and the third is a warming song of sure-fire hit potential. Collins does Adams proud, and so does the London Sinfonietta. The recordings are first-rate.

Harmonielehre

Harmonielehre. The Chairman Dances. Two Fanfares – Tromba lontana; Short Ride in a Fast Machine
City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI 555051-2 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●
The Chairman Dances and Short Ride in a Fast Machine are also available on HMV Classics
HMV5 73040-2 Ⓑ

Harmonielehre was inspired by a dream vision of a massive tanker that suddenly took flight, displaying a 'beautiful brownish-orange oxide on the bottom part of its hull'; the setting was just off San Francisco Bay Bridge. 'Those pounding E minor chords are like a grinding of gears,' says John Adams of its violent, gunshot opening. Scored for a huge orchestra and structured in three contrasted sections, Harmonielehre is probably the nearest thing on offer to a minimalist symphony, and for that reason alone it could well appeal beyond the élite coterie of minimalist-fanciers. Rattle's recording has great heft and dynamic range, an informative balance and a vivid sense of aural perspective. The brass components of those opening chords have enormous weight and presence, and the ringing marimbas thereafter a bright complexion. Adams's frequent requests for subtle tempo transitions are subtly honoured by the conductor. In short, Rattle's view of Adams is recommended particularly to those mainstream collectors who aren't yet sold on minimalism.

Naive and Sentimental Music

Naive and Sentimental Music
Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra / Esa-Pekka Salonen
Nonesuch 7559-79636-2 (44 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●●

The title of this work is adapted from On Naïve and Sentimental Poetry, a 1795 essay by Schiller who regarded the naïve artist as one for whom art is a natural form of expression, and who creates without concern for historical significance; the sentimental artist is all too aware that he and his art stand apart, and what he creates reflects this chasm. 'This particular piece,' Adams writes, 'perhaps more than any of my others, attempts to allow the naïve in me to speak, to let it play freely.'

A symphony in all but name, Naïve and Sentimental Music (1999) is cast in three movements. The first is an 'essay on melody,' built around an expansive theme that unfolds in long strands. Adams' harmonic sensitivity and structural control are breathtaking. And the entire movement unfolds as organically as does the melody that is its idée fixe. Adams titled the finale 'Chain to the Rhythm'. Melody takes a back seat to what quickly becomes a dazzling and increasingly ominous moto perpetuo.

Naïve and Sentimental Music is dedicated to Esa-Pekka Salonen and the Los Angeles Philharmonic, who premièred it in February 1999. Though the fiendishly difficult finale could perhaps be played more tautly, the overall interpretation is very persuasive indeed.

The Death of Klinghoffer

Sanford Sylvan bar Leon Klinghoffer; Stephanie Friedman mez Omar; James Maddalena bar First Officer; Thomas Hammons bar First Officer; Thomas Young sngr Molqui; Eugene Perry bar Mamoud; Sheila Nadler mez Marilyn Klinghoffer
London Opera Orchestra Chorus; Lyon Opera Orchestra / Kent Nagano
Nonesuch ② 7559-79281-2 (135 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes and text included. Recorded 1991

One wonders how many living composers would happily watch their scores lead a short life, relevant but finite. Not many; but John Adams might be one of them. First Nixon in China, then The Death of Klinghoffer: rarely before has a composer snatched subjects from yesterday's news and made operas out of them. Admittedly, themes of lasting significance lurk beneath this work's immediate surface: conflict between cultures and ideologies, rival claims to ancestral lands, human rights in general. Specifically, however, it takes us back no further than October 1985, when Palestinian terrorists hijacked the Italian cruise liner Achille Lauro and murdered wheelchair-bound passenger Leon Klinghoffer. The opera guides us through those events, albeit in an oblique fashion.

Whatever the long-term fate of the opera, Alice Goodman's libretto certainly deserves to be spared from oblivion. It is eloquent and beautiful, compassionate and humanitarian, rich in imagery and spacious in its sentence-structure. If The Death of Klinghoffer finally disappoints, it is because the marriage of words and music is so fragile. For all that, the opera's musical language is firmly rooted in tradition, but it is doubtful if anyone will come away from The Death of Klinghoffer with a memorable lyric moment lodged in the mind. The recording uses the cast of the original production, and contains no weak links. As one expects from Adams, the score has been superbly orchestrated, and it is done full justice by the Lyon Opera Orchestra.

El niño

Dawn Upshaw sop Lorraine Hunt Lieberson mez Willard White bass London Voices; Theatre of Voices; Deutsches Symphony Orchestra, Berlin / Kent Nagano
Nonesuch ② 7559 79634-2 Ⓕ
(111 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included

El Niño is an ecstatic celebration of Christ's birth, at once ethereal and fiercely driven, and as remote from homely 'Seasonal' images as Greenland is from Bethlehem. The pain and alienation of birth is as much a part of Adams's ground plan as the Holy child whose universal significance has kept the legend alive.

Maybe it's coincidence that the score opens like a robust relation of Reich's The Desert Music, but given the Biblical setting, the idea of desert isn't exactly inappropriate. Bach is another probable reference point. And yet any influences are utterly absorbed among the pages of a score that, aside from its melodic appeal and considerable rhythmic (ie, quasi-minimalist) vitality, can toy delicately with guitar and harpsichord or breathe fire through trombones and low woodwinds. Adams's facility for musical word-painting at times levels with Benjamin Britten's. Voices and characters intertwine or juxtapose with a skill that only a seasoned opera composer could summon.

Countertenors echo ancient church modes, initially as Gabriel in dialogue with Mary, sweetly sung by Dawn Upshaw, then reporting on the Babe 'that leaped in her womb' and standing by as Joseph (a grainy-voiced Willard White) struggles with the concept of Mary's pregnancy. The choice of texts, many written by Hispanic women, was selected in collaboration with Peter Sellars. The overall aim seems less to tell a consistent story than to create narrative images within a spiritual context. The episodes, whether inwardly lyrical or outwardly aggressive, have an urgency, or relevance, that reaches beyond religious edification. It brings the Christmas story alive. But, be warned – this is no starlit Cosy Encounter. The performance can't be faulted, and the recording achieves a true aural perspective. Very strongly recommended.

Nixon in China

Sanford Sylvan bar Chou en-Lai; James Maddalena bar Richard Nixon; Thomas Hammons bar Henry Kissinger; Mari Opatz mez Nancy T'ang First Secretary to Mao; Stephanie Friedman mez Second Secretary to Mao; Marion Dry mez Third Secretary to Mao; John Duykers ten Mao Tse-Tung; Carolann Page sop Pat Nixon; Trudy Ellen Craney sop

Chiang Ch'ing St Luke's Chorus and Orchestra / Edo de Waart
Nonesuch ② 7559-79177-2 (144 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes and text included. Recorded 1987

Whatever its weaknesses, there's no denying that Nixon in China is striking. Structured curiously, its three acts reduce from three scenes to two, and then to one, and they diminish proportionally in duration from more than an hour in Act 1 to the unbroken 30-minute span of Act 3. This last act played out in the statesmen's bedrooms, is a weary sequence of dialogues and soliloquies, ending in a curious but calculated state of anticlimax. Preceding this, though, is a run of colourful scenes that symbolise the main events without imposing any artificial sense of dramatic shape. By the end of the work, the public faces have given way to private lives; even Nixon and Chairman Mao emerge as mere mortals rather than mythical demi-gods.

The music serves the libretto deftly in fast-moving dialogue but the reflective and rhapsodic portions of text seem to leave Adams baffled, the melodic lines wandering aimlessly, short on intrinsic musical interest and rarely moving the singers to expressive performances. In the handling of spectacle and scene-setting, by contrast, Adams is in his element. He freely avails himself of any idiom, any oblique references or musical quotation that serves as a means to an end. Some passages would be unthinkable without the operas of Philip Glass; elsewhere lie uncanny ghosts of 1930s Stravinsky. Magpie just about sums this score up. The singing is sympathetic, with James Maddalena as an aptly volatile Nixon and Trudy Ellen Craney coping admirably with the coloratura lines of Madam Mao.

Further listening
The Wound-dresser
Coupling: Fearful symmetries
Sylvan bar Orchestra of St Luke's / Adams
Nonesuch 7559-79218-2 (47 minutes: DDD: 6/90) Ⓕ

Adams's tender and powerful meditation, to words by Walt Whitman, on the subject of those lost to AIDS. Touchingly performed by Sanford Sylvan.

Richard Addinsell British 1904-1977

GROVE After study at the Royal College of Music, London, and in Vienna, Addinsell visited the USA (1933), where he wrote for films. Most of his music was for the theatre and cinema; his popular Warsaw Concerto, in the style of Rachmaninov, was used in the film Dangerous Moonlight (1941).

Film Music

Blithe Spirit – Prelude; Waltz. Encore – Miniature Overture. Gaslight – Prelude. Parisienne – 1885. Southern Rhapsody. Waltz of the Toreadors – March; The General on Parade; Waltz (all arr. Lane). Fire over England – Suite (arr. Zalva). Passionate Friends – Lover's Moon. South Riding – Prelude (both arr Isaacs). A Christmas Carol – Suite (arr S Bernstein). WRNS March (arr Douglas)
Robert Gibbs vn Peter Lawson pf Royal Ballet Sinfonia / Kenneth Alwyn
ASV White Line CDWHL2115 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1998 ●

What delights this disc contains! Nobody should imagine that the Warsaw Concerto is all that is worth hearing from this fine composer. Addinsell had an utterly natural feel for richly tuneful, romantic music in the very best tradition of British light music. The diverse subjects for which he was commissioned served to turn these gifts to contrasted musical styles, which together provide a rewardingly varied programme. The most familiar music here for some readers will probably be the swaggering march and haunting waltz from the Waltz of the Toreadors. For others it may be the prelude and waltz from David Lean's film of Blithe Spirit or the suite from A Christmas Carol.

Perennial favourites in this collection are the invigorating WRNS March (rewarding material for any military band), the delightfully mysterious prelude to the 1939 film of Gaslight and the waltz from the stage play Parisienne. This last has been given a splendid Glazunovian orchestration by compiler, producer, arranger and annotator Philip Lane, who again leaves us in his debt, no less than conductor Kenneth Alwyn and the admirable Royal Ballet Sinfonia.

Additional recommendation
Film music
Goodbye Mr Chips – exc. Ring around the moon – exc. Smokey Mountains Concerto. The Isle of Apples. The Prince and the Showgirl – exc. Tune in G. Tom Brown's Schooldays – exc. Festival. Journey to Romance. Fire over England – exc. A Tale of Two Cities – exc
Martin, Elms pfs BBC Concert Orchestra / Alwyn
Marco Polo 8 223732 (68 minutes: DDD: 4/95) Ⓕ

A most attractive release. Much of the orchestral material for this recording was prepared by Philip Lane, who also provides the informative notes. Fine performances, too.

Warsaw Concerto etc

Warsaw Concerto (arr Douglas)[b]. The Admirable Crichton[a] – Polka and Galop; Waltz Sequence ([a]reconstructed by P Lane) The Black Rose – Suite[a]. Blithe Spirit[a] – Prelude; Waltz. Goodbye Mr Chips – Suite[ac]. Love on the Dole – Suite[a]. Out of the Clouds – Flame Tango (arr Sharples). Scrooge – Suite (arr S Bernstein)[c]. Tom Brown's Schooldays – Overture[a]
[b]Martin Roscoe pf [c]Manchester Cathedral Choir; [c]Chetham's Chamber Choir; BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Rumon Gamba
Chandos CHAN10046 (80 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●

None of the modern versions of the Warsaw Concerto seems to have the freshness, urgency and lack of self-indulgence of this very fine version. That's a pointer to the high level of playing and interpretation to be found throughout this ever fascinating and altogether quite delightful selection of Addinsell's film music. Though Rachmaninov comes so immediately and vividly to mind in the most celebrated of Addinsell's creations, that was, of course, strictly for the purposes of its film context. Elsewhere you're more likely to be reminded of Vaughan Williams, Ravel or Eric Coates. Pastiche was an inevitable part of a film composer's armoury, but the very real inventive gifts displayed in the Warsaw Concerto are also evident throughout this collection.

About half the music has already been recorded in other Addinsell collections, but not with the chorus that is especially effective here in the 'School Song' from Goodbye Mr Chips. Of the new items the sumptuously lyrical finale to the music for The Black Rose is particularly fine (expertly reconstructed, like much else here, by Philip Lane), as are the dances from the 1957 film The Admirable Crichton.

It's by no means just nostalgia, of course, that makes Addinsell's film music well worth exploring, and this generously filled CD is undoubtedly the best single-CD selection available.

Additional recommendations

Warsaw Concerto

Coupled with: Rachmaninov Piano Concerto No 2. Gershwin Rhapsody in Blue. Gottschalk, Liszt and Litolff

Ortiz pf Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Atzmon

Decca 430 726-2DM (56 minutes:DDD: 5/86[R]) Ⓜ

Addinsell's evergreen piano concerto played with suitably heart-on-sleeve passion by Cristina Ortiz.

'Piano Concertos from The Movies'

Warsaw Concerto

Couplings: Beaver Portrait of Isla Rozsa Spellbound Concerto. Rota The Legend of the Glass Mountain R R Bennett Murder on the Orient Express – excs. Bath Cornish Rhapsody. Herrmann Concerto Macabre. Williams The Dream of Olwen. Pennario Midnight on the Cliffs

Philip Fowke pf RTE Concert Orchestra / O'Duinn

Naxos 8 554323 (74 minutes: DDD: 7/98) Ⓢ

Fowke plays all the pieces with affection and panache. If you've always wished that the Warsaw Concerto were longer, this is the disc for you.

Thomas Adès British 1971

One of the leading lights in contemporary classical music, pianist/conductor/composer Adès's meteoric rise to international musical prominence has been phenomenonal. He gained early success as a pianist, winning Second Prize in the 1989 BBC Young Musician of the Year, then read music at King's College, Cambridge (1989-92). Among the works from his student years are his first opus, Five Eliot Landscapes (1990) and the Chamber Symphony (1990) – his first work to receive a professional performance. In 1993 he became Composer in Association to the Hallé Orchestra for whom he wrote The Origin of the Harp (1994) and These Premises Are Alarmed (1996). His most performed work, Living Toys (1993), brought him widespread critical acclaim, though it was the chamber opera Powder Her Face (1995) that earned him an international reputation. In 1998 he became artistic director of the Birmingham Contemporary Music Group and the following year, for his first large-scale orchestral work, Asyla (1997), he received the Ernst von Siemens Prize and the Grawemeyer Award. Also in 1999 he became joint artistic director of the Aldeburgh Festival. Forthcoming commissions include operas for the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, and Glyndebourne and a Piano Quintet for the Melbourne Festival.

Adès's compositions showed exceptional assurance of style and technique from the start, and his success had much to do with the umistakable presence of a personal accent in music which blends vividness of detail with a clear sense of compelling overall design.

Asyla

Asyla[bc]. ... but all shall be well[bd]. Chamber Symphony[ad]. Concerto conciso[ae]. These Premises are Alarmed[bd]

[a]Birmingham Contemporary Music Group; [b]City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / [c]Sir Simon Rattle, [d]Thomas Adès [e]pf

EMI 556818-2 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Recorded 1998 ●

This CD includes the Chamber Symphony, the work that first aroused interest in Adès's work when he was 18, set alongside Asyla, a recent un-chamber symphony and his first work for full orchestra. The progression between them is remarkable: the Chamber Symphony has both real invention and real economy, and its use of jazz elements is neither patronising nor culinary. Maybe its last movement adds little of consequence to the preceding three, but Asyla genuinely grows from the grave, rather Britten-ish horn line that sets it going through the strong drama of the central movements to the almost Sibelian climax of the finale. Adès's own voice is clearly audible throughout, elegant, coolly intelligent but urgent.

These Premises are Alarmed, a sinewy toccata of bright colour and urgent energy, was written for the opening of the Bridgewater Hall in Manchester. At four minutes it makes rather less impact than it should in the middle of a CD (play it first).

In the Concerto conciso Adès perhaps takes his pleasure in simple intervals and brief motives a little too far. However, ... but all shall be well is something else again. It develops abundant, earnest melody from a pair of simple phrases in an impressively sustained argument that reaches a powerful and satisfying climax. Fine performances, admirably recorded.

Living Toys

Awards 1998

Arcadiana, Op 12[a]. The Origin of the Harp, Op 13[b]. Sonata da caccia, Op 11[c]. Living Toys, Op 9[d]. Gefriolsae me, Op 3b[e] [c]Michael Neisemann ob [c]Andrew Clark hn [c]Thomas Adès hpd [a]Endellion Quartet (Andrew Watkinson, Ralph de Souza vns Garfield Jackson va David Waterman vc); [e]King's College Choir, Cambridge / Stephen 1Cleobury; [b]instrumental ensemble / Thomas Adès; [d]London Sinfonietta / Markus Stenz

EMI Debut 572271-2 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ

Text and translation included. Recorded 1997. ●●●

The five pieces here suggest a composer as delightedly surprised by his prodigal inventiveness as we are. Arcadiana, for example, is a seven-movement string quartet whose central and longest movement (four minutes) contains an extraordinary range of precisely imagined, highly original textures and yet in its penultimate section can settle to a serene and wonderfully beautiful adagio whose sound and mood be conveyed only by the adjective 'Beethovenian'. Far more overtly, the engaging Sonata da caccia uses elements that are very directly derived from Couperin, but the sensibility is entirely modern, even when you strongly suspect that this or that phrase is a note-for-note quotation. However, as with Adès's first collection, his is an imagination that you can trust. Living Toys has a quite Birtwistle-like sense of ritual to it, although more lyrical, quite frequently with a tangible jazz element. The Origin of the Harp is a dark, dramatic chamber tone-poem. Gefriolsae me, for male voices and organ, is a brief but impressive motet to Middle English words.

All five pieces are finely performed. Arcadiana, with its exquisite textures and melodic richness, is perhaps Adès's finest achievement so far, a work constantly aware of the musical past but renewing that past with astonishing freshness.

Life story

Catch, Op 4. Darknesse visible. Still sorrowing, Op 7. Under Hamelin Hill, Op 6. Five Eliot Landscapes, Op 1. Traced overhead, Op 15. Life story, Op 8b Valdine Anderson, Mary Carewe sops Lynsey Marsh cl Anthony Marwood vn Louise Hopkins vc Thomas Adès pf/org David Goode, Stephen Farr orgs

EMI Debut 569699-2 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ

Texts included. Recorded 1996 ●●

Adès has the gift of seizing your attention with strange but ravishingly beautiful sonorities and then holding it with entrancingly mysterious inventions that allure the ear. Yet he also has the much rarer quality of inspiring utter confidence. His style cannot be defined by simply describing any one of these pieces. Each solves a new problem or investigates a new scenario with such adroitness and completeness that each work seems a quite new and delightful adventure. In Still sorrowing the starting point is a piano whose central register is muted with a strip of plastic adhesive. The effect on those pitches is obvious: they are dulled to a sort of subdued drumming, but by observing the new light that this casts on the undamped upper and lower registers it is not too much of an exaggeration to say that Adès invents an entirely new and alluring instrument, or rather three of them. And he plays all three with poetry and wonder.

Catch is a game, in which a piano trio tempt and tease an off-stage clarinet; he eventually joins them in sober homophony, for this is a game with serious and lyrical substance as well as a jest. A similar but more ambiguous game is played in Under Hamelin Hill, where the piping toccata of one organist attracts two others to join him in co-operative apparent improvisation, but he is left alone for a shadowy soliloquy filled with shudders. Darknesse visible is a haunting meditation in which the presence of John Dowland is clearest where the music seems least like him; a magical illusion as well as a moving homage. In Life story the soprano is asked to imitate the manner of Billie Holiday in her wry reflection on a casual one-night encounter; it is the dark, searching piano that adds pity and bleakness to turn this into a riveting miniature opera. Traced overhead is filled with mysterious, glancing references to remembered piano music, but is grippingly coherent. And as if this were not enough, in the Eliot settings, Op 1, the 17-year-old Adès already proved himself a song-writer of rare talent. The performances are first-rate.

Powder Her Face

Jill Gomez sop Duchess; Valdine Anderson sop Maid, Confidante, Waitress, Mistress, Society Journalist, First Rubbernecker; Niall Morris ten Electrician, Lounge Lizard, Waiter, Delivery Boy, Second Rubbernecker; Roger Bryson bar Hotel Manager, Duke, Guest, Laundryman, Judge; Almeida Ensemble / Thomas Adès

EMI ② 556649-2 (116 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ

Text included. Recorded 1996 ●

Powder Her Face was written and had its first performances in 1995, when Thomas Adès was 24. It would be pretty remarkable, as the first opera by a composer of that age, if it demonstrated the fertility of invention and imaginative resource that erupted from the two discs of his shorter pieces (on EMI), combined with a promising but as yet understandably tentative gift for the stage. It does much more than that. The central character, though referred to in the cast-list simply as 'Duchess', is in fact Margaret, Duchess of Argyll, for many years a prominent figure in London society, who in 1963 was at the centre of a protracted and luridly sensational divorce case: the judge, in a verdict running to 65,000 words, described her sexual activities as 'disgusting' and her sexual appetite as 'debased'. Even after the divorce she counted the rich, the famous and the royal among her friends but died, penniless, in 1993.

Adès and librettist Philip Hensher imagine her as 'all cladding – powder, scent, painting, furs – nothing inside', and the risk of course is that she will appear either as an empty monster for whom we can feel little sympathy or as a glittering caricature whom we pity as the subject of the composer's and the librettist's mockery. Their wit is indeed dazzling. Hensher's libretto is outstandingly good – economical, vivid, filled with the most adroit spurs to the composer's invention – and Adès's score is as satisfyingly rich, surprising and bizarre as his other works would lead one to hope and expect. He takes great risks – an aria and a duet that are sung simultaneously, a musical equivalent of the judge's interminable concluding speech – and they come off brilliantly. He cannot resist alluding to the music that would have furnished the Duchess's glamorous life – the score is pervaded with tangos – but he can use it to convey menace and desolation as well as picturesque period evocation. He uses chamber forces – an orchestra of 15 and four singers enacting 16 roles – but draws astonishingly varied sounds and vivid dramaturgy from them. His highest achievement is his portrayal of the Duchess. From her first appearance, surprising a maid and an electrician sniggering at her grotesque reputation, she has iconic glamour and something like dignity. Although often off-stage – the 'second soprano' probably has more to sing – she dominates the opera effortlessly, and in the long final scene she achieves ... not tragic stature, perhaps, but deep and genuine patho.

The opera gains enormously from a central performance as alluring and attention-riveting as Jill Gomez's, although all the other singers are very accomplished. The score also makes huge demands of the orchestral players, many of them required to be virtuoso soloists. The recording is as vivid as it needs to be. A hugely enjoyable opera.

Alexander Agricola

Franco-Flemish 1446-1506

GROVE Agricola's career centred mainly on Italian courts (Milan, Florence, Naples) and the French court – from 1498 until his death he served Philip the Handsome of Burgundy at home and abroad. His travels brought him renown as a singer and composer. His works include eight masses, over 20 motets and other sacred pieces, nearly 50 chansons and c25 instrumental works. His style is predominantly northern, akin to Ockeghem's, using long, rhythmically complex contrapuntal lines built from short, decorative motifs and linked with frequent yet unobtrusive cadences.

Fortuna desperata

A la mignonne de fortune. Adieu m'amour. Adieu m'amour II. Allez, regretz. Ay je rien fait. Cecsus non iudicat de coloribus. De tous biens plaine. De tous biens plaine II. De tous biens plaine III. Et qui la dira. Fortuna desperata. Guarde vostre visage. Guarde vostre visage II. Guarde vostre visage III. J'ay beau huer. S'il vous plaist. Soit loing ou pres. Sonnes muses melodieusement 🅿

Ensemble Unicorn (Bernhard Landauer counterten Johannes Chum ten Colin Mason bass-bar Marco Ambrosini fiddle Nora Kallai vihuela d'arco Thomas Wimmer vihuela d'arco/lte Riccardo Delfino hp/snare hp) / Michael Posch rec

Naxos 8 553840 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ

Recorded 1995 ●●

Agricola was praised by his contemporaries for the bizarre turn of his inspiration, and his music likened to quicksilver. By the standards of the period this is a highly unusual turn of phrase, but it was, and remains, spot-on. Crawford Young's Ferrara Ensemble anthology, the first ever devoted to the composer, focused on the secular music, both instrumental and vocal; precisely the area covered by Michael Posch and Ensemble Unicorn in this most satisfying disc. Where there is duplication (surprisingly little, in fact) the performances compare with those of the Ferrara Ensemble, although the style of singing is very different. The voices are more upfront and less inflected, perhaps the better to match the high instruments with which they are sometimes doubled (the Ferrara Ensemble used string instruments only). But the tensile quality of Agricola's lines comes through none the less (the opening A la mignonne makes for an interesting comparison), as does the miraculous inventiveness and charm of his music. Further, much of what is new to the catalogue really is indispensible, for example Agricola's most famous song, Allez, regretz.

Unicorn keeps its improvisations and excursions to a minimum, and the music is the better for it. This disc would be indispensable at full price, let alone super-budget. It really is a must-have.

Jehan Alain

French 1911-1940

GROVE Alain studied with Dupré and Dukas at the Paris Conservatoire (1927-39) and was organist of St Nicolas de Maisons Lafitte in Paris (1935-39); he was killed in action. He shared Messiaen's enthusiasms for Debussy and Asian music, reflected in the modalities, rhythmic irregularities and ecstatic ostinatos of his works, which are mostly for the organ or the Catholic Mass. His organ works include Deux danses à Agni Yavishtra (1934), two Fantaisies (1934, 1936), Litanies (1937) and Trois danses (1937-39).

Organ Works

Suite. Climat. Prélude et Fugue. Choral dorien. Choral phrygien. Aria. Variations sur 'Lucis créator'. Berceuse sur deux notes qui cornent. Deux préludes profanes. Monodie. Ballade en mode phrygien. Choral cistercian pour une élévation. Variations sur un thème de Clément Janequin. Le jardin suspendu. Litanies. Fantasmagorie. Trois danses. Quatre pièces. Grave. Petite pièce. Intermezzo. Lamento. Première fantaisie. Deuxième fantaisie. Deux dances à Agni Yavishta. Cinque pièces faciles – Complainte à la mode ancienne; Fugue en mode de Fa; Verset-Choral; Berceuse. Postlude pour l'office de Complies. Page 21 du huitième cahier de notes de Jehan Alain

Kevin Bowyer org
Nimbus ② NI5551/2 (146 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded on the Marcussen Organ, Chapel of St Augustine, Tonbridge School, Kent in 1997 ●●●

This is the most comprehensive and most impressive recording yet of Alain's organ music. Bowyer offers nine pieces not included on Eric Lebrun's two-disc survey from Naxos. These may not be among the composer's most substantial creations, but Alain enthusiasts would not like to be without any of them, least of all the intensely moving page from one of Alain's notebooks setting out his musical reactions to the death, in a mountaineering accident, of his sister, Marie-Odile. Bowyer's performances are thought-provoking, stimulating and often inspired. His tempos are not especially quick although he does turn out the fastest performance ever recorded of the Intermezzo. Yet even here the choice of speed is symptomatic of Bowyer's whole approach; nobody could deny that when played so rapidly the work takes on a new dimension.

Nimbus achieves a near-perfect balance between clarity and atmosphere on the new Marcussen in Tonbridge School's rebuilt Chapel. When the disarming dialogue between a single reed and the flutes of the charming Petite pièce can be revealed in such detail nobody could realistically ask for a better setting for this magical music. Bowyer proves to be an unusually perceptive and persuasive advocate of Alain's music. One suspects it will be a long time before a serious contender to this outstanding release comes along.

Litanies. Petite pièce. Le jardin suspendu. Deuxième fantaisie. Variations sur un thème de Clément Janequin. Deux dances à Agni Yavishta. Deux préludes profanes. Choral cistercian pour une élévation. Climat. Monodie. Ballade en mode phrygien. Choral phrygien. Suite
Eric Lebrun org
Naxos 8 553632 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded on the organ of the Church of Saint-Antoine des Quinze-Vingts, Paris in 1995

Trois danses. Intermezzo. Variations sur 'Lucis créator'. Berceuse. Grave. Lamento. Première fantaisie. Prélude et Fugue. Choral dorien. Aria. Postlude pour l'office de Complies
Eric Lebrun org
Naxos 8 553633 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded on the organ of the Church of Saint-Antoine des Quinze-Vingts, Paris in 1995 ●

Whether it's the weirdly sombre Lamento, the captivating Intermezzo, the pseudo-archaic Variations sur un thème de Clément Janequin or the dramatically fervent Litanies, to have it all brought together under one roof allows us to revel in that magical mix of mysticism, melancholy and modality which makes Alain's voice so distinctive. This splendid Cavaillé-Coll organ, set in a richly atmospheric acoustic, seems the perfect vehicle for Alain's music, with its kaleidoscopic use of subtle colours and effects. It possesses glorious stops and seems fully equipped to deal with everything Alain's music demands of it. What a shame, then, that the recording itself misses the mark. An indistinct focus blurs much of the detail, while there just isn't enough of the church's ambience to compensate for this lack of clarity. There again, Eric Lebrun is guilty of some pretty indistinct articulation himself; that said, much of his playing is outstanding. The best-known works verge on the controversial (Le jardin suspendu, for example, is superficial), but in the rarely heard Suite he produces playing of conviction and magnetism. And with a deeply moving account of the Postlude pour l'office de Complies, he more than justifies Naxos's faith in him. This deserves a place on the shelves of all organ music devotees.

Isaac Albéniz

Spanish 1860-1909

GROVE Albéniz is one of the most important figures in Spanish musical history; he helped create a national idiom and an indigenous school of piano music. He studied at the Brussels Conservatory and with Liszt, Dukas and d'Indy; other important influences were Felipe Pedrell (who inspired him to turn to Spanish folk music), 19th-century salon piano music and impressionist harmony. But he was not simply a follower of the French school and exchanged ideas with Debussy and Ravel in Paris. Most of his many works are for piano solo, the best known being the suite Iberia (1906-8), distinguished by its complex technique, bold harmony and evocative instrumental effects. He also wrote a notable opera, Pepita Jiménez (1896). Albéniz was also a virtuoso pianist with a highly personal style.

Iberia

Albéniz Iberia (arr Gray) – El Albaicín; Triana; Rondeña
Granados Valses poéticos (trans Williams)
Rodrigo Invocación y Danza. En los trigales
Anonymous (arr Llobet). Ten Catalan Folksongs
John Williams gtr London Symphony Orchestra / Paul Daniels
Sony Classical SK48480 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1989-91 ●

The amalgam of technical guitaristic perfection in the face of daunting demands, fluid musicality and exemplary tone-production, caught in this exceptionally lifelike recording, represents a landmark in the instrument's march towards true parity with other instruments. Granados's Valses are unabridged, Rodrigo's moody Invocación y Danza comes in its original and more effective form, and two of the charming settings of Catalan folk-songs arranged by Llobet have no other recording. Nothing in Albéniz's virtuosic Iberia is accessible to the solo guitar, but with the aid of the LSO and Gray's enchantingly evocative arrangements, Williams shows three of its movements in a new and colourful light. To anyone with the slightest interest in the guitar or Spanish romantic music, this disc is a required purchase.

Iberia. Navarra (compl de Séverac).
Suite española, Op 47
Alicia de Larrocha pf
Decca ② 417 887-2DH2 (126 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1986 OO

Written during Albéniz's last three years, Iberia is his masterwork for the piano. The full extent of the journey he travelled in his all-too-brief life span of 49 years can't be fully appreciated by comparing these 12 richly colourful 'impressions' with the Suite española, generally accepted as his earliest serious foray into the nationalist field. Larrocha also gives us the bonus of the exuberant Navarra originally intended by the composer (before he rejected it as 'too plebeian') to end Iberia. Coming from such a distinguished specialist in the Spanish field, the album is as musically enjoyable as it is musicologically stimulating. Her playing has immediacy, subtlety and charm besides revealing fingers so magically able to conceal Albéniz's sometimes cruel technical demands. Compared to the old LP recording the clarity of colouring is like an old painting newly cleaned. But it's not just the recording that allows Larrocha's most recent Iberia to make a more vivid impact. Everything here carries just that little extra conviction. Every tiny detail in Albéniz's multi-layered textures, every counter-strand, every fleck of colour, is always crystal-clear.

As for Larrocha's range of colour, and the sheer sensuous beauty of her tone, that can only be described as a feast for the ear. She plays the Suite española with a spontaneous delight in their tunes, textures and rhythms; she enjoys them as the engaging morceaux de salon that, in comparison with what follows in Iberia, they undoubtedly are.

Additional recommendation
de Larrocha pf
Coupling: Granados Goyescas
Decca Double ② 448 191-2DF2 (141 minutes: ADD: 4/96) Ⓑ

Though not as finely recorded as her digital remake (reviewed above), Larrocha's 1972 recording is worth considering at budget price.

Mallorca

Albéniz Mallorca, Op 202. Suite española, Op 47. Cantos de España, Op 232 – Córdoba Granados Cuentos de la juventud – Dedicatoria. 15 Tonadillas – El majo olvidado. 12 Danzas españolas, Op 37 – Villanesca; Andaluza (Playera). 7 Valses poéticos
Rodrigo Tres Piezas españolas
Julian Bream gtr
RCA Navigator 74321 17903-2 Ⓢ
(77 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1982-83 OO

This recital offers playing of extraordinary magnetism and an almost total illusion of the great guitarist seated in the room making music just beyond one's loudspeakers; this effect is particularly striking in Albéniz's Córdoba and the pianissimo reprise of the central section of the Granados Danza española No 5, which is quite magical. The other works included are all played with comparable spontaneity.

RCA here reissue this disc at super-bargain price on their enterprising Navigator label; moreover, they have added Rodrigo's Tres Piezas españolas, recorded a year later. The second of these, a seven-minute 'Passacaglia', is quite masterly, while the final 'Zapateado' brings characteristically chimerical virtuosity from the soloist. It is difficult to identify another recital of Spanish guitar music that surpasses this, and it is now one of the great bargains in the Navigator catalogue.

Merlin

Carlos Alvarez bar Merlin; Plácido Domingo ten King Arthur; Jane Henschel sop Morgan le Fay; Ana María Martínez sop Nivian; Carlos Chausson bass Archbishop of Canterbury; Christopher Maltman bar Mordred; Javier Franco bar Sir Pellinore; Felipe Bou bass Sir Ector de Maris; José López Ferrero ten Kay; Javier Roldán bass King Lot of Orkney; Angel Rodríguez ten Gawain; Alfonso X 'El Sabio'; Spanish National Choir; Madrid Community Choir; Madrid Symphony Orchestra / José de Eusebio
Decca ② 467 096-2DHO2 (136 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 OO

This set is a revelation, and hugely enjoyable. While Albéniz has long been celebrated as an inspired composer of colourful piano music with a marked Spanish flavour, here in Merlin he emerges as a formidable opera composer, setting out to write his equivalent of Wagner's Ring cycle using a libretto (in English) based on the Arthurian legends. Albéniz completed the piano score in 1898, but did not finish the orchestral version until 1902. All plans for performance in the composer's lifetime fell through, and the only staging ever, incomplete, was a one-off event in Barcelona in 1960. Until recently, the full score was thought to be lost, but, encouraged by Spanish scholars José de Eusebio painstakingly collated material from various sources to produce a complete score, as recorded here.

Listening to almost any passage of this luxuriant score, it would be hard to identify the composer. One might just possibly guess Stanford, thanks to the occasional English-sounding motif, or maybe Humperdinck, who is similarly more straightforward than Wagner, or maybe Paul Dukas, one of Albéniz's teachers.

That is all to Albéniz's credit, for even if there are one or two banal moments, the score consistently compels attention with its rich presentation of the Arthurian story. Weaknesses centre on the libretto; the poetic language is extraordinarily contorted, using archaic words in the most ham-fisted way, while the plot is seriously flawed.

The recorded performance could hardly be finer. Plácido Domingo, as Arthur, sings nobly and with passion, even though he is disappointingly absent from the last half of Act 3. Carlos Alvarez as Merlin is equally fine, using his firm, dark baritone with an incisiveness and expressive range worthy of a Wotan. And though the timbres of the American sopranos, Jane Henschel as Morgan le Fay and Ana María Martínez as Nivian are similar enough to confuse one in places, they both characterise well, singing with consistently rich, warm tone. Christopher Maltman is a suitably evil-sounding Mordred, and outstanding among the others is the young tenor Angel Rodríguez, as Gawain.

The chorus sings with clear, incandescent tone, and under the dedicated direction of Eusebio the orchestra plays brilliantly, helped by a recording that's exceptionally full, atmospheric and well balanced.

Tomaso Albinoni

Italian 1671-1751

GROVE Born of wealthy parents, Albinoni was a dilettante musician, never seeking a church or court post, though he had contact with noble patrons. He concentrated on instrumental and secular vocal music and had early successes with his opera Zenobia (1694, Venice) and 12 trio sonatas Op 1 (1694). His reputation grew, with operas staged in other cities, beginning with Rodrigo in Algeri (1702, Naples); later operas, such as I veri amici (1722, Munich), were staged abroad. In all he wrote over 50 operas, several other stage works and over 40 solo cantatas; few works date from after 1730.

Albinoni's instrumental works, mostly for strings, were especially popular; 10 sets were published in his lifetime. Bach based four keyboard fugues on subjects from the Op 1 sonatas. While Albinoni's concertos were less adventurous and soloistic than Vivaldi's, they were probably the earliest consistently in three movements, and his oboe concertos Op 7 (1715) were the first by an Italian to be published. The sonatas (for one to six instruments with continuo) are mostly in four movements. His music is individual, with a strong melodic character and, especially in the early works, formally well balanced.

12 Concerti a cinque, Op 5

Collegium Musicum 90 / Simon Standage vn P
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0663 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●●

Albinoni might be described as a specialist in the medium of the Concerto a cinque, of which he composed 54 under five opus numbers, published at intervals during almost half of his productive life. The first six appeared in his Op 2 (1700), together with six sonatas from which they inherited some structural features, and were followed in 1707 by the 12 of Op 5. They were 'halfway houses' on the road to the violin concerto per se as we know it – and as Vivaldi established it four years later. Virtuosic passages for a solo violin appear only en passant in flanking movements and 'symmetrically' in the Adagios of Nos 3, 6, 9 and 12. Each Concerto is in three-movement form and all the finales are fugal, as they are in the Op 2, though in their simplicity they sound rather like rondos.

There was little by way of innovation in Albinoni's concertos, which leant on past examples and stressed some of their most durable features, but the lyricism of the Adagios of No 2, 5, 8 and 11 (again symmetrically placed) was indeed new. Their strength is in his gift of melodic invention, their clearly defined form and thematic material, their conciseness – a virtue that did not survive in some of his later concertos – and their vitality and freshness. The recording and annotation are of the highest standard, and of the performances it might be said that if they are ever bettered in any respect, we and Albinoni will indeed be fortunate.

Concerti a cinque, Opp 7 and 9

Op 7 – No 1 in D; No 2 in C; No 3 in B flat; No 4 in G; No 5 in C; No 6 in D; No 7 in A; No 8 in D; No 9 in F; No 10 in B flat; No 11 in C; No 12 in C
Op 9 – No 1 in B flat; No 2 in D minor; No 3 in F; No 4 in A; No 5 in C; No 6 in G. No 7 in D; No 8 in G minor; No 9 in C; No 10 in F; No 11 in B flat; No 12 in D
CHAN0579 – Op 7 Nos 3, 6, 9 and 12. Op 9 Nos 2, 5, 8 and 11 P
CHAN0602 – Op 7 Nos 1, 2, 4 and 5. Op 9 Nos 1, 3, 4 and 6. Sinfonia in G minor
CHAN0610 – Op 7 Nos 7, 8, 10 and 11. Op 9 Nos 7, 9, 10 and 12
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0579/0602/0610 Ⓕ
(oas: 72, 63 and 65 minutes: DDD)
Anthony Robson, Catherine Latham obs
Collegium Musicum 90 / Simon Standage vn
Recorded 1993 and 1996 ●

Albinoni's Op 7 and Op 9 consist of four concertos with (rather than for, as the composer insisted) one oboe, four with two oboes and four for strings only. Overall, the last show a strong family resemblance, with vivacious outer movements and suave slow movements that tend to be more chromatic; but the Op 9 string concertos include a solo violin part, at times very elaborate. The first volume contains the works for solo oboe and strings. Albinoni treats the oboe like a voice and the slow movements have tunes that stay in the mind. The second volume contains the string and double-oboe concertos. All are three-movement da chiesa works, with cheerful outer movements and slow ones that often remind you that Albinoni wrote a good deal of vocal music. The two oboes 'sing' together for the most part, either in thirds or in unison. The concertos on Vol 3 for two oboes display rather more individuality – the joyous finale of Op 7 No 11 intriguingly sharpens the fourth of the scale, Op 9 No 9 allows the oboes more independence of each other, while in the outer movements of Op 9 No 12 the oboes put up a good pretence at being trumpets.

Anthony Robson and Catherine Latham contribute deftly to the spirit of enjoyment that emanates from the whole of this disc. Collegium Musicum 90 is one of the very best Baroque bands around and here the players are in their element. The recorded balance is just right, keeping soloists and strings in equal perspective. These discs bid strongly for a place on every shelf.

---

12 Concerti a cinque, Op 9 Ⓟ
Andrew Manze vn Frank de Bruine, Alfredo Bernardini obs Academy of Ancient Music / Christopher Hogwood
Decca ② 458 129-2OH2 Ⓕ
(117 minutes: DDD) ●

For consistently amiable, if undemanding entertainment, Albinoni's concertos are hard to beat. Christopher Hogwood and the Academy of Ancient Music here perform the 12 concertos contained in the collection published in 1722 as the composer's Op 9. Neither the formal content nor the musical style differs significantly from Albinoni's earlier collection, Op 7 (1715); each set includes four concertos for strings, four for strings with oboe and four for strings with two oboes. In the Op 9 set, though, greater emphasis is placed on solo violin in the all-string pieces. This set contains perhaps Albinoni's crowning achievement in the concerto sphere, a lyrical Adagio for solo oboe with a simple string arpeggio accompaniment belonging to the Second Concerto. Its wistful, undulating melody lingers forever in the memory, outclassing in every respect the spurious G minor Adagio upon which, paradoxically, Albinoni's reputation today has largely been established. There are many delightful slow movements in this set, but also some irresistibly sprightly ones. These belong mainly to the pieces for two oboes, the Third and Sixth Concertos of the set providing spirited examples. None of this is lost either on the three accomplished soloists – Andrew Manze, Frank de Bruine and Alfredo Bernardini – or the strings of the Academy of Ancient Music, which provide lively and sensitive support. In short, the set affords uninterrupted pleasure from start to finish.

---

8 550739 12 Concerti a cinque – Op 9 Nos 2, 3, 5, 8, 9 and 11
8 553002 Sinfonia in G (arr Camden). 12 Concerti a cinque – Op 7 Nos 1, 2, 3, 8 and 9. Op 9 No 6.
8 553035 12 Concerti a cinque – Op 7 Nos 4, 5, 6, 11 and 12. Op 9 No 12
Anthony Camden, Julia Girdwood, Alison Alty obs The London Virtuosi / John Georgiadis
Naxos 8 550739/3002/3035 Ⓢ
(64, 58 and 52 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1992 and 1994 ●

The oboe participates in, rather than dominates, these works in a chamber-music-like fashion. Albinoni was not in the business of springing harmonic surprises, but was a fluent writer of engaging tunes, particularly those in the Adagios – each of these works has one – and of elegant discourses between the soloist and the upper strings. Anthony Camden and Julia Girdwood produce liquid sounds from their modern instruments and are as meltingly expressive in the slow movements as they are light on their feet in the flanking ones. The London Virtuosi, also using modern strings, has a nice, clean air about it and gives the music neither more nor less than its due. The recording is bright and well balanced.

Volume 2 begins with a strings-only Sinfonia in G, to which Anthony Camden has added oboe parts; it is thematically related to the Concerto, Op 7 No 4 (given in its original form), but to appreciate this bit of auto-plagiary you will need Vol 3. The three discs are better sampled than listened to from start to finish – unless you are an oboist or an insatiable 'Baroque person'; there are some delectable pickings to be had, particularly among the slow movements.

The performances and recording quality are of the same order as those of Vol 1, 'couth, kempt and shevelled' – as is the graceful and amiable music itself. As an archive, the complete set is hard to resist at super-bargain price.

Sonate da chiesa, Op 4

Six Sonate da chiesa, Op 4. 12 Trattenimenti armonici per camera, Op 6 Ⓟ
Locatelli Trio (Elizabeth Wallfisch vn Richard Tunnicliffe vc Paul Nicholson hpd/org)
Hyperion ② CDA66831/2 (159 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992

All the pieces on these discs are violin sonatas rather than trio sonatas but, sensibly, Paul Nicholson uses harpsichord for Op 6 and organ for Op 4, thereby providing the listener with variety in colour. This variety is maximised by a decision to intermingle the two sets. Each sonata is cast in the four movement slow-fast-slow-fast da chiesa pattern although, as with Corelli but to an even greater extent, Albinoni far from keeps to the da chiesa spirit, introducing instead a wealth of dance measures. Almost invariably the music is graceful in character, melodically appealing – above all in the slow movements such as the Adagio of Op 4 No 6 – and expressively restrained.

These qualities are certainly not lost on Elizabeth Wallfisch, who affectingly captures the limpid, reflective content of slow movements, on the one hand, and the brilliance of the faster ones on the other. Richard Tunnicliffe gives her discreet and sensitive support throughout. Possibly a little more in the way of caprice during the sparkling Allegros would be nice. It is not that the playing lacks vitality but that a certain worthiness of approach is sensed. In all essentials, though, this is an enjoyable and very worthwhile release, illuminating less familiar aspects of Albinoni's music.

Hugo Alfvén

Swedish 1872-1960

GROVE Alfvén studied at the Stockholm Conservatory (1887-91) and privately with Lindegren, also training as a painter. Thereafter he worked as a choirmaster and Director Musices at Uppsala University (1910-39). His music is distinguished by orchestral subtlety and a painterly exploitation of harmony and timbre. It is almost all programmatic, often seeking to evoke the landscapes and seascapes of southern Sweden (eg Midsummer Vigil, 1903; Shepherd-girl's Dance, 1923). His main works include five symphonies, much choral music and songs.

Swedish Rhapsodies

Swedish Rhapsodies – No 1, Op 19, 'Midsummer Vigil'; No 2, Op 24, 'Upsala-rapsodi'; No 3, 'Dalarapsodi'. A Legend of the Skerries, Op 20. Gustav Adolf II, Op 49 – Elegy
Iceland Symphony Orchestra / Petri Sakari
Chandos CHAN9313 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993

Petri Sakari gives us the most natural, unaffected and satisfying Midsummer Vigil to be heard on disc. He is light in touch, responsive to each passing mood and every dynamic nuance, self-effacing and completely at the service of the composer. Moreover, in the Upsala-rapsodi and its later companion he is fresher and more persuasive than any of his rivals on record. Even the Wagnerian-Straussian echoes from the skerries sound convincing. The only reservation concerns the Elegy from the incidental music to Ludwig Nordström's play about Gustav Adolf II, which might have benefited from greater reticence. Unusually for Sakari, he does not tell the tale simply or let the music speak for itself. The recorded sound is refreshingly free from analytical point-making; everything is there in the right perspective, although listeners whose first response is to find the recording recessed will find that a higher level of playback than usual will produce impressively natural results on high-grade equipment.

Cantatas

Cantata, 'At the Turn of the Century', Op 12^{ac}. Cantata for the 1917 Reformation Festivities in Uppsala, Op 36^{bc}. The Bells, Op 13^{b}
^{a}Lena Hoel sop ^{b}Karl-Magnus Fredriksson bar
^{c}Royal Stockholm Philharmonic Choir; Gävle Symphony Orchestra / Stefan Parkman
Sterling CDS1036-2 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1999 ●

Cantatas for ceremonial or anniversary occasions have a distinguished tradition in the Nordic countries, as can be seen in the catalogues of Sibelius, Grieg, Nielsen and Holmboe. Hugo Alfvén was as accomplished as any – indeed, comparing the two main works on this new release with Sibelius's 'Conferment' and Coronation cantatas, Alfvén was the finer exponent. Listen to the opening movement, 'Life's Empire', of Vid sekelskiftet ('At the Turn of the Century'), which has real nobility about it; and if the second and fourth are emptily high-spirited, they still sound fun. Alfvén's style may seem archaic for 1899, but there are sufficient passages – especially in the third movement, 'Väldarnas offer' ('The world's offering', a solo for soprano which can be performed separately) – that reveal the anachronisms to be more calculated than might at first appear. Alfvén's next numbered opus, the ballad Klockorna ('The Bells', 1900), was more consistently adventurous in harmony and orchestration, and is an absolute gem, sung beautifully by Karl-Magnus Fredriksson.

Fredriksson also features in the 1917 cantata commemorating the 400th anniversary of Luther nailing his 95 Theses to the chapel door in Wittenberg, thereby setting in motion the Protestant Reformation. The music (built around three Lutheran chorales) is magnificent, particularly in the first two movements, with their deeply affecting nobility of utterance.

Stefan Parkman, who directed several wonderful discs with the Danish National Radio Choir, secures wonderfully full and committed performances from all concerned, and Sterling's recording is warm and clear. A thoroughly estimable project, warmly recommended.

Charles-Valentin Alkan

French 1813-1888

GROVE Alkan was a leading piano virtuoso and an unusual composer, remarkable in technique and imagination yet largely ignored by his own and succeeding generations. A child prodigy, he studied at the Paris Conservatoire. Although he held no official appointment and rarely played publicly, he was known for the brilliance of his playing, his wide repertory of earlier music and as a champion of the pedal piano (for which he composed). His complex works include extra-musical elements; he favoured obscure titles and subject matter (often with a satanic, childish or mystical tone), bold tonal structures and unusual metres. He exploited brilliantly the keyboard's resources, often making great demands of technique and stamina, and used scrupulously exact notation. Many of his some 70 opus numbers are organised in long schemes of harmonic studies, such as the 25 Préludes in all the major and minor keys Op 31 (1847) and the 12 Études Op 39 (1857); his most famous and demanding works are his Grande Sonate, Op 33 and the Concerto (for piano solo) from Op 39. He was greatly admired by Liszt and Busoni.

Grand duo concertante, Op 21

Grand duo concertante in F sharp minor, Op 21. Sonate de concert in E, Op 47. Trio in G minor, Op 30
Trio Alkan (Kolja Lessing vn Bernhard Schwarz vc Rainer Klaas pf)
Naxos 8 555352 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1991

As this disc so persuasively reveals, there are a number of Alkan's chamber works that are long overdue for serious consideration. His violin sonata, the Grand duo concertante, for instance, is so thoroughly original and masterly in invention that it should have acquired for itself a prominent place in the French violin sonata repertoire. The somewhat unconventional tonal layout of the bold and memorable first movement suggests, at times, the harmonic world of Berlioz, but perhaps more strikingly looks forward, both here and in the final movement, to the melodic, Gallic charm of the Fauré sonatas.

The Sonate de concert for cello and piano is perhaps Alkan's finest and most important contribution to chamber music. Although clearly rooted in the classical tradition, it shouts Alkan from every page. The second movement, in siciliano style, is a fine example of Alkan whimsy; in the slow movement, Alkan draws musical inspiration from his Jewish faith to create a serene and somewhat mystical oasis of calm before launching into the helter-skelter activity of the finale. The earlier Piano Trio of 1841 is perhaps even more classical in design and utterance, and is certainly more terse and economical in its use of material. However, it's no easy ride for the performers. The Scherzo is strangely prophetic of Tchaikovsky in places and is graced with a fiendishly difficult finale. The performances are quite superb. Klaas copes admirably with all the keyboard pyrotechnics thrown at him, and Lessing and Schwarz provide performances of dedication and great understanding. Recording is full-bodied and close, although not uncomfortably so.

Three Etudes, Op 76

Alkan Transcription de concert (Beethoven's Piano Concerto No 3 in C minor, Op 37 – first movement). Three Etudes, Op 76 Busoni Sonatina No 6 super Carmen (Kammerfantasie) Chopin/Alkan Piano Concerto No 1 in E minor, Op 11 – Romanza Medtner Danza festiva, Op 38 No 3
Marc-André Hamelin pf Hyperion CDA66765 Ⓕ
(72 minutes: DDD). Recorded live in 1994 ○○

The solo transcriptions on the first half of this disc are not intended as substitutes for the real thing – at least not in the context of this disc – but they are presented here as supreme examples of the art of piano transcription in the late 19th century. In addition, they are superb display pieces, revealing not only the subtleties of the transcriber's art and, in this case, the pianist's ability to render them audible, but also Hamelin's extraordinary ability to make the pieces sound like originals rather than transcriptions. Indeed, in the Alkan transcription of the first movement of Beethoven's Third Piano Concerto, the absence of the orchestra never becomes a concern. The principal glory of the disc, however, is Hamelin's account of Alkan's Etudes, Op 76, for the hands separately and reunited, an exceptionally formidable opus which here receives a formidable and awe-inspiring performance. We also have the added frisson of knowing that what we hear is a single take before a live audience; listen to the hair-raising final study, a blistering, unbroken five-minute salvo of prestissimo semiquavers. The remaining items – a scintillating account of Busoni's Sonatina No 6 and Medtner's ebullient Danza festiva from Op 38 – provide further evidence of Hamelin's undoubted skill. The recorded sound varies a little from piece to piece but all are excellent in quality.

12 Etudes, Op 39

12 Etudes dans les tons mineurs, Op 39. Nocturne, Op 22. Etude in F, Op 35 No 5. Assez vivement, Op 38 No 1. Préludes, Op 31 – No 8, La chanson de la folle au bord de la mer; No 12, Le temps qui n'est plus; No 13, J'étais endormie, mais mon coeur veillait. Esquisses, Op 63 – No 2, La staccatissimo; No 4, Les cloches; No 11, Les soupirs; No 48, En songe. Gros temps, Op 74 No 10. First Suite No 2. Barcarolle, Op 65 No 6
Jack Gibbons pf
ASV ② CDDCS227 (155 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ○○

'Comme le vent' ('Like the wind'), the opening Etude from Op 39, is a real baptism of fire for the pianist. Marked prestissimamente, it is an unrelenting deluge of notes which, if played at Alkan's specified metronome marking, travels at the rate of 160 bars per minute, or to put it another way, traverses 20 densely packed pages in just 4'30". Gibbons throws caution to the wind and completes the whirlwind in a staggering 4'38". Despite the odd occasion when he comes perilously close to tumbling into the abyss, this ranks among the most exhilarating feats of pianism to be heard on disc. If Gibbons's credentials as an Alkan pianist are not sealed in his performance of the first Etude then his reading of the following two Etudes, 'En rythme molossique' and 'Scherzo diabolico', surely confirm him as an Alkan interpreter of exceptional authority. Listening to these commanding and exceedingly sure-footed performances one is left with the feeling that Gibbons has grown with and nurtured these pieces for some time. The following four Etudes make up the Symphony for Solo Piano and, if anything, Gibbons is even more impressive in his reading of this striking work.

Moving on to the Concerto for Solo Piano, Etudes Nos 8-10, Gibbons gives a wildly romantic reading. More extraordinary feats of virtuosity await the listener in the 12th Etude ('Le festin d'Esope') and the Allegro barbaro from the Op 35 Etudes, but the delightful selection of miscellaneous pieces with which Gibbons fills the remainder of the set shows not only the more introverted side of Alkan's creativity but also allows Gibbons to display a less ostentatious and more directly poetic aspect of his playing. The simple Nocturne in B major, with its Chopinesque heartbeat, is beautifully rendered as are the 'Les soupirs' and 'En songe' from the Esquisses, Op 63 and the Barcarolle, Op 65 No 6. However, the highlight of these miniatures comes with Gibbons's sensitive and effective delivery of the potently atmospheric 'La chanson de la folle au bord de la mer' ('Song of the mad woman on the seashore'), surely one of the most curious piano pieces to emerge from the 19th century.

Highly recommended to both Alkan devotees and newcomers alike. Excellent recorded sound.

Grande sonate, Op 33

Grande sonate, Op 33, 'Les quatre âges'. Sonatine, Op 61. Barcarolle, Op 65 No 6. Etudes dans les tons mineurs, Op 39 – No 12, 'Le festin d'Esope'.
Marc-André Hamelin pf
Hyperion CDA66794 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●●

Les quatre âges is an extraordinary piece in many respects, not least in its rather unconventional layout of four movements, each employing progressively slower tempos. Perhaps for this reason it has never attained a place in the repertoire – the extremely slow finale is hardly the sort of movement to ignite an overwhelming response from an audience at the close of the sonata, despite the feats of hair-raising bravura required in the first two movements. Hamelin's performance is everything one could wish for. The crispness and precision of his finger-work in the dazzling first movement is quite breathtaking and the sometimes superhuman feats of pianism demanded in the Faust-inspired second movement are executed with astounding ease. His reading of the third movement is beautifully poised and charmingly rendered while the tragic, Promethean finale is most effectively and powerfully projected.

The Sonatine, Op 61 is an entirely different matter, concise and concentrated in the extreme. Hamelin's direct, finely articulated no-nonsense reading brings out the clarity and economy of the writing, and he is also quick to underscore the work's more classical stance. A beautifully serene and hypnotic account of the seductive 'Barcarolle' follows, and the disc closes with a stunning display of pianistic gymnastics in the shape of 'Le festin d'Esope' from the Op 39 Etudes. Recorded sound is excellent.

Further listening
Lyapunov 12 Studies, Etudes d'éxecution transcendante
Scherbakov pf
Marco Polo 8 223491 (71 minutes: DDD: 4/94) Ⓕ
Fiendishly challenging studies for pianists who like to live dangerously. Awe-inspiring listening for non-pianists!

Gregorio Allegri

Italian c1582-1652

GROVE Allegri was a singer and composer at the cathedrals of Fermo and Tivoli and later maestro di cappella of Spirito in Sassia, Rome, and a singer in the papal choir. He composed many of his works for this choir and that of S Maria in Vallicella. His reputation rests on his Miserere, a psalm setting traditionally sung every Holy Week by the papal choir: it is basically a simple five-part chant, transformed by interpolated ornamented passages for a four-part solo choir which reaches top C (rare at that time). These passages were a closely guarded secret for many years; Mozart wrote out the work from memory when he was 14. Allegri was at his best in the a cappella style, as in his five masses; he also published three books of more up-to-date small-scale concertato church music.

Miserere mei

Allegri Miserere mei
Palestrina Motets – Stabat mater a 8. Hodie beata virgo. Senex puerem portabat. Magnificat a 8. Litanie de Beata Virgine Maria I
Roy Goodman treb King's College Choir, Cambridge / Sir David Willcocks
Decca Legends 466 373-2DM (56 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1963-64 ●●●

It is doubtful if any recording made by the choir of King's College, Cambridge, in the fertile Willcocks era, will prove more enduring than this celebrated performance of Allegri's Miserere. Admittedly there are more authentic versions in the catalogue, authentic not only in that they use the original Latin words where Willcocks opts for an English translation, but also in the sense that they search for a style less obviously redolent of choral evensong and the Anglican tradition. At the farthest extreme from King's, other versions strip Allegri's score of its various 18th- and 19th-century accretions – a nice piece of musical archaeology which, ironically, reveals the utter plainness of the Miserere when denied its familiar jewels, and sounds like an imposter when dressed up in even more garish baubles. For many the richly communicative singing of King's remains the ideal, however far removed it may be from the orginal intentions of Allegri. The Miserere is accompanied here by some classic Palestrina performances, which are still as fresh as when they were recorded in 1964. Some tape-hiss intrudes, but otherwise the sound is excellent. 'Fabulous' is the only way to describe this disc.

Miserere mei (two versions). Missa Vidi turbam magnam. De ore prudentis. Repleti sunt omnes. Cantate domino
A Sei Voci / Bernard Fabre-Garrus with Dominique Ferran org
Astrée Naïve E8524 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1994

Allegri's setting of the psalm Miserere mei is presented in two versions. The first is sung with ornamentation added by the French musicologist, Jean Lionnet following 17th-century models, while the second presents the Burney-Alfieri version familiar from the classic 1963 Willcocks recording above. The curiously named group A Sei Voci (in fact there are 10 of them) produce a rather varied sound, which is at times somewhat flat and white but at its best is embued with an appropriate Italianate edge. For the most part the embellishments are negotiated with style and verve; just occasionally (in the first Miserere) they are fuzzy or insecure. Miserere mei apart, hardly any of Allegri's music is heard either liturgically or in the concert hall. By training a pupil of Nanino, a distinguished follower of Palestrina, his best music is written confidently in the High Renaissance contrapuntal manner. The six-voice Missa Vidi turbam magnam, composed on one of his own motets, is a fine work, and shows that the stile antico, far from being a mere academic exercise, could still be vividly sonorous and dramatic, qualities which are brought out in this reading. The record is nicely rounded out with a selection of short continuo motets in the popular new manner, well established in Northern Italy, which was then becoming fashionable in Rome.

Additional recommendation
Miserere mei
Couplings: Lotti Crucifixus – a 6; a 8; a 10.
Works by Gesualdo, G Gabrieli, Monteverdi, Bai/Allegri, John IV
Westminster Abbey Choir; ᵃAbbey Consort / Neary
Sony Classical SK66615 (77 minutes: DDD: 7/96) Ⓕ
A fascinating collection of polyphony which puts Allegri's famous work in the context of contemporary settings.

William Alwyn

British 1905-1985

GROVE Alwyn studied with McEwen at the Royal Academy of Music (1920-23) and later taught there (1926-55); in 1961 he retired to Suffolk to compose. He disowned everything he wrote before the Divertimento for flute (1939), which opened a neo-classical phase, followed in the 1950 by a personal vein of English Romanticism. His music is characterised by precise workmanship. It includes five symphonies (1949, 1953, 1956, 1959, 1973) and two string quartets, opera (Miss Julie, 1976) and songs (often to his own words: he also published poems and essays); he wrote over 60 film scores, too.

Symphony No 3

Violin Concerto. Symphony No 3
Lydia Mordkovitch vn
London Symphony Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9187 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●

The Violin Concerto, although essentially threnodic and lyrical, opens confidently and the orchestra returns with regular bursts of energy. The end of the movement (the rapt pianissimo closing section) is exquisite: one is reminded here of Vaughan Williams' The lark ascending, although as the second movement Allegretto opens, the melodic writing also brings hints of Elgar. The finale is fairly vigorous, but again the lyrical impulse is all important. The work is discursive, yet has moments of great intensity. The performance could not be bettered and Mordkovitch's pianissimo playing is touchingly beautiful.

The Third Symphony is an outstanding example of Alwyn's earlier symphonic manner and is in three movements. The first combines driving rhythmic agitation with a powerful lyrical thrust. The Adagio, introduced by a peaceful horn theme, has an animated, brassy development, then ethereal strings restore the sense of repose, the horns returning glowingly. The finale restores the forward momentum with its rhythmic zest and has a powerful and satisfying resolution. Hickox's reading is truly convincing and the LSO responds committedly to a work that must be rewarding to play.

Additional recommendation
Symphony No 3
Couplings: Symphonies Nos 2 and 5
London Philharmonic Orchestra / Alwyn
Lyrita SRCD228 (77 minutes: ADD: 10/92) Ⓕ
Passionate, authoritative performances from Alwyn himself.

Symphony No 4

Symphonies – No 1 in D; No 4
London Philharmonic Orchestra / William Alwyn
Lyrita SRCD227 (77 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1970s ●

Symphony No 4. Elizabethan Dances. Festival March
London Symphony Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN8902 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992 ●

It is interesting to compare Alwyn's own recording with Hickox's version of No 4, an extraordinarily fine work, as the two accounts are remarkably alike. Indeed, when one compares the composer's phrasing of the long and beautiful string cantilena which opens the Adagio e molto calmato of the Passacaglia finale, its ebb and flow and dynamic gradations suggest that either Hickox has listened to the composer's LP or has a remarkable, instinctive feeling for the music (probably both). The Scherzo may have a bit more bite with Alwyn, but this is at least partly caused by the more leonine Lyrita sound. The centrepiece of the Scherzo brings a glorious blossoming from the violins which is equally thrilling in both performances, while at the very end of the symphony the final brass peroration has great forceful thrust from the composer. However, with the LSO and Hickox the slightly richer, more spacious Chandos recording adds to the weight of sonority. In short, these are both highly compelling performances of a remarkably diverse and well-argued symphony, bursting with lyrical ideas and melodic in the way traditional music is communicative, without being old-fashioned. As to the couplings on Chandos, they are relatively slight. The Elizabethan Dances aren't very early Elizabethan, but the languid 'Waltz' (No 2) is rather charming and the 'Poco Allegretto' (No 5) is even more so; the vigorous numbers are more conventional. The Festival March, written for the 1951 Festival of Britain, is an agreeable occasional piece, although its big tune isn't as memorable as those of Walton or Elgar. Yet if you want a modern recording of the Fourth Symphony, these are acceptable makeweights. On the other hand, Lyrita offers the Symphony No 1. It is a work teeming with ideas, and quite often reminds one of Alwyn's film music. With its ample scoring, the composer does go over the top a bit at times and this is not nearly so cogently argued a piece as the Fourth, although it has a rather appealing Adagio. It is splendidly played and the Lyrita recordings have been remastered most skilfully.

Additional recommendation
Symphony No 1
Coupling: Piano Concerto No 1
Shelley pf London Symphony Orchestra / Hickox
Chandos CHAN9155 (56 minutes: DDD: 5/93) Ⓕ

A fine modern version of the First Symphony coupled with the eventful First Piano Concerto of 1930.

Symphony No 5

Piano Concerto No 2. Symphony No 5, 'Hydriotaphia'. Sinfonietta for Strings
Howard Shelley pf
London Symphony Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9196 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●

Piano Concerto No 2 opens heroically and contains a good deal of rhetoric, yet the string writing has a romantic sweep and the Andante proves to be the highlight of the piece. Howard Shelley plays with much bravura and an appealing sensitivity. The powerful Fifth Symphony is a cogent argument distilled into one movement with four sub-sections. The energetically kaleidoscopic first movement is sharply contrasted by a melancholy Andante. The violent Scherzo is followed by a curiously ambivalent finale which provides a moving and compelling, if equivocal, apotheosis for a succinctly argued work. The richly expansive Sinfonietta for Strings, almost twice as long as the symphony, is very much in the English tradition of string writing. It is vigorous in the first movement and hauntingly atmospheric in the beautiful but disconsolate Adagio. The unpredictable finale begins impulsively before the mood changes completely and becomes altogether more subdued and muted in feeling. The obviously dedicated LSO is particularly responsive in the masterly Sinfonietta.

Additional recommendation
Symphony No 5
Couplings: Symphonies Nos 2 and 3
London Philharmonic Orchestra / Alwyn
Lyrita SRCD228 (77 minutes: ADD: 10/92) Ⓕ

A must if you've caught the Alwyn bug: three very different symphonies, given superb performances.

Lyra Angelica

Lyra Angelica. Autumn Legend. Pastoral Fantasia. Tragic Interlude
Rachel Masters hp Nicholas Daniel cor ang
Stephen Tees va
City of London Sinfonia / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9065 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1991 ●

Alwyn valued his Lyra Angelica concerto for harp above all his other music, and it is indeed very beautiful. Alwyn is a master of texture as well as form and the textures here, delicately embroidered by the solo harp, are harmonically rich, and the effect on the listener is very moving. The concerto is played with a real feeling for the music's rapture, and the expansive recorded sound, with rich string timbres and a perfect balance with the solo harp is very fine indeed. The Pastoral Fantasia was written in 1939 and looks back nostalgically to a more peaceful England. The music opens like Delius, but the entry of the viola brings an immediate affinity with Vaughan Williams as the solo viola begins in rhapsodic soliloquy. The Tragic Interlude dates from 1936, when the composer's foreboding of the imminence of the war brought an eloquent protest at the waste of life. The piece opens passionately and gathers momentum, but after its climax, dissolves into a moving elegiac threnody. Autumn Legend is much later (1954). It has a particularly lovely opening, with shafts of sunlight on the strings piercing the clouds, and the music's disconsolate manner has an underlying romantic feeling, rather than conveying pessimism. Yet the dark-hued cor anglais line has a pervading melancholy. It is a fine if ambivalent piece, and Nicholas Daniel, the soloist, captures its mood persuasively, while Richard Hickox shows himself in complete affinity with Alwyn's world. The Chandos recording is outstandingly fine.

Additional recommendation
Lyra Angelica
Couplings: Concerto Grosso No 2. Autumn Legend
Browne cor ang Ellis hp
London Philharmonic Orchestra / Alwyn
Lyrita SRCD230 (56 minutes: ADD: 12/92) Ⓕ

A disc of three of Alwyn's most beautiful works.

Film Music

The Crimson Pirate. Green Girdle. Take my Life[a]. In Search of the Castaways – Rhumba; Ship's Waltz. The Card – suite. The Winslow Boy – suite. Desert Victory – Prologue; Map of Routes to Middle East; Reinforcements Arrive; Training Sequence; March. State Secret – Main Titles and Escape; Grand Ball; Theatre Music; On the Barge; Finale. Svengali – Libera mea[b]
[a]Susan Bullock sop [b]Canzonetta; BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Rumon Gamba
Chandos CHAN9959 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

In vintage British films of the 1940s and '50s one expected a major orchestral film score. William Alwyn, alongside Malcolm Arnold, supplied some of the finest examples. His orchestral flair and the ready lyrical flow of his themes brought much that was memorable, and Philip Lane's reconstructions from the original soundtracks continually remind us of his melodic gifts, never more effectively than in the opening pot-pourri from The Crimson Pirate, which is teeming with lively ideas and nautical colour. In Take my Life Alwyn composed a pastiche aria for the operatic heroine, and wrote yet another for Svengali, both powerfully sung here by Susan Bullock.

The delectably light-hearted score for The Card is a quite perfect, whimsical portrayal of the engagingly resourceful hero of one of Arnold Bennett's most endearing lighter novels, while the 'Coachride to Bursley' is a delightful moto perpetuo scherzando and the finale equally charming and capricious. There is a fine 'Ship's Waltz' and a rumbustious 'Rumba' for In Search of the Castaways while the wartime epic, Desert Victory, opens nobilmente, and closes in similarly patriotic mood with the grandiloquent 'March'. Alwyn was not a purveyor of flamboyant Hollywoodian theme tunes, but his music always added much to the background atmosphere, and for the most part stands up very well on its own, especially when it is as superbly played and recorded as it is here.

Miss Julie

Jill Gomez sop Miss Julie; Benjamin Luxon bar Jean; Della Jones mez Kristin; John Mitchinson ten Ulrik; Philharmonia Orchestra / Vilem Tausky
Lyrita ② SRCD2218 (118 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Notes and text included. Recorded 1983

In his colourful and confident adaptation of Strindberg's play, Alwyn consistently demonstrates his mastery of atmosphere and timing, bringing out the chilling intensity of this story of Miss Julie's sudden infatuation for her father's man-servant. He adapted the play himself, and understood far more than most librettists the need for economy over text.

The idiom, harmonically rich and warmly lyrical, brings occasional Puccinian echoes which, along with reminiscences of other composers, add to the music's impact. By any reckoning this is a confidently red-blooded opera. Tausky's conducting is strong and forceful, with superb singing from all the principals. Jill Gomez is magnificent in the title-role, producing ravishing sounds. Benjamin Luxon gives a wonderfully swaggering portrait of the unscrupulous manservant, vocally firmer than on almost any of his other recordings. Della Jones is splendidly characterful, relishing her venomous cry of 'Bitch!' when, at the very end of Scene 1, she realises Julie and Jean have gone off together. John Mitchinson is characterful too, in his drunken scene. The recording is excellent.

Louis Andriessen

Dutch 1939

After early training with his father, the composer Hendrik Andriessen, he studied with Kees van Baaren at the Royal Conservatory at The Hague and later with Berio in Milan (1962-63) and Berlin (1964-65). Returning to the Netherlands he established himself as a leading musical figure both through his own compositions and as a performer of his own and others' work. Since 1973 he has taught composition at the Royal Conservatory and since the mid-1980s has been in great demand as a guest lecturer.

After a few youthful works influenced by neo-classicism and serialism Andriessen moved away from the postwar European avant garde toward American minimalism, jazz and Stravinsky, developing a musical language that is marked by extremes of ritual and masquerade, of monumentality and intimacy, of formal rigour and intuitive empiricism. The epitome of the Hague School, he is regarded as the most influential Dutch composer of his generation. His most important works include De volharding (1972) De staat (1972-76) De tijd (1980-81) and De materie (1984-89). In the 1990s he collaborated with film director Peter Greenaway on the video M is for Man, Music, Mozart (1991) and the stage works Rosa, A Horse Drama (1994) and Writing to Vermeer (1997-99).

Rosa: The Death of a Composer

Lyndon Terracini bar Juan Manuel de Rosa; Miranda van Kralingen sop First Singer; Madame de Vries; The Texan Whore; The Investigatrix;

Marie Angel sop Second Singer; The Blonde Woman; Esmeralda; Christopher Gillett ten / Roger Smeets bar Alkan; Lully (The Gigolos); The Cowboys; Phyllis Blanford spkr The Index Singer; Schönberg Ensemble; Asko Ensemble / Reinbert de Leeuw
Nonesuch ② 7559-79559-2 (112 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes and text included. Recorded 1998 ○○

Rosa: The Death of a Composer, or 'A Horse Drama', gives us blood on the stable floor, dried, ominous and darkly crusted with sexual symbolism. Louis Andriessen's pile-driving score is a musical enactment related by birth to Stravinsky, though it's probably nearer in spirit to rock, jazz and Broadway. Rosa has a wonderful lack of compromise, a snorting aggression – especially at 8'45" into the Seventh Scene where angular rhythms suddenly transform to a wild canter. The mythical Uruguayan composer Juan Manuel de Rosa rides bareback as his hapless fiancée moans of how Juan loves horses more than he loves her. She has already confessed that she 'pretends to be a horse to amuse his [Juan's] lechery' – and if that shocks you, then brace yourself for a feast of debauchery, violence and black humour.

Andriessen's band comprises woodwinds, brass, synthesizers, percussion and a few amplified strings. The style recalls the bold contrasts in, say, De materie, with tough-fisted rhythms and stark fortissimo chords. The overture is typically confrontational but some of the most powerful music in the score occurs at the end of scene 4 where, in true murder-mystery fashion, a missing clue thwarts the drama's successful resolution. Heavy Blues settle among the opening pages of the fifth scene, and the 11th opens to a Morricone-style solo harmonica, where the hub of the theme reflects another of Andriessen's obsessions. It's a certain Brahms Waltz (from Op 39) that his sister used to hum in their childhood bedroom and that also crops up earlier on in the piece. Who would have thought sentimentality would figure in such a blatantly bestial context, but there you have it! The last scene is trailed by a raunchy, rock-style 'Index Singer' who opens by defining Abattoir ('The location of the opera…A slaughterhouse', etc) and gets as far as Gas, via the likes of Dump and Envy. She eventually makes an exit, but the printed text takes us all the way from Glass-Haired to Zig-Zag.

Rosa was premièred at the Netherlands Opera in 1994 and the performance under review is superb, though special mention should be made of soprano Marie Angel, a marvellous singer and a formidable vocal actress. Film Director Peter Greenaway's libretto is erotic, often lyrical and profoundly ambiguous. Unusually, the words and synopsis complement each other: you read one, then study the other for further elucidation. But the music is pure Andriessen, blanched in the quieter music, and punch-drunk when the going gets hot. It's a music of extremes. If you're unsure, play a minute or so of the overture and the whole of scene 4. That'll tell you all you need to know…more or less.

George Antheil American 1900-1959

GROVE Antheil studied privately with Sternberg and with Bloch (1920) before moving to Berlin in 1922 to make his name as a modernist. Jazz, noise and ostinato were the means, worked into brutally simple designs in the Airplane Sonata (1922) and Sonata sauvage (1923), these last written after his move from Berlin to Paris. There he wrote the Ballet mécanique (1925) for an ensemble of pianos and percussion including electric bells and propellers. In 1926 he turned to neo-classicism, then to opera: Transatlantic (1930, Frankfurt) was a satire on American political life. In 1936 he settled in Los Angeles, where he wrote symphonies, operas vocal, chamber and piano music along more conventional lines.

Symphonies Nos 1 and 6

Symphonies – No 1, 'Zingareska'; No 6, 'after Delacroix'. Archipelago
Frankfurt Radio Symphony Orchestra / Hugh Wolff
CPO CPO999 604-2 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●

In 1923 Antheil gave a piano recital of his own music at the Théâtre des Champs-Elysées in Paris which created the kind of sensation not seen since The Rite of Spring 10 years earlier. Erik Satie was there and applauded vigorously, refusing to be deterred by Milhaud. One can see why. His Symphony No 1, Zingareska (Gypsy Song), comes from the same year as that spectacular piano recital and Antheil was uncertain about it. The gypsy element perhaps covers his own unsettled existence between the USA, Berlin and Paris, but it also symbolises his own kind of style-modulation long before he could have heard anything by Ives. We're now starting to enjoy Antheil's bare-faced kleptomania on its terms. Indeed, there are some lovely things in this young man's music, often beautifully scored and hovering hazardously between Petrushka and Parade; you never quite know what's going to happen next. In spite of his bravado Antheil had soul – take the delicious opening of the Doloroso third movement with celesta background to the oboe or the melodies over ostinato patterns in the middle of the final ragtime – the one which starts at 1'26" gets so close to the first of Stravinsky's Five Easy Pieces for piano duet as to be actionable.

It's a pity that Symphony No 6 (partly based on Delacroix's picture Liberty leading the people) duplicates the National Symphony Orchestra of the Ukraine under Kuchar on Naxos, since both are strong performances of this substantial piece from 1948. Antheil pays another debt to Satie since the Larghetto is a slow Gymnopédie, an oasis of calm between patriotic war music. The riotous Archipelago, subtitled 'Rhumba', is in the tradition of Gottschalk but, via Gershwin's Cuban Overture, is pure 1930s and ends a most impressive and enjoyable case for orchestral Antheil from three different decades.

Symphonies Nos 4 and 5, 'Joyous'

Symphonies – No 4, '1942'; No 5, 'Joyous'.
Decatur at Algiers
Frankfurt Radio Symphony Orchestra / Hugh Wolff
CPO CPO999 706-2. (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Symphony No 4, written in the worst years of the war, gets an ebullient performance which has the edge over the Ukranians since the recorded sound is richer. The music employs juxtapositions, exactly like cinematic cuts, that have little to do with symphonic development and are less dominated by Stravinsky than some of Antheil's earlier works. The tunes are memorable. The novelty here is Decatur at Algiers, called a nocturne although it's based on Stephen Decatur conquering the Barbary pirates in the early 1800s. There's an attractive Arabic flavour about the spooky principal theme on the oboe. This release also brings the Fifth Symphony – first recorded by the Vienna Philharmonia under Herbert Haefner in 1952 – back into the catalogue. This is a war symphony too. Antheil lost his brother in the conflict and dedicated the symphony to 'the young dead of all countries who sacrificed everything'.

The first movement is continuously bustling in an idiom which crosses Stravinsky with jazz: it works. The Adagio molto is an elegiac siciliano, and the finale is a pot-pourri which raises constant echoes – that's how musical kleptomania operates. Almost at the start Antheil recalls the opening of Shostakovich's Fifth in homage to America's wartime ally. These are all fine performances, well recorded too – another impressive case for later Antheil on his own terms.

Ballet mécanique

Ballet mécanique (rev 1953). Serenade for Strings No 1. Symphony for Five Instruments
Concert for Chamber Orchestra
Philadelphia Virtuosi Chamber Orchestra / Daniel Spalding
Naxos 8 559060 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ

Although Ballet mécanique is the inevitable selling point here, the 1953 revision eschews many of the sonic and rhythmic excesses that give the work its infamy and, to be honest, its musical appeal. Spalding secures a zestful performance from the Philadelphia Virtuosi, less frenetic than the Ensemble Modern, with the interlocking ostinatos of pianos and percussion readily invoking Les noces in sound if not substance.

The other works give a good overview of Antheil's changing idiom over the greater part of his career. From 1948, the First Serenade might seem a continuation of his inter-war neo-classicism, yet the chromatic unease which permeates the brusque outer movements, and the plaintive solos and chill sul ponticelli of the Andante intimate deeper emotions. The Symphony of 1923 offers a statement of stylistic intent to rival Stravinsky's Octet, though the astringent polytonal writing is more akin to Milhaud's Chamber Symphonies. Nine years on, and the Concert finds the eclipsed composer pursuing understated yet intriguing directions. The succession of mini-ensembles, linked by a varied ritornello for the whole group, may have its basis in Stravinsky's Symphonies of Wind Instruments, but Antheil's piece is formally open-ended and emotionally anything but cathartic.

Characterful and well-prepared performances, cleanly recorded, and informative notes. Probably the best disc yet in Naxos's American Classics series.

Thomas Arne British 1710-1778

GROVE Arne, the son of an upholsterer, was probably encouraged in his musical career by his violin teacher Michael Festing. In 1732-33 he and his sister Susanna (later Mrs Cibber) were associated with musicians who aimed to establish an Italian-style English opera. After the success of his masque Dido and Aeneas (1734), Arne was engaged at Drury Lane Theatre, where he was to produce his works until 1775. In 1737 he married the singer Cecilia Young, who appeared in his next production, Comus (1738); influenced by Handel's Acis and Galatea, it was his most individual and successful work. Also popular was the masque Alfred (1740) (including 'Rule, Britannia'). While in Dublin in 1742-44 Arne produced his oratorio The Death of Abel (1744) and music by Handel. His dialogue Colin and Phoebe established him as a leading composer at the London pleasure gardens; during the next 20 years he published annual song collections. Among his next major works were a miniature English opera buffa, Thomas and Sally (1760), the oratorio Judith (1761) and an English opera seria to a metastasio libretto, Artaxerxes (1762), the first and only such work to achieve lasting fame. After his masque The Arcadian Nuptials (1764) Arne's career declined; L'Olimpiade (1765; now lost), his only Italian opera, was a failure. But his last years saw the production of many of his best works, notably Shakespeare Ode (1769), the masque The Fairy Prince (1771) and the afterpiece May-day (1775); he also wrote catches and glees for concerts at Ranelagh House.

One of the most significant English composers of his century, Arne wrote over 80 stage works and contributed to some 20 others. His essentially lyrical genius is obvious also in his instrumental music.

Artaxerxes

Christopher Robson counterten Artaxerxes; Ian Partridge ten Artabanes; Patricia Spence mez Arbaces; Richard Edgar-Wilson ten Rimenes; 🄿

Catherine Bott sop Mandane; Philippa Hyde sop Semira; The Parley of Instruments / Roy Goodman
Hyperion ② CDA67051/2 (140 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes and text included. Recorded 1995 ●

This is a work of great historical importance and musically fascinating. Arne, the leading English composer of his time for the theatre, wanted to write serious as well as comic English operas, and decided that Italian opera seria should serve, on the literary side, as his model; he chose the most famous of all the Metastasio librettos, Artaserse, as the basis for his first (and last) attempt at the genre. It is generally supposed that the translation was his own work. He performed the opera at Covent Garden in 1762 with considerable success and it remained a favourite for many years. He never followed up that success, and nor, regrettably, did anyone else. English vocal music of this period has quite a distinctive manner, being tuneful, rather short-breathed, often with a faintly 'folky' flavour. It does not naturally reflect the exalted emotional manner of an opera seria text. Nevertheless, the music is enormously enjoyable, full of good melodies, richly orchestrated, never (unlike Italian operas of the time) long-winded. Several of its numbers became popular favourites in Arne's time, and for long after.

Much of the best and most deeply felt music goes to Arbaces, very finely and expressively sung by Patricia Spence. She uses more vibrato than anyone else in the cast but her warmth of tone and expressive power are ample justification. Mandane, Arbaces's beloved, composed for Arne's mistress Charlotte Brent, is another rewarding part and is finely sung here by Catherine Bott, who can encompass both the charming English ditties and the more Italianate virtuoso pieces. Christopher Robson makes an excellent Artaxerxes, although this castrato part is bound to be testing for a countertenor and he is often covered by the orchestra. Arne's orchestral style here is very rich, with much prominent wind writing; sometimes the singers do not ride the full textures very comfortably. Roy Goodman's accompaniments are not generally very subtle. The original score does not survive complete, a victim (like so many) of the frequent theatre fires of the time; Peter Holman has done an unobtrusive and stylish job of reconstructing some of the lost recitatives. Recommended warmly to anyone curious about this byway of 18th century opera, and to anyone drawn to Arne's very appealing melodic style.

Sir Malcolm Arnold

British 1921

Arnold studied with Jacob at the Royal College of Music, London, and in 1941 joined the LPO as a trumpeter, leaving in 1948 to devote himself to composition. His most important works are orchestral (nine symphonies, 1951-82; numerous light and serious pieces). His language is diatonic, owing something to Walton and Sibelius, and the scoring is dramatically brilliant, Berlioz being his acknowledged model. A fluent, versatile composer, he has written scores for nearly 100 films.

Clarinet Concerto No 2

Arnold Clarinet Concerto No 2, Op 115
Copland Concerto for Clarinet and String Orchestra with Harp and Piano Hindemith Clarinet Concerto
Martin Fröst cl Malmö Symphony Orchestra / Lan Shui
BIS CD893 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●●

All three of these concertos were written for Benny Goodman, but, not surprisingly, it is the Arnold work which most fully exploits his dedicatee's jazz background. The first movement is a typical Arnoldian scherzando, with an irrepressible Tam O'Shanter/Beckus the Dandipratt audacity. Fröst and Lan Shui clearly relish its verve and energy, and then bring a seductive richness to the main theme of the slow movement. Yet they do not miss the plangent emotional ambivalence later – for there are characteristic moments of Arnold-like darkness here too. The outrageous show-stopper finale, with its rooty-tooty clarinet tune and orchestral whoops, also has a surprise up its sleeve in its sudden lyrical interlude; but one and all let their hair down for the boisterous reprise.

At the haunting opening of the Copland concerto, Martin Fröst's clarinet steals in magically on a half-tone. Lan Shui's sympathetic and flexible support contributes to a memorable performance of Copland's masterly first movement, with the coda gently fading into the cadenza. The Hindemith concerto which follows produces a characteristic sinewy lyricism in the first of its four movements, with some nicely touched-in brass and woodwind comments. Again Fröst cajoles the ear with his pliable line and the effect is unexpectedly mellow. With extremely fine recording and marvellous solo playing, this triptych will be hard to surpass.

Additional recommendation
Clarinet Concertos
Coupling: Britten Concerto Movement
Maconchy Concertinos
T King cl
English Chamber Orchestra / Wordsworth
Hyperion Helios CDH55060 (DDD) Ⓑ
Indispensable collection of works for the clarinet lover, beautifully recorded and superbly performed.

Guitar Concerto, Op 67

Arnold Guitar Concerto, Op 67
Rodrigo Concierto de Aranjuez
Takemitsu To the Edge of Dream
Julian Bream gtr City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI 754661-2 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1991 ●●

This is Bream's fourth recording of the Rodrigo, and his second version of the Arnold Concerto (his first, recorded in 1959, is available on various RCA reissues). His tempos in the outer movements are a mite slower than of yore but the differences are small and the energy, sparkle and clean delivery are undiminished. What differentiates these performances from others, including Bream's earlier ones, is the extraordinary accounts of their slow movements. Bream's views of the sardana and the smoky night club (respectively) come from within, to an extent that makes even the most expressive of others seem 'external', and they are conveyed with such wonderful fluidity of tone and phrasing that one might almost believe the feeling that one is hearing them for the first time. Takemitsu said of To the Edge of Dream 'melodic fragments float in a transparent space like so many splinters of dream'; although they never quite coalesce into a stable, protracted melody, they give cohesion to the music. The work is scored for an unusually large orchestra but, as it most often alternates with, rather than opposes, the guitar or is held to a breathless pianissimo, the guitar is always audible. It is a work of haunting beauty. And these are desert-island versions of the concertos, adding maturity to virtuosity.

Dances

Four Cornish Dances, Op 91. English Dances, Op 27; Op 33. Irish Dances, Op 126. Four Scottish Dances, Op 59. Solitaire – Sarabande; Polka
London Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Malcolm Arnold
Lyrita SRCD201 (61 minutes: ADD/DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1979-90 ●●

A warm and well-deserved welcome was given to the English, Scottish and Cornish Dances, when these recordings, conducted by the composer, first appeared. Here, with the Irish Dances added, as well as the two movements which were written to go with the two sets of English Dances as the ballet, Solitaire, it is even more of a winner. The analogue sound is given a splendid transfer with plenty of presence and is full and brilliant. The newer items, in digital sound, very well recorded too, bring no feeling of inconsistency. Best known of all is the first of the second set of English Dances with its jaunty piccolo theme, but one after another these little jewels first grab and then delight the ear with their brilliant pastiche of folk melodies.

The first of the Irish Dances, written in 1986, opens with a rumbustious movement very much in the style of the earlier sets, with characteristic and attractive syncopations, but the other three dances are both sparer in instrumentation and darker in tone, effectively so. The two movements from Solitaire are equally valuable, particularly the superb, coolly atmospheric 'Sarabande', the longest and most ambitious movement of any here, again made weightier by Arnold's slow speed. Even if you don't want to play all 22 items at one go – and that is no penance at all – this is a wonderful box of delights.

English Dances – Set 1, Op 27; Set 2, Op 33. 🏵
Four Scottish Dances, Op 59. Four Cornish Dances, Op 91. Four Irish Dances, Op 126. Four Welsh Dances, Op 138
Queensland Symphony Orchestra / Andrew Penny
Naxos 8 553526 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1995 ●

This Naxos set of the Arnold Dances has the advantage of including the Four Welsh Dances, not otherwise available on CD. These were the last to be written, and their mood follows on naturally from the ambivalence of the Irish Dances. With the composer working with Penny prior to the recording in Australia, it is not surprising that the tempos are very like Arnold's own in his superb set made with the LPO for Lyrita. Where there is a difference, Penny is slightly faster, but the effect is marginal. The greater character of the LPO under Arnold shows in the very first of the English Dances, notably at the reprise, which is more warmly positive, capped with a superb cymbal crash (backwardly balanced and less effective on Naxos). The Queensland Hall is noticeably reverberant and detail is generally less well focused than on the Lyrita disc; yet so vivid is Arnold's scoring that not much is missed. The lovely Mesto third English Dance is certainly beautifully done in Queensland and in the second set of English Dances, the Con brio and Giubiloso have all the necessary colour and flair.

The Australian orchestra have obviously warmed up for the Scottish set and the inebriated Glaswegian is nicely observed. For some the lyrical third Scottish Dance is one of the most beautiful and memorable of all Arnold's many fine tunes. Penny treats it gently; his coda is particularly delicate, but at its appearance on the full strings the composer is that little bit more romantic. However, Penny's closing dance, a Highland fling, is superb in its drunken abandon. In the opening Cornish Dance that follows, Penny captures the mysterious evocation of deserted copper mines well, and in the Irish Dances, written some 20 years later, he captures the fragile mood of the central Commodo and Piacevole tenderly. Altogether an excellent and inexpensive collection.

Additional recommendation
English Dances
Couplings: Guitar Concerto, Op 67. Symphony for Brass Instruments, Op 123. Quintet for Brass, Op 73
Various artists; LPO / Boult
Decca 468 803-2 (74 minutes: ADD: 9/90ᴿ) Ⓜ

Boult is masterly in the delightful English Dances.

Ballet music

Homage to the Queen, Op 42*a* – Ballet Suite
Rinaldo and Armida, Op 49. Little Suite No 2, Op 78.

Organ Concerto, Op 47^{a}.
^{a}Ulrik Spang-Hanssen org
Royal Aarhus Academy of Music Symphony Orchestra / Douglas Bostock
Classico CLASSCD424 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002

No fewer than three first recordings adorn this set, in which some of Denmark's finest young musicians lend spirited advocacy to three appealing Arnold scores from the 1950s.

Bostock's first recording of the 20-minute concert suite from the 1953 Coronation-ballet Homage to the Queen is all the more welcome given that Robert Irving's superbly stylish 1954 Philharmonia recording of the complete work is now deleted. Hailed by Dame Ninette de Valois as 'the finest ballet composer since Tchaikovsky', Arnold penned a further three scores for the Royal Ballet. First staged in 1955 and choreographed (like Homage to the Queen) by Frederick Ashton, Rinaldo and Armida packs a wealth of colourful and touching invention into its tightly-knit 22-minute span. Elsewhere, Ulrik Spang-Hanssen is a nimble soloist in the Organ Concerto written in 1954 for Denis Vaughan (the central Lento casts quite a spell), and we also get the bright-eyed, impeccably crafted Little Suite No 2 that Arnold fashioned for the 1963 Farnham Festival.

Nicely prepared, committed performances one and all; reasonably vivid sound. Sir Malcolm's many fans will love this enterprising collection.

Film Music

Trapeze – Suite. No Love for Johnnie – Suite. David Copperfield – Suite. Stolen Face – Ballade or Piano and Orchestra^{b}. The Belles of St Trinian's – Comedy Suite^{c}. The Captain's Paradise – Postcard from the Med (all arr Lane). You Know What Sailors Are – Scherzetto^{a}. The Holly and The Ivy – Fantasy on Christmas Carols (both arr Palmer). The Roots of Heaven – Overture. Symphonic Study,'Machines', Op 30
^{a}John Bradbury cl ^{b}Phillip Dyson, ^{c}Paul Janes pfs
BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Rumon Gamba
Chandos CHAN9851 (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●●

Almost all the film music here comes from the 1950s, when memorable ideas were pouring out of Arnold, and his unique orchestral palette was already glowing luminously.

The suite arranged by Philip Lane from Trapeze is quite outstanding in the quality of its invention, including a swinging tune for the horns in the Prelude, an engaging blues for saxophone and guitar to follow, an ebullient circus march, and a deliciously lugubrious 'Elephant waltz' for tuba duet, while the closing sequence opens hauntingly and then introduces an accordion to remind us we are in Paris. The suite from David Copperfield has a fine lyrical opening sweep, then introduces a delightfully quirky, syncopated moto perpetuo representing 'The Micawbers'. This features a solo clarinet, and Christopher Palmer has arranged another witty clarinet Scherzetto from an equally winning theme used in You Know What Sailors Are.

The concertante Ballade for Piano and Orchestra adeptly arranged by Lane from Stolen Face is less memorable, but the overture from The Roots of Heaven (provided for the film's New York prèmiere) opens with a splendid Hollywoodian/Waltonian flourish, then follows with more catchy syncopation and a lilting waltz tune. Perhaps the most tender, romantic writing comes in No Love for Johnnie (after another rousing march). The irrepressible score for The Belles of St Trinian's (the composer's favourite film) has something of the audacious sparkle of Ibert's Divertissement, and if The Holly and the Ivy brings a rather predictable collection of familiar carols, for the most part fully scored and not particularly individual, Arnold's jaunty samba from The Captain's Paradise, which memorably had Alec Guinness in the bigamous title-role, makes a splendid finale. The performances have plenty of zest, and the flow of bittersweet lyrical writing is poignantly caught by Rumon Gamba and the excellent BBC Philharmonic in a recording of top Chandos quality. If you enjoy film music, it doesn't come any better than this.

Additional recommendation
Bridge on the River Kwai. Inn of the Sixth Happiness. Hobson's Choice. Whistle down the Wind. Sound Barrier
London Symphony Orchestra / Hickox
Chandos CHAN9100 (78 minutes: DDD: 2/93) Ⓕ
A well-chosen collection of Arnold film scores arranged by Christopher Palmer and played with infectious gusto by the LSO and Richard Hickox.

Symphonies Nos 1 and 2

Symphonies – No 1, Op 22; No 2, Op 40
London Symphony Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9335 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●

Here is an entirely appropriate coupling of the first two symphonies, superbly played by the LSO and given demonstration sound in what is surely an ideal acoustic for this music, with striking depth and amplitude and a wholly natural brilliance. The dynamic range is wide but the moments of spectacle – and there are quite a few – bring no discomfort. Richard Hickox shows himself to be thoroughly at home in both symphonies and the readings have a natural flow and urgency, with the two slow movements bringing haunting, atmospheric feeling.

The First Symphony opens with thrusting confidence on strings and horns, and at its climax, where the strings soar against angry brass ostinatos, the playing generates great intensity; then at the start of the slow movement the purity of the flute solo brings a calm serenity, which returns at the close. There are only three movements and the plangent lyrical melancholia of the expansive march theme of the finale is filled out by some superb horn playing, which is enormously compelling. The first movement of Symphony No 2 brings a most winning clarinet solo (Arnold's fund of melodic ideas seems to be inexhaustible). There is an energetic, bustling Scherzo to follow, but again it is the slow movement which one remembers, for its elegiac opening, its arresting climax and its lovely epilogue-like close. Above all, these are real performances without any of the inhibitions of 'studio' recording.

Additional recommendations

Symphonies Nos 1 and 2
National Symphony Orchestra of Ireland / Penny
Naxos 8 553406 (56 minutes: DDD: 5/96) Ⓢ

A bargain coupling without quite the finesse of the Hickox/LSO recordings (reviewed above).

Symphony No 2
Couplings: Symphony No 5. Peterloo
Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra / Groves;
City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Arnold
EMI 566324-2 (77 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ

Arnold conducts his own music with great verve, and the highly accessible Fifth is a delight.

Symphonies Nos 3 and 4

Symphonies – No 3, Op 63; No 4, Op 71
National Symphony Orchestra of Ireland / Andrew Penny
Naxos 8 553739 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1996 ◉

These recordings of two of Arnold's finest symphonies carry the composer's imprimatur (he attended the sessions). Penny is clearly right inside every bar, and the orchestra play with impressive ensemble and feeling, and above all great freshness and spontaneity.

The Naxos recording's concert-hall ambience has been beautifully caught. One of the finest players in Dublin is the principal oboe and his solos often bring a specially plangent quality, particularly in the slow movement of No 3 (at 4'55") where there is a real sense of desolation. The finale then lightens the mood with its kaleidoscope of wind and brass and a wispy string melody that soon becomes more fulsome. Penny's momentum and characterisation here are superb, as is the orchestral response. Similarly the winningly scored opening of the Fourth Symphony flashes with colour: that marvellous tune (2'44") is played with captivating delicacy by the violins. The exquisitely fragile Scherzo is etched with gossamer lightness and the slow movement is shaped by Penny with fine lyrical feeling and the most subtle use of light and shade. Its romanticism is heart-warming, yet is also balanced by Arnold's underlying unease. The boisterous fugal finale has some of the best playing of all.

Additional recommendation

Symphonies Nos 3 and 4
London Symphony Orchestra / Hickox
Chandos CHAN9290 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Hickox has the full measure of both symphonies and the Chandos recording is superb.

Symphonies Nos 5 and 6

Symphonies – No 5, Op 74; No 6, Op 95
London Symphony Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9385 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ◉

Arnold's Fifth is one of his most accessible and rewarding works. The inspiration for the work was the early deaths of several of Arnold's friends and colleagues: Dennis Brain, Frederick Thurston, David Paltenghi and Gerard Hoffnung. They are all remembered in the first movement and Hoffnung's spirit pops up in the third and fourth. The Chandos recording is richly resonant and reinforces the impression that in Hickox's hands the Andante has an added degree of acceptance in its elegiac close, while the last two movements are colourfully expansive. The Sixth Symphony is nothing like as comfortable as the Fifth, with a bleak unease in the unrelenting energy of the first movement, which becomes even more discomfiting in the desolate start to the Lento. This leads to a forlorn suggestion of a funeral march, which then ironically quickens in pace but is suddenly cut down; the drum strokes become menacingly powerful and the despairing mood of the movement's opening returns. Hickox handles this quite superbly and grips the listener in the music's pessimism, which then lifts completely with the energetic syncopated trumpet theme of the rondo finale. Although later there are moments of ambiguity, and dissonant reminders of the earlier music, these are eclipsed by the thrilling life-asserting coda.

Additional recommendations

Symphonies Nos 5 and 6
National Symphony Orchestra of Ireland / Penny
Naxos 8 552000 (57 minutes: DDD: 6/01) Ⓢ

A good bargain alternative that is well worth considering.

Symphony No 5
Couplings: Symphony No 2. Peterloo.
Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra / Groves;
City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Arnold
EMI 566324-2 (77 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ

Arnold conducts his touching tribute to lost musical friends with great feeling and skill.

Symphonies Nos 7-9

Symphonies Nos 7, 8 and 9. Oboe Concerto, Op 39[a]
[a]Jennifer Galloway ob BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Rumon Gamba
Chandos ② CHAN9967 (116 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ

In No 7 Gamba takes a more urgent approach than does Andrew Penny in his account for Naxos. With weightier orchestral sound, helped by a full, atmospheric Chandos recording, Gamba is even more compelling, though in that first movement the ragtime march halfway through loses some of its grotesquerie at a faster speed. At a more flowing speed in the slow movement Gamba is warmer than Penny, less chilly. One consistent advantage of Gamba's faster speeds is that the extra challenge to the orchestra brings out an element of daring, almost always an advantage in writing that is surreal in its sharp juxtapositions of ideas and mood, with Mahlerian references to popular music. That is specially true of the Giubiloso third movement of No 9. Penny and his Irish players by comparison seem almost too well-behaved, though the transparency of the sound lets one hear the heaviest textures clearly.

The final Mahlerian slow movement of the Ninth in Gamba's hands is also warmer, weightier and more measured than with Penny, though both sustain the slow, spare writing superbly, with Gamba bringing an extra velvety warmth to the final movements of consolation. The Oboe Concerto makes a welcome supplement on that second disc, with Gamba and his excellent soloist, Jennifer Galloway, bringing out the wit and biting jauntiness of earlier Arnold.

Additional recommendation

Symphonies Nos 1-9.

National Symphony Orchestra of Ireland / Penny

Naxos ⑤ 8 505178 (300 minutes: DDD: 5/96, 8/98, 6/01, 9/01) Ⓢ

Penny draws consistently bright-eyed, polished playing from his band. Penny's No 1 is perhaps the weakest of the set, though the playing is still powerful and lucid. His Third is extremely fine, his Fourth also a great success and his Nos 5-9 are in almost every way a match for the best. A notable achievement and terrific value for money.

Georges Auric

French 1899-1983

GROVE Auric studied at the Paris Conservatoire and with d'Indy at the Schola Cantorum (1914-16), becoming acquainted with Satie, Milhaud and Honegger. He was a member of Les Six, wrote ballets for Dhiagilev (Les fâcheux, 1923) and film scores for Cocteau and was also a music critic. In the 1950s and '60s he held administrative posts while maintaining his musical curiosity: some of his later pieces are serial.

Film Music (recons Lane)

Suites – Caesar and Cleopatra; Dead of night; Father Brown; The Innocents^{a}; It always rains on a Sunday; The Lavender Hill Mob; Moulin Rouge^{b}; Passport to Pimlico; The Titfield Thunderbolt; Hue and Cry – Overture

BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Rumon Gamba with ^{a}Anthea Kempston, ^{b}Mary Carewe sops

Chandos CHAN9774 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Recorded 1999 ●

All the scores here (expertly reconstructed by Philip Lane) are from British films, for which Auric wrote some 30; but he also wrote another 100 or so for French, German, Italian and American movies. It was in fact by a French film – René Clair's delightful satire A nous la liberté – that he first won our hearts in 1932; it wasn't until the end of the war that he was taken up by Denham and Ealing. Auric, not one for the 'hit tune' score beloved by commercial exploiters, nevertheless showed in his Moulin Rouge waltz that he could command the popular style with the best. On this disc he is heard running the gamut through the grandiose or the dramatic (It always rains on a Sunday, one of his finest pieces of writing), the menacing (the unforgettably scary Dead of night) and the atmospheric ('At the Sphinx' in Caesar and Cleopatra) to the swirling gaiety of The Titfield Thunderbolt, the perky Passport to Pimlico and the ebullient high spirits of Hue and Cry. From the gusto of the playing throughout, it seems clear that the BBC Philharmonic enjoyed making this disc: understandably so.

Further listening

La Belle et la Bête

Moscow Symphony Orchestra / Adriano

Marco Polo 8 223765 (62 minutes: DDD: 7/96) Ⓕ

Auric's Ravellian score for Cocteau's 1946 film with Jean Marais, performed with an idiomatic feel for the otherworldliness of this alluring film.

The Ladykillers

Royal Ballet Sinfonia / Alwyn

Silva Screen FILMCD177 (61 minutes: DDD: 7/97) Ⓕ

A splendid collection of scores for Ealing comedies splayed with lashings of gusto and a great feeling for this now sadly lost idiom. A 1997 Gramophone Award winner.

Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach

German 1714-1788

GROVE Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach, second son of Johann Sebastian Bach, studied music under his father at the Leipzig Thomasschule and law at university. In 1738 he became harpsichordist to the Prussian crown prince, moving to Berlin when his employer became King Frederick in 1740. There he was accompanist to the royal chamber music, and had the particular task of accompanying the king's flute solos. His most important compositions of this period were his keyboard sonatas; he also wrote his famous Essay on the True Art of Keyboard Playing (1753-62), which established him as the leading keyboard teacher and theorist of his time. He was however discontented in Berlin, because of the poor salary, the want of opportunity and the narrow scope of his duties. In 1767 Frederick reluctantly released him and he then succeeded Telemann as Kantor and music director in Hamburg, with responsibility for teaching, for some 200 performances of music each year at five churches and for ceremonial music on civic occasions. At this time he produced much church music as well as keyboard music, sets of symphonies and concertos.

CPE Bach, the best-known member of his family in his lifetime, was greatly respected for his treatise – which summarised the musical philosophy and the musical practices in north Germany at the middle of the 18th century – as well as for his music. His keyboard sonatas (he composed c150 as well as countless miscellaneous pieces) above all break new ground in their treatment of form and material; he also wrote improvisatory fantasias of intense expressiveness. His symphonies – he wrote c20– are in the fiery, energetic manner favoured in north Germany, with dramatic breaks, modulations and changes of mood or texture; usually the movements run continuously. There are twice as many concertos (and more concerto-like sonatinas), also vigorous in style; all were written for harpsichord and some were adapted for other instruments. His chamber works are numerous; there are many songs, as well as choral works from his late years, including two fine oratorios (Die Israeliten in der Wüste, Die Auferstehung und Himmelfahrt Jesu), Passion settings and other church works which often include adaptations of his own and other composers' music.

Cello Concertos

Cello Concertos – A minor, H432; 🅿
B flat, H436; A, H439
Bach Collegium Japan / Hidemi Suzuki vc
BIS CD807 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

Why is it that cellists who bemoan their lack of concerto repertory continue to neglect CPE Bach's three essays in the genre? It's a mystery; these are excellent pieces, full of infectious nervous energy in their outer movements and tender lyricism in central ones. The Bach concertos are not unknown to the recording catalogues, however, not least because they also exist in alternative versions which the composer made for flute and harpsichord respectively. Though there are times when the low-lying cello has difficulty making itself heard against the orchestra, Suzuki makes light of the matter with performances whose agility, lightness and textural clarity make those of Bylsma and the larger-sounding OAE sound heavy-handed. But while Suzuki – thanks to a generally thinner sound – is the more successful in the way he transmits the surface excitement and energy of the quick movements, he cannot match Bylsma's vocal inspiration in the eloquent poetry of the slow movement. Suzuki's, nevertheless, are refreshing, enlivening performances of attractive and substantial music.

Cello Concertos – A minor, H432; B flat, H436; 🅿
A, H439
Anner Bylsma vc Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment / Gustav Leonhardt
Virgin Classics Veritas 561401-2 Ⓜ
(70 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1998

However unlikely, circumstantially, that the cello versions came first, it is nevertheless that instrument which often seems to bring out the expressive qualities in this music most eloquently. This is, above all, the case in the slow movements, where the cello captures that darkly shaded intensity of expression at which Bach excelled. The most striking of the three is the muted Largo mesto of the A major Concerto, which plunges the listener into a shadowy world whose wide-ranging imaginative content presages early German Romanticism. None of this is lost on Anner Bylsma, who is quite the most ardently persuasive advocate. His playing of all three slow movements is suffused with an intensity and rapt contemplation. Fast outer movements, in contrast, dance along happily with lightly articulated solo passages, warm tone and eloquent projection. There are, admittedly, a few passages of shaky intonation, but overall they are insignificant. Bylsma brings enormous warmth of spirit to the music, sometimes tender, sometimes quite fiercely passionate and always with sympathetic understanding of Bach's individual gestures. The OAE provides strong support, Leonhardt's direction, being characteristically sympathetic, bringing many insights to an elusive style. The recorded sound is admirably clear and ideally resonant.

Cello Concertos – A minor, H432;
B flat, H436; A, H439
Timothy Hugh vc Bournemouth Sinfonietta /
Richard Studt
Naxos 8 553298 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1995

Timothy Hugh's bow dances in the flanking movements and is matched by those of the Bournemouth Sinfonietta, alert to every nuance and disposed to throw their weight around only as much as is fitting. It is, however, the slow movements that are the heart of these works. They are all tinged with sadness but none more than the Largo of the A major Concerto, where Hugh's abated vibrato, attenuated lines and resistance to the excessive squeezing of appoggiaturas express a sadness that is held within, not spilt in salt tears. This is a recording to set alongside the two reviewed above.

Harpsichord Concertos

Harpsichord Concertos – G minor, H409; 🅿
A, H411; D, H421
Miklós Spányi hpd Concerto Armonico /
Péter Szüts
BIS CD767 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

While these particular concertos are not consistently engaging, they demonstrate the emerging inventiveness of CPE's musical personality within a growing trend towards public concerts in the mid-18th century. In fits and starts there are those sparsely etched landscapes, complete with an unsettled weather front, which at their best can captivate us. If decorum is sometimes overworked, Bach's originality is even more remarkable given that the ritornello structure inherited from his father's generation, with its alternating solo and string sections, is less easy to sustain in a relatively uncontrapuntal style. Contrast is therefore a key element and Bach needs a soloist who can discern how the relationship between the harpsichord and the orchestra can be manipulated to good effect. Miklós Spányi and Concerto Armonico, led by Péter Szüts, give wonderfully lucid, flexible and clearly articulated readings. The shading in the finale of the G minor and middle movement of the D major Concertos is also energised by a naturally discursive balance, a deft textural palette for which artist and engineer can take equal credit. With such eloquent playing, this volume of world première recordings will give the listener more than just an opportunity to refine his perspective on Bach's achievements. It deserves a welcoming audience.

Keyboard Concertos

Keyboard Concertos – D, H414; E, H417; A, H422 🅿
Concerto Armonico / Miklós Spányi fp
BIS CD785 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

With his fifth volume of CPE Bach's complete keyboard concertos, Miklós Spányi comes to three works composed in the mid-1740s, which he plays on a copy of a Silbermann fortepiano of that period. The choice is not only determined by the existence of such instruments at Frederick the Great's court, where Carl Philipp was employed, but also because the keyboard layout is more suited to the fortepiano than the harpsichord, and because the A major work here – a first recording, like that of the D major – includes the marking pianissimo. The present instrument is light and silvery in tone, which makes for some difficulties of proportion in the D major, performed with additional manuscript parts found in Brussels for trumpets and drums. The more embellished version of the A major Concerto is adopted here. The first movement displays some particularly athletic passagework for the piano. The E major Concerto is musically the most inventive and unusual of the three works, and harmonically certainly the most adventurous – a splendid concerto that deserves to be better known. The recording has occasional problems with balance but the performances are praiseworthy.

Keyboard Concertos – E minor, H418; 🅿
B flat, H429; G minor, H442
Miklós Spányi fp
Concerto Armonico / Péter Szüts vn
BIS CD786 (73 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1996 Ⓕ

On this recording Miklós Spányi has exchanged his previous harpsichord or fortepiano for a tangent piano: it is like a fortepiano but has the strings struck vertically by tangents (as in the clavichord) rather than at an angle by hammers. Its tone could also be modified by raising the dampers completely or only in the treble, employing only one of each note's two strings (una corda), inserting a leather strip ('moderator') between tangents and strings, or creating a harp-like effect by damping the strings with small pieces of cloth. The boldness and unusual style of Emanuel's concertos took his contemporaries aback, and even now they can surprise. The extrovert E minor work, for example, begins with dramatic energy but is interrupted by extraordinary, tentative-sounding broken phrases at the soloist's first entry before being allowed to continue on its way: the Adagio, which includes striking chromatic progressions, has imitative interplay between the solo instrument and the violins. The finale of the otherwise more 'normal' galant G minor Concerto generates very vehement chordal attacks – or are these being overdone here? Spányi's playing throughout has vitality and neatness, although his lifting of the dampers in running passages inevitably causes them to become blurred.

Sinfonias

CPE Bach Sinfonias, H663-6 – No 1 in D;
No 2 in E flat; No 3 in F; No 4 in G
WF Bach Sinfonia in F
Salzburg Chamber Philharmonic Orchestra /
Yoon K Lee
Naxos 8 553289 (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1994

The exhilarating CPE Bach symphonies presented here are not the more frequently recorded, surprise-filled string symphonies of 1773 (H657-62), but the set of four for strings, flutes, oboes, bassoons and horns which Bach wrote a couple of years later. They are no less astonishing. Bewildering changes of direction, disorientating rhythmic games and unexpected solos all turn up in this nervous, excitable music, which for originality and sheer life-force could surely only have been matched in its day by that of Haydn. The Salzburg Chamber Philharmonic, under its founder Yoon K Lee, turns in crisp, spirited and (the odd moment of slack tuning apart) disciplined performances which do the music full justice. They are not timid about making the most of Bach's strong contrasts, although they produce them more by the release of some thunderous forte passages than by the pursuit of too many unearthly pianissimos. The overall effect is wholly convincing, and only in the symphony by Emanuel's older brother Wilhelm Friedemann – more old-fashioned and less successful as a piece – does the use of modern instruments begin to get in the way of the spirit of music. An undeniably good buy.

Additional recommendation
Orchestral Works
4 Sinfonias, H663-6. Concertos for Flute and Strings – in G, H445; in A minor, H431. Concerto for Harpsichord and Fortepiano in E flat, H479. Concerto for Two Harpsichords, Two Horns and Strings in F, H408
Mathot fp Hünteler fl
Amsterdam Baroque Orchestra / Koopman hp
Warners Ultima ② 8573-88050-2 (DDD) Ⓑ

These are top-notch performances of some wonderful, often outlandish works that still have the capacity to astonish; the tart textures of the band really suit the music. Strongly recommended.

Chamber works

Quartet for Keyboard, Flute, Viola and Continuo in D, H538. Viola da gamba Sonata in G minor, Wq88 – Larghetto. Trio Sonatas – Two Violins and Continuo in C minor, H579; Flute, Violin and Continuo in C, H571. Solo Flute Sonata in A minor, H562 🅿
Florilegium (Ashley Solomon fl Rachel Podger vn/va Lucy Russell vn Daniel Yeadon vc/va da gamba Neal Peres da Costa hpd/fp)
Channel Classics CCS11197 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●

More than half a century separates the earliest and the latest of the works here. The C major Trio Sonata was one of Bach's earliest compositions, written at the age of 17 more or less under his father's supervision, and the D major Quartet was composed in the last year of his life, while he was Music Director in Hamburg. The remaining items date from his time at the court of Frederick the Great. The C minor Sonata is extraordinary, a programmatic work 'portraying a conversation between a Sanguineus and a Melancholicus' who disagree throughout the first two movements, but the former's outlook prevails in the finale. The talented Florilegium players bring out to the full the bewilderingly diverse character of this sonata.

If the Sonata for unaccompanied flute was written for Frederick, as seems likely, he must have been quite skilled, able to cope with some fairly virtuosic passagework. Ashley Solomon's performance is most persuasive. How far Carl Philipp developed is shown by the late quartet, an attractive composition which, besides promoting the keyboard (fortepiano here) from a mere continuo to prominent solo status, is already in the style of the Viennese classics in form, and links the first two movements. The whole disc is strongly recommended.

Keyboard Sonatas

Keyboard Sonatas – in F sharp minor, H37; in G minor, H47; in G, H119; in C minor, H121; in E minor, H281; in D, H286; in A, H135: Andante con tenerezza. Rondos – in A, H276; in C minor, H283; in D minor, H290
Mikhail Pletnev pf Ⓕ
DG 459 614-2GH (79 minutes: DDD) ●

No one who enjoyed Pletnev's two-disc set of Scarlatti (on Virgin Classics) will be surprised that he has now turned his attention to CPE Bach, whose keyboard music is so important in the transition from the High Baroque to Classical style. Nor is there any need for eyebrow-raising over his use of a modern piano, since it is clear from Bach's notation and from contemporary reports of his playing that he placed a premium on flexibility of tone. In any case, Pletnev's taste, intelligence and virtuosity win the day. It is clear that Pletnev has felt free to go his own way with ornamentation and, occasionally, with rhythm. But he almost always does so in the spirit of the composer, whose own performing manner was renowned for its combined raptness and clarity. And overall one cannot but admire Pletnev's tasteful rhetoric, his eloquent declamatory flourishes, his pliancy in the Rondos, and his rhythmic alertness and caprice in fast movements, allied to the classiest of fingerwork and the most refined colouristic sense.

Given its historical significance (which extends as far as anticipations of Brahms – compare the first track with the finale of Brahms's First Cello Sonata), CPE Bach's keyboard music is remarkably poorly served on CD. All the more reason to welcome this superbly executed disc. Recording quality is clean but not clinical, with the piano close but not oppressively so, and always natural-sounding.

Die Auferstehung und Himmelfahrt Jesu

Die Auferstehung und Himmelfahrt Jesu, H777/Wq240
Uta Schwabe sop Christoph Genz ten 🅿
Stephan Genz bar Ex Tempore;
La Petite Bande / Sigiswald Kuijken
Hyperion CDA67364 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded c2002 ●

CPE Bach is much better known for his instrumental works, which are numerous, than his vocal, which are few: but his short oratorio Die Auferstehung und Himmelfahrt Jesu ('The Resurrection and Ascension of Jesus'), a late work which was written in the 1770s, has a strong claim to be reckoned among his most original and his finest. It certainly proclaims his originality in its opening bars, a sombre and mysterious passage for cellos and basses alone, and the ensuing chorus at least hints at the grandeur and sense of the momentous that distinguishes his father's great choral works.

The narrative is sung by a tenor in a series of recitatives, mostly starting secco but increasingly coloured by orchestral textures as they gather emotional force. Here they are impressively done by Christoph Genz, with subtle and refined shading of the tone and a quiet intensity of expression. The soprano aria, warmly and touchingly done by Uta Schwabe, with a mournful first part and a joyous second, is a particularly expressive piece, although arguably it is outshone by the duet that follows, with its attractive use of two flutes to accompany the soprano and its typical use of appoggiaturas and the dissonances they create to heighten he expression.

Sigiswald Kuijken's lively but sensitive and thoughtful direction, and his attention to details of the instrumental texture, ensure that the work gets the performance it merits. Compelling and warmly recommended.

Johann Christian Bach

German 1735-1782

GROVE Johann Christian Bach, the youngest son of JS Bach, probably studied first under his father, then on his death with his half-brother Carl Philipp Emanuel. in Berlin. In 1754 he left for Italy, where he became Roman Catholic and organist at Milan Cathedral. He also embarked on an operatic career, with operas staged in Turin and Naples. He was then invited to compose for the King's Theatre in London, where he settled in 1762; his operatic career was patchy, but he was soon appointed royal music master and was successful as a teacher. He also promoted and played in a prominent concert series with his friend CF Abel, bringing the newest and best European music to Londoners' notice. (He befriended the boy Mozart on his London visit, 1764-65.) Many of his works were published, including songs written for Vauxhall Pleasure Gardens. In 1772 and 1774 he visited Mannheim for performances of his operas Temistocle and Lucio Silla and in 1779 he wrote Amadis de Gaule for the Paris Opéra, but the success of these works, like that of his London operas, was limited. His popularity faded in the late 1770s, and after financial troubles his health declined; he died at the beginning of 1782, and was soon forgotten.

JC Bach's music blends sound German technique with Italian fluency and grace; hence its appeal to, and influence upon, the young Mozart. His symphonies follow the Italian three-movement pattern: the light, Italian manner of his earlier ones gave way to richer-textured and more fully developed writing by the mid-1760s. The peak of his output comes in the six symphonies of his Op 18, three for double orchestra and exploiting contrasts of space and timbre. His interest in orchestral colour gave rise to several symphonies concertantes, for various soloists and orchestra, suitable material for his London concerts. At these he also played his piano concertos, attractive for their well-developed solo-tutti relationship though still modest in scale. Of his chamber music, the Op 11 quintets are particularly appealing for their charming conversational style and their use of colour. His music is often leisurely in manner, and this must have militated against the operas success as dramatic music. He also composed a quantity of Latin sacred music during his time in Italy. Though sometimes regarded as a decadently hedonistic composer by comparison with his brother CPE, Johann Christian stands firmly as the chief master of the galant, who produced music elegant and apt to its social purpose, infusing it with vigour and refined sensibility.

Keyboard concertos

Six Concertos for Keyboard and Strings, Op 7 – No 1 in C; No 2 in F; No 3 in D; No 4 in B flat; No 5 in E flat; No 6 in G P
Members of the Hanover Band (Graham Cracknell, Anna McDonald vns Sebastian Comberti vc) / Anthony Halstead fp
CPO CPO999 600-2 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●

On Halstead's previous disc of JC Bach's keyboard concertos, he employed nine strings from the Hanover Band; but the present Op 7 concertos, like those of Op 1, call for only two violins and cello. He played the Op 1 work on the harpsichord, as specified on the title-page of the original edition: here he plays a fortepiano on the grounds that not only does the title-page of Op 7 designate 'Harpsichord or Piano Forte', but also that the fortepiano had made considerable headway in London in the seven years since the Op 1 appeared in 1763. The most interesting of these concertos are the last two of the set, each in three movements. No 5 is particularly fine, not merely because of its brilliant keyboard writing (notably in its finale) but because the sturdy initial Allegro di molto is more mature in style, with fresh material appearing in the development, and because of its deeply expressive, almost Mozartian, Andante. No 6 is distinguished by its central movement's long cantilena lines and for an extraordinary key-move near the end of the finale. Halstead's playing is a model of neatness and crisp rhythmicality: his decorations are in good taste, and in No 5 he adopts the composer's own cadenzas. His string colleagues are excellent. In short, a very pleasing disc.

Harpsichord Concertos – D minor; B flat; F minor P
Hanover Band / Anthony Halstead hpd
CPO CPO999 393-2 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

The works of JC Bach's Berlin years are almost indistinguishable from those of his brother, CPE, and anyone putting on this disc could be excused for thinking the first movement of the D minor Concerto – with its purposeful, energetic scales, its stark textures, its heavily used motifs, its rushing harpsichord writing, its sombre minor key and its total lack of lyricism – to be wholly CPE's work. It is in fact a very accomplished piece for a composer less than 20 years old and there are glimmerings of JC's own voice in the Adagio affettuoso that follows; it still sounds like North German music, untouched by Italian softness and sunshine, but the harpsichord cantilena certainly has a more personal expressive character and so does some of the string writing in the ritornellos and accompaniment. The slow movements throughout seem individual and appealing in a sense that CPE's are not. The quick movements, especially in the B flat Concerto, contain gestures of the abrupt and musically violent kind that CPE so often used. The finale of the D minor has a curious element of fantasy and an imaginative use of pizzicato behind the first solo entry.

Halstead uses a small orchestra, strings only, 3 3 1 1 1, which is quite sufficient and very alert. The solo playing is extremely fluent and indeed brilliant; Halstead plays with ample energy and rhythmic precision and realises the elaborate melodic lines effectively. Some of his cadenzas seem to go harmonically too far afield too quickly and are not entirely convincing, but this is a small blemish in an admirable disc.

Symphonies concertantes

Symphonies concertantes – F, T287 No 2; B flat, T287 No 7; D 🅿
Anthony Robson ob Jeremy Ward bn Graham Cracknell, Anna McDonald vns Sebastian Comberti vc Hanover Band / Anthony Halstead
CPO CPO999 537-2 (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●

The symphonie concertante, predominantly light-hearted, allotted a more prominent role to the solo instruments than did the concerto grosso. The earliest of the present three works is that in F, and the JC Bach scholar Ernest Warburton speculates that the choice of a solo oboe and bassoon suggests that it may have been written in 1761 for Naples, where Bach's opera Catone in Utica called for outstanding players of just these instruments. It is a cheerfully engaging two-movement work that takes the bassoon up into the tenor register: its first movement is unorthodox in shape. The D major work, in three movements, likewise ends in a minuet, with a trio in the minor for a change. Overall, the writing places more emphasis on virtuosity for the two soloists, and both in the energetic first movement and the more formal second there is a lengthy cadenza. The most notable symphonie concertante here, however, is that in B flat, long considered lost and rediscovered only in 1996: this is its first recording. Probably composed for JC's London concerts in the late 1770s, it allows the orchestra greater say; the initial ritornellos in the first two movements are unusually long. In the Larghetto the solo cello drops out, leaving the violin long, sweetly pungent cantilenas – a strikingly fine movement.

Halstead secures neat performances of finesse of all three works, which also benefit from skilful soloists and well-balanced recording. Delightful.

Symphonies

Six Symphonies, Op 6 – No 1 in G; No 2 in D; No 3 in E flat; No 4 in B flat; No 5 in E flat; No 6 in G minor 🅿
Hanover Band / Anthony Halstead
CPO CPO999 298-2 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

In the Op 6 Symphonies, the frothy Italianate music of the composer's Italian and early London years was behind him; these pieces, dating from the late 1760s, while still Italian-influenced in their formal clarity and melodic style, are sturdier, more carefully composed, more symphonic. Both the E flat works in this set have something of the solidity and warmth associated with that key, and each has a C minor Andante. The G major's first movement has the confident ring and thematic contrasts of his mature music, and the D major contains Mannheim crescendos and some delightful textures, with flutes and divided violas, in its charming, slightly playful middle movement.

The set ends with Bach's single minor-key symphony in G minor, very similar in spirit to Mozart's No 25; this piece, often recorded before, shows an unfamiliar side to his musical personality. Anthony Halstead and his players convey the music's strength and spirit convincingly. The lively finales all go with a swing, and the opening movements have plenty of energy. The slow movements are not always quite so persuasive: the third C minor slow movement of the G minor Symphony is a little overly deliberate and becomes detached and modest in expressive impact.

Generally, though, these are strong and appealing performances of some attractive and unfamiliar music, clearly, slightly drily recorded, and admirers of the London Bach and his music need not hesitate.

Symphonies – Op 9: No 1 in B flat; No 2 in E flat; No 3 in B flat; B flat, Sieber No 1; E flat, Sieber No 2; E flat (ed Warburton) 🅿
Hanover Band / Anthony Halstead
CPO CPO999 487-2 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●

This disc offers the Op 9 Symphonies published in The Hague in 1773, two of them in two versions, along with a little-known symphony. Ernest Warburton explains in his notes that the usual texts for these works, with oboes and horns, are in his view arrangements of originals calling for clarinets – still rarities in most European orchestras at the time – and bassoon, in which form one of them was published in Paris. Here, then, Op 9 Nos 1 and 2 are done twice over to allow comparison; and certainly the versions differ markedly in flavour with clarinets and bassoon. The E flat work, No 2, one of Bach's finest and most vigorously argued symphonies, comes out particularly well, with quite a different ring to its tuttis.

The E flat Symphony is an attractive work, with an eloquent violin line in the Andante, and a charming final gavotte. Of the works played twice, the B flat is lightish, probably originally an opera overture; the E flat has more substance and notably a C minor slow movement with a melody of a haunting, graceful beauty. The third Op 9 Symphony is a brisk little piece which again started life as an overture. Halstead directs with his usual style and shapeliness.

Adriano in Siria – Overture. Six Grand Overtures, Op 18 – No 1 in E flat; No 4 in D. Symphony in G minor, Op 6 No 6. Sinfonia concertante in C, T289 No 4 (ed Maunder) 🄿
Academy of Ancient Music / Simon Standage vn
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0540 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●

The G minor Symphony is a magnificently fiery piece, similar in manner to Haydn's No 39 and Mozart's No 25; it is done here with plenty of Sturm und Drang, notably in the very forceful finale, and the noble ideas of the slow movement are well caught. The opening item is a three-movement D major Symphony, in effect, with a well-worked first movement and an Andante with rich wind writing. No other composer, besides Mozart, seems to have had as keen a feeling as JC Bach for the sensuous beauty of wind textures. The Sinfonia concertante isn't quite as successful a piece (it's rather repetitive), but it is never less than charming and enjoyable, again with some beautiful wind textures in the Larghetto and a delightful 'Two lovely black eyes' theme in the rondo. The solo playing is admirable.

Recommended to anyone sympathetic to JC Bach's music.

Overtures

Overtures – Gioas, re di Giuda; Adriano in Siria; Zanaida; Orione. La clemenza di Scipione – Overture; No 5, March in G; No 22, March in E flat. Carattaco – Overture; No 20, March in B flat; No 26, March in G. Symphony in D, Schmitt Op 18 No 1 🄿
Hanover Band / Anthony Halstead
CPO CPO999 488-2 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●

Small-scale but elegantly fashioned, melodious and pleasurable music: it is no wonder that the London public in the 1760s and 1770s took JC to their hearts. Here we have the overtures to six works of his that were performed at the King's Theatre in the Haymarket – from his first opera there, Orione in 1763, to his last, La clemenza di Scipione in 1778, and the 1770 oratorio, Gioas, plus a symphony which is a pasticcio of the Clemenza overture with additional trumpets and drums and a revised version of the Andante from the overture to his only completed French opera, the 1779 Amadis de Gaule.

The most striking feature about all these works, apart from their vigorous openings, is the freedom in the use of wind instruments: Zanaida has soli clarinets, and the trio of Orione's minuet is for wind band only, as are passages in Adriano, the E flat March in Clemenza and the brilliant final Presto of Carattaco.

The Hanover Band's playing is vital and fresh, rhythmically crisp and tonally clean-cut; the recording is first-rate.

Harpsichord Works

'Bach and the Möller Manuscript' 🄿
JC Bach Capriccio sopra la lontananza del suo fratello dilettissimo, BWV992. Sonata, BWV967. Suite, BWV832. Toccata in D, BWV912 G Böhm Capriccio. Suite in D minor Fabricius Gigue belle in C minor Lully Chaconne Reincken Suite C Ritter Suite Zachow Suite
Carole Cerasi hpd
Metronome METCD1055 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●

One of the most thought-provoking aspects in Christoph Wolff's Bach book, The Learned Musician (WW Norton & Co: 2000), is the sheer range and quantity of repertoire absorbed by the young JS Bach, much of it disseminated by his older brother Johann Christoph, with whom he lived after he was orphaned at the age of nine. Continuing an award-winning trail of engaging recorded recitals, Carole Cerasi explores the world of Bach's early musical influences and the composer's own early attempts.

The Möller Manuscript – named after an early owner – is the only surviving Johann Christoph compilation. It reveals the panoply of Teutonising of the French suite by 17th-century masters such as Handel's teacher Zachow, and the 'éminences grises', Böhm and Reincken, whose beautifully argued and flamboyant works are still woefully unrecognised. Cerasi gives a thoroughly engrossing account of these latter masters (the Böhm Capriccio is quite simply a gem: no wonder Bach so admired him). This is an utterly compelling recital, dispatched with flair and an acute sensibility.

Johann Sebastian Bach

German 1685-1750

GROVE Johann Sebastian was the youngest son of Johann Ambrosius Bach, a town musician, from whom he probably learnt the violin and the rudiments of musical theory. When he was 10 he was orphaned and went to live with his elder brother Johann Christoph, organist at St Michael's Church, Ohrdruf, who gave him lessons in keyboard playing. From 1700-02 he attended St Michael's School in Lüneburg, where he sang in the church choir and probably came into contact with organist and composer Georg Böhm. He also visited Hamburg to hear JA Reincken at the organ of St Catherine's Church.

After competing unsuccessfully for an organist's post in Sangerhausen in 1702, Bach spent the spring and summer of 1703 as 'lackey' and violinist at the court of Weimar and then took up the post of organist at the Neukirche in Arnstadt. In June 1707 he moved to St Blasius, Mühlhausen, and four months later married his cousin Maria Barbara Bach in nearby Domheim. Bach was appointed organist and chamber musician to the Duke of Saxe-Weimar in 1708, and in the next nine years he became known as a leading organist and composed many of his finest works for the instrument. During this time he fathered seven children, including Wilhelm Friedemann and Carl Philipp Emanuel. When, in 1717, Bach was appointed Kapellmeister at Cöthen he was at first refused permission to leave Weimar and was allowed to do so only after being held prisoner by the duke for almost a month.

Bach's new employer, Prince Leopold, was a talented musician who loved and understood the art. Since the court was Calvinist, Bach had no chapel duties and instead concentrated on instrumental composition. From this period date his violin concertos and the six Brandenburg Concertos, as well as numerous sonatas, suites and keyboard works, including several (eg the Inventions and Book I of the '48') intended for instruction. In 1720 Maria Barbara died while Bach was visiting Karlsbad with the prince; in December of the following year Bach married Anna Magdalena Wilcke, daughter of a court trumpeter at Weissenfels. A week later Prince Leopold also married, and his bride's lack of interest in the arts led to a decline in the support given to music at the Cöthen court. In 1722 Bach entered his candidature for the prestigious post of Director musices at Leipzig and Kantor of the Thomasschule there. In April 1723 after the preferred candidates, Telemann and Graupner, had withdrawn, he was offered the post and accepted it.

Bach remained as Thomaskantor in Leipzig for the rest of his life, often in conflict with the authorities, but a happy family man and a proud and caring parent. His duties centred on the Sunday and feastday services at the city's two main churches, and during his early years in Leipzig he composed prodigious quantities of church music, including four or five cantata cycles, the Magnificat and the St John and St Matthew Passions. He was by this time renowned as a virtuoso organist and in constant demand as a teacher and an expert in organ construction and design. His fame as a composer gradually spread more widely when, from 1726 onwards, he began to bring out published editions of some of his keyboard and organ music.

From about 1729 Bach's interest in composing church music sharply declined, and most of his sacred works after that date including the B minor Mass and the Christmas Oratorio consist mainly of 'parodies' or arrangements of earlier music. At the same time he took over the direction of the collegium musicum that Telemann had founded in Leipzig in 1702 – a mainly amateur society which gave regular public concerts. For these Bach arranged harpsichord concertos and composed several large-scale cantatas, or serenatas, to impress the Elector of Saxony, by whom he was granted the courtesy title of Hofcompositeur in 1736.

Among the 13 children born to Anna Magdalena at Leipzig was Johann Christian, in 1735. In 1744 Bach's second son, Emanuel, was married and in 1747 Bach visited the couple at Potsdam, where Emanuel was employed as harpsichordist by Frederick the Great. At Potsdam Bach improvised on a theme given to him by the king, and this led to the composition of the Musical Offering, a compendium of fugue, canon and sonata based on the royal theme. Contrapuntal artifice predominates in the work of Bach's last decade, during which his membership (from 1747) of Lorenz Mizler's learned Society of Musical Sciences profoundly affected his musical thinking. The Canonic Variations for organ was one of the works Bach presented to the society; the unfinished Art of Fugue may also have been intended for distribution among its members.

Bach's eyesight began to deteriorate during his last year, and in March and April 1750 he was twice operated on by the itinerant English oculist John Taylor. The operations and the treatment that followed them may have hastened Bach's death. He took final communion on July 22 and died six days later. On July 31 he was buried at St John's cemetery. His widow survived him for 10 years, dying in poverty in 1760.

Bach's output embraces practically every musical genre of his time except for the dramatic ones of opera and oratorio (his three 'oratorios' being oratorios only in a special sense). He opened up new dimensions in virtually every department of creative work to which he turned, in format, musical quality and technical demands. As was normal at the time, his creative production was mostly bound up with the external factors of his places of work and his employers, but the density and complexity of his music are such that analysts and commentators have uncovered in it layers of religious and numerological significance rarely to be found in the music of other composers. Many of his contemporaries, notably the critic JA Scheibe, found his music too involved and lacking in immediate melodic appeal, but his chorale harmonisations and fugal works were soon adopted as models for new generations of musicians. The course of Bach's musical development was undeflected (though not entirely uninfluenced) by the changes in musical style taking place around him. Together with his great contemporary Handel (whom chance prevented his ever meeting), Bach was the last great representative of the Baroque era in an age which was already rejecting the Baroque aesthetic in favour of a new, 'enlightened' one.

Keyboard Concertos

Harpsichord Concertos – D minor, BWV1052; D, BWV1054. Concerto for Flute, Violin, Harpsichord and Strings in A minor, BWV1044. Das wohltemperierte Klavier, BWV846-93 – Preludes and Fugues: F, BWV880; B, BWV892 🅿
Le Concert Français / Pierre Hantaï hpd
Astrée Naïve E8837 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1993 ●●

The concertos come over well. Ensemble are tautly controlled and the string playing effectively articulated, although on occasion the first violin is a little too favoured in the recorded balance. However, the string playing is so unanimous in sound and purpose that there is little to worry about in this department. Hantaï himself is impressive for his wonderfully rhythmic playing, the clarity with which he interprets both his own keyboard textures and those which support and punctuate it, and not least for his supple, muscular concept of the music. These are extraordinarily invigorating performances, which draw the listener deep into the harmonic and contrapuntal complexities and conceits of Bach's art. Take for instance the elusive Adagio of BWV1052, where careful punctuation and sensitive interaction between solo and tutti make for a rewarding coherence. In the A minor Triple Concerto, Hantaï is joined by his flautist brother, Marc, and François Fernandez (violin), the leader of the ensemble. The work is a Leipzig arrangement of movements from earlier pieces not in concerto form, whose extent sources were almost certainly copied after Bach's death. The opening Allegro is a little too heavy, but the essentially three-part texture of the middle movement is realised with affection. Altogether a stimulating disc.

Keyboard Concertos – D minor, BWV1052;
E, BWV1053; A, BWV1055
Academy of St Martin in the Fields /
Murray Perahia pf
Sony Classical SK89245 (53 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●●

Soloist-conducted piano concertos can sometimes mean compromise, even chaos...but not in this case. As soloist, Perahia is his usual stylish, discreet and pianistically refined self. He takes the D minor Concerto's opening at a fair lick, a hot-foot sprinter embellishing the line with taste and affecting a little ritardando, just as the mood momentarily brightens, à la Edwin Fischer. Elsewhere, he is very much his own man, intensifying his tone for rising sequences or softening it to the most rarefied murmur. His command of colour is as striking here as it is on his CD of the Goldberg Variations, especially in the Adagio, which approaches cantorial heights of intensity.

As for the E major and A major Concertos, elegance is more of the essence than fire, but there too Perahia delivers. He has a way of accenting without jabbing the keys, tracing counterpoint while keeping the top line well to the fore. And how nice to hear the warming tone of a theorbo (bass lute) in the E major Concerto's central Siciliano, a beautiful performance, more ornamental than cantorial, in keeping with the more decorative nature of the music.

Rivals are plentiful, but credible contenders at this level of interpretation are rare. Sviatoslav Richter plays with incredible control while keeping every note alive, but some might find his manner too austere. And while Edwin Fischer is consistently spontaneous, he is rather less elegant than Perahia – and his version of the A major Concerto sounds as if it's 'Busonified'. András Schiff, like Perahia, commands a wide range of colours, though the binding force of Perahia's concentration – always a boon in his latest recordings – leaves the stronger impression. The carefully balanced Sony recordings keep the sound frame tight and lively.

Keyboard Concertos – No 3 in D, BWV1054; No 5 in F minor, BWV1056; No 6 in F, BWV1057; No 7 in G minor, BWV1058
Academy of St Martin in the Fields /
Murray Perahia pf Ⓕ
Sony Classical SK89690 (54 minutes: DDD) ●●

As well as being immensely vital, Perahia's Bach is profoundly pianistic, not in any exhibitionistic sense, but in the way tempo, dynamics and nuance register without undue exaggeration. Perahia's staccato never loses quality, even when soft – try the opening movement of the Sixth Concerto. And yet he is just as capable of increasing the pressure as he sees fit: listen out for his brightening tone at 5'16" into the same movement, or the extraordinary dexterity of his finger work from around 1'45" into the finale, a fair match for any fiddler tackling the same passage in the parallel Fourth Brandenburg Concerto. The counterpoint-crazy Glenn Gould is the benchmark here, wonderfully absorbing as ever, but this warmer, more discreet and more overtly decorative newcomer is, for the moment, the preferred option. The sound is beautifully clear (violin desks are antiphonally placed) with impressive richness in the bass. Nothing much more to say except, don't hesitate – life is too short.

Oboe Concertos

Oboe Concertos – F, BWV1053; A, BWV1055;
D minor, BWV1059
Chamber Orchestra of Europe / Douglas Boyd
ob/ob d'amore
DG 429 225-2GH (46 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1989 ●

Although Bach is not known to have written any concertos for the oboe, he did entrust it with some beautiful obbligato parts, so he clearly did not underrate its expressive capacities. He did, however, rearrange many of his works for different instrumental media and there is musicological evidence that original oboe concertos were the (lost) sources from which other works were derived. The Harpsichord Concerto, BWV1055, is believed originally to have been written for the oboe d'amore, while the other two Oboe Concertos have been reassembled from movements found in various cantatas. Whatever the academic reasoning, the results sound very convincing.

Douglas Boyd is a superb oboist, with a clear sound, and a fluency that belies the instrument's technical difficulty. He plays the faster, outer movements with winsome lightness, and with alertness to dynamic nuance; the slow ones, the hearts of these works, are given with sensitivity but without sentimentality – which can easily invade that of BWV1059, taken from Cantata No 156, Ich steh mit einem Fuss im Grabe. The Chamber Orchestra of Europe partners him to perfection in this crisp recording.

JS Bach Oboe d'amore Concerto in D, BWV1053a (arr Mehl). Cantata No 156, 'Ich steh mit einem Fuss im Grabe' – Sinfonia. Trio in F, BWV1040

CPE Bach Oboe Concertos – B flat, H466;
E flat, H468
Heinz Holliger ob/ob d'amore Massimo Polidori vc
Andreas Erisman hpd Berne Camerata / Thomas Zehetmair vn
Philips 454 450-2PH (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

It's nice to see JS's music coupled with that of his second son, Carl Philipp Emanuel. The JS pieces are the Oboe d'amore Concerto reconstructed from the E major Harpsichord Concerto (and very convincingly so); the Sinfonia from Cantata No 156, a sweetly lyrical piece for oboe and strings which also turns up as the slow movement of the F minor Harpsichord Concerto; and a tiny Trio which, in typical Bach fashion, makes light of the fact that it is canonic. The two CPE concertos are both works of his late years in Berlin, expansive and varied as ever, and mixing polite galanteries with a more deeply felt, brooding changeableness, especially evident in the slow movements.

The JS pieces receive the more convincing performance: Holliger's playing shows superb technical control; he demonstrates a pleasing variety of articulation in the Concerto and the Trio, while the Sinfonia just oozes with all the gentle flow it demands. How odd then that, by comparison, the CPE Bach performances should sound so old-fashioned, with more vibrato from the strings and a resultant slight loss of clarity and incisiveness. This is music which benefits more from the use of period instruments, but undoubtedly there are plenty who would disagree, and Holliger's musicianship cannot be faulted; there are few Baroque oboists who could play with such fluidity. So unless you have an aversion to modern instruments, you can buy with confidence.

Violin Concertos

A minor, BWV1041; E, BWV1042. Double Concertos – Two Violins and Strings in D minor, BWV1043; Oboe, Violin and Strings in C minor, BWV1060

Violin Concertos, BWV1041-42.
Double Concertos, BWV1060[a]; BWV1043
Arthur Grumiaux, Herman Krebbers vns Heinz Holliger ob Les Solistes Romands; New Philharmonia Orchestra / Arpad Gerecz, [a]Edo de Waart
Philips Silver Line 420 700-2PSL (61 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1970-78 ●●

In the old days, records of Bach violin concertos were adequately filled by the Concertos in A minor and E major, plus the Double Violin Concerto. On this disc these three works are played strongly by Arthur Grumiaux, who is joined in the Double Concerto by Herman Krebbers. Arpad Gerecz directs Les Solistes Romands and the 1970s recordings are vivid; some may even find it slightly strident. The fourth work (to fill the longer playing time available) is the Concerto for oboe and violin, BWV1060. Heinz Holliger plays beautifully, and Grumiaux is utterly relaxed with the New Philharmonia Orchestra under Edo de Waart in a noticeably warm recording.

Violin Concertos, BWV1041-42. Double Concertos, BWV1043[b]; BWV1060[a]
[a]Albrecht Mayer ob [b]Daniel Stabrawa vn
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Nigel Kennedy vn
EMI 557016-2 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●

Though Bach is not a composer one generally associates with Nigel Kennedy, this recording of the four most popular concertos is far more than just a dutiful 250th anniversary offering. Kennedy is nothing if not characterful, taking a positive, often robust view of Bach. It is not just his breathtakingly fast speeds in finales and in some first movements, too, that will have listeners pricking up their ears, but often a fierceness of manner which can initially take one aback. With brilliant playing not just from the soloist but from the Berlin Philharmonic, the results are certainly exciting. The power of Bach's writing is reinforced thanks also to the rather close recorded balance in the Jesus-Christus Kirche.

However fast Kennedy's speeds in Allegros, he counters any feeling of breathlessness not just in his clean articulation, but in his fine detailing. The Berlin players respond very sympathetically, but are not always quite so adept at springing rhythms at such fast speeds, and in the finale of the E major, the slurred phrasing of each duplet is in danger of sounding exaggerated.

By contrast, slow movements tend to be taken broadly, but there again Kennedy has thought through his expressive phrasing in detail, consciously pointing rhythms, shading dynamics and colouring tone. His natural magnetism carries one on unerringly, though even more enjoyable is the freshly spontaneous, more songful if less detailed approach of both Grumiaux (Philips) and Joji Hattori (Classic fM), particularly the Hattori, where the joy of Bach's inspiration is more evident, not just in lyrical slow movements but in bouncy Allegros.

Yet any reservations over the Kennedy detract not at all from the positive strength of his readings. In the slow movement of the A minor Concerto, for example, the orchestral chords on violins and violas marking each beat of the bar are weightier than usual, again following detailed indications in the score. That helps to set in relief such magic moments as Kennedy's ethereally sustained pianissimo entry on a high B flat at bar 17 (track 8, 2'19"), emerging as from afar.

In the Double Concerto Daniel Stabrawa makes a perfectly matched partner, and in the Concerto for oboe and violin there is no question of his seeking to overshadow the fine artistry of the warm-toned Berlin oboist Albrecht Mayer. Even though the two rival versions of this ideal coupling make safer recommendations, with such characterful readings this disc finds its very distinctive place – these are the visions of an exceptional artist, helped by warm, full sound.

Violin Concertos, BWV1041-42[a]. 🅿
Double Concertos, BWV1043[b]; BWV1060 (arr Fischer)[c]
[abc]Ryo Terakado, [b]Natsumi Wakamatsu vns
[c]Marcel Ponseele ob Bach Collegium Japan / Masaaki Suzuki
BIS CD961 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●

These aren't just 'authentic' performances, they're also outstandingly musical ones. There is happy animation in the flanking movements – bows are lifted from or stopped on the strings to ensure the cleanest of textures – and a warmth of expression in the slow ones which comes from a deeper source than mere academic study.

The admirable soloist in the A minor and E major Concertos, Ryo Terakado, and his partner in the Double Concerto, Natsumi Wakamatsu, both studied with Sigiswald Kuijken in The Hague and served with various Baroque ensembles in Europe before returning to Japan. It shows in the beautifully 'vocalised' shaping of their lines. Not once do they or their ripieno colleagues jar the ear with acidic sounds, and in the Andante of the A minor Concerto Terakado achieves a pianissimo that is near-miraculous in its quality. Marcel Ponseele, the only European on parade, has a comparably distinguished pedigree. In the reconstructed Concerto BWV1060 his fluency, rounded tone and clean articulation are second to none, and he makes the Adagio one of the serenely lovely high spots of the entire programme. As for the ripieno, one could not ask for better, and they are recorded in excellent balance with the soloists. Suzuki directs the whole with sure hands.

Additional recommendation
Violin Concertos, BWV1041-43, 1060
Podger vn Academy of Ancient Music / Manze vn 🅿
Harmonia Mundi HMU90 7155 (57 minutes: DDD: 4/97) Ⓕ

Manze projects a highly developed sense of fantasy in his interpretations and, for the most part, it proves immensely effective.

Reconstructed Concertos

Concerto for Oboe, Violin and Strings, BWV1060[a] 🅿
Concerto for 3 Violins and Strings in C, BWV1064[b]
Viola Concerto, reconstructed from BWV 49, 169 and 1053[c]. Violin Concerto in G minor, BWV1056[d]
[a]Albrecht Mayer ob [b]Aleksander Ivic,
[b]Bernhard Forck vns [c]Wolfram Christ va
Berlin Baroque Soloists / Rainer Kussmaul[abd] vn
Koch Schwann 3-1491-2 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 2000

Bach's concertos mostly survive in manuscripts which the composer rearranged for keyboard, both for himself and in multi-form, to play with his sons in Leipzig. Speculation on exactly when such pieces were originally written, and for what instruments they were intended, has been one of the most circular parlour games in musical history; theories on tessitura, idiom, rhetorical figures and so on have all played a part in this largely hypothetical debate. Scholarly cul-de-sacs have, however, hardly discouraged the likes of Rainer Kussmaul and others from presenting these pieces in a variety of ways.

It soon becomes clear in programmes such as this that the issue really isn't worth getting in a stew about. The Concerto in C major is, in any guise, a marvellous triple concerto which, since it first appeared on record in 1975 has received several readings on disc. Few are as robustly and extrovertly conceived as this, gutsy playing indeed abounding from these flexible Berlin Philharmonic principals. Sitting alongside Jeanne Lamon's elegant and lithe account with Tafelmusik and, more recently, an effervescent performance with Isabelle Faust under Helmuth Rilling on modern instruments, the Berliner Barock Solisten pursue a middle path. This is further exemplified in the G minor Violin Concerto with Kussmaul as soloist, where modern instruments (in his case a Strad, no less) are set-up for an easier Baroque ride.

The players here, and in Wolfram Christ's captivating interpretation of the cantata-derived Concerto in D for viola (though in reality, it is no more a viola concerto than Tertis's reading of the Elgar Cello Concerto), seem to find a happy medium of a stylishly aware gestural palette without, for them, the disorientation of 'period' specialism. Most beguiling perhaps are the slow movements where the lyrical pedigree of these fine instrumentalists begins to shine. A stimulating addition to the catalogue.

Brandenburg Concertos

No 1 in F, BWV1046; No 2 in F, BWV1047;
No 3 in G, BWV1048; No 4 in G, BWV1049;
No 5 in D, BWV1050; No 6 in B flat, BWV1051

Vienna Concentus Musicus / Nikolaus Harnoncourt 🅿
Teldec Ultima ② 0630-18944-2 (148 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1981-83 ●●

This is the second set of Brandenburgs directed by Nikolaus Harnoncourt, following his pioneering accounts of the 1960s. The later performances, in particular, have been favourites for reissue since their original release in 1982; this is their second reissue. A strong sense of reappraisal lies at the heart of these challenging performances of the Brandenburgs, plainly evident in the level of refinement and attention to detail, traits that have now become Harnoncourt's hallmark in later repertoire; the technical limitations of period instrumentalists from the first set are definitely a ghost laid to rest. Concerto No 2, for instance, has a considered nonchalance and the trumpet playing is of a different order here: this is one of the most aristocratic and rounded performances on disc. While perhaps never totally succeeding in displacing the older (1967) version in many people's affections, the present one does have several strong points, not least the extraordinarily high quality of the recording. Where this set scores over the older one is in the brass and woodwind playing. Great advances were made between the 1960s and the 1980s in rediscovering and developing techniques required to bring period horns, trumpets, oboes and flutes to life in a convincing way. The playing at its best is very good indeed. Such is the case with Alice Harnoncourt's solo violin playing in the Fourth Concerto of the set which, from a technical and an interpretative viewpoint, is an outstanding feature. The two string concertos (Nos 3 and 6) also come over well. In summary, nothing here is remotely dull and the level of execution is consistently high. Thoroughly recommended.

Brandenburg Concertos Nos 1-6 🅿
Tafelmusik / Jeanne Lamon vn
Sony Classical Vivarte ② S2K66289 Ⓕ
(93 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1993-94 ●●

Tafelmusik's Brandenburgs come straight from the heart and as such they are performances which invite repeated listening and are furthermore both easy and enjoyable to live with. There are no startling novelties here and nothing which attempts to impede the natural course of musical flow. Tempos are sensibly chosen and, once chosen, consistently adhered to. That is not to say that there is an absence of affective gesture or a lack of rhetorical awareness. Everything in fact is punctuated in a way that allows the listener to follow the subtly shaded nuances of Bach's dialogue. Some readers may feel that these interpretations lack the stamp of a strong personality but any such fears of interpretative neutrality are largely dispelled by the sensibility of the players and their skill at reaching the heart of the music without the assistance either of pretension or muddled intellectual clutter.

Reservations chiefly concern minutiae of tuning and to a much lesser extent, ensemble. Neither these weaknesses, nor the occasional blip or thwack, hindering the production of clean notes from oboe, horns or trumpet, spoil enjoyment of Nos 1 and 2. It is a pity that the first movement of No 3 is marred by indifferent tuning and, more disturbingly, by a marked acceleration in speed beginning at bar 84 (3'26"); but the second Allegro of the work is so well done that you are inclined to forgive them. Tafelmusik's account of this brilliant binary movement is not to be missed.

CD80368 Brandenburg Concertos Nos 1-3 🅿
CD80354 Brandenburg Concertos Nos 4-6
Boston Baroque / Martin Pearlman hpd
Telarc CD80368/54 (52 and 41 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

Boston Baroque is a close-knit group of highly accomplished and stylish instrumentalists. On their discs their enthusiasm is clear in the bustling outer movements; it's a wise leader who knows his team, in this case Martin Pearlman, who no doubt set the tempos. In the slow movements there is the breathing-space which is often found lacking. The soloists are first-class (though Friedemann Immer's trumpet trills in Concerto No 2 sound a mite uncomfortable) and the multi-talented Daniel Stepner (violone piccolo in No 2, violin soloist in Nos 4 and 5, and viola soloist in No 6) and Pearlman himself (harpsichord) are especially impressive. It is, however, the ensemble, supported by a finely balanced recording, that makes these accounts so outstanding, and those who are allergic to thin or nasal string sounds will find nothing to cringe from in the warmth of tone that characterises these performances. The annotation states (but without explanation) that Concerto No 6 'must remain a chamber piece with one player to a part': whether it must or not, the recording shows it to be wholly effective played in that way. We are also told that 'it includes the transparent sounds of gambas' and so it does, but we are left to guess who their players might be. There can be no clear 'best' in the Brandenburgs, but this set is likely to remain among those which will prove to be enduring.

Brandenburg Concertos Nos 1-3 🅿
Oboe Concerto in A, BWV1055. Concerto for Two Violins, Oboe and Orchestra in C minor, BWV1060
David Reichenberg ob Simon Standage vn
The English Concert / Trevor Pinnock hpd
Archiv Produktion Blue 471 720-2ABL Ⓜ
(71 minutes: DDD) Recorded 1982-84

Brandenburg Concertos Nos 4-6 🅿
Concerto for Flute, Harpsichord and Strings in A minor, BWV1044
Liza Beznosiuk fl Simon Standage vn
The English Concert / Trevor Pinnock hpd
Archiv Produktion Blue 474 220-2ABL Ⓜ
(73 minutes: DDD) Recorded 1982-84

The chief merits here are the overall zest of the performances, the expressive shaping of slow movements, and the individual contributions of some of the soloists – Pinnock himself brilliant in No 5, Philip Pickett, Lisa Beznosiuk and David Reichenberg admirable on recorder, transverse flute and oboe respectively, and Simon Standage in the violin parts performing prodigies, especially at the breakneck speeds adopted for some of the fast movements (the finale of No 4, for example). This tendency to force the pace makes things uncomfortable for the horns in No 1, and also leads elsewhere to some feelings of instability. Obviously several sessions were needed to record all six concertos, and there are some rather disturbing differences of balance and of ambiance between them. In No 2 the recorder, except when in its high octave, has difficulty in making its part heard, even against only the violin, let alone the oboe and trumpet (though it seems to have been brought in slightly closer for the finale); but in No 4 the internal balance between recorders and violin is quite satisfactory. No 1 is the most cramped acoustically, its larger sonorities needing room to expand; at the other extreme is No 3, which seems too resonant for real clarity; much the best and cleanest sound is achieved in Nos 4 and 5. A somewhat variable level of success, then, though at their best the recordings are highly recommendable.

Further listening
Stravinsky Concerto in E flat, Dumbarton Oaks
Couplings: Pulcinella Suite. Bartók Romanian Dances. Divertimento
Orpheus Chamber Orchestra
DG 445 541-2GMA (71 minutes: DDD: 4/86 & 6/87^R)

Stravinsky's witty take on Bach's Brandenburg Concertos, played with precision and finesse by the Orpheus CO.

Orchestral Suites

No 1 in C, BWV1066; No 2 in B minor, BWV1067; No 3 in D, BWV1068; No 4 in D, BWV1069

Orchestral Suites Nos 1-4 🅿
Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment / Frans Brüggen
Philips ② 442 151-2PH2 (81 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ◉

In Bach's hands the orchestral suite reached a peak of expressive refinement and it is this aspect of the music that Brüggen so effectively highlights, with discerningly applied appoggiaturas, gently swung rhythms and concern for eloquent turns of phrase.

The Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment responds well to his ideas and gives an alluringly intimate and relaxed performance of the First Suite in C major. The Second Suite, in B minor, is treated as pure chamber music, with single strings and a continuo of two lutes. This last-mentioned feature is a pleasing touch, and an effective one, too. The Third and Fourth Suites, both in D major, are of an entirely different character from the first two. Enter trumpets and drums to enrich the woodwind and string textures with a splendid sense of occasion. The Third Suite has long been the most popular of the four, chiefly on account of its celebrated 'Air on the G string', and the ebullient Gavottes which follow it. But the real jewel here is the Overture to the Fourth Suite. Its rich and subtle harmonies all contribute towards an exotic flavour which comes over well.

The only complaint is that in none of the Suites does Brüggen observe the second half repeats of the overtures themselves. This is something of a pity, because they are supreme examples of the form. However, these performances are lightly delivered, with spirit, subtly shaded dynamics and, in general, a loving attention to every detail in the music. That's what it deserves and it has paid off, handsomely. A satisfying release, superbly recorded.

Orchestral Suites Nos 1-4; 🅿
No 5 in G minor, BWV1070 (attrib)
Musica Antiqua Köln / Reinhard Goebel
Archiv Produktion ② 415 671-2AH2 Ⓕ
(111 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1982-85

The Suite in G minor was once in the possession of Bach's eldest son, Wilhelm Friedemann, who might also have been its composer. In an interesting insert-note, Reinhard Goebel explains that between 1982 and the completion of the recordings in 1985, his ideas changed about how to perform the music. Taking an extreme view he considers the earlier essay in style as among the sins of his youth. Much of Goebel's newer thinking is influenced by the writings of the American musicologist Frederick Neumann. Some of the points are not presented clearly and these are truisms concerning 'authenticity', but his essay comes over as thoughtful and constructive. All this might suggest that there are sweeping and irreconcilable differences between MAK's performances and others of recent years. Not so, for while Goebel does largely put his ideas into practice it is in details of phrase and of articulation that his readings provide the most interesting comparisons. In the B minor Suite, the phrases are beautifully shaped, the tempos nicely judged and the instrumental textures effectively clear. In the remaining three suites the string forces of the ensemble are considerably augmented with four first and four second violins, three violas, two cellos, a violone and two harpsichords. The solo and ripieno playing is of a very high order; and it needs to be since some of Goebel's tempos make what occasionally sound like ultimate demands on his wind players.

In its shaping of individual notes and of phrases, these performances are probably more immaculate than any, yet that alone may not prove enough for you to switch your allegiance. Lively, brisk, stylish and highly polished these readings certainly are; they afford many delightful and convincing views of Bach's music, notably in the first two suites and lyrical account of the Air from the Third Suite. Nevertheless, at times you are conscious of a severity of outlook, a rigidity of temperament if not of interpretation which does not accord with the 'occasional' and often jubilant spirit of the music. Without wishing to dilute the considerable virtues of this issue, we would sound a warning bell to anyone tempted to regard it as preferable to others based on comparable tenets of performing style merely on the grounds of its polished executancy. The recorded sound is clear and pleasantly resonant. All Bach's repeats are observed throughout.

Additional recommendation
Orchestral Suites
English Baroque Soloists / Gardiner
Warner Ultima ② 0927-41387-2 (DDD) Ⓑ

A lovely aerated reading. At the end of the First Suite Gardiner incorporates the thematically related Chorale BWV299 – a novel and effective idea. The sound is superb.

The Art of Fugue, BWV1080

Awards 1986

Davitt Moroney hpd 🅿
Harmonia Mundi Musique d'Abord
② HMA195 1169/70
(99 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1986 ●●●

Bach died before the process of engraving his last great work had been completed, thus leaving a number of performance issues in doubt. However, Davitt Moroney is a performer-scholar with a mature understanding of the complexity of Bach's work; in a lucid essay in the booklet, he discusses the problems of presenting The Art of Fugue whilst explaining his approach to performing it. Certain aspects of this version will be of particular importance to prospective buyers: Moroney himself has completed Contrapunctus 14 but he also plays the same Contrapunctus in its unfinished state as a fugue on three subjects. He omits Bach's own reworkings for two harpsichords of Contrapunctus 13 on the grounds that they do not play a part in the composer's logically constructed fugue cycle; and he omits the Chorale Prelude in G major (BWV668a) which certainly had nothing to do with Bach's scheme but was added in the edition of 1751 so that the work should not end in an incomplete state. Moroney's performing technique is of a high order, placing emphasis on the beauty of the music which he reveals with passionate conviction. Exemplary presentation and an appropriate recorded sound enhance this fine achievement.

Evgeni Koroliov, with Lyupka Haždigeorgieva pfs
Tacet ② TACET13 (84 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1990 ●●

Consideration of recordings of The Art of Fugue often raises such issues as whether it was intended as a theoretical work or for practical performance, what instrument or instruments it should be played on, and in what order the movements are played. For those obsessed with the last question, the order favoured here is, after the sixth (French) Contrapunctus, to intersperse the canons with the remainder. Evgeni Koroliov approaches the first Fugue very slowly and tranquilly, starting and ending quietly but with increases of tension here and there. Any fears that this is going to be a bland reading of the whole are immediately dispelled by the characterful treatment of the ensuing movements. Contrapunctus 2 (in dotted rhythm) becomes almost pugnacious, Contrapunctus 4 is taken presto, and both it and its immediate successor are played staccato without sounding in the least gimmicky. Elsewhere Koroliov employs a judicious variety of dynamics and of articulation – staccato, staccatissimo, legato and détaché – to convey his unfailingly clear linear thinking. The one weakness in this excellent issue is the inadequate presentation material, which doesn't mention, among everything else. The Art of Fugue is often made to sound dull and didactic: this performance is absolutely riveting.

The Art of Fugue. A Musical Offering, BWV1079. 🅿
Canons, BWV1072-78; 1086-87
Musica Antiqua Köln / Reinhard Goebel
Archiv Produktion ③ 413 642-2AH3
(140 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1984 ●

It goes without saying that period instruments or modern replicas are used. The intellectually staggering Art of Fugue is a kind of testament to Bach's art and for this recording the instrumentation, unspecified by the composer, has been well chosen. The 14 miniature Canons which close this issue are for the most part a recent discovery and were written on a page of Bach's own copy of the Goldberg Variations; of curiosity value certainly but not much more than that. Excellent recording.

Bach The Art of Fugue – Contrapuncti 1-11; 🅿
Fuga Mozart Five Fugues, K405. Fugue in G minor, K401/K375*e*
Phantasm (Laurence Dreyfus, Wendy Gillespie, Jonathan Manson, Markku Luolajan-Mikkola viols)
Simax PSC1135 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●

Seeing that we enjoy Bach and Mozart on a modern piano – an instrument of course outside their time-frame – should we demur at their music being played on an equally anachronistic consort of viols? Leaving aside the argument advanced in Laurence Dreyfus's note that much viol consort music was fugal in texture anyway, the fact is that the contrapuntal lines here emerge with great clarity and with a subtlety of timbre, articulation and dynamics beyond even the ablest keyboard player, thanks to Phantasm's accomplished and expressive performances. The group offers the first 11 contrapuncti, without the canons or mirror fugues, but plus the final uncompleted chef d'oeuvre that was to have crowned the awesome project; Phantasm's playing offers new insights into Bach's prodigious mind. In his transcriptions for string quartet of fugues from the 48, Mozart – who, it is reported, constantly had Bach's volume lying open on his piano – made a few small adjustments to details of rhythm and part-writing; and the process also fired him to write several fugues of his own, including the one in G minor (for piano solo or duet) here. Phantasm, despite a slight tendency to hurry, brings a smile to one's lips by its intonation, precision and, above all, musicality.

The Art of Fugue, BWV1080 🅿
Fretwork (Richard Boothby, Richard Campbell, Wendy Gillespie, Julia Hodgson, William Hunt, Susanna Pell viols)
Harmonia Mundi HMU90 7296 Ⓕ
(76 minutes: DDD). Recorded c2002 ●●

Though The Art of Fugue is usually considered a composition for keyboard, the timbre of strings, especially viols played and reproduced this way, does give the music another dimension.

Though there are no tempo directions for the 20 pieces that comprise this work – performers are expected to relate speed to time signatures without other guidance – Fretwork's judgements are difficult to fault. Turn to the 'Canon alla Duodecima', or alternatively 'Contrapunctus 9', where the required swift pulse does not preclude expressive articulation; and then to 'Contrapunctus 10', where four-in-a-bar is reflected in a slower pace that also allows more space for a keener, but not overt, subjective response. Indeed, throughout their idiomatically phrased, impressively cohesive and clean-textured exploration of the work, these thoughtful musicians don't italicise anything.

In sum, Fretwork opt for a quiet, controlled intensity that perhaps needs extended listening to be fully appreciated. The recording certainly won't stand in your way. It is expertly balanced, the acoustic giving both ambience and intimacy.

Flute Sonatas, BWV1030-35

No 1 in B minor; No 2 in E flat; No 3 in A; No 4 in C; No 5 in E minor; No 6 in E

Flute Sonatas Nos 1, 2 and 4-6
Violin Sonata in G minor, BWV1020 (arr fl)
James Galway fl Sarah Cunningham va da gamba
Philip Moll hpd
RCA Victor Red Seal 09026 62555-2 Ⓕ
(75 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1993 ●

The basic six flute sonatas, BWV1030-35, can be accommodated on a single disc but Galway plays safe by keeping to what Bach (or someone else) actually wrote, omitting the unfinished A major Sonata, BWV1032, which other players have chosen to present in variously completed forms. There is, from the purist's point of view, still a 'risk' since it remains unproven that Bach was the composer of BWV1031, 1033 and 1020. However, their quality justifies their inclusion – if Bach didn't write them one doubts that he would have disowned them.

Galway is at his warm, velvet-toned best, phrasing immaculately, caressing the slow movements and fleet of tongue in the quicker ones. His tempos are well chosen and he never allows virtuosity to get the better of his judgement. The 'supporting cast' are no less beyond reproach, but while the flute and viola da gamba are well balanced the harpsichord might profitably have been allowed a rather more equal say in BWV1030 and BWV1031.

Flute Sonatas Nos 1-6
William Bennett fl George Malcolm hpd 🏵
Michael Evans vc
ASV Quicksilva CDQS6108 (77 minutes: ADD) ⓢ
Recorded 1978 ●●

There is something rather special about the Flute Sonatas and the more so when they are as well played as they are by William Bennett and George Malcolm. They were obviously written during a happy period in Bach's life for they are amiably inventive pieces, which is not to imply that they are slight, just very appealing. What matter if the E flat, BWV1031 (which has an engaging Siciliano slow movement), and the C major, BWV1033, are probably spurious – they still offer thoroughly worthwhile music. On this reissue, the first three sonatas (BWV1030-32) are played as a simple duet for flute and harpsichord; in the last three (BWV1033-35), written for flute and bass continuo, Michael Evans joins the ensemble and the balance – especially since his is not a Baroque instrument – is quite perfect. As for that superb flautist Bennett, he too uses a modern instrument, yet is the soul of finesse as well as playing creatively and with consistently beautiful tone. The sound is forward but very convincing; and Malcolm's harpsichord is not over-amplified but admirably lifesize. This is a fine recording indeed and at super-bargain price should not be missed.

Solo Flute Sonata in A minor, BWV1013. P
Flute Sonatas^{a} – B minor, BWV1030; C, BWV1033;
E minor, BWV1034; E, BWV1035
Ashley Solomon fl ^{a}Terence Charlston hpd
Channel Classics CCS15798 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●●

This is an impressive and enjoyable CD that easily bears repeated listening. There is a soothing quality to the Baroque flute, and its gentle, slightly reedy tone is captured very well here. It is closely recorded in a church acoustic to give a brilliant tone with added depth. Today's makers of the Baroque flute are producing highly refined instruments, exemplified here by the Rod Cameron copy of a Denner, which has a strong, even tone and good balance of register, allowing highly accomplished performers like Ashley Solomon complete technical freedom.

This recording is not merely music therapy, however, but a genuine musical experience. His performance of the unaccompanied A minor Partita, for example, is nothing short of commanding: the control in articulation and breathing allows the phrasing to be flexible and unfussy. Indeed, it is the directness of his interpretations that is so telling; there is almost none of that slightly coy rubato that some other flautists use to disguise the need to breathe. Rather, Solomon ensures that the phrases are neither choppy nor fragmented. He has an excellent sense of the longer line and the harmonic pull beneath Bach's wonderfully melodic writing. The faster movements are perhaps the most successful, full of buoyancy and energy without seeming rushed or pushed. Try the second movement of the E minor Sonata, for example, or that of the C major. Slow movements are far from inexpressive, but again refreshingly direct: he never wallows (a good example is the introductory movement of the E major Sonata). Solomon is well partnered by Terence Charlston on a rich-toned Ruckers-copy harpsichord. Even if you already have a version of Bach's flute works on CD this can be strongly recommended, and it makes an equally good first-time buy too. Prepare to be uplifted.

Tri

Trio Sonatas

Trio Sonatas – D minor, BWV527; G, BWV530; A minor, BWV1029; G minor,BWV1030; C, BWV1037 Ⓟ
The Rare Fruits Council (Manfredo Kramer vn Pablo Valetti vn/va Balàzs Máté vc Dirk Boerner hpd Alessandro de Marchi org)
Astrée Naïve E8804 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 OO

Following recent recordings of, among others, the complete 'true' trio sonatas from Florilegium and the complete organ trios adapted for strings and continuo from the Purcell Quartet, as well as numerous one-off arrangements dropped as fillers into other Bach chamber releases, this one offers a mixed bag of solutions to the irritating little anomaly that the greatest of Baroque instrumental composers wrote hardly any music in one of the Baroque period's most ubiquitous instrumental forms. So, here we get convincing arrangements for various combinations of violins, viola, cello, organ and harpsichord of two of the organ trios, the B minor Sonata for flute and obbligato harpsichord, the C major Sonata genuinely written for two violins and continuo – though not, it seems, by Bach (Goldberg is thought to be the man), and the G minor Sonata for gamba and obbligato harpsichord.

That Bach's music can withstand transcription like no one else's has been remarked on countless times, but it is nice to be reminded from time to time of another old truth, namely that there is always something new to be found by those with the wit to look for it. That is exactly what the Rare Fruits Council demonstrates here in performances of uncommon energy and imagination that will surely win over the most resistant of transcription sceptics. Genteel and polite they are not; rather, they embrace the music with an inspiriting boisterousness and wholeheartedness. This is music-making simply bursting with life.

Most exciting of all, the players revel in Bach's life-enhancing contrapuntal interplay with a joyousness that is almost jazz-like in its freedom and exhilarating spontaneity. Their sound could be described as bold, up-front, occasionally a little coarse, but above all, well, fruity. If you are suffering from Bachian cobwebs, this thoroughly enjoyable release will blow them away.

Additional recommendation
Trio Sonatas, BWV525-30
Nos 1, 3, 5 and 6. Coupling: Four Duets, BWV802-05
14 Verschiedene Canones, BWV1087 Ⓟ
Palladian Ensemble
Linn Records CKD036 (75 minutes: DDD: 8/95) Ⓕ
Refreshingly committed performances which stray from old paths in stimulating ways and show off the corporate style of the Palladian Ensemble.

Violin Sonatas

No 1 in B minor, BWV1014; No 2 in A, BWV1015; No 3 in E, BWV1016; No 4 in C minor, BWV1017; No 5 in F, BWV1018; No 6 in G, BWV1019

Violin Sonatas Nos 1-6, BWV1014-19 Ⓟ
Sonata for Violin and Continuo in G, BWV1019a^{a}. Cantabile, BWV1019a/2. Sonatas for Violin and Continuo^{a} – No 2 in G, BWV1021; No 4 in E minor, BWV1023
Rachel Podger vn ^{a}Jonathan Manson va da gamba Trevor Pinnock hpd
Channel Classics ② CCS14798 (139 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 2000 OO

Another recording of Bach's violin sonatas, and at last one that really hits the spot. Rachel Podger has already attracted much praise for her recordings of the solo violin music, but is heard here to even better advantage in the Six Sonatas for Violin and Obbligato Harpsichord, BWV1014-19, for which she is joined by Trevor Pinnock (of whose English Concert she is now the leader).

The two make a fine match. Both are uncomplicated, utterly instinctive musicians with a sure technical command and sound stylistic sense, and in works as robust and complete as these, that is most of the battle already won. But this is also music of great poetry, and, without straining unduly to make their points, Podger and Pinnock bring this out superbly; Pinnock's harpsichord is gently resonant and softly voiced, and Podger coaxes a lyrical flexibility out of her violin, its singing qualities enhanced thanks to a restrained but tellingly sweetening use of vibrato – one which also enables her to play more consistently and blessedly in tune than almost any other Baroque fiddler currently in business.

It is difficult to single out details of this recording for comment; there just seems to be such a tremendous feeling of overall 'rightness' to it. Maybe the finale of Sonata No 2 seems rather frantic and the wonderful Adagio ma non tanto of No 3 a touch lumpy, but there really is not much else to criticise. And there are true gems to be enjoyed in the opening movement of BWV1014, where the violin makes an almost imperceptible initial entry, or the warm embrace of BWV1017's Adagio, or practically any of the sparkling fast movements, played with invigorating rhythmic drive and clarity.

This recording's most recent period rival, that of Andrew Manze and Richard Egarr, shows a typical wealth of new ideas and inspired moves but is less satisfying as a whole, and suffers from some intonationally hairy moments and a less precisely pointed sound. The only period recording to touch Podger and Pinnock for technical assurance is that of Fabio Biondi and Rinaldo Alessandrini, but in both sound and interpretation it is heavy-handed compared with the spontaneous musicianship and airy texture on display here, and rather meanly it gives the six obbligato sonatas only. Though all the recent recordings of these sonatas have had their merits, this – two discs for the price of one – is, quite simply, the best yet.

Violin Sonatas Nos 1-6, BWV1014-19 🅿
Giuliano Carmignola vn
Andrea Marcon hpd
Sony Classical ② S2K89469 (94 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2001 ●

Giuliano Carmignola's reputation as a Baroque violinist has so far rested on his recordings of Vivaldi concertos with the Venice Baroque Orchestra, where his easy virtuosity and sweet sound have made for some highly pleasant, if not always startlingly thought-provoking, listening. With the move to Bach's six supremely eloquent sonatas for violin and obbligato harpsichord, the advantages of his ready technique are equally apparent; this is probably the most consistently in-tune 'Baroque' performance of these pieces currently available, with Bach's exposed and melodically intricate lines giving Carmignola none of the intonation problems which afflict most of his rivals.

With music as well-written and self-supporting as this, he has the battle half-won already, and lovers of these pieces can safely sit back and enjoy an effortlessly classy musical display from both Carmignola and harpsichordist Andrea Marcon. Recorded in a gently glowing church acoustic, and with the harpsichord well represented in the balance but not sounding unnaturally large, there is little more that one could wish for. This silky newcomer is, indeed, a strong contender for a top recommendation.

And yet there are some things to be desired, as a visit to a handful of rival recordings will testify: Fabio Biondi (on Opus 111, see below) takes a more muscular and forthright approach in his recording. It is Rachel Podger and Trevor Pinnock (on Channel Classics, reviewed above), however, who offer the best balance, Podger in particular mixing sure technique with typically natural and spontaneous musical personality. She remains a first choice, though Carmignola gives her a good run for her money and for some listeners Channel Classics' rather less appealing recorded sound may tip the balance the other way. Perhaps this really is one of those cases where the best answer is to have both.

Further listening
'Bachiana'
Includes works by H, JC , JL and JS Bach, Pagh and Wilche
Berben hpd Musica Antiqua Köln / Goebel vn
Archiv Produktion 471 150-2AH
(76 minutes: DDD: 2/02) Ⓕ

An eclectic and highly entertaining programme of works by Bach's family and contemporaries.

Viola da gamba Sonatas

Sonatas for Viola da gamba and Harpsichord, BWV1027-29[a] – No 1 in G; No 2 in D; No 3 in G minor[a]. Capriccios – in B flat, BWV992; in E, BWV993 🅿
[a]Jaap ter Linden va da gamba Richard Egarr hpd
Harmonia Mundi HMU90 7268 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●

Forced to choose just one CD to represent Bach's instrumental chamber music, then among the plethora of transcriptions and double albums there would perhaps be no better group of works to pick than these.

Jaap ter Linden and Richard Egarr enter a largish field which includes a number of modern cellists unable to resist this superb music, but they emerge as serious contenders for a placing. Linden's sound has the smoothness and rich lyricism that one tends to associate with the Baroque cello, while at the same time retaining something of the gamba's pleasing incisiveness of line. Egarr's harpsichord is splendidly sonorous, and while his tautly controlled playing is in many ways the opposite of Linden's, the meeting of instruments and minds is nevertheless a happy one. Egarr, playing an obbligato part, has less opportunity to show off his individualism than he would in an improvised continuo accompaniment, but, even if he could have been favoured a little more in the balance, his ability to orchestrate an impressive range of sounds from his instrument is still in evidence, especially in the concerto-like Sonata in G minor. He also dispatches the disc's filler items – two of Bach's early, somewhat old-fashioned solo harpsichord pieces – with vigorous and virtuosic aplomb.

Compared with their recent rivals, then, these are lively performances which steer a comfortable middle course between those of the rich-toned but slightly unimaginative Markku Luolajan-Mikkola and Miklós Spányi and the more intense and inspired but sloppily recorded Jordi Savall and Ton Koopman. Alison Crum and Laurence Cummings suffer too much from a balance unkind to the gamba. It all comes down to taste, of course, but this new recording may just be the one to live with.

Additional recommendation
Viola da gamba Sonatas, BWV1027-29
Coupled with: Trio Sonata in C, BWV529 🅿
Savall va da gamba Koopman hpd
Alia Vox AV9812 (59 minutes: DDD: 6/00) Ⓕ

A significant Bach gamba release. Savall and Koopman conjure performances whose sheer rightness and creative warmth make the music sound invigoratingly fresh.

Sonatas and Partitas for Solo Violin

Sonatas – No 1 in G minor, BWV1001;
No 2 in A minor, BWV1003, BWV1005; No 3 in C.
Partitas – No 1 in B minor, BWV1002;
No 2 in D minor, BWV1004; No 3 in E, BWV1006

Sonatas Nos 1-3. Partitas Nos 1-3. Violin Sonatas[a] – No 3 in E, BWV1016; No 4 in C minor, BWV1017
Arthur Grumiaux vn [a]Egida Giordani Sartori hpd

Philips 50 Great Recordings ② 464 673-2PM2 Ⓜ
(146 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1960-61 ●

Also available without the sonatas on Philips Duo
② 438 736-2PM2 Ⓜ

The totally innocent ear, deprived of any comparison, could be forgiven for judging Grumiaux's to be definitive performances of Bach's Partitas and Sonatas. There is little of the sweetness of a Heifetz, the passing whimsy of a Shumsky here. And yet they define, indeed, as few other performances do, the structural frame and rhythmic working-out of each movement with extraordinary determination and authority. The purity of intonation is absolute; the energy locked into the sheer sound of the instrument startling. And two discs, as they say, for the price of one! Those who know and love the artistry of Grumiaux will be thrilled to rediscover these Berlin recordings of the early 1960s, sharply remastered and sounding out in a roomy acoustic. The platinum gleam glancing off every moment of double-stopping, and the flinty brightness struck where contrapuntal voices meet ring out as never before. The arpeggios of the Presto of the G minor Sonata flash like light from a prism; and the same mesmeric steadiness of moto perpetuo makes for a heady finish to the C major Sonata. What dominates, though, is the rhythmic rigour of Grumiaux's playing. His perfectionism, fused with a real sense of struggle, brings sheer might to the fugues of the Sonatas: it is rather like watching a climber scaling a vast rock face, securing himself with a pick and leaping across the next crevasse.

CCS12198: Sonata No 1. Partitas Nos 1 and 2 Ⓟ
CCS14498: Sonatas Nos 2 and 3. Partita No 3
Rachel Podger vn
Channel Classics ② CCSSEL2498 Ⓕ
(142 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1997-99 ●●●

Hitherto we have heard Rachel Podger only in early chamber works and as Andrew Manze's partner in Bach double concertos: here now, at last, is an opportunity to hear her on her own. And you couldn't be more on your own than in Bach's mercilessly revealing Solo Sonatas and Partitas, perhaps the ultimate test of technical mastery, expressiveness, structural phrasing and deep musical perception for a violinist. Playing a Baroque instrument, Podger challenges comparison with the much praised and individual reading by Monica Huggett: she has many of the same virtues – flawless intonation, warm tone, expressive nuances, clear understanding of the proper balance of internal strands – but her approach is sometimes markedly different. This is most obvious in the great D minor Chaconne, in which Huggett's rhythmical flexibility worried some people, but in which Podger, here as elsewhere, while fully characterizing the varied repetitions of the ground, is intent on building up the cumulative effect. One pleasing general feature of her playing, indeed, is her firm but unassertive rhythmic sense; others are the absence of any suspicion that technical difficulties exist (instead a calm control, as in the G minor's Siciliano), her subtle phrasing (as in the B minor Corrente, with the fleetest of doubles), the cross-rhythms of her G minor Presto and, most strikingly, the sheer poetic feeling with which she imbues the initial Adagio of the G minor Sonata. She touches in chords lightly: though some might have been split downwards rather than upwards so as to preserve the continuity of a lower part (for example, in bar 5 of the B minor Allemande, bar 10 of the Chaconne and in the 18th and 19th bars of its major section). Her D minor Giga is stunning. Altogether a most impressive and rewarding disc.

As a matter of tactics disregarding the printed order of the works, the second disc opens in the most effective way with a joyous performance of the ever-invigorating E major Preludio. At once we can recognise Podger's splendid rhythmic and tonal vitality (not merely Bach's marked terraced dynamics but pulsatingly alive gradations within phrases), her extremely subtle accentuations and harmonic awareness (note her change of colour at the move from E to C sharp major in bar 33), are all within total technical assurances. The Gavotte en Rondeau is buoyantly dance-like, and in the most natural way she elaborates its final statement (her stylish ornamentation throughout the Partita is utterly convincing). She takes the Giga at a restrained pace that allows of all kinds of tiny rhythmic nuances. Only a rather cut-up performance of the Loure stops this being one of the most enjoyable E major Partitas on disc.

In the sonatas she shows other sterling qualities. She preserves the shape in the A minor Grave's ornate tangle of notes; she judges to a nicety the balance of the melodic line against the plodding accompanimental quavers of the Andante; she imbues the C major's Adagio with a hauntingly poetic musing atmosphere, and her lucid part-playing of its Fuga could scarcely be bettered. In the Fuga of the A minor Sonata, however, she unexpectedly allows herself considerable rhythmic freedom in order to point the structure. The final track is a stunning performance of the C major's closing Allegro assai which would bring any audience to its feet.

Sonatas Nos 1-3. Partitas Nos 1-3
Benjamin Schmid vn
Arte Nova Classics ② 74321 72113-2 Ⓢ
(133 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1999 ●●

Benjamin Schmid counts Harnoncourt, Végh and Heinrich Schiff as significant musical influences. His Bach, like theirs, uses scholarship to fly. In the G minor Sonata's opening Adagio his sound ranges from a blanched, unwavering line to judiciously gauged vibrato. His chords are tonally generous (he clearly relishes every note) and his 'softly rolled' arpeggios allow the music's rich harmonic drift to register. Articulation is exceptionally clean and the Third Partita's dance movements display a winning rhythmic lilt.

Although the D minor Partita's Chaconne clocks up a fairly swift 12'39" (Végh, for one, is slower by two-and-a-half minutes), Schmid balances courtliness and architecture in ideal proportions. The three sonata fugues work extremely well, the C minor being their crowning glory. Schmid alternates sonorous chords with a chirpy approach to shorter, single note-values, always consistently and with a mastery of tonal colouring. Tempos are generally swifter than the 'traditional' norm (though not dissimilar to various period performances), repeats are played and although some might question the odd slowing here or speeding there, most listeners will find Schmid's readings singularly stimulating and imaginative.

This is remarkable music-making and the silly asking price makes purchase truly mandatory – whether for comparison with better-known alternatives or for a first-time encounter with these magnificent works.

Sonatas Nos 1-3. Partitas Nos 1-3
Itzhak Perlman vn
EMI ② 749483-2 (143 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1986-87 ●●

These works are brutally difficult to play, not least in securing accurate intonation and in minimising the disruptive effect of hacking out the three- and four-note chords but, given today's Olympian standards, technical shortcomings may be tolerated only in performances that are musically relevatory.

Technically Perlman is beyond reproach; chords are traversed deftly and in the Adagio of Sonata No 3 skilfully subjugated to the melodic line, and his differentiation between marked pianos and fortes is very clear. There is brilliance in the faster movements, delicacy in the galanteries, and except perhaps for the Allemande of Partita No 2, grave expressiveness in the slower ones; stylistic misfits are far fewer than those of, say, Sándor Végh or Nathan Milstein (1971), and all repeats are offered – usually with some changes of dynamics.

Bach with a fair degree of gloss maybe, but a version by one of today's greatest violinists that is justly popular.

Additional recommendations

Sonatas Nos 1-3. Partitas Nos 1-3 (arr Galbraith)
Galbraith gtr
Delos ② DE3232 (119 minutes: DDD: 12/98). Ⓕ

Paul Galbraith's embellishments are impeccable. In sum, these thoughtful and majestic performances are strongly recommended, and not only to lovers of the guitar.

Partita No 2 – Chaconne in D minor (arr Busoni)
Couplings: Schumann Kreisleriana
Beethoven Rondos
Kissin pf
RCA Victor 09026 68911-2 (63 minutes: DDD: 12/98) Ⓕ

Kissin's Bach/Busoni Chaconne is both grand and thrilling; the instrument is taken to its limits.

Solo Cello Suites

No 1 in G, BWV1007; No 2 in D minor, BWV1008;
No 3 in C, BWV1009; No 4 in E flat, BWV1010;
No 5 in C minor, BWV1011; No 6 in D, BWV1012

Solo Cello Suites Nos 1-6
Pierre Fournier vc
DG The Originals ② 449 711-2GOR2 Ⓜ
(139 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1961-63 ●●●

Of all the great cellists, Pierre Fournier came closer to the heart of the music than almost any other. He seems to have possessed all the virtues of his fellow cellists without yielding to any of their self-indulgences. He could be brilliant in execution – his technique was second to none, as he proves throughout this set – profound in utterance, aristocratic in poise and wonderfully coherent in his understanding of Bach's articulation and phrases.

We need look no further than the Prelude of the First Suite in G major to find the supreme artistry which characterises each and every moment of these performances. There are very occasionally notes which fail to reach their centre but they are few and far between and Fournier's intonation compares favourably with that of some of his virtuoso companions. Fournier's rubato is held tightly in rein and when he does apply it, it is in the interests of enlivening aspects of Bach's formal writing. He can sparkle too, as he does in many of the faster dance-orientated movements such as courantes, gavottes and bourrées; in the sarabandes, he invariably strikes a note of grandeur coupled with a concentration amounting at times almost to abstraction. Above all, his Bach playing is crowned with an eloquence, a lyricism and a grasp of the music's formal and stylistic content which will not easily be matched.

It is hardly surprising that these readings seem as fresh and as valid today as they did in the 1960s. Out and out purists, poor devils, may not be able to adjust to modern pitch, modern instrument and, in the case of Suites Nos 5 and 6, the wrong instrument, but if that is so they are deserving more of compassion than censure. Fine recorded sound and strongly commended on virtually all counts.

Cello Suites Nos 1-6. H
English Suite No 6 in D, BWV811 – Gavotte I; Gavotte II (arr Pollain). Musicalisches Gesangbuch – Komm, süsser Tod, BWV478 (arr Siloti). Violin Sonata, BWV1003 – Andante (arr Siloti). Orchestral Suite No 3 in D, BWV1068 – Air (arr Siloti). Toccata, Adagio and Fugue in C, BWV564 – Adagio
Pablo Casals vc with Nikolai Mednikoff, Blas-Net, Otto Schulf pfs
Naxos Historical mono ② 8 110915/6 Ⓢ
(149 minutes: ADD)
Recorded 1927-39 ●

When these recordings first appeared back in the 1930s and '40s, Bach for solo cello was a singular and esoteric concept. Casals had rediscovered the Suites for modern ears and his probing, albeit highly idiosyncratic, playing was a mandatory recommendation. Indeed, in those days it was the only recommendation. Nowadays, with countless period-conscious rivals vying for prominence, Casals the pioneer is viewed as a venerable – if somewhat anachronistic – elder statesman. His achievement is still beyond question, but there will be some listeners who won't like what they hear.

After, say, the elegantly tapered playing of János Starker, Casals can initially sound wilful and ungainly. His bow seems to slice through chords like a meat cleaver. His intonation wanders, and his fingers press down on the strings so forcefully that a note 'pings' even before the bow is drawn. After Starker's rhythmic projection Casals reels and rhapsodises as if blind drunk on expressive freedom.

However, this impression is only transitory. What at first sounds gruff, even off-hand soon registers as boldly assertive. The intonation is not so much 'faulty' as expressively employed, and as for those pre-echoing 'pings', they soon cease to matter – much as Glenn Gould's mumbling did years later. Time teaches you that the speaking tone, the poetic tenutos, the irresistible lilt in faster dance movements and the varied approach to vibrato were part of a grand musical plan, one that is now cherishable.

Casals makes a singular musical experience out of every movement. Try the Courante and Sarabande of the Fifth Suite – muscular resolve followed by profound self-communing.

Transfer-wise, things could hardly have gone better. True, there is some surface noise, but the sound has considerable realism and the broad contours of Casals's tone are untroubled by excessive filtering. A rival package from Pearl (identical couplings plus a transcription from a Bach-Vivaldi Concerto) reports a fatter cello sound with less well-focused contours. EMI's set offers only the Suites in transfers that, while admirably clear, are rather less natural than Ward Marston's for Naxos.

Solo Cello Suites Nos 1-6
Boris Pergamenschikov vc
Hänssler Edition Bachakademie ② 92 120 Ⓕ
(128 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1998 ●●

Any worthy recording of Bach's solo cello compositions celebrates the balance of mind and body, prayer and dance, scholarship and unspoiled intuition. One of the most striking features of this set is the lavish way Pergamenschikov ornaments the musical line, usually in a repeat, but always with a convincing sense of style. He is equally adept at charting the precise mood of each movement, making free with the various preludes (usually at a fairly fast tempo), pointing courantes with a lively staccato, drawing expressive weight from the sarabandes without obscuring their rhythmic profile and dancing through the various minuets and gigues. His phrasing is supple, flexible and musically varied, his use of vibrato subtly expressive within the parameters of period style. There is a noticeable lilt to much of the phrasing, and an expressive legato that is unhampered by excessive vibrato. Pergamenschikov indulges a genuine sense of play and knows intuitively where to hold back, where to insert a tiny pause, and where to lean on the beginning of the bar. The recordings are excellent. Pergamenschikov should henceforth take his rightful place among the top modern recommendations of this exalted repertoire.

Solo Cello Suites Nos 1-6 🅿
Pieter Wispelwey vc
Channel Classics ② CCS12298 (140 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●●

Netherlands-born cellist, Pieter Wispelwey, is equally at home on Baroque and modern instruments. These performances are carefully prepared, beautifully executed and most eloquently expressed. The instruments, too, sound well, Wispelwey having chosen an early 18th-century cello by Barak Norman for the first five Suites, and a five-stringed violoncello piccolo by an unidentified craftsman for the special requirements of the Sixth.

Wispelwey is an imaginative player with a highly developed sense of fantasy. These qualities are as welcome in his performances of Bach as they are to be treated with circumspection in his almost entirely fanciful written introduction to the music. Preludes come across especially well since it is in these wonderfully varied opening movements, with their rhetorical diversity, that the performer can give rein most freely to his or her most natural conversational inflexions. And he makes the most of that thrilling climax at the peak of a chromatic accent through a full scale and a half. Sarabandes are profound and reflective without being weighty, and allemandes graceful and substantial. The galanteries, by contrast, are lightly bowed and redolent of playful and demonstrative gestures. That, to an extent, is true also of the courantes, while the gigues are firmly projected, full-toned and splendidly robust.

Wispelwey's set of Bach's Cello Suites, then, is deserving of praise. If you are familiar with the gruff grandeur of Pablo Casals, or the aristocratic nobility of Fournier, then these performances will throw an entirely different light on the music, more conversational and with airier discourse. You may never want to be without the two earlier sets, but Wispelwey's version sits comfortably on the uppermost range of the period-instrument performance ladder.

Solo Cello Suites, BWV1007-12 🅿
Paolo Pandolfo va da gamba Ⓕ
Glossa ② GCD920405 (144 minutes: DDD) ●

Tucked away in the packaging for this release is an imaginary dialogue, written by Paolo Pandolfo, in which a cello and a viola da gamba dispute the latter's right to play Bach's solo cello suites. The gamba's point (and of course Pandolfo's) is that, while on the one hand the suites can be seen as the beginning of one tradition, so they are also the end of another. Bach, who knew both the old world of the gamba and the new one of the cello, is peering into both at once, and by adapting the six suites for the gamba, Pandolfo contends that he is able to throw light onto that older world. In the end, though, it is the musicianship that matters, and fortunately Pandolfo's is of the most eloquent kind. These are above all wonderfully supple readings full of thoughtfulness and imagination, but almost as impressive is the way in which he succeeds in casting these familiar pieces into the gamba's poetic world of intimate self-communion. This is more than a historical experiment, and there are moments when Pandolfo's artistry stands on its own feet and hits you between the eyes.

Additional recommendation

Verbruggen recorder p
Harmonia Mundi HMU90 7260
(76 minutes: DDD: 7/01) Ⓕ

Brilliantly successful recorder transcriptions of the Suites, and a technical tour de force exceeded only by the quality of Verbruggen's thinking. A revelatory listening experience for lovers of Bach and Baroque music in general.

Lute Suites

Lute Suites – G minor, BWV995; E minor, BWV996; C minor, BWV997; E, BWV1006a. Prelude, Fugue and Allegro in E flat, BWV998. Prelude in C minor, BWV999. Fugue in G minor, BWV1000
Stephan Schmidt gtr
Naïve Classique ② V4861 (98 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●●●

Whether or not the description of these as 'lute' works is justified has long been a matter for debate, and in their annotation Stephan Schmidt and Claude Chauvel inevitably fail to resolve the matter, though they lean more in the direction of 'yes' than most. In a sense it matters little, for the works have been performed and recorded on a variety of other plucked-string instruments – harpsichord and lute-harpsichord as well as guitar – in exemplary fashion. The 'standard' six-string guitar is a baritone instrument, but its lowest register is not extended enough to avoid the need for compromises; accordingly guitars with more strings (the extra ones at the bass end) have been in use for over 30 years. Göran Söllscher's DG recordings on an 11-string alto guitar (1983 and 1981/84) remain as fresh as they were then. Now Schmidt, using 10 strings, sets a new benchmark with this magnificent set. The extra four strings give firmer bass and more resonant bass lines, as did Söllscher's five, and free the player's left hand from the restriction of having to hold many of them down.

Schmidt's touch is happily light in the galanteries and in the Loure of BWV1006*a*, but there is gravity in the unhurried sarabandes – such variations apply not only to pace but to spirit, too. He knows when to embellish (which he does with elegance) and when not. His rubato 'bends' a little more than Söllscher's and he is less conservative in his approach to embellishment – but attitudes to such matters have since eased. If there is a better version of these works on any kind of guitar in terms of content and recording quality we have yet to hear it.

Italian Concerto

Italian Concerto in F, BWV971. Capriccios – sopra la lontananza del suo fratello dilettissimo in B flat, BWV992; in E, BWV993. Duets, BWV802-805. French Overture in B minor, BWV831
Angela Hewitt pf
Hyperion CDA67306 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●●

Here is an attractive recital of five varied pieces or suites of pieces, familiar and not so familiar, played with Hewitt's expected intelligence and finish and not a little verve. In her very readable introduction, Hewitt quotes a contemporary review of the Italian Concerto describing Bach not only as a great master but as someone 'who has almost alone taken possession of the clavier', and whose compositions are exceedingly difficult to play 'because the efficiency of his own limbs sets his standards'.

They still are, and Hewitt conveys the feeling that the challenges are not just to be met but should be sensed as integral to successful performance. By giving the quick numbers plenty of pace she makes the music sound difficult in the right way. No question of hustling them along, of course not, but rather of touching the core of the rhythmic energy and of making all the lines, throughout the texture, directional and lively. Hewitt's is not a monumental Bach, rooted to the spot, but one which makes us curious as to what lies around the next corner. The brilliant outer movements of the Italian Concerto, the long fugal section of the French Overture, the second and fourth of the Duets (those extraordinary studies in two-part writing) are all successes of her musical dynamic and high-stepping style. And the Echo movement of the French Overture (track 28) has a positively theatrical allure, like something out of Rameau – wonderful!

She cannot disguise the fact, however, that some of the movements in this great suite 'in the French style' lie uneasily on the piano, especially when the sonorities characteristic of a two-manual harpsichord are transcribed as if for a piano without sustaining pedal. If only she would allow herself a dab of it now and then; the music needs to hang in the air a bit, and the 18th-century harpsichord was, after all, an instrument of mass as well as point, richer in colour and weight of sound than Hewitt's pencil-lines and sometimes rather brittle and over-articulated manner suggest.

On the other hand, her characterisation of the two early Capriccios in terms of the modern piano is a tour de force – sparky, fresh, as if improvised. The greatness of the rest of the music here may put them in the shade, a little, but they are delightful. Bach aged 17, trying his hand at programme music? Well, the Capriccio 'on the departure of his beloved brother' remained his only example of it, but it is a reminder too that there was nothing he couldn't do. A stimulating disc, and beautiful sound.

Keyboard Partitas

No 1 in B flat, BWV825; No 2 in C minor, BWV826; No 3 in A minor, BWV827; No 4 in D, BWV828; No 5 in G, BWV829; No 6 in E minor, BWV830

Awards 2001

Keyboard Partitas Nos 1-6
Trevor Pinnock hpd
Hänssler Classic ② 92 115 Ⓜ
(149 minutes: DDD).
Recorded 1998-99 ○○○

The six Partitas are virtually a compendium of Bach's keyboard styles, with toccatas and French overtures, fugues and fantasies and all manner of dances. Trevor Pinnock rises to a new level of mastery in his new recording of them. We all know about the brilliance of his fingerwork and his beautifully sprung, ebullient rhythms; but here he goes further, showing a true grandeur of manner that embraces Bach at his most serious and pensive, his most learned, and – above all – his most vividly rhetorical. Pinnock takes his time over the music: these are measured readings of the partitas, thought through, viewed whole. The natural and spontaneous musicianship of old is still there, but now it is given extra depth and meaning through the carefully judged articulation, the tiny moments of hesitation, all within a fluent larger rhythm, that lend extra point and shape to a phrase, a group of phrases, an entire musical paragraph.

The warm, full, rather resonant recording beautifully captures the rich sound of his fine instrument – a David Way copy from 1983 of a Hemsch original – as well as the detail of his playing. There could hardly have been a happier return to the recording studio for Pinnock than this fine set.

Keyboard Partitas – No 1 in B flat, BWV825; No 3 in A minor, BWV827; No 6 in E minor, BWV830
Richard Goode pf
Nonesuch 7559-79698-2 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ○○○

In this second volume of Richard Goode's complete set of Bach Partitas one senses a distinguished lineage, a tradition of Bach piano playing with a Classical-Romantic bent that reaches back to Harold Samuel via Borowsky, Horszowski, Schnabel and Serkin. Like them (though not specifically in the Partitas) Goode treats line as paramount, stressing counterpoint only where and when it serves an expressive end, as in the First Partita's Allemande. Like Schnabel, Goode can occasionally accelerate a phrase to focus its place in the larger context. The use of crescendo is subtle yet telling (the Corrente) and the way phrases breathe, suggests hours spent focusing on a precise rubato.

This is glorious music, and there's barely a second when you are not aware of that fact. Everything flows from the logic of the line, and when perspectives do change (at around 46 seconds into the Third Partita's opening two-part Fantasia, for example, where the lower voice takes the lead) the option seems inevitable.

Everything essential to the spirit is here: dance and reverie, clarity and form, digital brilliance. Goode never forces his tone and although he has a secure sense of rhythm – the faster dances trip along rather than rush – there is no hint of the obsessive drive indulged by the post-Gould school. That, too, can be exciting, but Goode's inner explorations of Bach will probably yield longer-term satisfaction. This is an exceptionally fine set.

Keyboard Partitas Nos 1-6
Angela Hewitt pf
Hyperion ② CDA67191/2 (143 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996-97 ●

After ages without any recordings of the Partitas on the piano, along comes Angela Hewitt and saves the situation, effortlessly eclipsing all competitors. If Bach is to be played on the piano, this is the kind of way to do it. Inherent in all her playing is a rhythmic vitality, always under control, that sweeps one along with its momentum, subtly varied articulation, dynamics that follow the natural rise or fall of phrases without exaggerations, an appreciation of Bach's harmonic tensions, an ability to differentiate between the strength of contrapuntal lines, and an unfailing clarity of texture. This is a sane and sensible interpretation, deeply musicianly and devoid of eccentricity. Her attitude, rather like Toscanini's, is to accept the text com' è scritto and then to make legitimate adjustments, so we get double-dotting and assimilation of rhythms. Technically she is immaculate, with the cleanest possible ornaments. In the great E minor Sarabande Hewitt is justifiably emotional, without becoming soggy: only in the first half of the A minor Allemande is there a hint of coyness. No, the whole disc gives unalloyed pleasure.

Keyboard Preludes

Five Preludes, BWV939-43. Prelude in C minor, BWV999. Keyboard Partita No 1 in B flat, BWV825. Fugue in C, BWV953. Three Minuets, BWV841-43. French Suite No 5 in G, BWV816. Fughetta in C minor, BWV961. Clavier-Büchlein for W F Bach – Preludes: C, BWV924; D, BWV925; D minor, BWV926; F, BWV927; F, BWV928; G minor, BWV930. Concerto in F, BWV971, 'Italian Concerto'. Anna Magdalena Notenbuch – Minuets: G, BWVAnh114; G minor, BWVAnh115 P
Richard Egarr hpd

EMI Debut 569700-2 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ Recorded 1995 OO

Richard Egarr's programme is an attractive one in which three major solo harpsichord works – the Partita (BWV825), the French Suite (BWV816), and the Italian Concerto (BWV971) – are interspersed with Preludes, Minuets and two Fugues from the Kellner Collection, the Clavier-Büchlein for Wilhelm Friedemann Bach, 'the son I love, the one who fills me with joy', and the Notenbuch for Bach's second wife, Anna Magdalena. The character of Egarr's instrument, a copy by Joel Katzman of a 1638 Ruckers, has been effectively recorded, capturing its warm timbre in an intimate, domestic-sounding ambience.

Egarr's B flat Partita is an unhurried affair, reflective in its Prelude and Allemande and rhythmically supple. Some readers may not at once respond to the extent to which he leans on notes, thereby breaking up that strict regularity of pulse that used to be the order of the day. His articulation and rhythmic flexibility are both illuminating and communicative. The music breathes, and with each breath comes a natural pause in the declamation allowing for rhetorical gesture and a feeling for scansion. Just occasionally in the Sarabande phrases are a little too clipped and skimped over, but such instances, both here and in the French Suite, are both few and far between. Each of the little Preludes and Minuets is lovingly shaped and played with a sense of affection for, and understanding of, the music's poetry. In short this is an outstanding disc, both for Egarr's technically accomplished playing and for his delicacy of feeling.

Keyboard Sonatas

Keyboard Sonatas – D minor, BWV964; A minor, BWV965; C, BWV966; G, BWV968. Fugue in B flat, BWV954 P
Andreas Staier hpd
Teldec 3984-21461-2 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 OO

Some readers may be surprised to hear that Bach ever composed sonatas – not suites, but sonatas – for harpsichord. Well, actually he didn't. What he did do – if indeed it was he and not his eldest son – was transcribe his BWV1003 A minor Solo Violin Sonata (transposing it down a fifth) and the first movement of the BWV1005 C major (putting it down to G); and, more certainly, he himself adapted a number of movements from the Hortus musicus suites (for two violins, gamba and continuo) by Johann Adam Reincken, the aged master to whom, as a teenager, he had journeyed to Hamburg to hear. Taking his cue from Bach, Andreas Staier has transcribed the remaining movements of the C major Violin Sonata and added three movements to the C major Reincken adaptation – a suite, be it noted, not a sonata.

Before purists throw up their hands in horror at Staier's temerity, let them listen to Bach's own startlingly audacious harpsichord version of BWV1005, with offbeat chords, surprising chromaticism and rolling left-hand arpeggios. In his own treatment of that work's Fuga, Staier is very free but most convincingly idiomatic: one would never guess that it was a transcription. Bach's arrangements of Reincken largely adhere to the originals but amplify the fugues by adding episodes, as is also the case in the A minor Gigue. Staier's playing is notable for the crispness and variety of his articulation and – improvisatory Reincken preludes apart – the vitality of his rhythmic drive. A splendid disc.

Das wohltemperierte Klavier

48 Preludes and Fugues – Book 1 BWV846-69; Book 2 BWV870-93

Das wohltemperierte Klavier, Books 1 and 2 H
Rosalyn Tureck pf
DG mono ④ 463 305-2GH4 (296 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1954 OOO

Here is a performance of a matchless wit, musical grace and eloquence; playing as vivid and life-affirming as any on record, a magical interaction of scholarship and imaginative brio. Tureck can conjure a mystical stillness or a coruscating play of light and shade, of crescendos and decrescendos that can make the plain-sailing of others seem tentative and inadequate, and much time-honoured wisdom and tradition stale and archaic (try the Third Prelude from Book 1). Here is no 'old wig' but a voice of timeless richness and vitality, one that made Schoenberg declare Bach to be 'the first 12-tone composer'. The devotional flow of the 22nd Prelude in B flat minor is offered with an immaculate and indeed phenomenal pianistic authority and a mastery that allows for a total artistic liberation and unimpeded way to the music's very heart or poetic essence. In each unfailing instance the precise weight and timbre of every polyphonic strand seems to have been sifted and defined a hundred times only to be resolved into a dialogue or continuum as natural as it is piquant and thought-provoking. Early in her career Tureck replaced a highly successful, if more conventional, concert career with a single-minded devotion to a composer who for her makes all others dispensable. Skilfully remastered, such work is beyond price, deserving, in the words of that most august publication The Record Guide, 'a heavenful of stars'.

Das wohltemperierte Klavier H
8 110651/2: Book 1
8 110653/4: Book 2
Edwin Fischer pf
Naxos Historical mono ② 8 110651/2 and 8 110653/4 (107 and 126 minutes: ADD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1933-36 OOO

Edwin Fischer's 1933-36 HMV set of Bach's 48 was the first recording by a pianist of the set, and it remains probably the finest of all. Fischer might well have agreed with András Schiff that Bach is the 'most romantic of all composers', for his superfine musicianship seems to live and breathe in another world, ether or ambience. His sonority is as ravishing as it is apt, never beautiful for its own sake, and graced with a pedal technique so subtle that it results in a light and shade, a subdued sparkle or pointed sense of repartee that eludes lesser artists. Again, no matter what complexity Bach throws at him, Fischer resolves it with a disarming poise and limpidity, qualities as natural as they are profound.

All this is a far cry from, say, Glenn Gould's egotism in the 48, or the sort of performances that can make genius a pejorative term. Fischer – a blessedly naive artist who told his students to forget 'the material, working world and be on intimate terms with trees, clouds and winds' – showed a deep humility before great art, making the singling out of one or another of his performances an impertinence.

In Book 2, you could hardly imagine a more seraphic utterance in No 3, later contrasted with the most skittish allegro reply. He did, indeed, possess a touch with 'the strength and softness of a lion's velvet paw', and there are few recordings from which today's generation of pianists could learn so much; could absorb his way of transforming a supposedly learned tome into a fountain of limitless magic and resource. Here, then, is Fischer at his most sublimely poised and unruffled, at bargain price in beautifully restored sound.

Das wohltemperierte Klavier
CDA67301/2: Book 1
CDA67303/4: Book 2
Angela Hewitt pf
Hyperion ② CDA67301/2 and CDA67303/4 Ⓕ
(117 and 148 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1997-99 ●●

Admirers of Canadian pianist Angela Hewitt's lightly articulated and elegantly phrased Bach playing will not be disappointed by this recording. These qualities characterise the playing of each and every one of these profoundly didactic yet sublimely poetic pieces. In respect of her restrained use of the sustaining pedal, her consequently clearly spoken articulation, and the resultant lucidity of musical thought, Hewitt brings to mind those still controversial recorded performances of Edwin Fischer. Hewitt certainly sounds more comfortable in a studio than Fischer ever did, and her technique is more consistently disciplined than Fischer's was under these circumstances. Her reflective view of the more inwardly-looking Fugues, such as the lyrical one in E flat minor, is most attractive. Taut, but with a suppleness that is entirely devoid of stiffness, this is indeed cogent and gracefully beautiful playing of a high order. Some readers may sense, from time to time, an overtly intense element of subjective thought in her understanding of the music, a quality which seems to be endorsed by occasional references in her lively, illuminating and detailed introduction, to Bach's 'sense of inner peace', and so on. However, to conclude on a thoroughly positive and enthusiastic note, these are performances of Book 1 that you will want to hear many times over. The recording and instrument sound well, too.

Hewitt's Book 2 of the 48 is a delight to both ear and mind. Everything is in the best of taste and free from all exhibitionism – her interpretations are conceived in consciously pianistic terms. There are subtle tonal nuances, natural rises and falls of dynamics, well-defined differentiation of contrapuntal lines and appreciation of the expressive implications of Bach's chromaticisms. Throughout her playing of these preludes and fugues – several longer, more mature and more demanding than those of Book 1 – there is a sense of unhurried poise, with rhythm that flows. The air of tranquillity she can produce is underlined by her frequent adoption of very quiet openings, many of which then take on a warmer tone towards the end – even the E major Fugue, which Landowska labelled 'combative', is handled quietly, yet she is able to sound contemplative (as in the E major Fugue) without lapsing into Tureckian reverentiality.

Just occasionally Bach's more intense movements tempt her into emotional rubatos which, though musically affecting, take Bach out of his century, and not everyone will care for the big allargandos she makes at the ends of some of the earlier movements. Otherwise these are musicianly and imaginative performances.

Das wohltemperierte Klavier, Book 1 Ⓟ
Kenneth Gilbert hpd
Archiv Produktion Blue ② 474 221-2ABL Ⓜ
(110 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1983

In Book 1 there are virtually no markings and so the performer carries heavy responsibility for phrasing and articulation. Gilbert's blend of scholarship and technique with artistic sensibility makes for notably convincing, often poetic playing. The D minor Prelude is one of many instances where his interpretation haunts the memory. Gilbert's vital rhythmic sense and love of refinement are qualities in his artistry which can be strongly felt throughout this vast project. Some readers may feel that he is comparatively unadventurous in his registration – others, for example, make a greater point of differentiation through instrumental colour – but it is one of the features of Gilbert's performance that is particularly praiseworthy, since he clearly and effectively achieves his contrasts through interpretation, renouncing the facility to emphasise them by more artificial means. In textural clarity he yields nothing to his competitors in this repertoire and, in short, arrives at a solution which is refined, lyrical and sometimes dazzlingly virtuosic, as in the Prelude in B flat, BWV866.

The acoustic of the Musée de Chartres, where this disc was recorded, is pleasantly resonant. Gilbert plays a 17th-century Flemish harpsichord enlarged first by Blanchet and then by Taskin the following century. A satisfying achievement and an important issue.

Das wohltemperierte Klavier – Book 1
Evgeni Koroliov pf
Tacet ② TACET93 Ⓕ
(129 minutes: DDD) ●

No music is more impervious to the vagaries of interpretation than Bach's. Play his keyboard music on a piano and it remains obstinately in character. Proponents of the harpsichord may disagree, but musicologist Eva Badura-Skoda has thrown a spanner in the works by arguing strongly that Bach, in his Leipzig years, extensively used fortepianos in an effort to help Silbermann perfect these instruments. So a pianoforte was the next step, after all. Edwin Fischer used it in the first recording of the 48, but his approach and emendations have their detractors. Koroliov's only audible emendation is an extra note in the bass at bar 28 of the C minor Prelude. Otherwise he sticks to the text and his decorations at the endings of a couple of pieces are well within current knowledge of authentic practice.

What intrigues and impresses is that, unlike most pianists, Koroliov largely ignores the sustaining pedal. He often prefers to let fingers, rather than feet, dictate colour; and his fingers are capable of a variety of touch. They can also project the notes with pinpoint velocity which, when wrongly applied, turns the G major Fugue into a mechanical exercise. This is a serious miscalculation, but it is the only one. The instrument is closely miked, which can lead to moments of discomfort, for instance in the A minor Fugue which is starkly presented. But Koroliov isn't always uncompromising, and the B flat minor Prelude offers an example of his sensitivity to the changes within a single work, from rigorous beginnings to a resigned ending.

Koroliov reserves his best for the last pair for which, unusually, Bach added markings, Andante and Largo respectively. His performance of the Fugue marries tension to an inexorable flow that portrays the structure as an imposing edifice. Purists may quibble at the very slow tempo but this is a tour de force.

English Suites, BWV806-11

Six English Suites, BWV806-11
Glenn Gould pf
Sony Classical Glenn Gould Edition ② SM2K52606 Ⓜ
(112 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1971-73 ●
BWV806-808 also available on Glenn Gould Anniversary Edition Ⓜ SMK87765; BWV809-811 on Ⓜ SMK87766

No more original genius of the keyboard has existed than Glenn Gould, but this can lead to drawbacks as well as thrilling advantages. You may, for instance, sense how Gould can sacrifice depth of feeling for a relentless and quixotic sense of adventure. Yet love it or deride it, every bar of these lovingly remastered discs (the hiatus is explained in some riveting accompanying notes) tingles with joie de vivre and an unequalled force and vitality. Try the opening of the First Suite. Is such freedom glorious or maddening, or is the way the odd note is nonchalantly flicked in the following sustained argument a naughty alternative to Bach's intention? The pizzicato bass in the second Double from the same Suite is perhaps another instance of an idiosyncrasy bordering on whimsy, an enlivenment or rejuvenation that at least remains open to question. But listen to him in virtually any of the sarabandes from the Suites and you will find a tranquillity and equilibrium that can silence such criticism and even at his most piquant and outrageous his playing remains, mysteriously, all of a piece. The fiercely chromatic, labyrinthine argument concluding the Fifth Suite is thrown off with a unique brio, one of those moments when you realise how Gould can lift Bach out of all possible time-warps and make him one of music's truest modernists.

Toccata in C minor, BWV911. Partita No 2 in C minor, BWV826. English Suite No 2 in A minor, BWV807
Martha Argerich pf
DG The Originals 463 604-2GOR Ⓜ
(50 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1979 ●

This Bach recital, first issued in 1980, is now revived on DG's The Originals. Admirers may already have heard Argerich in the Second Partita, on the wing, so to speak, in a superlative live performance dating from 1978-79 (and with the Bourrée from the Second English Suite for an encore) on EMI. Yet even they will surely admit that these slightly later studio recordings carry an extraordinary authority and panache.

Argerich's attack in the C minor Toccata could hardly be bolder or more incisive, a classic instance of virtuosity all the more clear and potent for being so firmly but never rigidly controlled. Here, as elsewhere, her discipline is no less remarkable than her unflagging brio and relish of Bach's glory. Again, in the Second Partita, her playing is quite without those excesses or mannerisms that too often pass for authenticity, and in the Andante immediately following the Sinfonie she is expressive yet clear and precise, her following Allegro a marvel of high-speed yet always musical bravura. True, some may question her way with the Courante from the Second English Suite, finding it hard-driven, even overbearing, yet Argerich's eloquence in the following sublime Sarabande creates its own hypnotic authority. The dynamic range of these towering, intensely musical performances has been excellently captured by DG.

French Suites, BWV812-17

Six French Suites, BWV812-17
Andrei Gavrilov pf
DG ② 445 840-2GH2 (93 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993

Bach compiled his French Suites, so-called – the composer did not give them this title – towards the end of his Cöthen period and at the beginning of his final appointment at Leipzig. Like others before him, Andrei Gavrilov acknowledges his debt to Glenn Gould, sensing a fellow spirit throwing down the gauntlet and challenging convention at every turn with his fearless mix of directness and idiosyncrasy. Yet as his performances so eloquently convey, there are depths and subtleties in these cosmopolitan Suites which are often erased by Gould's manic determination to redefine the parameters of Bach interpretation. Gavrilov has a way, for instance, of casting light on even the simplest, least polyphonic of the composer's arguments. He may retain some of his former headstrong pugnacity yet in the sarabandes, which like pools of reflection form the nodal and expressive centre of each Suite, he finds an often glorious ease, repose and gently luminous sense of texture. Even those for whom such open-hearted espousal of the modern piano's resources is anachronistic will surely be touched and convinced. The DG sound quality is exemplary.

Six French Suites, BWV812-17. Sonata in D minor, BWV964. Five Preludes, BWV924-28. Prelude in G minor, BWV930. Six Preludes, BWV933-38. Five Preludes, BWV939-43. Prelude in C minor, BWV999. Prelude and Fugue in A minor, BWV894
Angela Hewitt pf
Hyperion ② CDA67121/2 (151 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ●

Even the most out-and-out purists who blench at the thought of Bach on so alien an instrument as the piano (as if Bach himself ever showed any reluctance at transferring his work from one instrument to another!) will find it hard not to be won over by Angela Hewitt's artistry. Eschewing all hieratic pretentiousness on the one hand and self-regarding eccentricities on the other, she gives us Bach performances that are not only admirable in style but marked by poise and what used to be called a 'quiet hand': 'chaste' might not be too fanciful a term, so long as that does not suggest any lack of vitality. There is intelligence in her carefully thought-out phrasing and subtle variety of articulation: gradations of sound are always alive without their becoming precious.

The bulk of this recording is devoted to the French Suites. Particularly enjoyable is the lightness of her treatment of the Airs of Nos 2 and 4, the vigour of No 5's Bourrée and the freshness of No 6's Allemande; the extra decorations she adds in repeats everywhere sound properly spontaneous and are in the best of taste; ornaments are always cleanly played and matched up in imitative voices.

Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue, BWV903

Prelude and Fugue in A minor, BWV894. 🅿
Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue in D minor, BWV903. Toccatas – C minor, BWV911; D, BWV912. Prelude and Fugue in B minor on a theme of Albinoni, BWV923/951. Fantasia and Fugue in A minor, BWV944. Prelude in C minor, BWV999
Pierre Hantaï hpd
Virgin Classics Veritas 545322-2 Ⓕ
(64 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1997 ●●

What connects this miscellany of pieces is that they are all early works of Bach's (although he later revised the Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue), none of which was published in his lifetime. The vitality and exuberant invention that bubble out of them go far to explain the bewilderment and shock felt by the burghers of Arnstadt and elsewhere at this headstrong and musically daring young man.

It is difficult to imagine the effect on its first hearers of that Chromatic Fantasia, with its still astonishing key-shifts. Italian influence on Bach and his interest in his predecessors is exemplified in the B minor Fugue he borrowed from an Albinoni trio sonata, in the process extending it to nearly three times its original length; the multi-sectional Toccata in D curiously combines the improvisational with the fugal; and two of the present works were drawn upon for later compositions – the A minor Fugue, BWV944, became the basis for the BWV543 Fugue for organ, and the BWV894 Prelude and Fugue were lifted wholesale for the Triple Concerto for flute, violin and harpsichord. The fugue in this last is excitingly taken by Hantaï (playing on a copy of a Ruckers) at a breakneck pace, and elsewhere he underlines the young Bach's dashing style by the vigour and thrust of his rhythm. His dazzling runs, and the ferocious energy with which he attacks the Chromatic Fantasia, are absolutely electrifying: a performance to put nearly all others in the shade.

Fantasia in C minor, BWV906. 15 Two-Part Inventions, BWV772-86. 15 Three-Part Inventions, BWV787-801. Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue in D minor, BWV903
Angela Hewitt pf
Hyperion CDA66746 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●

Angela Hewitt's approach may be gleaned from her refreshingly lucid annotation, or simply by listening to what she does. 'A skilful player can [bring out the different voices] with different colours' and 'To be capable of producing a true legato without using the pedal will serve a pianist well in any repertoire': Hewitt puts her fingers where her thoughts are. She never upsets the balance of the lines that it is in the nature of the harpsichord to yield, and her economy with the sustaining pedal helps to preserve their clarity.

The two- and three-part Inventions are treated as music in their own right, not simply as invaluable exercises; each is given its distinctive character, with a wonderful variety of sensitive touch and shapely rubato that never once threatens to become anachronistic. Her readings of the C minor Fantasia and the Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue are as eloquent and stimulating as any yet recorded by a harpsichordist.

Goldberg Variations, BWV988

Awards 1994

Pierre Hantaï hpd P
Opus 111 OP3084
(77 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1992 ●●●

Pierre Hantaï's approach to the Goldberg Variations is tremendously spirited and energetic but it also exhibits discipline. What is most appealing about this playing, though, is that Hantaï clearly finds the music great fun to perform; some players have been too inclined to make heavy weather over this music. He makes each canon a piece of entertainment while in no sense glossing over Bach's consummate formal mastery. Other movements, such as Var 7 (gigue) and Var 11, effervesce with energy and good humour and he is careful to avoid any display of superficiality. Not for a moment is the listener given the impression that his view of the music is merely skin deep. Indeed, there is a marked concentration of thought in canons such as that at the fourth interval (Var 12). Elsewhere his feeling for the fantasy and poetry of Bach's music is effective and well placed (such as in Var 13). The character of Bruce Kennedy's copy of an early 18th-century instrument by the Berlin craftsman Michael Mietke is admirably captured by the effectively resonant recorded sound.

Goldberg Variations, BWV988 P
Ketil Haugsand hpd
Simax 1192 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●●

This remarkable set of 30 Variations badly needs a harpsichord performance which projects the various layers of meaning and characterisation in a cohesive whole and, crucially, which makes the harpsichord sound warm, generous and palatable over 70 minutes.

Ketil Haugsand has produced just this. He is a player whose rhetorical capabilities and stubbornly musical instincts have found a rightful home in this masterpiece. Like his resplendent and under-acknowledged reading of the Six Partitas (on Simax), Haugsand starts from a position of sonority. This may seem a vaguely dubious observation but it gains credence when one hears how he allows his measured tempi to enrich the harmonic fabric so that melodic articulation moves completely at one alongside his idea of abstract beauty of sound. Haugsand's inventive and poetic personality also enables each movement to make its presence felt, as with the infectious jauntiness of Variation 10, the spirited carousel of Variation 14, enhanced by the contrast of resigned pathos from the previous movement, or the clarity of voicing of Variation 23 which is as riotously handled as the halting opening of Variation 19 (like that advertisement of a puppy unravelling the Andrex). The great fantasy, Variation 25, is a profound reflection which maintains its shape against all odds; with many harpsichordists, this is where all neuroses emerge in force. The last two variations are joyous and majestic and wonderfully affirm the journey's end.

Haugsand has clearly had his fingers and mind marinading in this music for decades. It is as genial, engaging and mature a musical imagination as this reviewer has heard in the Goldbergs, especially impressive given that the constraints of performing them on the harpsichord appear even greater by the day, as pianists open up ever-new vistas. This performance throws down the gauntlet, especially with Arne Akselberg's natural and resonant recorded sound. A truly exceptional achievement.

Awards 2001

Goldberg Variations, BWV988
Murray Perahia pf
Sony Classical SK89243
(73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●●●

Murray Perahia's Goldberg Variations aren't just colourful, or virtuosic, or thorough in terms of repeats, but profoundly moving as well. Here one senses that what is being played isn't so much 'Bach' as an inevitable musical sequence with a life of its own, music where the themes, harmonies and contrapuntal strands await a mind strong enough to connect them.

Rosalyn Tureck was the first recorded Goldbergian to take the structural route and her EMI/Philips set remains among the most cogent of older alternatives. And while Glenn Gould achieves formidable levels of concentration (especially in the second of his two commercial recordings for CBS/Sony), his gargantuan personality – utterly absorbing though it is – does occasionally intrude. Perahia brooks neither distraction nor unwanted mannerism. He invests the Goldbergs with the sort of humbling gravitas that Schnabel brings to, say, Schubert's B flat Sonata. Yes, there are fine-tipped details and prominent emphases, but the way themes are traced and followed through suggests a performance where the shape of a phrase is dictated mostly by its place in the larger scheme of things.

Perahia never strikes a brittle note and yet his control and projection of rhythm are impeccable. He can trace the most exquisite cantabile, even while attending to salient counterpoint, and although clear voicing is a consistent attribute of his performance, so is flexibility. Like Hewitt, he surpasses himself. It's just that in his case the act of surpassing takes him that little bit further. A quite wonderful CD.

Goldberg Variations
Angela Hewitt pf
Hyperion CDA67305 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●●

Name your leading interpretative preferences in the Goldberg Variations, and there's bound to be someone on disc who expresses them. Leaving aside numerous harpsichord versions, the current catalogue is notably rich in colourful piano alternatives. Of the best available options, Rosalyn Tureck holds structure as paramount; Glenn Gould (in his 1981 recording) is strong on rhythmic continuity and contrapuntal clarity and (recently for Hänssler Classic) Evgeni Koroliov is distinctive above all for his imaginative handling of repeats. Hewitt's chosen course is not dissimilar to Koroliov's, at least in principle (both pianists play all the repeats), but her manner of playing is entirely different. Two things strike you more or less from the start: first, that she can summon many dynamic grades simultaneously; and second, that her variations between repeats are not restricted to matters of voicing. For example, in Variation 13, she accelerates her phrases as if caught on a spontaneous impulse, then relaxes for the response . When she plays the variation's first half again she significantly modifies her tone and rubato, then opts for a more formal approach to the second half. All this in just over four and a half minutes!

Her mastery of the keyboard is exemplary. She can launch an elegant staccato or allow one voice to weave an ivy-like thread, while others argue above it. Beyond a seamless account of the pivotal 25th Variation, Hewitt rattles off manic trills in 23 and favours a grand, free-wheeling approach for 29. Hewitt makes the subtlest of colourists and has never made a better CD. Strongly recommended.

Goldberg Variations
Glenn Gould pf
Sony Classical Glenn Gould Edition SMK52619 Ⓜ
(51 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1981 ○○○
Also available coupled with 1955 Variations on
Sony Ⓜ SM2K87703

This truly astonishing performance was recorded 26 years after Gould's legendary 1955 disc (see below). Gould was not in the habit of re-recording but a growing unease with that earlier performance made him turn once again to a timeless masterpiece and try, via a radically altered outlook, for a more definitive account.

By his own admission he had, during those intervening years, discovered 'slowness' or a meditative quality far removed from flashing fingers and pianistic glory. And it is this 'autumnal repose' that adds such a deeply imaginative dimension to Gould's unimpeded clarity and pin-point definition. The Aria is now mesmerically slow. The tremulous confidences of Variation 13 in the 1955 performance give way to something more forthright, more trenchantly and determinedly voiced, while Var 19's previously light and dancing measures are humorously slow and precise. Var 21 is painted in the boldest of oils, so to speak and, most importantly of all, Var 25 is far less romantically susceptible than before and has an almost confrontational assurance. The Aria's return, too, is overwhelming in its profound sense of solace and resolution. This is surely the finest of Gould's recordings.

Goldberg Variations[a] H
Das wohltemperierte Klavier, Book 2 – No 33 in E;
No 38 in F sharp minor
Glenn Gould pf
Sony Glenn Gould Edition mono SMK52594 Ⓜ
(46 minutes: ADD). Item marked [a] recorded 1955 ○
Also available coupled with 1981 Variations on
Sony Ⓜ SM2K87703

Gould's pianistic skills have been universally and freely acknowledged, but his musical vision has elicited a range of critical response that has few parallels in this century. The view that Bach was a mere mathematical genius and little more has long passed, but it has its echoes in Gould's approach; he was fascinated by the structure of the music and was supremely skilful in showing the Jacquard-loom patterns woven by its contrapuntal threads.

Every structural detail is exposed with crystal clarity but, switching metaphors, what is revealed is a marvellously designed and executed building, inhabited only by a caretaker. An overall time of 38 minutes does not seem unreasonable for the Goldberg Variations (here shorn of every repeat) but the statistic is misleading: many variations pass at breakneck speeds. As an exposition of the music's mechanism this is a remarkable performance but, despite occasional intrusions of sing-along and sparing use of the pedals (music first, pianism second), it says little of Bach's humanity.

Two Fugues from the 48 extend the playing time to the lower limit of respectability. Neither is hurried and No. 33 proceeds with the solemnity that some others perceived to be its due. The sound quality of the recordings is impressive, but overall this is probably of archival rather than definitive interest.

Toccatas (keyboard)

Toccatas, BWV910-16
Angela Hewitt pf Ⓕ
Hyperion CDA67310 (69 minutes: DDD) ○○○

As Angela Hewitt tells us in her exemplary accompanying essay, Bach's Toccatas were inspired by Buxtehude's 'stylus fantasticus – a very unrestrained and free way of composing, using dramatic and extravagant rhetorical gestures'. For Wanda Landowska, they seemed initially 'incoherent and disparate' and it takes an exceptional artist to make such wonders both stand out and unite.

Yet Angela Hewitt – always responsive to such a teasing mix of discipline and wildness – presents even the most audacious surprises with a superb and unfaltering sense of balance and perspective. Time and again she shows us that it is possible to be personal and characterful without resorting to self-serving and distorting idiosyncrasy. Everything is delightfully devoid of pedantry or over-emphasis; few pianists have worn their enviable expertise in Bach more lightly. In the F sharp minor Toccata everything is meticulously graded, and in the dazzling D major Toccata, which so fittingly closes her programme, not even Bach's most ebullient virtuosity can induce her to rush; everything emerges with a clarity that never excludes expressive beauty.

Her performances could hardly be more stylish or impeccable, more vital or refined; and, as a crowning touch, Hyperion's sound is superb.

Organ Fantasias and Fugues

Fantasias and Fugues – C minor, BWV537; G minor, BWV542; C minor, BWV562; G, BWV572. Preludes and Fugues – D, BWV532; F minor, BWV534; A, BWV536; G, BWV541; A minor, BWV543; B minor, BWV544; C, BWV545; C minor, BWV546; C, BWV547; E minor, BWV548, 'Wedge'; E flat, BWV552, 'St Anne'
Christopher Herrick org
Hyperion ② CDA66791/2. (150 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded on the organ of the Jesuitenkirche, Lucerne, Switzerland in 1993 ●●

These 15 works constitute some of the finest and most important music ever written for the organ. They are such mainstays of the repertory that no serious lover of organ music could consider a world without them. Herrick's performances are authoritative, scholarly and perceptive, but if that were all it would merely be putting Bach on a pedestal, making him accessible only to those who already possess the key to the door. Herrick's genius is in bringing the music vividly to life, injecting it with a sense of fun and a directness of appeal without for a moment compromising artistic integrity. Few could fail to be captivated by the wonderfully vibrant and smiling countenance of the great E flat Prelude while those of us who have laboured long and hard just to get our feet round that most ankle-twisting of all fugue subjects must surely surrender in the face of Herrick's effortless fluency in BWV542.

The glorious Swiss instrument has been brilliantly recorded, portraying not just the instrument itself but its sumptuous aural setting.

Allabreve in D, BWV589. Aria in F, BWV587. Canzona in D minor, BWV588. Four Duets, BWV802-05. Fantasias – A minor, BWV561; C, BWV570. Fantasia con imitazione in B minor, BWV563. Fugues – C minor, BWV575; G, BWV576; G, BWV577, 'Jig Fugue'; G minor, BWV578. Pastorale in F, BWV590. Preludes – A minor, BWV551; G, BWV568; A minor, BWV569. Preludes and Fugues – E minor, BWV533; G minor, BWV535; D minor, BWV539; D minor, BWV549*a*; G, BWV550. Toccata and Fugue in E, BWV566. Trios – D minor, BWV583; C minor, BWV585; G, BWV586. Trio Sonata in G, BWV1027*a* (arr cpsr). Musikalisches Opfer, BWV1079 – Ricercar a 3; Ricercar a 6
Christopher Herrick org
Hyperion ② CDA67211/2 (156 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded on the organ of the Stadtkirche, Rheinfelden, Switzerland in 1996 ●●

Some might be tempted to describe what we have here as the 'scrapings from the barrel', for when you've taken out the chorale-based works, the trio sonatas, the concertos and the big preludes, fantasias, toccatas, passacaglias and fugues this is what's left. One could, however, be tempted almost to prefer these crumbs from the table of great genius to those stupendous musical feasts which are everybody's idea of the real J S Bach. And when you have those crumbs seasoned with such loving care, such elegance and such finesse as Christopher Herrick gives to, say, the G minor fugue (BWV578) or the enchanting Trio Sonata (BWV1027*a*), you realise that here is music every bit as worthy of close attention as anything Bach wrote for the organ. In matters of registration, tempo, articulation and phrasing, Herrick displays immaculate taste. This is playing of the very highest order. The modest two-manual Metzler, built in 1992, makes an enchanting sound, and the recording fully supports the superlative artistry of the playing.

Organ recital

Includes Canzona in D minor, BWV588. Kirnberger Chorales – Wo soll ich fliehen hin, BWV694; Christum wir sollen loben schon, BWV696; Nun komm, der Heiden Heiland, BWV699; Gottes Sohn ist kommen, BWV703; In dich hab' ich gehoffet, BWV712; Fantasia: Jesu, meine Freude, BWV713. Chorale Preludes – Ach Gott und Herr, BWV714; Gelobet seist du, Jesu Christ, BWV723; Lobt Gott, ihr Christen gmein, BWV732; Nun freut euch, lieben Christen g'mein, BWV734; Wie schön leucht' der Morgenstern, BWV739; Ach Gott, vom Himmel sieh' darein, BWV741; Auf meinen lieben Gott, BWV744; Herr Jesu Christ, mein's Lebens Licht, BWV750; O Vater, allmächtiger Gott, BWV758; Vater unser im Himmelreich, BWV762; Wie schön leuchtet der Morgenstern, BWV763. Concerto in D minor, BWV974. Preludes and Fugues – A minor, BWV894; A minor, BWV551. Toccatas – D, BWV912; D minor, BWV913. Trio in C minor, BWV585
Kevin Bowyer org
Nimbus ② NI566970 (199 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Played on the Marcussen Organ at Hanskirche, Odense, Denmark. Recorded 2000 ●

This is probably by far and away the best release so far in this comprehensive survey of Bach's organ works. What distinguishes it is, first of all, the recorded sound which has lost that underlying feeling of artificiality in its mix between instrument and acoustic which has occasionally surfaced in previous Nimbus recordings from the Hanskirche in Odense. Most of all, however, the outstanding feature is Bowyer's own playing. Always able to come up with enjoyable and eminently listenable performances as a result of his phenomenal technique and intense musicianship, his playing here has real authority. There may be stylistic quibbles (Bowyer's ornamentation can be a little too sparing), but few would argue that here is playing which shows a real understanding of the music's essential spirit. One senses here a level of empathy with the world of Bach which has been missing from earlier releases. The chorale preludes are sweet sounding (as is everything on this splendid Marcussen) but really do sound like the musings of a great master on both the chorale melodies and their texts, while the handful of large-scale display works here seem to look beyond superficial virtuosity and into the mind of a composer for whom every note of music (good or mediocre) was of real intrinsic value. Those not so far tempted to explore this gargantuan series could do a lot worse than invest in this release.

Chorale Preludes, BWV1090-120

Chorale Preludes – Neumeister Collection, BWV1090-120; Ach Gott und Herr, BWV714; Der Tag, der ist freudenreich, BWV719; Vater unser im Himmelreich, BWV737; Ach Herr, mich armen Sünder, BWV742; Machs mit mir, Gott, nach deiner Güt, BWV957
Christopher Herrick org
Hyperion CDA67215 (80 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999

These 38 chorale preludes come from a collection of 83 pieces compiled in the 18th century by Johann Gottfried Neumeister. The collection eventually made its way to Yale University, where it was discovered by the Bach scholar Christoph Wolff. Bach's preludes are early works, and as Wolff so aptly wrote: 'Already there is innovation. There is a degree of originality and sophistication that is really quite remarkable.'

Herrick gives clear, attractive performances with rhythmic articulation and lively ornamentation. Some listeners may find his playing too calculated and self-conscious; however, these are sprightly readings, free of excessive mannerisms. The most enjoyable aspect of the CD is the way Herrick gives each chorale prelude its own distinct sound world, despite having only a nine-stop, one-manual Metzler organ. This instrument is one of the most beautiful organs imaginable, and Herrick exploits every conceivable combination of stops to achieve a pleasing variety of colour. The organ is well recorded, too, though some may find it a little too closely miked.

Clavier-Übung III, BWV669-89

Clavier-Übung III, BWV669-89. Duets, BWV802-5. Fugue in E flat, BWV552 No 2
Kay Johannsen org
Hänssler Edition Bachakademie ② 92 101 Ⓕ
(100 minutes: DDD). Recorded on the Erasmus-Bielfeldt organ, St Wilhadi, Stade in 1998 ⦿

These discs transport the listener back to 1736, the date of the Erasmus-Bielfeldt organ recorded here. Three years later Bach published the third part of his Clavier-Übung, an academically austere title which disguises one of his most symbolic and liturgically important cycles. He had high hopes for the commercial success of the volume and its successor, the Goldberg Variations. The Clavier-Übung features the so-called Organ Mass. A Hymn Mass, it uses Lutheran texts and melodies in one major and several minor arrangements.

The two discs open and close with the Prelude and Fugue in E flat, BWV552. From the Prelude's first notes it is clear that Johannsen's playing is of the highest calibre. There is emotional involvement without a superfluity of ornamentation and rubato. Here, too, is tenderness, flamboyance, attack and rhythmic drive. In Johannsen's hands the listener is subtly drawn to the core of the music, its complexity simplified through his beautifully balanced registrations. Highlights include the extended prelude on Vater unser im Himmelreich, BWV682 and those on Aus tiefer Not, BWV686/687. The Four Duets are stylistically related and unified through an ascending key sequence which, as the notes mention, represent the Passion, Easter, Ascension and Pentecost. The superb booklet includes notes on the individual registrations employed. First-rate recording quality .

Clavier-Übung III, BWV669-89. Prelude and Fugue in E flat, BWV552, 'St Anne'. Four Duets, BWV802-05. Canonic variations on 'Vom Himmel hoch', BWV769*a*
Ton Koopman org
Teldec ② 4509-98464-2 (125 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded on the Silbermann organ of Freiburg Cathedral, Germany in 1996 ⦿

Three great joys await on this pair of discs. First there is the sublime collection of chorale preludes, framed by one of the most majestic of all Bach's Preludes and Fugues, which forms the Clavier-Übung III. Then there is the glorious instrument, its beautiful flutes, its delicate and subtle reeds, its invigorating full organ all captured magnificently in this vivid Teldec recording. And third there is the playing of Ton Koopman, who brings a wealth of authority and perception flavoured with unflagging enthusiasm. He soothes those jagged double-dotted rhythms of the Prelude without losing one iota of the work's great stature. He imbues the 21 chorale preludes with an almost prayerful atmosphere, and to the four Duets he brings a lighter, more joyful nature, as if to relax the mood before the final, supremely celebratory Fugue. The overall effect is to re-create in musical terms the celebration of the Mass itself. Throughout, ornamentation is not so much discreet as rare. His unusual reticence in this respect extends to a magnificent account of the Canonic variations where the clarity of the canonic lines is remarkably vivid. An immensely worthwhile issue.

Orgel-Büchlein, BWV599-644

Orgel-Büchlein, BWV599-644
Christopher Herrick org
Hyperion CDA66756 Ⓕ

(72 minutes: DDD). Recorded on the Metzler organ in the Stadtkirche, Rheinfelden, Switzerland in 1994

With just two manuals and 32 speaking stops, this wonderful organ is relatively small but still offers sufficient scope for Herrick to find a different registration for each of these 45 Preludes. The softer sounds used for Herr Jesu Christ, dich zu uns wend are preferable to the rather coarse pleno (In dir ist Freude) but it makes an undeniably ravishing sound. The Orgel-Büchlein's 46 Chorale Preludes (here the almost identical pair on Liebster Jesu are merged, accounting for the disc's 45 tracks) are so brief that listening to them all in one sitting is the musical equivalent of eating salted peanuts one at a time in quick succession. In an attempt to make it all more palatable Herrick tries two tricks. First, he plays remarkably fast, which some people may not find particularly rewarding. Secondly, he revises the playing order, interspersing those Preludes based on 'general' themes between those for particular times in the church's year, and even mixing up the ones within each group. The booklet deserves paeans of praise. Robin Langley's notes are the perfect match for Herrick's playing: scholarly, erudite, infinitely rewarding and so easily communicative.

Orgel-Büchlein, BWV599-644
Ton Koopman org
Teldec Das Alte Werk 3984-21466-2 Ⓕ
(70 minutes: DDD). Recorded in Ottobeuren Abbey, Bavaria in 1998 ●

These are short pieces, but brevity does not necessarily imply inconsequentiality. Koopman is very impressive here, with sensitive, authoritative and perfectly gauged performances, imaginatively registered and stunningly recorded on the 1766 Riepp organ of Ottobeuren Abbey. He never lets the preludes sound short, treating each one as a gem to be lovingly nurtured so that, even when it survives barely 40 seconds, we feel we have lost an old friend as it dies away in the Abbey's ambience. His sense of proportion is flawless, avoiding excessive sentimentality in O Mensch, bewein' dein' Sünde gross and creating the perfect balance between liveliness and majesty for Komm, Gott Schöpfer, Heiliger Geist. These are distinguished performances indeed, and if in places we hear signs of the instrument's great age, or its action impinges a little heavily on the ear, that serves only to enhance the sense of authority and stature this admirable release lends to some of Bach's briefest creations.

Schübler Chorales, BWV645-50

Preludes and Fugues – C, BWV545; E flat, BWV552, 'St Anne'. Trio Sonata in E minor, BWV528. Largo in A minor, BWV529. Fantasia in C minor, BWV562. Schübler Chorales, BWV645-50
Piet Kee org
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0590 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded on the Schnitger organ of the Martinikerk, Groningen, The Netherlands in 1995 ●

This is playing of heart-warming humanity and spiritual equilibrium, combining deep thought with complete spontaneity. Kee's control of the long, singing line goes hand in hand with a poetic command of Baroque instrumental articulation. Dip anywhere into the Schübler Chorales or to either of the Trio Sonata slow movements and you can hear the separate melodic lines not only given individual character, shape and direction but also combined with ease and gentle authority. Tempos in extrovert movements are unusually moderate, Bach's markings of Vivace and Allegro being taken by Kee as indications of mood rather than velocity, and yet the musical discourse is involving and full of wit, helped by registrations that are both simple and wise. The disc is crowned by a magnificent performance of the Prelude and Fugue in E flat, one that fully exploits the vivid contrasts of theme and texture and yet binds the work into a structural unity without a hint of haste or stiffness. Rightly, the recording presents this refined, robust organ as heard within its natural acoustic habitat and Kee has subtly absorbed the church's acoustic into his interpretations.

Schübler Chorales, BWV645-50. Leipzig Chorales, BWV651-68. Chorales from Cantatas Nos 36, 59, 62 and 180. Wenn wir in höchsten Nöten sein, BWV431. Du heiliger Brunst, süsser Trost, BWV226 No 2. An Wasserflüssen Babylon, BWV267. Herr Jesus Christ, dich zu uns wend', BWV332. O Lamm Gottes, unschuldig, BWV401. Nun danket alle Gott, BWV386. Von Gott will ich nicht lassen, BWV418. Allein Gott in der Höh' sei Ehr', BWV260. Jesus Christus, unser Heiland, BWV363. Komm, Gott Schöpfer, heiliger Geist, BWV370
Amsterdam Baroque Choir / Ton Koopman org
Teldec Das Alte Werk ② 4509-94459-2 Ⓕ
(142 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included. Organ works recorded on the organ of the Grote Kerk, Leeuwarden in 1994 ●●

Koopman's performances have a glorious sense of spontaneity born of the understanding that, with a cantata and a fistful of chorale preludes to compose and perform every week, Bach was hardly involved here in deep, painstaking creativity. Koopman seems totally attuned to the essential practicality of this music. As a result he can indulge in outrageously ebullient ornamentation, which from any other organist might seem merely bad taste, and maintain his light, dispassionate approach even through those Preludes usually afforded particular emotional significance, yet make it all sound stylistically convincing. A link between organ and cantata cycles is forged here by pairing each prelude with its chorale. The complete unity of approach between organist and singers is ingeniously underpinned by the use of organ accompaniment where unaccompanied singing might create a sense of dissociation. There is occasional variation but throughout, the singing of the Amsterdam Baroque Choir is a complete, unalloyed joy. Koopman isn't going to be everybody's cup of tea, but with this beautifully recorded pair of discs any reservations are completely outweighed by the sheer musical integrity of what are truly wonderful performances.

Schübler Chorales. Leipzig Chorales. Kirnberger Chorales, BWV690-91 and BWV694-713
Christopher Herrick org
Hyperion ② CDA67071/2 (147 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded on the Metzler organ of the Jesuitenkirche, Lucerne, Switzerland in 1995

The Schübler Chorales are mostly drawn from cantata movements, the Leipzig, sometimes known as the '18' and sometimes as the 'great' due to their large stature (including in BWV652 the longest chorale prelude Bach wrote), and some miscellaneous chorale preludes which have nothing in common beyond the fact that Johann Philipp Kirnberger, a pupil and admirer of Bach, bundled them all together. Keenly aware of the artificiality of the situation – obviously no organist in Bach's day would have dreamt of playing 44 chorale preludes in one go – Herrick has approached the task with businesslike vigour. Wachet auf fizzes like champagne at a wedding – no wonder the sleepers seem so eager to waken with such a riotous wedding feast clearly already in full swing. But such unrelenting bubbliness can also seem misplaced: Schumann's description of Schmücke dich, o liebe Seele (BWV654) as 'priceless, deep and full of soul' hardly fits this dancing performance. Perhaps, then, not a recording from which to extract single preludes, but certainly one which can withstand repeated bouts of continuous listening. As ever, not only has Herrick found a simply ravishing Swiss organ which he uses with impeccable good taste (and his invariably sensitive registrations are all detailed in the booklet) but the Hyperion team have come up with a top-notch recording.

Toccatas and Fugues

Toccatas – G minor, BWV915; G, BWV916. Fugues on themes of Albinoni – A, BWV950; B minor, BWV951. Fugue in C minor, BWV575. Preludes and Fugues – C, BWV553; D minor, BWV554; E minor, BWV555; F, BWV556; G, BWV557; G minor, BWV558; A minor, BWV559; B flat, BWV560. Fantasia con imitazione in B minor, BWV563
Kevin Bowyer org
Nimbus NI5377 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded on the Marcussen organ of St Hans Kirke, Odense, Denmark in 1992

While critical opinion and academic argument may deter others, Bowyer is content to let the music speak for itself, whether it is 'by J S Bach, J L Krebs or A N Other'. On this disc the music speaks with absolute conviction. One thinks of the gloriously dramatic rhetoric Bowyer brings to the two Toccatas (BWV915 and 916). Harpsichordists may claim these as their own but who could deny this lovely Odense organ the opportunity to glitter with such flamboyant music? The eight 'short' Preludes and Fugues have a muscular, clean-shaven feel to them underlined by plain and simple registrations. While other recordings of such indefinable pieces seem like scraps from the cutting-room floor, Bowyer sets them firmly in the mainstream of high Baroque organ music.

Toccata and Fugue in D minor, BWV565. Fantasia and Fugue in G minor, BWV542. Trio Sonata No 1 in E flat, BWV525. Pastorale in F, BWV590. Organ Concerto No 1 in G, BWV592. Chorale Prelude – Erbarm' dich mein, O Herre Gott, BWV721. Organ Chorale – Aus tiefer Not schrei ich zu dir, BWV1099
Kevin Bowyer org
Nimbus NI5280 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded on the Marcussen organ of St Hans Kirke, Odense, Denmark in 1991

This disc includes the best-known of all Bach's organ pieces – although some would dispute that it is an organ piece or even that Bach wrote it; Bowyer's account of the Toccata and Fugue in D minor is invigorating, exciting and very fast. It sets the scene for a CD of virtuoso performances and sound musicianship. The whole is a well-chosen, self-contained programme which also includes an indisputably 'great' organ work, a Trio Sonata, a transcription Bach made of an effervescent concerto by Ernst, a youthful chorale prelude as well as one from a collection only discovered in 1985 and one real oddity. Much thought has gone into the choice of organ and this instrument serves its purpose admirably; roaring magnificently in the Fantasia and emulating the tranquil sounds so characteristic of the Pastorale.

Toccata and Fugue in D minor, BWV565. Herzlich tut mich verlangen, BWV727. Fugue in G, BWV577. Erbarm' dich mein, O Herre Gott, BWV721. Fugue on a theme by Corelli in B minor, BWV579. Prelude and Fugue in G, BWV541. Pastorale in F, BWV590. Clavier-Übung III, BWV669-89 – Wir glauben all' an einen Gott, BWV680. Orgel-Büchlein, BWV599-644 – O Mensch, bewein' dein' Sünde gross, BWV622. Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor, BWV582
Peter Hurford org
EMI Eminence CD-EMX2218 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded on the Schnitger organ of the Martinikerk, Groningen, The Netherlands in 1993 ○○

'Peter Hurford playing organs of Bach's Time.' While Bach on 'authentic' instruments is no novelty, we certainly don't hear enough of the wondrous Ahrend organ, which begins this series in such style. Ahrend? Builders of Bach's time? Well, we're obviously going to have to take the title with a hefty pinch of salt. Although it dates back more than 500 years, in its present form the organ dates from only 1984. Bach never played it, and even if he had he certainly wouldn't recognise it now, but it sounds quite wonderful; Henry Mitton and Mark Nations have recorded it magnificently, closely focusing the sound within an aura of spaciousness. Splendid playing by Hurford too, of course. He begins with the ubiquitous Toccata and Fugue in D minor. But what a performance! Everything else is given warmly communicative, unpretentious and immensely appealing performances.

Trio Sonatas, BWV525-30

No 1 in E flat; No 2 in C minor; No 3 in D minor; No 4 in E minor; No 5 in C; No 6 in G

Trio Sonatas Nos 1-6
Christopher Herrick org
Hyperion CDA66390 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded on the Metzler organ of the Parish Church of St Nikolaus, Bremgarten, Switzerland in 1989 ◉◉

The common assumption is that Bach wrote his Six Trio Sonatas as training studies for his son Wilhelm Friedmann, and young organists still regard the ability to play them as a prerequisite in establishing proper organ technique. But if ever the notion that this is music 'first to practise and secondly to admire' was shown to be false, this stunning disc presents an unanswerable argument. Herrick's performances are immense fun, brimming over with real affection for the music. He allows himself occasional displays of enthusiasm (adding a few exuberant glissandos in the last movement of the E flat major Sonata, for example) and he chooses his stops both to enhance the vitality of the quick movements and to underline the sheer beauty of the slower ones. The recording makes this disc a worthwhile buy if only for the glorious sound; the organ speaks into a rich, opulent acoustic which treats each note as a priceless jewel, to be enhanced by its setting but not in any way to be obscured. A disc of rare beauty and a real gem in any collection.

Trio Sonatas Nos 1-6
Kay Johannsen org
Hänssler Classic 92 099 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded on the Metzler organ of the Stadtkirche, Stein am Rhein, Germany in 1997 ◉◉

Kay Johannsen is not a particularly familiar name outside his native Germany, but he has something distinctive to say in his Bach interpretations. His performance is distinguished by uniformly stylish, immaculately tailored readings of the Trio Sonatas. At the beginning of the 1990s Herrick's Hyperion recording was perceived as the most persuasive, vivid and compelling performances ever of these sonatas. He has, at last, met his match. Johannsen has every bit as much verve, spirit and musical persuasiveness, the organ is ideal both for these sparkling performances and the transparency of the musical textures (like Herrick, Johannsen has chosen a glorious Swiss Metzler – this time the 1992 instrument in the municipal church of Stein am Rhein), and Hänssler Classic's recording has exceptional presence and clarity. What many may prefer is Johannsen's avoidance of those glissandos and exuberant over-the-top gestures which Herrick favours.

Miscellaneous Recitals

Allein Gott in der Höh sei Ehr: BWV715; BWV717; BWV711; BWV260. Christ lag in Todesbanden: BWV4[a]; BWV695. Fugue on a theme by Corelli in B minor, BWV579. Herr Jesu Christ, dich zu uns wend: BWV332[a]; BWV655. Jesus Christus unser Heiland: BWV363[a]; BWV688. Preludes and Fugues – C minor, BWV549; G, BWV550; E flat, BWV552. Prelude in A minor, BWV569. O Lamm Gottes, unschuldig: BWV401[a]; BWV618. Schmücke dich, o liebe Seele: BWV180[a]; BWV654. Trio Sonata No 1 in E flat, BWV525. Valet will ich dir geben: BWV415[a]; BWV736
[a]Caroline Magalhaes mez [a]Philippe Froeliger ten
Francis Jacob org
Zig-Zag Territoires ② ZZT001001 (90 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Played on the Aubertin organ of the Parish Church, Saessolsheim, Alsace. Recorded 2000 ◉

This might look like just another organ recital, but in reality it celebrates the remarkable philanthropy of a small Alsatian community who have collectively funded, over nine years, a beautiful organ in Saessolsheim in the north of Alsace. Here it is played by a local son, Francis Jacob, an accomplished young player whose programme is an imaginative cross-section of Bach's organ works. He is not afraid to play a fugue without a prelude if he feels it serves the greater architectural good of the programme. Indeed, his ideals of passing through carefully ordered genres, keys and colourific possibilities are engaging and perceptive.

As for the performances, one is struck by the ebullience and vitality of Jacob's fast playing, rhythmically assured and with a strong feel for instrumental timbre, not just organ sound – the key to discovering allusions and subtexts as the Bach player must. Lift and immediacy of articulation prevail over endless swathes of legato. How refreshing it is to hear such glowing colours in the opening chorale prelude, Valet will ich dir geben.

However invigorating Jacob's playing though, there is a tendency to resist the poetic instinct, as if he is mistaking it for indulgence. Schmücke dich sounds unyielding, calculated and even wearing. He produces an idiosyncratic equivalent in the middle movement of the Trio Sonata in C major (what possessed him to break this restful melody up into little squares?), and yet all is forgiven in a deeply touching O Lamm Gottes, a chorale marvellously disguised as a taut canonic web irradiating ethereal harmonic consequences – this is where the expressive effect of dissonance is more at consonance with the underlying conceit than consonance could ever be! Jacob rattles off Allein Gott with supreme dexterity, and the dazzling upper partials are further evident in a compellingly neurotic reading of the A minor Prelude. The programme of two short CDs ends with the E flat St Anne Fugue, not as grand or mature in conception as some, but carefully considered and, like most of this recording, it conveys a notably immediate, 'one-off' and animated musical presence.

Complete Cantatas

Volume 1 – Nos 16, 33, 37, 42, 56, 61, 72, 80, 82, 97, 113, 132, 133, 170. Volume 2 – Nos 22, 23, 44, 54, 57, 85, 86, 92, 98, 111, 114, 135, 155, 159, 165, 167, 188. Volume 3 – Nos 17, 35, 87, 90, 99, 106, 117, 123, 153, 161, 168, 172, 173, 182, 199. Volume 4 – Nos 7, 13, 45, 69, 81, 102, 116, 122, 130, 138, 144, 149, 150, 169, 196. Volume 5 – Nos 6, 26, 27, 46, 55, 94, 96, 107, 115, 139, 156, 163, 164, 178, 179. Volume 6 – Nos 2, 3, 8, 60, 62, 78, 93, 103, 128, 145, 151, 154, 171, 185, 186, 192. Volume 7 – Nos 9, 36, 47, 73, 91, 110, 121, 125, 129, 152, 157, 166, 184, 198. Volume 8 – Nos 18, 30, 40, 49, 79, 84, 88, 89, 100, 108, 136, 140, 176, 187, 194. Volume 9 – Nos 1, 5, 14, 20, 32, 38, 50, 51, 58, 63, 83, 104, 109, 162, 183, 195. Volume 10 – Nos 21, 25, 28, 39, 43, 48, 52, 59, 65, 75, 119, 137, 143, 146, 175, 180, 197. Volume 11 – Nos 4, 10, 12, 64, 70, 71, 74, 76, 95, 101, 105, 124, 127, 131, 134, 158, 177. Volume 12 – Nos 19, 24, 29, 31, 34, 41, 66, 67, 68, 77, 112, 120, 126, 147, 148, 174, 181 P

Ruth Holton, Marjon Strijk sops Sytse Buwalda counterten Marcel Beekman, Martinus Leusink, Nico van der Meel, Knut Schoch tens Bas Ramselaar bass Holland Boys Choir; Netherlands Bach Collegium / Pieter Jan Leusink

Brilliant Boxes Ⓢ (12 five-disc sets) 99363/99364/99367/99368/99370/99371/99373/99374/99377-80 (3691 minutes: DDD). Texts included Ⓢ ●

Brilliant Classics has, through licensing and creative plundering of old catalogues, has contrived its own Bach Edition. Rather more surprising is that within this patchwork of miscellaneous performances comes a brand new set of the complete cantatas. How on earth can such a project be viable as a realistic competitor to the meticulously prepared work of leading exponents, or even prudent financially? The answer lies in the spirit of the task, one clearly designed to provide a large audience with the opportunity to experience all these masterworks on period instruments, at an affordable price. A ridiculous price actually. The practice of speed-recording represents quite an art in itself, attempting to engender inspiration while also ensuring acceptable standards of performance and recording – all within an intensive low-budget schedule. Unsurprisingly then, Pieter Jan Leusink's standard-sized Holland Boys Choir and Netherlands Bach Collegium deliver a rather uneven collection of performances with highs and lows in close proximity.

Volumes 1-8: Some readings are simply too indistinct to warrant comparison with more considered and glamorous competition, doubtless in those cases where not enough time has been allowed for the performers to find their interpretative feet beyond merely 'getting it together'. Some, like that of the 'Trauer Ode', miss the point with overt force dispatching fragrant delicacy, while a healthy number constitute refreshing accounts disarmingly caught at the point of discovery. You take the rough with the smooth in this roller-coaster enterprise.

If there is one overriding Achilles heel, it is the unreliability of the solo singing. The tenor contributions, in particular, too often undermine Leusink's generally bright and well-judged conceptions. Volume 5 is a case in point, where Knut Schoch, in the solo tenor cantata, No 55, is simply not up to the task. Judging by the qualities the less ubiquitous Marcel Beekman demonstrates in a beautifully executed No 164, he would have been a better first choice throughout. The most seasoned of the tenors, Nico van der Meel, becomes more authoritative as the set progresses. Soprano Marjon Strijk often finds Bach's taxing melisma a squiggle too far, in marked contrast to the expert if somewhat recessed singing of Ruth Holton and the excellent bass contributions of Bas Ramselaar (they also combine well in their many duets, such as the rollicking No 49). Ramselaar is the best singer on the set and would, for the most part, grace any of the current series; he has the grainy intimacy of Klaus Mertens, and also a burly resonance when it suits him. His reading of 'Ich will den Kreuzstab', No 56, is a commendable achievement by any standards, and there are fine arias in the splendid Ascension works, Nos 37 and 128, as well as in 36, 100 and 108.

Further on the credit side, the boy-led choruses can irradiate a compellingly sure-footed and unmannered perspective of Bach, as in Nos 33 and 97 and in the refreshing and unselfconscious clarity of intent sweetly imparted in Nos 94, 6 and 117; the chorales are also luminously immediate and affecting.

Other cantatas are rather down-played, such as Nos 139 and 62, but are still worthy and enjoyable as honest performances in an unpretentious Kappellmeister mould. If there is a shortage of refinement and blend in No 133 or spit and polish in the rhythmically exacting Nos 26 and 33, bright and energetic declamation is agreeably more the rule than the exception in Leusink's no-airs-and-graces approach. In the general firmament of new cantata recordings, these spontaneous performances stand comparison more in terms of individual movements (many, including several mentioned above, of real conviction and distinction) than complete pieces. Of the handful of cantatas where a special vision of the whole work is unanimously conveyed, with the performers firing on all cylinders, one should highlight (in no particular order) Nos 57, 87, 33, 42, 192, 45, 88, 176, 125 and 129. If the choral movements are the best things in these sets, there are still some memorable arias (to counter an abundance of ropey ones) with which Volumes 1, 2, 4, 6, and 8 are particularly well-endowed.

Volumes 9-12: Here, Leusink traverses the final peak with far more consistently enduring accounts than the comparative 'hit or miss' of the earlier readings, though unsurprisingly for an enterprise designed around tight rehearse-record schedules, there will always be scrappy moments.

More encouragingly, there is also a striking and rare quality here which shines through more strongly than in the majority of the earlier volumes and gives Leusink and his Dutch colleagues genuine credentials. It is the unmannered and straightforward approach to delivering the essence of the work in question, the honesty and means to get directly to its heart through real 'performance', often at the point of discovery. In this respect one is reminded of the earlier recordings from Leonhardt/Harnoncourt, a set which one suspects will be increasingly revisited for that very reason. For all the 'al dente' movements here, there are as many refreshingly uninhibited and distinguished readings, notably Nos 119, 43, 74, 197, 127, 104 and 148. There is a keen ear for the fundamental 'conceit' of the music upon which spontaneous music-making happens 'as if live'; unassuming, common sensical and unegotistical, the earthy Kapellmeister approach reminds one of the unspectacular (and occasionally a touch unimaginative) but free-breathing performances by the likes of Karl Ristenpart, Wolfgang Gönnenwein, Fritz Lehmann, Felix Prohaska and Fritz Werner in the 1950s and 60s.

Ears attuned to the refined and homogeneous textures of the top Baroque orchestras will find the grainy and sometimes rather thin violins altogether too disturbing. Others may find this more acceptable and, at times, even liberating, especially when joined by the wonderfully colourful wind playing and robust brass playing; the oboe of Peter Frankenberg, in particular, is one of the set's greatest qualities, though not far behind is the trumpet consort, led by Susan Williams. Notable again is the outstanding bass singing of Bas Ramselaar, whose resonant warmth and musicianly response to text is the most significant vocal strength in the set. Also to be admired are the two main sopranos, Ruth Holton and Marjon Strijk. Both have a vocal timbre of the effervescent and light variety though they bring much radiance and projection to their music-making, and far more accuracy in matters of tuning than in the earlier boxes. Holton sings splendidly in the two demanding arias in No 75, with breeziness in No 52 and loving understanding in the stunning cantabile of No 120 (which Bach used in a later version of the G major Violin Sonata), and with great cultivation in BWV31. She sails through the treacherous No 51 with great élan. Strijk brings considerable fluency to her arias in both Nos 25 and 28.

The alto part is less appealingly taken. Sytse Buwalda should not have been lumbered with the responsibility for all the alto arias, several movements of which represent some of Bach's most treasured examples of reflective ardour (why not use mezzos, contraltos and even boy altos for these parts, rather than the often excellent but over-used countertenor?). Despite Buwalda's unsteadiness, he occasionally delivers something reasonable though, such as in Nos 148 and 83. Exactly the same complaint can be levelled at Knut Schoch, a courageous tenor but one without the capacity for variation of colour in his sound, as one hears and expects from both Paul Agnew for Koopman (Erato) or Gerd Türk for Suzuki on BIS. Too often, the upper tessitura just isn't there or else he cannot control it. Luckily, Nico van der Meel is wheeled out for the big ones and he is splendid in both 'Ja, tausendmal tausend' in No 43, as well as No 74. In No 31, he is redolent of the deeply touching singing of Helmut Krebs for Werner (nla). Also used is Marcel Beekman, who shines in No 48 and projects a palpable joie de vivre with Ramselaar in the fine duet, 'Wie will ich mich freuen' from No 146, as does Holton with Ramselaar in the duet of No 32.

The boy-led Holland Choir and 'period' band, Netherlands Bach Collegium, are again central to the success and distinctive essence of this series. The teamwork in the choir is admirably demonstrated in some of the most difficult pieces, such as the large 'da capo' chorus of No 34, the fervent No 197 and infectiously crackling No 70, resulting in white-hot expositions of thrilling proportions. Leusink's success elsewhere comes largely through his admirably well-judged feeling for tempos and a means of accentuation which drives the music forward inexorably. There is, however, a fine line here between luminous vitality and sheer panic; the latter afflicts control in some choruses where Bach just cannot be learnt in a rush: Nos 65, 48 and 137 are examples where phrases are snatched, or over-sung, to the detriment of both textural cohesion and intonation, as well as general quality of sound.

In sum, these readings deserve to be recognised, primarily for their attractive and well-measured strides, but also for a lack of dogma or self-importance. Hard-driven and intermittently rough in places (especially string intonation), they are nevertheless consistently honest, rarely disastrous, and occasionally illuminating statements. Bachians, old and new, should investigate the series with an eager circumspection, taking the rough with the smooth but relishing the open-hearted spirit of the enterprise. The best performances will bring the listener close to the solar plexus of Bach's 'Kantatenwelt'.

Miscellaneous Cantata Discs

No 18 Gleich wie der Regen und Schnee
No 21 Ich hatte viel Bekümmernis
No 22 Jesus nahm zu sich die Zwölfe
No 23 Du wahrer Gott und Davids Sohn
No 24 Ein ungefärbt Gemüte
No 25 Es ist nich Gesundes an meinem Liebe
No 31 Der Himmel lacht! die Erde jubilieret
No 35 Geist und Seele wird verwirret
No 37 Wer da gläubet und getauft wird
No 40 Dazu ist erschienen der Sohn Gottes
No 48 Ich elender Mensch, wer wird mich erlösen
No 49 Ich gehe und suche mist Verlangen
No 50 Nun ist das Heil und die Kraft
No 51 Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen!
No 54 Widerstehe doch der Sünde
No 56 Ich will den Kreuzstab gerne tragen
No 59 Wer mich liebet, der wird mein Wort halten

No 60 O Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort
No 61 Nun komm, der Heiden Heiland
No 65 Sie werden aus Saba alle kommen
No 67 Halt im Gedächtnis Jesum Christ
No 69 Lobe den Herrn, meine Seele
No 70 Wachet, betet, seid bereit allezeit
No 71 Gott ist mein König
No 75 Die Elenden sollen essen
No 76 Die Himmel erzählen die Ehre Gottes
No 78 Jesu, der du meine Seele
No 80 Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott
No 82 Ich habe genug
No 86 Wahrlich, wahrlich, ich sage euch
No 89 Was soll ich aus dir machen, Ephraim?
No 90 Es reifet euch ein schrecklich Ende
No 95 Christus, der ist mein Leben
No 99 Was Gott tut, das ist wohlgetan
No 104 Du Hirte Israel, höre
No 105 Herr, gehe nicht ins Gericht mit deinem Knecht
No 106 Gottes Zeit ist die allerbeste Zeit
No 109 Ich glaube, lieber Herr, hilf meinem Unglauben
No 111 Was mein Gott will, das g'scheh allzeit
No 114 Ach, lieben Christen, seid getrost
No 115 Mache dich, mein Geist bereit
No 119 Preise Jerusalem, den Herrn
No 124 Meinen Jesum lass ich nicht
No 131 Aus der Tiefen rufe ich, Herr, zu dir
No 136 Erforsche mich, Gott, und erfahre mein Herz
No 143 Lobe den Herr, meine Seele
No 144 Nimm, was dein ist, und gehe hin
No 147 Herz und Mund und Tat und Leben
No 148 Bringet dem Herrn Ehre seines Namens
No 152 Tritt auf die Glaubensbahn
No 155 Mein Gott, wie lang, ache lange
No 158 Der Friede sei mit dir
No 161 Komm, du süsse Todesstunde
No 166 Wo gehest du hin?
No 170 Vergnügte Ruh', beliebte Seelenlust
No 173 Erhöhtes Fleisch und Blut
No 179 Siehe zu, dass deine Gottesfurcht
No 180 Schmücke dich, o liebe Seele
No 181 Leichtgesinnte Flattergeister
No 184 Erwünschtes Freudenlicht
No 186 Ärgre dich, o Seele, nicht
No 190 Singet dem Herrn ein neues Lied!
No 194 Höchsterwünschtes Freudenfest
No 202 Weichet nur, betrübte Schatten
No 208 Was mir behagt, ist nur die muntre Jagd
No 209 Non sa che sia dolore
No 210 O holder Tag, erwünschte Zeit
No 211 Schweigt stille, plaudert nicht, 'Coffee'
No 212 Mer hahn en neue Oberkeet, 'Peasant'

Cantatas Nos 18, 143, 152, 155 and 161 P
Midori Suzuki, Ingrid Schmithüsen sops Yoshikazu Mera counterten Makoto Sakurada ten Peter Kooy bass Bach Collegium Japan / Masaaki Suzuki org
BIS CD841 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997 ●●

The fifth volume of Bach's sacred cantatas performed by the Bach Collegium Japan continues their Weimar survey with five pieces written between *c*1713 and 1716. It begins with No 18, performed in its Weimar version – Bach later revived it for Leipzig, adding two treble recorders to the purely string texture of the upper parts of the earlier composition. The scoring of No 152 is more diverse, featuring in its opening Sinfonia a viola d'amore, viola da gamba, oboe and recorder.

A conspicuous feature of No 155 is its melancholy duet for alto and tenor with bassoon obbligato. While the vocal writing sustains something of the character of a lament the wonderfully athletic, arpeggiated bassoon solo provides a magical third voice. The accompanying essay is confused here, emphasizing the importance of a solo oboe which in fact has no place at all in this work. No 161 is a piece of sustained beauty, scored for a pair of treble recorders, obbligato organ, strings and continuo. Bach's authorship of No 143 has sometimes been questioned. Much of it is un-Bach-like, yet at times it is hard to envisage another composer's hand.

The performances are of unmatched excellence. Suzuki's direction never falters and his solo vocalists go from strength to strength as the series progresses. Suzuki makes a richly rewarding contribution with beautifully poised singing, a crystal-clear voice and an upper range that only very occasionally sounds at all threatened. Mera and Sakurada sustain a delicately balanced partnership in the elegiac duet of No 155, the limpid bassoon-playing completing this trio of outstanding beauty. Kooy is a tower of strength, a sympathetic partner to Suzuki in the dance-like duet between Jesus and the Soul (No 152), and resonantly affirmative in his aria from the same cantata. But the highest praise should go to Mera and Sakurada for their affecting performance in No 161. All the elements of this superb cantata are understood and deeply felt by all concerned. The disc is admirably recorded and, apart from the aforementioned confusion, painstakingly and informatively documented.

Cantatas Nos 21 and 31 P
Monika Frimmer sop Gerd Türk ten Peter Kooy bass Bach Collegium Japan / Masaaki Suzuki
BIS CD851 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997

Both of these are Weimar compositions, dating from *c*1713 and 1715 respectively, and both were later sung at Leipzig. Where No 21 is concerned, the performance history is complex since Bach, who clearly and understandably set great store by this extended and profoundly expressive piece, made no fewer than four versions of it. Following what was probably its second Weimar performance, in 1714, Bach produced a new version which he used as a test-piece in Hamburg's Jacobikirche, when applying for an organist's post there in 1720. It is this version, for soprano and bass soloists only, in which the parts are transposed from C minor to D minor that forms the basis of the present recording.

Suzuki offers listeners an opportunity, by way of an appendix, of hearing Bach's alternative thoughts on certain sections of the cantata. These are meticulously prepared and affectingly declaimed performances. Listen, for instance, to the beautifully articulated and delicately placed bassoon quavers in the poignant opening Sinfonia of No 21. This is most sensitively done and an auspicious beginning to the work. String playing is not always quite as clean as it could be but the instrumental expertise is impressive. The solo line-up is strong, with Monika Frimmer sustaining several demanding soprano arias with eloquence and tonal warmth. Gerd Türk and Peter Kooy are secure and expressive, and the singing of the 18-voice choir of women's and men's voices is impressive, though tenors sound strained in the first chorus of No 21.

Cantatas Nos 22, 23 and 75 🅿
Midori Suzuki sop Yoshikazu Mera counterten
Gerd Türk ten Peter Kooy bass Bach Collegium Japan / Masaaki Suzuki org
BIS CD901 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1998 ●●

This eighth volume of Bach Collegium Japan's Bach cantata series bridges the period between Bach's departure from Cöthen and his arrival at Leipzig, early in 1723. Du wahrer Gott und Davids Sohn (No 23) was mainly written at Cöthen, while Jesus nahm zu sich die Zwölfe (No 22) must have been composed almost immediately on Bach's reaching Leipzig. The remaining cantata, Die Elenden sollen essen is on an altogether grander scale, in two parts, each of seven movements. The performances maintain the high standards of singing, playing and scholarship set by the previous issues in this series. There are little insecurities here and there – the oboes, which play a prominent role in each of the three pieces, are not always perfectly in agreement over tuning – but the careful thought given to the words, their significance and declamation, and the skill with which they are enlivened by the realization of Bach's expressive musical vocabulary, remain immensely satisfying. The disciplined, perceptively phrased and beautifully sustained singing of the two choral numbers of No 23 illuminate the words at every turn, savouring the seemingly infinite expressive nuances of the music. As for No 75, we can only imagine the astonishment with which Leipzig ears must have attuned to its music. In this absolutely superb piece Bach entertains us with a stylistic diversity that is breathtaking. Polyphony, fugue, chorale fantasia, da capo aria, instrumental sinfonia, varied recitative, wonderful oboe writing and a rhythmic richesse all contribute to the special distinction both of this cantata and No 76. Lose no time in becoming acquainted with this one. It reaches, one might say, those parts which other performances do not.

Cantatas Nos 24, 25, 67, 95, 105, 136, 144, 147, 148, 173, 181 and 184 🅿
Lisa Larsson sop Bogna Bartosz, Elisabeth von Magnus mezzos Gerd Türk ten Klaus Mertens bass
Amsterdam Baroque Choir and Orchestra / Ton Koopman hpd/org
Erato ③ 3984-23141-2 (214 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1997

The seventh volume of Ton Koopman's projected complete cantata survey contains pieces which Bach performed at Leipzig in 1723 and 1724. Koopman's line-up of soloists has been taking a while to settle down and, in this volume, the alto solos are shared between Elisabeth von Magnus, one of the greatest strengths of the series so far, and Bogna Bartosz. All the tenor arias are sung by Gerd Türk, and Lisa Larsson and Klaus Mertens provide their stylish and warm-hearted performances as soprano and bass soloists respectively.

As well as containing three superb examples of Bach's genius in the cantata medium – Nos 67, 105 and 147 – Vol 7 contains a handful of rarely heard pieces, of which No 136, with its colourfully brilliant opening chorus, is perhaps the most immediately striking. At the opposite end of the affective scale is the sombre, penitential chorus which determines the prevalent character of No 25. This technically ingenious double fugue in E minor is difficult to carry off convincingly in performance but Koopman, with his clearly defined contrapuntal strands and responsive choir, succeeds better than any rival version. The gracefulness and fluency in his direction come together rewardingly in No 95. This highly original cantata, with its syncopations, dissonances, bold key changes, and references to four hymns with their associated melodies, all in the opening chorus, is, quite simply, breathtaking. The music commands our attention at every turn, disturbing and pleasing our senses in equal measure. But perhaps it is the following two movements which most readily capture our imagination and win our hearts. Lisa Larsson sings the former with ingenuous charm while Gerd Türk, in the latter, seems to sustain Bach's mercilessly high vocal range with the greatest of ease.

The overall picture of this set is mainly convincing, with some very fine playing and singing – only the occasionally over-assertive projection of countertenor voices from the choir fails to please. Any disappointment here, though, seems relatively slight beside the many excellent contributions of Koopman's artists. If, on balance, No 105 is a shade lacking in strength of purpose, then such feelings are ameliorated by the well-nigh perfect partnership of Larsson and oboist, Marcel Ponseele, in its poignant soprano aria, certainly one of the highest peaks in a stimulating issue.

Cantatas – Nos 35: Sinfonias; 56[a]; 82[a] and 158[a] 🅿
[a]Matthias Goerne bar
[a]Salzburg Bach Choir; Salzburg Camerata Academica / Sir Roger Norrington
Decca 466 570-2DH (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1999 ●●●

This is an extraordinarily fine recital from Matthias Goerne of the solo bass cantatas. His is the sort of mature, sophisticated, assured and boundless Bach singing which one hears so rarely these days. With the beguiling and cultivated oboe playing of Albrecht Mayer, Goerne takes a refreshingly underivative view of Ich habe genug (No 82), involved yet unobtrusively engaged. This, and the famous lullaby 'Schlummert ein', is fragrant, even and soft-spoken.

Norrington's hold on the modern-instrument Salzburg Camerata Academica provides an almost ideal palette for the Lieder-inspired communicative range of Goerne. The strings purr in a gentle if slightly old-fashioned way, yet the orchestra is also receptive to period gesture (including minimal vibrato); just occasionally they rather fall between two stools and seem reticent (a pity about a peculiar glitch in track 3 where nearly a beat is skipped). But this pales into insignificance alongside the opening melisma and subsequent translucent illumination of Ich will den Kreuzstab (No 56). The heavy cross and its heart-breaking allusions are wonderfully inflected in one of Bach's most revelatory through-composed arias; the build-up and chromatic descent on 'it leads me after all my trials to God and to the promised land' is quite irresistible, as is his radiantly poetic response to the symbol-rich music that follows (the final accompanied recitative is a jewel).

The brief No 158 is also a joy, especially the 'Welt' farewell in the central aria with its glistening violin obbligato and chorale. Another shiveringly beautiful and ethereal world opened up by a singer who, apart from his obvious vocal distinction, brings his own uncircumscribed world of experience to bear on the music. A great Bach recording.

Cantatas Nos 37, 86, 104 and 166 🅿
Yukari Nonoshita sop Robin Blaze counterten Makoto Sakurada ten Stephan MacLeod bass
Bach Collegium Japan / Masaaki Suzuki
BIS BIS-CD1261 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 2002

The first work on this CD is a little-known gem, No 86, Wahrlich, wahrlich, ich sage euch ('Verily, I say unto you'). Succinct and imploring, the listener follows the doctrinal and attentive tone set so marvellously by a composer arrested by the intensity of Christ's promise: 'Whatsoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, he will give it you.' Suzuki, as ever, chooses exceptionally well-judged tempi throughout, leaves no stone unturned in his confident preparedness and also introduces a fine new bass to the series, Stephan MacLeod, as the 'vox Christi'.

Of the other three works here, none is particularly long but each contains a central movement of special significance. In No 37, it is the chorale duet of a stanza from 'How brightly shines the morning star', sung with disarming fluency by Yukari Nonoshita and Robin Blaze, and in No 166, the tidy tenor Makoto Sakurada gives a sensitive, if somewhat under-nourished, account of 'Ich will an den Himmel denken'. This cantata also boasts a ravishing and peerless 'Man nehme sich in Acht' from Blaze.

In the great bass aria 'Beglückte Herde', MacLeod gives a gentle and soft-grained performance (very much in the spirit of Suzuki's usual bass, Peter Kooij) as Christ's sheep are offered the rewards of faith. Some will wish for a more involving performance of this highly original work, as Richter provides (from 1973) – with a majestic Fischer-Dieskau – and the radiant spontaneity of Pieter Jan Leusink, which arguably boasts the best bass singing in recent years from Bas Ramselaar.

Suzuki's volume will, however, satisfy a good number of tastes. These are consistently impressive performances, beautifully recorded and Suzuki communicates Bach with unalloyed joy.

Cantatas Nos 40, 60, 70 and 90 🅿
Yukari Nonoshita sop Robin Blaze counterten Gerd Türk ten Peter Kooy bass
Bach Collegium Japan / Masaaki Suzuki
BIS BISCD1111 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Masaaki Sukuki here brings us four more fine cantatas, of which Wachet! betet! betet! wachet! (No 70) stands apart as one of Bach's most graphically dramatic and cohesive choral achievements. The first movement is justly celebrated, its tautness, forbidding fanfares and diminished chords representing the coming of Christ and the Last Judgement. The apocalyptic backdrop fascinated early interpreters of Bach in the 1950s and '60s, notably Felix Prohaska with his menacing pacing and sepia-like textures offset against a Viennese elegance.

Suzuki's direction is more pressing and urgent in style; his less theatrical, more meticulous approach allows the filigree in the instrumental writing to emerge in a way too rarely heard. Koopman (Erato) has the edge in conveying a more harrowing perspective to the first movement, but the remainder of the cantata is beautifully crafted by Suzuki, demonstrating the artistic conviction and sheer vocal bravura of Robin Blaze in 'Wenn kommt' (though his soaring tones are heard to even better effect in No 60). The pivotal aria in No 70 is the radiant 'Hebt euer Haupt empor', a succinct piece whose open-heartedness requires something more than Gerd Türk and Suzuki can give. This is where Georg Jelden for Fritz Werner (Erato) sets the gold standard for conveying this gem's utter simplicity of expression.

The most compelling performances on this disc are in the busy counterpoint, such as the opening chorus of No 40, 'Dazu ist erschienen', the vibrant tenor aria 'Christenkinder', which shows off BCJ's exemplary wind section, and (to return to the horror of Judgement) the peerlessly executed bass aria of No 90, where Peter Kooy and the obbligato trumpet of Toshio Shimada find the perfect synergy. But it is in the stirring and decidedly prescient Sturm und Drang quality of No 60, 'O Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort', that Suzuki's infectious grasp of pulse, biting accentuation and luminous textures take fullest flight: he entertains no half-measures in the opening chorus. All round, yet another prestigious addition to the series.

Cantatas Nos 48, 89, 109 and 148 P
Midori Suzuki sop Robin Blaze counterten
Gerd Türk ten Chiyuki Urano bass
Bach Collegium Japan / Masaaki Suzuki
BIS BIS-CD1081 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 2001

Masaaki Suzuki's considered approach to this oeuvre is what marks him out as a distinctive voice in current Bach performance. This volume reveals much of the best in the series so far: consistently good singing, a sustained familiarity with the music (not always to be taken for granted in the studio) beyond mere pristine executancy, and Suzuki's guiding hand which is especially attentive to the textual motivation in Bach's music.

A broader approach seems to win the day for much in this disc, as one can admire in the defining logic of the fine opening fugal chorus of Bringet dem Herrn (No 148), whose resplendent contrapuntal bravura takes thrilling flight in the chapel's ringing acoustic. Here, and rather less so in the relatively unpolished Leusink reading, the paragraphs connect in a way which ensures an inexorable momentum and sustained uplift – which was rarely achieved in performances of this work from the early days of Bach cantata recordings. The instrumental and obbligato playing throughout is of a high order (if not perhaps boasting the depth of string quality of Koopman), doubtless inspired by the alto and tenor of Robin Blaze and Gerd Türk respectively – who are the main soloists in all four works. Both sing with delectation and authority. In No 109 Suzuki eschews over-characterisation and instead accentuates the instrumental profile as the means of gathering the disparate melodic ideas. There are many other highlights here. The plangent opening lament-chorus of No 48 is slower than Koopman's, but it is a remarkably controlled, even and luminous creation. If not always emotionally exhaustive, Bach Collegium Japan explore the naked emptiness in this work and one feels properly wrung out. A notable achievement.

Cantatas Nos 49, 58 and 82 P
Nancy Argenta sop Klaus Mertens bass
La Petite Bande / Sigiswald Kuijken vn
Accent ACC9395 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1993 ●●

Few readers will be disappointed either by the music or the performances on this disc. It features one of Bach's very finest cantatas, Ich habe genug (No 82) for solo baritone, and two 'Dialogue' cantatas for soprano and bass. Leaving out for the moment such issues as instrumental timbre, Sigiswald Kuijken is among the most thoughtful of present-day practitioners of Baroque music. That is not to say that you will always like what he does but that he always has a good reason for doing it and is prepared to defend it to the end. Here, there are no complaints whatsoever: tempos are beautifully judged, the string sound is warmer than usual and the overall approach to the music expressive and eloquently shaped. Mertens gives a fine performance of Ich habe genug, clearly articulated and resonantly declaimed. Kuijken has opted for the first of several versions of this cantata which Bach made subsequently for various voice pitches and with small instrumental adjustments.

In the two 'Dialogue' cantatas Mertens is joined by Nancy Argenta, an effective piece of casting. Both voices are tonally well focused and project the music in a manner admirably free from needless affectation or contrivance. An expressive peak is reached in Argenta's aria, 'Ich bin herrlich, ich bin schön' (No 49), a ravishing quartet movement with oboe d'amore and a violoncello piccolo beautifully played by Hidemi Suzuki. Add to this a first-rate performance of the organ obbligatos in the opening Sinfonia and final duo of the same cantata and you have a performance of distinction. An outstanding achievement.

Cantatas Nos 50, 50 (recons Kleinbussink), 59, 69, 69a, 75, 76, 104, 179, 186, and 190 P
Ruth Ziesak sop Elisabeth von Magnus mez Paul Agnew ten Klaus Mertens bass
Amsterdam Baroque Choir and Orchestra / Ton Koopman org
Erato ③ 3984-21629-2 Ⓕ
(195 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included.
Recorded 1997 ●

In his sixth volume of Bach's complete cantatas, Koopman is engaged in the great Leipzig period from 1723. Bach's inaugural offering was a pair of substantial bipartite cantatas, Nos 75 and 76. Koopman gives us the second one initially, Die Himmel erzählen die Ehre Gottes, in a muscular and assertive performance. The fine opening chorus, with its swaggering trumpet obbligato, is zestfully negotiated and appropriately full-blooded. The same commitment and character are plentiful in the formidably worked-out contrapuntal edifice of No 75 – a movement passionately declaiming the rewards of seeking God – and the wonderfully evocative imagery in No 104, Du Hirte Israel, höre. Memorable for different reasons is Singet dem Herrn, No 190, a cantata whose opening two movements require major reconstruction. Koopman has completed the task with a dynamic scoring around the existing vocal parts. If a somewhat over-elaborate setting, it is nevertheless thrilling, and employs the sort of fervent Reformation-like unisons and belting brass which cannot fail to stir.

Koopman has found in Ruth Ziesak a soprano who can get round the notes, sing consistently in tune (despite one under-par aria in No 186) and express the meaning of the music with rhetorical personality. She dances around the lithe 'Ich nehme mein Leiden' from No 75. This latter cantata abounds in arresting arias, none more so than the delicious 'Mein Jesus soll', a creation of such ingenious and agreeable melodic inflexion that Paul Agnew can but relish it devotedly. Both Agnew's and Klaus Mertens's singing throughout is a joy, a happy blend of technical security, musicianly shaping and tonal elegance. Elisabeth von Magnus is, in truth, the weak link. Her contribution to the stirring Part 2 of No 76 is not especially undistinguished but her languid sound is repeatedly enervating, and too often the pitch dips unacceptably. In all other respects this is quite a turn-up for the books after the hits and misses of previous volumes. Bach was clearly intent on impressing his new employers with the most accomplished work he could produce; one only has to hear the richness of these scores (a bonanza here for those who like trumpets, and brilliantly played too) to suppose that Koopman has found similar inspiration at exactly the right time.

Cantatas Nos 51, 202 and 209 🅿
Agnes Giebel sop Concerto Amsterdam / Jaap Schröder vn Leonhardt Consort / Gustav Leonhardt hpd
Teldec Das Alte Werk 3984-21711-2 Ⓜ
(65 minutes: ADD). Texts and translations included.
Recorded 1966 ●

Followers of historical recordings of Bach's music admire Agnes Giebel for her impeccable delivery and shimmering control of line. She is a worthy mentor to current practitioners in that she communicates an utterly enraptured love of Bach and its expressive world. Whilst her voice may sound old-fashioned in its dignified restraint, that is merely the 'front'; as one can hear in the recitative and arioso of Jauchzet Gott (No 51), she manipulates her heady control of the phrase with mesmerizing intensity. There is much consistently vintage Giebel in this welcome reissue. Stylish accompaniments from the early Dutch pioneers, Jaap Schröder and the Leonhardts, provide a tantalizing glimpse of how Giebel, had she been a generation younger, would have so ideally suited and relished the exciting possibilities of period instruments; the chamber-like Non sa che sia dolore (No 209) has all the refinement and instinct for discerning gesture to render it a remarkably prescient document of its time: the aria, 'Partipur e con dolore' is a case in point and this really is vintage Giebel. No 51 has been a favourite with technically capable sopranos in the post-war period. The opening is a touch pedestrian in the paucity of shaping in the ritornello arpeggios but Giebel's beady encirclement of the fiendish passagework as the piece unfolds is sheer joy. A precious disc of a great Bach singer.

Cantatas Nos 51 (arr W F Bach), 202 and 210 🅿
Christine Schäfer sop Musica Antiqua Köln / Reinhard Goebel vn
DG 459 621-2GH (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included ●

Of the two wedding cantatas, Weichet nur, betrübte Schatten (202) ranks among Bach's best-loved, but the other, O holder Tag, erwünschte Zeit (No 210), is much less heard. To these, Christine Schäfer adds another Bach favourite, Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen! (No 51) which, although not specifically for a wedding, confirms propriety in a nuptial context.

The partnership of Schäfer and Reinhard Goebel with his Musica Antiqua Köln is an interesting one, and rewarding more often than not. Schäfer is a spirited singer with a bright tone and an agile technique. Her clearly articulated phrases accord well with Goebel's well-defined instrumental contours and colourfully characterised rhythms – the fourth aria of No 210, in the rhythm of a polonaise, is admirably enlivened in these respects – and her well-controlled vibrato is a pleasure throughout.

If Emma Kirkby's performance of this piece and No 202 is more understated than the present one there is, none the less, an underlying expressive subtlety and a warmth of vocal timbre in her singing which may prove the more rewarding and enduring. The opening aria of No 202, a sublime piece of musical imagery, points up some of the essential differences between the two approaches: Schäfer declamatory, demonstrative and bright toned, with an edge to the voice, Kirkby, warm toned, alluring and exercising superb control throughout. On the other hand Schäfer's even technique, with its easier access to the highest notes of the range, often has the edge over Kirkby in more virtuosic movements. And in No 210 Schäfer's vocal brilliance and unfailing security, together with Goebel's lively if on occasion provocative gestures, make one of the most alert and interesting performances of the piece. Schäfer also rises brilliantly to the occasion in No 51. A stimulating and often satisfying release.

Cantatas Nos 65, 81, 83, 190 🅿
Robin Blaze counterten James Gilchrist ten Peter Kooy bass Bach Collegium Japan / Masaaki Suzuki
BIS BIS-CD1311 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded c2002 ●

Another meticulously prepared volume in this distinguished series comprises the late festivities of Christmas 1724 and two Epiphany works from a few weeks later. Taken from the first of Bach's annual cantata cycles, these four works reveal the astonishing variety and textual (and textural) coloration which the composer exercised in this period of free-wheeling creativity from his early months of employment in Leipzig.

While the instrumentation of horns, recorders, oboes da caccia and strings in No 65 captures the spiciness of eastern promise, Suzuki imbues the whole with a relaxed and soft-grained pastoral regality. This is further exemplified in the easy delivery of the aria 'Nimm mich dir zu eigen' in which James Gilchrist performs with supreme awareness, beckoning the listener to inhabit his world: this is exceptionally characterised singing by any standards and Suzuki shouldn't look back.

No less successful is the way Bach Collegium

Japan embraces the Christmas message in the incomplete Cantata No 190. Imaginative reconstruction can bring this work to life and Masato Suzuki has found a majestic solution to the opening chorus, which his namesake realises with abandon.

Cantata No 81 is a mesmerisingly compact piece in which St Matthew's account of Jesus calming the storm provides the arresting imagery for three fine arias. The middle movement is the set-piece par excellence, truly operatic in its posturing bravura and burning focus of conceit. Gilchrist again brings tremendous commitment and open-heartedness with the kind of cultivated vocal élan of great Bach tenors in the Helmut Krebs and Anton Dermota mould. Both Robin Blaze and Peter Kooy perform their arias with customary distinction. Altogether, an extremely fine volume, finer than any rival.

Cantatas Nos 71, 106 and 131 🅿
Midori Suzuki, Aki Yanagisawa sops Yoshikazu Mera counterten Gerd Türk ten Peter Kooy bass
Bach Collegium Japan / Masaaki Suzuki
BIS CD781 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1995

Here these artists are abreast of current thinking concerning Baroque style, yet sometimes you find yourself longing for a little more expression and a little less fashionable orthodoxy. The three cantatas included here are among Bach's earliest essays in the form. Nos 106 and 131 (*c*1707) belong to the Mühlhausen period, while No 71 was written in 1708. By and large, Suzuki has chosen effective tempos, though there are notable exceptions. One of these affects the beautiful Sonatina for recorders and viola da gamba that introduces the Actus tragicus (No 106), a funeral piece of startling intensity. Suzuki feels too slow here, adding a full 40 seconds on to performances by virtually all of his rivals. Elsewhere, and above all in his choice of soloists, Suzuki fields an exceptional team. We can feel this especially in the effortlessly projected singing of Midori Suzuki (Nos 71 and 131) and Aki Yanagisawa (No 106), the uncluttered declamation of Gerd Türk, and the resonant contributions by Peter Kooy. The countertenor here lacks either conviction or consistent aural charm. The Choir is well drilled and, as with the solo element, the voices respond urgently to the spirit of the text. Listen to the thrice supplicatory 'Israel' in the concluding chorus of No 131 for one such example.

Cantatas Nos 8, 78, 91, 99, 107, 111, 114, 116, 121, 124, 135 🅿
Lisa Larsson, Sibylla Rubens sops Annette Markert contr Christoph Prégardien ten
Klaus Mertens bass Amsterdam Baroque Choir and Orchestra / Ton Koopman
Erato ③ 8573-85842-2 (201minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

These 11 cantatas represent the absolute kernel of Bach's cantata oeuvre, and Koopman's series too, as the great 'chorale' cantatas take fullest flight. Economy of means is one feature of Bach's increasing technical prowess and artistic maturity, but the formal 'straitjacket' of the chorale seems only to have catalysed an even greater imagination.

Koopman's approach is an instinctively musical one, as opposed to one drawn from, say, a reconstructed 'religious' context or any new-fangled theory on performance rectitude. This is refreshingly realised in the effervescent and abstracted instrumental quality of No 124 (where the circular thread of oboe d'amore figuration is beautifully articulated) or the thrill of the chase in No 91 (probably not one of Bach's best works in the cycle). Koopman's infectious energy rubs off on the eloquent Christoph Prégardien, whose performances throughout are truly outstanding, from the poetic fluidity of 'Troste mir, Jesu' in No 135, the suspended animation of 'Wo wird in diesem Jammertale' in No 114 and the galant, purring line of 'Drum ich mich ihm' from No 107. His fellow soloists do not fare consistently quite as well. Klaus Mertens exhibits timbral majesty in arguably the best works in the set, Nos 8 and 78, where he is clearly caught up by the music's unstoppable momentum. Yet, there is a discernable line between this and when engagement is limited to merely covering the ground (for instance 'Auf ihn magst' in No 107).

Lisa Larsson, the soprano, is very competent, as she shows in her numerous duets with Annette Markert – who herself has a pleasing if not particularly radiant sound – but this is music whose expressive and colouristic potential deserves better. Sadly, the estimable Sybilla Rubens sings only on the Terzetto of No 116.

However, as mentioned before about this series, one has to count one's blessings for distinctly unfussy performances allied to top-class execution – and the Amsterdammers are really top-drawer. Despite the occasional frustration, Nos 99, 124, 111, 78 and 114 can stand alongside the best in the deservedly rich discography of Bach's cantatas.

Cantatas Nos 80 and 147
Ingrid Kertesi sops Judit Nemeth mez Jozsef Mukk ten István Gáti bar Hungarian Radio Chorus; Failoni Chamber Orchestra, Budapest / Mátyás Antál
Naxos 8 550642 (54 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1992

Cantatas Nos 51 and 208
Ingrid Kertesi, Julia Pászthy sops Judit Nemeth mez Jozsef Mukk ten István Gáti bar
Hungarian Radio Chorus; Failoni Chamber Orchestra, Budapest / Mátyás Antál
Naxos 8 550643 (50 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1992

Naxos include here four of Bach's most celebrated and accessible cantatas. The performances are far removed in character from the complete Harnoncourt and Leonhardt edition on Teldec;

women rather than boys sing all the soprano and alto solos, the Hungarian Radio Chorus is a mixed male and female ensemble and the Failoni Chamber Orchestra of Budapest plays modern rather than period instruments. However, for much of the time this is enjoyable spirited music-making which, in its choice of tempos, its understanding of recitative and its feeling for the lyricism of Bach's writing compares favourably with rival modern instrument versions. The disappointment lies partly in the choice of edition and solution to instrumentation. Sheep may safely graze (No 208) is without the treble recorders which Bach specifically asked for and which intensify the pastoral idyll. Here, furthermore the flutes are rather distantly balanced giving them a somewhat irrelevant role which is far from Bach's intention.

More serious is the decision to follow the inflated version of the first and fifth movements of Ein feste Burg (No 80) penned by Bach's eldest son, Wilhelm Friedemann shortly after his father's death. Here Friedemann added three trumpets and a kettledrum to the original texture of oboes and strings, and though some may prefer the more overt sense of occasion and the emphasis of the church militant, that this achieves, the scoring of the original is unquestionably effective and in keeping with the piece as a whole. Much else here is sensitively and unsentimentally performed. 'Jesu, joy of man's desiring' (from No 147) is perhaps a shade on the slow side. Most affecting of all though, is the canonic alto/tenor duet from No 80 whose tender writing for oboe da caccia and violin has long been for some one of the purplest of all passages in the entire Bach cantata canon. The soprano Ingrid Kertesi negotiates the many difficulties of Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen! fluently and with a youthful zeal and few will be disappointed by her spirited artistry. To sum up, these are two mainly very enjoyable discs which can be confidently recommended. Clear recorded sound.

Cantatas Nos 82 and 199[a] 🅿
Concerto for Oboe, Violin and Strings, BWV1060[b]
[a]Emma Kirkby sop [b]Katharina Arfken ob
Freiburg Baroque Orchestra /
Gottfried von der Goltz vn
Carus 83 302 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included ●●

One of the world's brightest Baroque ensembles performing with one of the world's most admired Baroque sopranos sounds an enticing proposition, and so it should. What is more, the solo cantatas on offer here are two of Bach's most moving: No 82, Ich habe genug, that serene contemplation of the afterlife; and No 199, Mein Herze schwimmt im Blut, a relatively early work with a text which moves from the wallowing self-pity of the sinner to joyful relief in God's mercy. Each contains music of great humanity and beauty, and each, too, contains an aria of aching breadth and nobility – the justly celebrated 'Schlummert ein' in the case of Ich habe genug, and in Mein Herze the humble but assured supplication of 'Tief gebückt'.

Both could have been written for Emma Kirkby, who is perhaps at her best in this kind of long-breathed, melodically sublime music in which sheer beauty of vocal sound counts for so much. The support of the Freiburg Baroque Orchestra is total, combining tightness of ensemble with such flexibility and sensitivity to the job of accompaniment that you really feel they are 'playing the words'. The Freiburgers also give one of the most satisfyingly thoroughbred accounts of the Violin and Oboe Concerto on disc. Add a recorded sound which perfectly combines bloom, clarity and internal balance, and you have a CD to treasure.

Cantatas Nos 105[a]; 179 and 186[b]
Miah Persson sop [ab]Robin Blaze counterten
Makoto Sakurada ten Peter Kooy bass
Bach Collegium Japan / Masaaki Suzuki
BIS CD951 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1999 ●

Bach Collegium Japan's eloquent advance into the rich repository of cantatas composed during Bach's first year at Leipzig is distinguished in Vol 10 by Masaaki Suzuki's remarkable instinct for the emotional core of each of these three works. Experiencing Herr, gehe nicht ins Gericht (No 105) reveals a sense of open-hearted fervour and contemplation, never for a minute cloying or self-regarding at the expense of vibrant expression. This is a work embued with a rich discography, yet what Suzuki uniquely achieves, compelling in the opening chorus, is an intensity born of subtle contrast in vocal and instrumental articulation, underpinned by his uncanny ability to choose a tempo which provides for lyrical intimacy and organic gesture, as the respective texts demand. Suzuki grasps the magnificent nobility of the composer's inspired musical commentary on the human soul in No 105. Miah Persson exhibits sustained control and delectable purity of tone in the continuo-less 'Wie zittern und wanken' and 'Liebster Gott' from No 179. With Peter Kooy's cathartic recitative singing (preparing the spirit of salvation) and the beautifully balanced tenor aria and final chorale, Herreweghe's elegant and fragrant 1990 account, a clear leader until now, has a companion on the top rung.

The bipartite Trinity cantata, Ärgre dich, o Seele, nicht (No 186), revised from a Weimar version of 1716, conveys equally Suzuki's assurance and vision. Perhaps the choruses which frame Part 1 are a touch short on gravitas (and tuning is intermittently awry in the first) but here, and in the formidable opening movement of No 179 rhythmic incision is the order of the day. This is another first-rate achievement (the soloists are slightly recessed but the recorded sound is excellent). Arguably the most complete and mature offering in the series so far.

Cantatas Nos 194[a], 119;[b]; 🅿
[b]Yoshie Hida, [a]Yukari Nonoshita sops [b]Kirsten

Sollek-Avella contr [a]Makoto Sakurada ten
[a]Jochen Kupfer bar [b]Peter Kooij bass
Bach Collegium Japan / Masaaki Suzuki
BIS BISCD1131 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included

Masaaki Suzuki gives No 194 a fittingly airy charm, heard most infectiously in 'Hilf, Gott' where an underlying Gavotte (with resonances of the final movement of the Wedding Cantata, No 202) finds bright-eyed soprano, Yukari Nonoshita, in confident and beguiling voice. She is most accomplished throughout and delectably joins the gentle and receptive baritone, Jochen Kupfer, in 'O wie wohl' ist uns geschehn', a bucolic minuet-style duet. This is, all told, the most persuasive reading on disc and supersedes both Rilling's stiff reading and even Harnoncourt's cultivated (if slightly hit-and-miss) performance, notable also for the presence of a young Thomas Hampson.

Harnoncourt, however, comes out better in one of the grandest French-overture cantatas Bach was to write, 'Preise Jerusalem' (No 119). Composed to honour the new Leipzig town council, Bach really pushed the boat out. Suzuki never quite boasts either the grand sonic cohesion of Philippe Herreweghe's urgent account or the thrilling characterisation of Harnoncourt. Strongly recommended nevertheless for Suzuki's superb reading of No 194.

Cantatas Nos 211 and 212 🅿
Emma Kirkby sop Rogers Covey-Crump ten
David Thomas bass Academy of Ancient Music / Christopher Hogwood
L'Oiseau-Lyre 417 621-2OH (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included ●
Recorded 1984

These two most delightful of Bach's secular cantatas here receive sparkling performances fully alive to the humour and invention of the music. The Coffee Cantata illustrates a family altercation over a current enthusiasm, the drinking of coffee. A narrator tells the story whilst the soprano and bass soloists confront each other in a series of delightful arias. Thomas brings out the crabby dyspeptic side of Schlendrian's character imaginatively and Kirkby makes a charming minx-like Lieschen. Covey-Crump's sweet light tenor acts as a good foil. The Peasant Cantata also takes the form of a dialogue, here between a somewhat dull and simple young man and his sweetheart Mieke, a girl who intends to better herself. Through the 24 short movements Bach conjures up a wonderfully rustic picture with some vivid dance numbers and rumbustious ritornellos. The soloists' nicely rounded characterizations emerge with great humour and Hogwood directs with vitality and sprightly rhythmic control. The recording is excellent.

Additional recommendations
Cantatas
Nos 39, 73, 93, 105, 107, 131
Collegium Vocale, Ghent / Herreweghe
Virgin Veritas ② 562025-2 (120 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ

This is a veritable treasure trove. The pick of the bunch is No 105, Herr gehe nicht ins Gericht, delivered with glowing intensity, led by the shimmering Barbara Schlick. Herreweghe and his beautifully blended ensemble give deeply considered performances.

Nos 51 and 61
Couplings: St Matthew Passion – excerpts. Chorale Prelude, BWV639. Italian Concerto, BWV971. Double Violin Concerto, BWV1043. Overtures Nos 2 and 3, BWV1067-68
Various artists; Monteverdi Choir; English Baroque Soloists / Gardiner
DG Panorama 469 106-2GP2 Ⓜ
(149 minutes: DDD: 4/85^{R} and 2/93^{R})

A fine performance of No 51, in which soloist Emma Kirkby captures well the spirit of rejoicing, and an outstandingly successful performance of No 61.

Nos 78 and 106 🅷
Stich-Randall sop Hermann mez Dermota ten
Braun bar
Vienna Bach Guild Choir and Orchestra / Prohaska
Omega Records mono/stereo OVC2009 Ⓜ
(49 minutes: ADD). Texts and translations included
Not available in the UK at present but try the internet. ●●●

One of the great recordings of the 20th century. Prohaska's No 78 remains unrivalled for its cohesive overall concept and for the great distinction of its soloists. A performance which no lover of Bach's music should be without.

Motets

Motets – Singet dem Herren, BWV225; 🅿
Der Geist hilft unsrer Schwachheit auf, BWV226;
Jesu meine Freude, BWV227; Fürchte dich nicht, BWV228; Komm, Jesu, komm, BWV229;
Lobet den Herren, BWV230
Greta de Reyghere, Katelijne van Laetham sops
Martin van der Zeijst, Sytse Buwalda countertens
Hans Hermann Jansen tens Johannes-Christoph Happel bar La Petite Bande Choir; La Petite Bande / Sigiswald Kuijken
Accent ACC9287 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1992

Motets, BWV225-30
Netherlands Chamber Choir / Ton Koopman
Philips 434 165-2PH (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1986-87

These two approaches to Bach's Motets differ strongly from one another. Kuijken directs performances with colla parte instrumental support, that is to say with instruments doubling each of the vocal strands. Koopman, on the other hand, prefers the vocal strands a cappella with instruments providing only the basso continuo. The choir in each version is made up of women sopranos and countertenors with the men's voices. Choosing between the versions is difficult and to a large extent must be a matter of which approach you prefer. Kuijken's performances are more relaxed than those of Koopman. He avoids anything in the nature of overdirection and, while neither singing nor playing is always quite as tidy as it might be, there is a lively spontaneity, especially rewarding in the radiant performance of Singet dem Herren. Koopman draws more sharply articulated singing than Kuijken from the Netherlands Chamber Choir though sometimes at the expense of natural declamation and spontaneity. But there is greater linear clarity here than in the other and it pays off handsomely in Komm, Jesu, komm. It is a pity that Koopman does not avail himself of the surviving instrumental parts for Der Geist hilft but, in other respects, the strengths and weaknesses of the two performances are fairly evenly distributed and both are highly recommended.

Magnificat, BWV243

Bach Magnificat in D, BWV243 🅿
Vivaldi Ostro picta, RV642. Gloria in D, RV589
Emma Kirkby, Tessa Bonner sops
Michael Chance counterten John Mark Ainsley ten
Stephen Varcoe bar
Collegium Musicum 90 Chorus and Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0518 Ⓕ
(64 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included.
Recorded 1990 ●

Hickox sets effective tempos in Bach's Magnificat and points up the many striking contrasts in colour and texture with which the piece abounds. From among the many successful features of the recording Stephen Varcoe's 'Quia fecit mihi magna' and the 'Et misericordia' sung by Michael Chance and John Mark Ainsley stand out. Vivaldi's Gloria, RV589 is the better known of two settings by the composer in D major. In this programme it is prefaced by an introductory motet Ostro picta, which may well in fact belong to the Gloria and is here sung with warmth and radiance by Emma Kirkby. Hickox's performance of this evergreen vocal masterpiece comes over with conviction. It is gracefully phrased, sensitively sung and affectingly paced with an admirable rapport between vocalists and instrumentalists. The sound is first-rate.

Bach Magnificat[ab] Kuhnau Magnificat in C[a]
Zelenka Magnificat in C, ZWV107[b]. Magnificat in D, ZWV108[a]
[a]Miah Persson, [b]Yukari Nonoshita sops Akira Tachikawa counterten Gerd Türk ten Chiyuki Urano bass Bach Collegium Japan / Masaaki Suzuki
BIS CD1011 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1998

The four settings of the Magnificat featured here sit comfortably together. Two of them, by Bach's predecessor at Leipzig, Johann Kuhnau, and by Bach himself, are 'Leipzig-born'. The others, by Bach's contemporary Zelenka, were composed for the court chapel at Dresden. Kuhnau's Magnificat is full of colourfully effective gestures, textural contrasts and suppleness of form, and the instrumentalists bring out the rhythmically buoyant character of the opening chorus wonderfully well.

With this talented ensemble of voices and instruments there is an unusually highly developed sense of phrase contour and rhythm. Be it recitative, aria, chorus, continuo accompaniment or tutti, the component parts are all carefully and most beautifully shaped. Vocal declamation is fresh and incisive and solo contributions are of uniform excellence. This applies equally to the Zelenka and Bach settings.

The performance of Bach's Magnificat is spirited and, by and large, excellent, though expressively rather cool; but where Kuhnau and Zelenka present few problems for the brass and woodwind, Bach, as nearly always, puts everyone on his and her metal, and chinks in this formidable armour are occasionally revealed. Nevertheless, it is a fine release, above all for the Kuhnau, which should delight many listeners.

Magnificat. Cantata No 51 🅿
Nancy Argenta, Patrizia Kwella, Emma Kirkby sops Charles Brett counterten Anthony Rolfe Johnson ten David Thomas bass
English Baroque Soloists / Sir John Eliot Gardiner
Philips 50 Great Recordings 464 672-2PM Ⓜ
(41 minutes: DDD)
Texts and translations included ●

Bach's Magnificat is a work full of contrasts – contrasts of texture, of colour and of temperament – few of which escape the attention of Gardiner, his choir, orchestra and fine group of soloists. The choruses are sung with great vigour and precision; articulation is crisp and diction excellent. The solo singing is of a uniformly high standard with some outstanding contributions from Charles Brett, Anthony Rolfe Johnson and David Thomas. One thinks in particular of the 'Quia fecit', in which Thomas is admirably accompanied by a perfectly balanced continuo texture, and the 'Et misericordia' duet for alto and tenor, which is sung with great tenderness and restraint by these artists. Among the obbligato contributions we must single out that of the oboe d'amore in the 'Quia respexit' which is sensitively played and hauntingly beautiful.

The cantata Jauchzet Gott in allen Landen! is one of three for solo soprano which Bach wrote at Leipzig during the 1730s. The spirit of the text, as its title implies, is one of rejoicing. It's a spirit which the soloist, Emma Kirkby, captures well. Her solo partner in the colourful opening movement and in the fugal 'Alleluia' at the close is Crispian Steele-Perkins who manages Bach's exacting trumpet parts with precision. Less enjoyable is the exaggerated acceleration in tempo for the 'Alleluia' section of the final movement, but it's a dazzling display without a doubt. These are fine performances of two of Bach's best-known church compositions, with admirably clear recordings.

Magnificat in D, BWV243
Cantata No 21
Greta de Reyghere sop René Jacobs counterten
Christoph Prégardien ten Peter Lika bass
Netherlands Chamber Choir; La Petite Bande / Sigiswald Kuijken
Virgin Classics The Classics 561833-2 Ⓑ
(73 minutes: DDD). Notes, texts and translations included. Recorded 1988 ●

The first of this batch of The Classics, coupling performances of Bach's Magnificat with Cantata No 21, is in every way recommendable. Indeed Nicholas Anderson's original review commented that in the Magnificat Sigiswald Kuijken and La Petite Bande 'reach the heart of Bach's music more convincingly than almost any other [version] currently available'. He went on to comment that he found Kuijken's performance of Ich hatte viel Bekümmernis 'profoundly affecting', although he also noticed some instrumental insecurity. Certainly the lovely solo and choral singing in both works, coupled to a superbly atmospheric recording, make this a Bach CD to treasure.

Mass in B minor, BWV232

Monteverdi Choir; English Baroque Soloists / Sir John Eliot Gardiner 🅿
Archiv Produktion ② 415 514-2AH2 Ⓕ
(112 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1985 ●●

There is much to be said for becoming acquainted with more than one version of Bach's B minor Mass. No single performance of a work of this distinction and stature can embrace all its aspects. The argument for one singer to each vocal part has encouraged performers and audiences alike to think afresh about the forces best suited to the work's vocal element. Gardiner opts for differentiation between soloists and a ripieno chorus. He bases his forces on the famous memorandum which Bach handed to the Leipzig town council in 1730 outlining the vocal and instrumental requirements for performances of his church music.

This is a fine achievement. Some listeners may feel the results would have been more satisfying if Gardiner had let the music unfold with greater natural freedom and not felt the need to tweak rhythms and tempos. Some may like that additional degree of excitement engendered by such methods but Bach, above all composers, perhaps, does not require 'whipping up' any more than his profound utterances benefit from exaggerated tempos in either direction in order to underline a point. The many strong points of Gardiner's direction, among which should be singled out a vital rhythmic understanding, a clear and positive sense of purpose, and a naturally affective response to Bach's music, combine in forming a concept of the work which not only explores its ineffable mysteries but also savours the magnificence of its architecture. The solo vocal line-up is a strong one and there are few weak moments. But perhaps the crowning achievement of Gardiner's recording lies in the vitality, accuracy and homogeneity of the ripieno singing. There is a spontaneity about this singing to which few listeners could remain indifferent. Gardiner's choruses are immediately striking and handled with such skill and rigorous discipline that repeated hearing in no sense diminishes their impact.

Jenny Hill sop Dame Janet Baker contr
Peter Pears ten John Shirley-Quirk bass
New Philharmonia Chorus and Orchestra / Carlo Maria Giulini
BBC Legends/IMG Artists ② BBCL4062-2 Ⓜ
(138 minutes: ADD). Recorded live at St Paul's Cathedral, London in 1972

In these days of period-instrument hegemony in the performance of Bach, this 'old-fashioned' B minor Mass may be considered an anachronism among younger collectors, but it has its own validity in terms of Giulini's absolute commitment to the work in hand and in the thoroughness of the execution. The downside of the large-scale approach can be heard in the somewhat lumbering account of 'Qui tollis', its upside in the grave, measured 'Gratias agimus' where the successive entries of the same idea are unerringly propelled. 'Et incarnatus est' and 'Crucifixus' in the Credo have a wonderful inwardness, the 'Sanctus' a power unavailable to a smaller choir.

When it comes to the soloists this performance wins hands down over authenticity. Janet Baker, on top form, is warm, vibrant, above all communicative with her words. Shirley-Quirk, in both his solos, is confident and bold in his vocal projection, secure and full in tone. There is no one to match them today. Jenny Hill sings purely and with fresh feeling. Only Peter Pears, already in his sixties, disappoints. The recording catches both the St Pauls' reverberation and the sense of a notable occasion.

Lutheran Masses

Masses[a] – F, BWV233; G, BWV236. 🅿
Trio Sonata in C, BWV529 (arr Boothby)
[a]Nancy Argenta sop [a]Michael Chance counterten
[a]Mark Padmore ten [a]Peter Harvey bass Purcell Quartet (Catherine Mackintosh, Catherine Weiss vns Richard Boothby vc Robert Woolley org)
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0653 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included ●

Thank goodness the absurd prejudice that has long deprived us of adequate recordings of Bach's four Lutheran Masses (or short Masses, as they are also known because, in accordance with Lutheran usage, they set only the Kyrie and Gloria) seems finally to have died a death. The Masses' crime has been to be made up almost entirely of paraphrases of cantata movements from the 1720s, yet Bach is Bach, whatever the circumstances, and this is wonderful music which, like the B minor Mass, offers sober old-style polyphonic choral movements of impressive cumulative power alongside choruses of almost physical excitement and clamour and some first-rate arias with instrumental obbligato.

As with volume 1 the Purcell Quartet adopt a one-to-a-part approach, with the four vocal soloists also forming the choir and the Purcell Quartet being augmented by whatever extra instruments are needed. The result sounds not in the least underpowered, and gains considerably over Herreweghe's typically well-turned but more traditional choral approach in vividness of texture and harmony, crispness of attack and a madrigalian litheness of expressive response.

The recording allows just the right amount of bloom without becoming washy. There are times when the two higher voices sound further forward than the others, and Michael Chance occasionally disappears a bit towards the bottom of his range, but in general this release brings nothing but pleasure both in the music and in the stylish and lively performances.

Mass in F, BWV233a. Cantatas Nos 65 and 180. Ⓟ
Sanctus in D, BWV238
Ann Monoyios sop Angus Davidson counterten
Charles Daniels ten Peter Harvey bar Gabrieli Consort and Players / Paul McCreesh
Archiv Produktion ② 457 631-2AH2 Ⓕ
(160 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included.
Includes readings, congregational hymns and organ works by Bach and Pachelbel. Recorded 1997 ●

This two-disc set contains four vocal works by Bach, set in the context of an Epiphany Mass 'as it might have been celebrated in St Thomas, Leipzig *c*1740'. Though several attempts have been made in the past to re-create the sequence of events at the two main services where Bach's cantatas were sung, the Hauptgottesdienst, in the morning, and the Vesper, in the afternoon, this is the first time that such a project has been committed to disc. You are very likely to be captivated by much of what Paul McCreesh and his musicians, with help in liturgical canon from the scholar, Robin A Leaver, have achieved.

The sacred vocal works which have been chosen for this reconstruction of a Hauptgottesdienst for the 'Feast of the Three Kings' are the F major Lutheran Mass, the Sanctus and two cantatas, Sie werden aus Saba alle kommen, a true Epiphany piece, and Schmücke dich, o liebe Seele which is foremost a Trinity piece but one which Bach may well have used on other occasions. McCreesh did well in securing the services of Ann Monoyios and Peter Harvey, but all involved make an impressive showing. The Missa comes over very well, Monoyios's 'Qui tollis peccata mundi' outstanding for its warmth of colour.

The brisk tempo chosen for the superb chorale fantasy with which No 180 begins fails to convince. The brilliant tenor aria with virtuoso flute obbligato which follows is, on the other hand, well considered in respect of tempo, and is beautifully articulated by flautist Jed Wentz. But it is Monoyios who, once more, steals the show with her affecting account of the lyrical elaboration with violoncello piccolo of a verse from the Communion hymn on which the cantata is based.

Overall, this project is likely to interest all lovers of Bach's music. The recorded sound, from Freiburg Cathedral and Brand-Erbisdorf in Saxony, is excellent.

Additional recommendation
Lutheran Masses, BWV233-236
Couplings: Cantata Nos 39, 73, 93, 105, 107, 131 and Santus in D, BWV238
Various soloists; Collegium Vocale / Herreweghe
Virgin Classics ④ 561721-2
(239 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Attractive accounts of the Masses (though textural clarity in the choral movements suffers in the reverberant acoustic) and well-paced and at times deeply felt accounts of the cantatas, some scrappy ensemble playing aside.

St John Passion, BWV245

Gerd Türk ten Evangelist; Chiyuki Urano bass Ⓟ
Jesus; Ingrid Schmidthüsen, Yoshie Hida sops
Yoshikazu Mera counterten Makoto Sakurada ten
Peter Kooy bass
Bach Collegium Japan / Masaaki Suzuki
BIS ② CD921/2 (110 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1998 ●●

Bach seems to have performed his St John Passion on four Good Fridays during his tenure as Thomaskantor at Leipzig. However, he continued to make significant revisions right up to the last performance under his direction, on April 4, 1749. Of the four versions, the second, dating from 1725, contains the most distinctive revisions, the first version (1724) and the last bearing close affinity with one another. Masaaki Suzuki and his talented Bach Collegium Japan have chosen Bach's latest version. All has evidently been carefully prepared and deeply considered: what is refreshing about their approach is the importance afforded to the relationship between text and music, to the theological source of Bach's inspiration, and the emotional impact of the story and music on its audience. Some of their thoughts may strike readers as simplistic, even perhaps a shade sentimental, but on the strength of this fervent performance we can hardly question their sincerity.

The role of the Evangelist is sung with clarity and lightness of inflexion by Gerd Türk. His performance is eloquently measured, his phrasing well shaped and his articulation engagingly varied. All of which makes him a riveting storyteller. The role of Jesus is taken by Chiyuki Urano, warm-toned and resonant. Ingrid Schmidthüsen and Yoshikazu Mera make strongly appealing contributions and Peter Kooy is satisfying and affecting. Excellent, too, are the contributions of the Collegium's choir of women's and men's voices. Choral and instrumental articulation is incisive, propelling the rhythms with energy. The performance draws you in from the start. This is a major recording event, and an eminently satisfying one.

St John Passion, BWV245 (sung in English)
Sir Peter Pears ten Evangelist; Gwynne Howell bass Jesus; Heather Harper, Jenny Hill sops Alfreda Hodgson contr Robert Tear, Russell Burgess, John Tobin, Adrian Thompson tens John Shirley-Quirk bar Wandsworth School Boys' Choir; English Chamber Orchestra / Benjamin Britten
Double Decca ② 443 859-2DF2 Ⓜ
(130 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1971 ●●

Britten's recording of the St John Passion is very special indeed. He apparently preferred to perform this Bach choral work because of its natural potential for drama. With Peter Pears a superb Evangelist this account takes over the listener completely. The soloists are all splendid, though one must single out Heather Harper, and the choral response is inspirational in its moments of sheer fervour.

Britten's direction is urgent and volatile, the Wandsworth School Boys' Choir sings out full-throatedly and the English Chamber Orchestra underpins the whole performance with gloriously rich string textures. Then there is the analogue recording itself which offers a demonstration of ambient fullness, vividness of detail and natural balance. In fact, one gets the impression that a live performance at The Maltings, Snape has been transported to the area just beyond one's speakers!

St John Passion, BWV245 Ⓟ
James Gilchrist ten Evangelist John Bernays bass Christus Eamonn Dougan bass Pilatus
Joe Littlewood sop James Bowman counterten
Matthew Beale ten Colin Baldy bass
New College Choir, Oxford;
Collegium Novum / Edward Higginbottom
Naxos ② 8 557296/7 (110 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Text and translation included. Recorded c2002

When you hear the ominous first chorus of Bach's St John Passion sung and played like this, liturgical ritual and visceral human drama make for an unusually intense experience. The bass line pulsates, the boys articulate the words with supreme clarity and the steady speed provides the movement with just the right length – a consideration too often neglected.

Recorded in New College, Oxford, the resident choristers, choral scholars and lay clerks appear to be entirely at ease with the special juxtaposition of quicksilver action and warm reflection which Bach demands in his choruses and chorales. Edward Higginbottom delivers a palpable sense of narrative, unfussy, as if habit lies at the root of its being. Just listen to the searing choral chromaticisms as Christ is brought before Caiaphas, the startlingly urgent declamations as the crowd bays for blood or the distraught tenderness of James Bowman in 'Es ist vollbracht'.

The Evangelist is the established tenor James Gilchrist, whose alert and straightforward singing makes his performance utterly believable. Of the current generation of choristers, Joe Littlewood reminds us that English choirboys can sing German music beautifully and convey the emotional essence of the text with maturity and purpose. His 'Ich folge' is a delight.

There is the odd strain in Matthew Beale's testing tenor arias but a pleasing timbre, as indeed there is in John Bernays' proud but unblustering Christus. If there is a general tendency, it is to allow the music to speak in its own time within a relaxed beat. The rest is instinct, experience and letting what will be, be. In such light comes this refreshing and captivating new interpretation.

St John Passion, BWV245 Ⓟ
Ruth Holton sop Bogna Bartosz contr Markus Brutscher ten Thomas Laske bar Tom Sol bass
Cologne Chamber Choir; Collegium Cartusianum / Peter Neumann
Dabringhaus und Grimm ② MDG332 0983-2 Ⓕ
(114 minutes: DDD) Text and translations included.
Recorded 1999 ●

Bach never entirely settled on a single view of the St John and there are at least four known versions, from Good Friday 1724 (Bach's first Easter in Leipzig) to a performance the year before he died. Peter Neumann expounds here on the virtues of the second, dating from a year after the first. The differences are neither extensive nor merely cosmetic; such is Bach's skilful pacing of the narrative that the original conception can shift markedly with an ever-so-slight nudge. The most immediate difference is the replacement of the austere, imagery-laden opening chorus, 'Herr, unser Herrscher', with the chorale fantasy 'O Mensch, bewein', later employed to conclude Part 1 of the St Matthew.

To the unsuspecting, this is the St John Passion that can have you thinking you're playing the beginning of the second disc of the St Matthew; this and two further movements demonstrate Bach's obsession – as with the cantatas of the period – with employing chorales as integral raw material. Yet perhaps more striking still is the interpolation of new arias, possibly derived from an earlier Passion setting conceived in Weimar. These arias, 'Himmel reisse' and 'Zerschmettert mich', are far more animated and graphic than anything in the earlier version. More remarkable still is 'Zerschmettert', performed with dazzling immediacy by Evangelist and tenor soloist Markus Brutscher. This is a superb piece of theatrical posturing of the sort that Handel and Telemann would have filched for their opera, had they only known. The one casualty in this version is 'Erwage', a perennial favourite.

Given that the majority of the work remains common to all, this account should not be judged merely on its special properties. Neumann conveys strong musical ideas throughout: the choruses are wonderfully attentive to contrapuntal detail, and mesmerisingly varied in articulation. One forgets how beautifully crafted and selected the chorale tunes are in this work, and Neumann allows the music to breathe so that they represent a kind of caesura in the otherwise intense narrative.

Brutscher is an utterly reliable, if somewhat monochrome Evangelist. His technical ease and superb intonation are noteworthy, but often he chooses to remain studiously uninvolved. Ruth Holton is made for the bright-eyed discipleship of 'Ich folge', but there's more to her Bach than youthful piping, as we can hear in her sensitive account of 'Zerfliesse, mein Herze'. The soloists individually are not, however, what marks out this recording; rather it's Neumann's corporate, controlled and intimate concept. He moves skilfully between incandescence and emotionally charged intensity. This is, then, a persuasive testament to Bach's most radically different version of the St John.

St Luke Passion, BWV246 (attrib)

Mona Spägele sop Christiane Iven contr 🅿
Rufus Müller, Harry van Berne tens Stephan Schreckenberger, Marcus Sandmann basses
Alsfeld Vocal Ensemble; Bremen Baroque Orchestra / Wolfgang Helbich
CPO ② CPO999 293-2 (106 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1996 ●

Those who love Bach will want to investigate the St Luke Passion. In terms of scale, rhetorical intensity, structural and stylistic sophistication, musical invention and artistic ambition generally, this work finds no common ground with Bach's two extant passions. That said, Bach judged that a simple juxtaposition of chorus-(chorale)-recitative-chorus, with the occasional aria, could hold its own in the traditional deliberations of Leipzig's Holy Week. The modern listener will find much that is intimate and touching about this Passion setting. The meditative element comes less from contemplative arias than from a continuous and freshly fashioned narrative, although the arias, with their favoured wind obbligato parts, are often skilled and affecting.

Wolfgang Helbich and his Bremen forces pitch the dramatic climate just about right throughout. Smoothly articulated, unmannered and technically accomplished, the chorales and turba scenes are especially well judged.

The Evangelist, Rufus Müller, conveys the Gospel with soft-grained clarity and understated dignity and the other soloists do more than justice to the six arias. Indeed, for all the many qualities of the performance, especially the affectionate contribution of the Alsfeld Vocal Ensemble, this enterprising recording ever sharpens the distinction of Bach and his relatively functional role as Kantor with the parallel workings of his compositional mind. Whether this is Wolfgang Helbich's tacit intention, Bach's genius glows ever brighter.

St Mark Passion, BWV247

(reconstr Koopman)
Sibylla Rubens sop Bernhard Landauer counterten
Christoph Prégardien, Paul Agnew tens
Peter Kooy, Klaus Mertens basses Breda Sacraments Choir; Amsterdam Baroque Choir and Orchestra / Ton Koopman
Erato ② 8573-80221-2 (118 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●

Not a note of Bach's St Mark Passion exists, but we know it existed once and that it was a parody work. Koopman makes no bones about the purely speculative nature of this project. He pretends he's a Bach student: 'Here is a libretto; set it to music using anything you find in the works I have written up to now (1731). What you do not find, compose yourself.' And how he revels in the opportunity to draw on his vast knowledge of Bach's choral music as he matches cantata choruses and quasi-turbae to Picander's extant text of Bach's lost Passion. This has been done before, most recently by Andor Gomme and Simon Heighes but using, as the accepted basis of the contemplative texts, the contemporaneous Trauer Ode (BWV196) as well as recitatives and choruses from Keiser's St Mark Passion. Koopman feels this is not a satisfying parody, and similarly refuses to raid equivalent music from the St John Passion (although he uses 'Zerschmettert mich' from the second version of 1725).

In fact, the St Mark, as Bach would have recognised, was a different type of proposition to the St John or St Matthew Passions and he would have made no attempt to model it on his two previous settings; the libretto here draws more on the austerity of the narrative than the luxuriance of the commentary. Hence, there are fewer arias, fewer moments of poetic reflection and a more concentrated gospel narrative.

Koopman's deft sense of the appropriate idiom is reflected in his choice of the opening chorus, taken from BWV25, luminously sung with its well-disguised Passion chorale intensifying the harmonic direction. The arias witness seasoned Bachians in full flow. Paul Agnew conveys 'Falsche Welt' as a graphic declamation, confirming a brilliantly effective transformation taken from BWV179, 'Hypocrites who thus ignore' becoming 'treacherous world, thy flattering kisses are but poison'. This has a more Passion-like bearing than the music from BWV54 used in Gomme and Heighes's reworking.

As for the recitatives, there is a tendency for formulas to lead to an imbalance of concentration on a particular pivotal chord; they therefore just miss being idiomatic. As for the delivery, Christoph Prégardien reveals his best ringing expressivity. The cast is a strong one and the chorus and orchestra uniformly fine.

Apart from being the most satisfying account to date, it is a performance which best serves the mystery of the Passion, differently told, as a wonderful narrative for musico-poetic dramatic contours. The only gripe is that Koopman does not list the cantata sources in the booklet.

St Matthew Passion, BWV244

Anthony Rolfe Johnson ten Evangelist; Andreas Schmidt bar Jesus; Barbara Bonney, Ann Monoyios sops Anne Sofie von Otter mez Michael Chance counterten Howard Crook ten Olaf Bär bar Cornelius Hauptmann bass London Oratory Junior Choir; Monteverdi Choir; English Baroque Soloists / Sir John Eliot Gardiner Ⓟ
Archiv Produktion ③ 427 648-2AH3 Ⓕ
(167 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included.
Recorded 1989 ●●●

What makes Gardiner's St Matthew Passion stand out in the face of stiff competition is, more than anything, his vivid sense of theatre. Bach's score is, after all, a sacred drama and Gardiner interprets this aspect of the work with lively and colourful conviction. That in itself is not sufficient to ensure a fine performance, but here we have a first-rate group of solo voices, immediately responsive choral groups and refined obbligato and orchestral playing. Anthony Rolfe Johnson declaims the Evangelist's role with clarity, authority and the subtle inflexion of an accomplished story-teller. Ann Monoyios, Howard Crook and Olaf Bär also make strong contributions but it is Michael Chance's 'Erbarme dich', tenderly accompanied by the violin obbligato, which sets the seal of distinction on the performance. Singing and playing of this calibre deserve to win many friends and Gardiner's deeply felt account of Bach's great Passion does the music considerable justice. Clear recorded sound.

St Matthew Passion, BWV244 Ⓟ
Christoph Prégardien ten Evangelist; Matthias Goerne bar Christus; Christine Schäfer, Dorothea Röschmann sops Bernarda Fink, Elisabeth von Magnus contrs Michael Schade, Markus Schäfer tens Dietrich Henschel, Oliver Widmer basses Vienna Boys' Choir; Arnold Schoenberg Choir; Concentus Musicus Wien / Nikolaus Harnoncourt
Teldec ③ 8573 81036-2 (163 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Includes enhanced CD with full autograph score.
Recorded 2000 ●●●

Harnoncourt has waited over 30 years to return to the 'Great Passion', which, but for his live Concertgebouw recording (Teldec – nla), he last recorded in 1970 when he had completed only a handful of cantatas in Teldec's defining series. Harnoncourt's re-visitation presents a unique statement, one which cannot fail to make an impression. Recorded in the sumptuous acoustic of the Jesuitenkirche in Vienna, one can detect the flavour of southern European oratorio, ebulliently theatrical, immediate and free-breathing, and without the austerity of North German rhetoric. What is recognisably perceived as 'spiritual' in the carefully coiffured renderings of Suzuki (BIS) and Herreweghe (Harmonia Mundi) has no place here. Harnoncourt's religiosity is not imposed but stands rather in a lifetime of musical distillation. This is instantly obvious in the opening chorus, where bridal imagery (in the music's secular, balletic lift) is juxtaposed with the physical imagery of what is at stake (in the broad, enduring bow strokes). While Suzuki's visceral chorale is more spine-tingling, the refinement here of 'Sehet, Wohin?' amidst inexorable, paradoxically unquestioning direction, is masterful.

Pacing Part 1 is no easy task, and many a tank has been emptied before reaching what the great Bach scholar Friederich Smend called 'the central message of the work' (encompasssing Nos 46-49). Harnoncourt neither dallies unduly with the chorales nor charges through them; they skilfully counterbalance the remarkably incandescent narrative of Prégardien's Evangelist. The tenor shows a supreme attention to detail (even if his singing is sometimes effortful), and his dialogue with Matthias Goerne's vital Christus is especially compelling. Harnoncourt gives 'Blute nur' a touch of characteristic melodrama, but none can doubt how Dorothea Röschmann and the orchestra, between them, project its expressive core.

The well-drilled, medium-sised Arnold Schoenberg Choir's strikingly cultivated crowd scenes make a strong contrast with the relatively brazen chorus in Harnoncourt's 1970 version. Unlike the specialists of the pioneering years, Harnoncourt hand-picks his soloists from the widest possible pool. Apart from the excellent Röschmann, Christine Schäfer impresses here far more than in her rather harried solo Bach disc (DG). More relaxed and controlled, she sings with acute coloration and stillness in 'Aus Liebe'. With Bernarda Fink's beguiling 'Erbarme dich' and Michael Schade's resplendent 'Geduld', only Oliver Widmer (who sings 'Gebt mir') gives less than unalloyed pleasure. The pick of the crop is Dietrich Henschel, who sings with great warmth and penetration with a 'Mache dich' to stand alongside (if not to rival) Fischer-Dieskau for Karl Richter. But with even these wonderful contributions, it still takes clarity of vision to graphically propel the drama yet also ponder it reverentially. Again, Harnoncourt leaves his mark with his unerring compassion at most of the critical points.

Finally, one should mention Concentus Musicus, grainy and luminous in ensemble, the obbligato wind a far cry from the softer-edged and rounded tonal world of almost all other 'period' groups. In short, this is the most culturally alert reading in years and a truly original and illuminating experience.

St Matthew Passion, BWV244 Ⓟ
Mark Padmore ten Evangelist; Peter Harvey bass Christus; Julia Gooding, Deborah York sops Magdalena Kožená, Susan Bickley mezs James Gilchrist ten Stephan Loges bass Gabrieli Players / Paul McCreesh
Archiv Produktion ② 474 200-2AH2 Ⓕ
(161 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included
Recorded c2002 ●●

In the distinguished performance history of the Great Passion, this is a dynamic and powerful reading. What we are have here, primarily, is a compelling directorial vision, a dramatically cohesive whole. The only 'controversial' aspect is the use of single voices in the chorus, thereby applying the research presented in the last two decades by Joshua Rifkin and Andrew Parrott. However, as it happens, Paul McCreesh sees this option as a flexible way of enhancing the rich expressive possibilities of the St Matthew, a means to a somewhat greater end, thankfully, than joining the band of zealots who seek world domination in Bach vocal performance. And there can be no denying that McCreesh uses the single voices to great and encouraging effect. The warm intimacy of expression in the chorales is often spell-binding, the lucid realism of the madrigalian commentaries touchingly palpable and the crowd scenes almost crazed, as if one were within the mob. McCreesh's pragmatism also ensures that his quality singers produce a rich tonal body rather than a pushed, squawking consort.

There is some outstandingly characterised singing to be heard here, and a few missed opportunities too. Deborah York sounds somewhat al dente in her soprano arias, a limited emotional range partly accentuated by the colour and subtlety of expression of Magdalena Kožená's 'Buss und Reu' as well as the enraptured and troubled 'Ach, nun ist mein Jesus hin!'. Mark Padmore's Evangelist is highly charged and responsive: at times he hovers, regaling the facts of the matter with disarming poise; at others he becomes agitated, even manic. He seems somehow implicated in Peter's denial in a tableau performed with quite remarkable dramatic power, setting up Kožená's 'Erbarme dich'. Hers is one of the most painfully beautiful performances in years, even if the violin obbligato bulges rather too much.

Of the two basses, the Christus of Peter Harvey conveys neither gilded halo or testosterone-fired ruddiness but he remains an effective and constant companion. Stephan Loges is rhetorically imploring in timbre, unafraid to take risks and a singer one listens to attentively.

There is yet to be a clear leader in St Matthew Passion recordings, even if that were desirable. The quality of the production here is mainly first-rate although there are the usual dips and troughs one expects from such a challenging undertaking. 'Können Tränen' is a scrappy and flat affair with a strangely below-par Susan Bickley, and the strings are not always universally impressive. Overall, if not as culturally resonant as Harnoncourt's remarkably mature and poetic reading, McCreesh's interpretation has an unremitting singularity of purpose, as aesthetically Protestant as Harnoncourt's is Catholic. A memorable and vitally conceived account.

Additional recommendation
St Matthew Passion, BWV244
Orchestra of the Eighteenth Century / Brüggen 🄿
Philips ③ 454 434-2PH3 (160 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

This is a St Matthew Passion which should please many. Brüggen's live interpretation is eloquent, thoughtful in style and content, and has a textural clarity which few competitors can rival.

Christmas Oratorio, BWV248

Monika Frimmer sop Yoshikazu Mera counterten 🄿
Gerd Türk ten Peter Kooy bass Bach Collegium Japan / Masaaki Suzuki
BIS ② CD941/2 (145 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1998 ●●

The six cantatas that make up Bach's Christmas Oratorio are part of a unified work celebrating not just Christmas itself but also the New Year and Epiphany. Masaaki Suzuki faces plentiful if not invariably stiff competition in this work. In fact, it outstrips most of its rivals, in respect both of vocal and instrumental considerations. A notable quality in Masaaki Suzuki's direction is his feeling for naturally expressive contours, allowing the music to breathe freely. Best of all, perhaps, is his refusal to pay even lip service to Bach's supposed predilection for fast tempos. Everything here seems to be exceptionally well judged, which is not to say that the pace of individual movements is necessarily slower than those in competing versions but that it is more interrelated with a concept of each section as a whole, and more textually conscious than some.

The soloists are generally very good indeed. Yoshikazu Mera makes a distinctive contribution and Gerd Türk is a communicative singer whose light articulation suits his partly narrative role. Peter Kooy never puts a foot wrong, while Monika Frimmer makes a favourable impression in her duet with Kooy, 'Herr, dein Mitleid, dein Erbarmen'. A small, well-balanced choir of technical agility and an accomplished quorum of instrumentalists set the seal on an outstanding achievement. The finest all-round performance of the Christmas Oratorio on disc.

Christmas Oratorio, BWV248
Sibylla Rubens sop Ingeborg Danz contr
James Taylor, Marcus Ullmann tens Hanno Müller-Brachmann bass Gächinger Kantorei; Stuttgart Bach Collegium / Helmuth Rilling
Hänssler Classic ③ 92 076 (144 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1999 ●

Energetic director Helmut Rilling is more fired up than ever here. The choruses crackle with thrilling fervour and a blistering attack and shine to notes which, alongside a forthright Gächinger Kantorei, carry the day persuasively on modern instruments. There will always be those for whom Rilling represents an inflexibility of phrasing and unyielding articulation in Bach, paradoxically more reminiscent of the least alluring elements of period performance than the 'ebb and flow' of mainstream consciousness. This recording doubtless reinforces the odd prejudice, though the habitually hard-edged orchestral textures of the Bach Collegium

Stuttgart seem more mollifying and warm-hearted in movements such as the pastoral Sinfonia at the beginning of Part 2 and the divinely inspired 'Schlafe, mein Liebster' later in the same cantata (it must be said now, flawed by a tiresomely repeated pull-up before the second phrase).

James Taylor is a natural Evangelist: articulate, discriminating, exacting if not emotionally candid. He also retains focus throughout the respective events of each tableau and gives clearly etched readings. Yet much of the credit must also go to the outstanding solo singing. Sibylla Rubens and Hanno Müller-Brachmann are stunning in the pivotal duet of Part 3, 'Herr, dein Mitleid', and Ingeborg Danz sings with exquisite and gentle poise in the scene-setting 'Bereite dich, Zion'. If her 'Schlafe' is a touch disappointing, then that reflects the weight of expectation which surrounds this central aria. If you prefer a mezzo to a countertenor, then only Anne Sofie von Otter for Gardiner or Christa Ludwig for Richter can better her largely satisfying contribution. Müller-Brachmann is a fine bass soloist in 'Grosser Herr' and as movingly intimate as Michael George for Philip Pickett in the recitative with chorale, 'Immanuel, O süsses Wort'. Rubens is on really terrific form throughout and her 'Nur in Wink' in Part 6 is a model of outstanding Bach singing.

There is a spiritual containment which serves its purpose here – there's absolutely no sentimental guff – and yet it perhaps trespasses into the clinical too readily. Rilling, as ever, raises one's hopes and only intermittently fulfils them, but this is still a distinguished reading.

Easter Oratorio, BWV249

Easter Oratorio. Cantata No 11 🅿
Monika Frimmer sop Ralf Popken counterten Christoph Prégardien ten David Wilson-Johnson bar Choir and Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment / Gustav Leonhardt
Philips 442 119-2PH (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1993

Of the two Bach oratorios on this generously filled disc, it is the Easter Oratorio which is the least performed today. It is a work of customary Bachian brilliance in the quality of individual movements, even if the whole is not entirely satisfying. It does, however, carry a unique flavour and one with which Leonhardt clearly feels a close affinity. This is evident in the way he handles the exuberant Sinfonia with knowing and stately bravura, also providing copious insights into the phrasing of the wonderful wind dialogues – all played with fastidious clarity and élan by the OAE. Whilst this movement sparkles, Leonhardt (or rather the oboist, Anthony Robson) gives more flesh to the subsequent Adagio; this is splendidly vocalised playing. Both here and in the Ascension Oratorio the chorus is fairly streamlined and although the quality of singing goes without saying, greater breadth to Bach's choruses in the second work would have been preferable. The soloists on the latter are variable. Only Ralf Popken in 'Saget, saget mir' is ideal. Despite some misgivings, Leonhardt's perceptive performances will always win friends and his recording of the Easter Oratorio still appeals more than its competitors. As for the Ascension Oratorio, although not a front-runner, this recording certainly has its revelatory moments.

Wilhelm Friedemann Bach

German 1710-1784

GROVE Wilhelm Friedemann, the eldest son of JS Bach, studied under his father at the Leipzig Thomasschule; his father put together a 'Clavier-Büchlein' for him and may have written book 1 of the '48' with him in mind. Friedemann also studied the violin with JG Graun. After university study, he became organist at the Dresden Sophienkirche in 1733; he moved to the Liebfrauenkirche, Halle, in 1746 but his years there were turbulent and he left in 1764. He later lived in Brunswick and then in Berlin, but with his difficult temperament and perhaps dissolute character found no regular employment though his organ playing was admired.

The volatility of his musical style is of a piece with his life. In his early years he wrote mainly for keyboard; at Dresden, for instruments; at Halle, church cantatas and some instrumental music; and in his late years, chiefly chamber and keyboard works. He vacillated in style between old and new, with galant elements alongside conservative Baroque ones, intense north German expressiveness alongside more formal writing. His keyboard music includes fugues and deeply felt polonaises. His gifts are unmistakable here and in such works as the Concerto for two solo harpsichords or the often suite-like Sinfonia in F, but the final impression is of a composer whose potential was never fully realised.

Cantatas

Cantatas – Lasset uns ablegen die Werke der Finsternis, F80. Es ist eine Stimme eines Predigers in der Wüste, F89 🅿
Barbara Schlick sop Claudia Schubert contr Wilfried Jochens ten Stephan Schreckenberger bass Rheinische Kantorei; Das Kleine Konzert / Hermann Max
Capriccio 10 425 (54 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1991 ●

This disc makes a valuable contribution towards a fuller understanding of this highly gifted but complex member of the Bach clan. In the mid-1740s Wilhelm Friedemann was appointed Director of Music and organist at the Marienkirche at Halle. He remained in the post for almost 20 years, a period which witnessed the composition and performance of all the cantatas represented here. Among the many delights to be found in this music are those occasioned by Friedemann's disparate, even opposing terms of reference. In other words the stylistic vocabulary is both rich and varied, often harking back to a strong paternal influence – what better one has there ever been? JS Bach's idiom, for instance, is startlingly apparent in the opening chorus of the Advent cantata, F80 ('Let us cast off the works of darkness'). Both the arias of this fine cantata are of high quality, the first, for soprano with obbligato flute ably demonstrating how carefully Friedemann thought out his declamation.

For the most part the performances are excellent. The four soloists are first-rate, Barbara Schlick and Wilfried Jochens in particular; and the singing of the Rheinische Kantorei is effective, though just occasionally its component 16 voices sound under threat from Bach's sometimes exacting requirements.

Imaginative programming and sympathetic performances add to this musical revelation.

Simon Bainbridge

English 1952

GROVE Bainbridge studied at the Royal College of Music, London, and Tanglewood; American music, in particular Ives and Reich, has been a formative influence. There is a spatial element in some of his music, which is largely instrumental. Among his most characteristic pieces are the Viola Concerto (1976), Concertante in moto perpetuo (1983) and Fantasia for two orchestras (1984).

Ad ora incerta

Ad ora incerta (Four orchestral songs from Primo Levi)^{a}. Four Primo Levi Settings^{b}
Susan Bickley mez ^{a}Kim Walker bn
^{b}Nash Ensemble; ^{a}BBC Symphony Orchestra / Martyn Brabbins
NMC NMCD059 (54 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997-98 Ⓕ ●●

At the beginning of the fourth Primo Levi setting in Ad ora incerta (a depiction of the ghastly chemical factory attached to Auschwitz that Levi miraculously survived) there is a slow orchestral crescendo, like the panning of a camera to reveal the full horror of the scene. What follows is not a shout of protest but sober lyricism, and when that crescendo returns it introduces an eloquently poignant melody. Simon Bainbridge is an uncommonly fine musical dramatist. He lets the words speak, and distils his music so as to clarify them. In Ad ora incerta the vocalist has a companion, a solo bassoon. Because that fourth poem repeatedly speaks of a dead companion, of course, but also in the way the bassoon shadows or reflects the voice, there is also a subtle and moving suggestion that after Auschwitz Levi lacked and longed for a companion, a fellow survivor who would understand his memories in ways that none of us can. One can scarcely believe that these beautiful but painful poems could be set to music; certainly not with the delicate and imaginative sympathy that Bainbridge shows here.

The four chamber settings are still sparer but no less gravely beautiful. In the seven brief lines of the first of them Levi distils the impossibility of communicating his experiences yet the imperative need to try. Bainbridge's setting conveys that, but adds the most restrained and loving pity. It is a remarkable and a deeply moving achievement. Both performances are fine, that of the chamber settings beyond praise in its quiet intimacy.

Sir Granville Bantock

British 1868-1946

GROVE Bantock studied with Corder at the Royal Academy of Music (1889-93), then worked as a conductor and teacher (professor at Birmingham, 1908-34). He did much to promote the music of his English contemporaries and produced a large output of orchestral and large-scale choral works, influenced by early Wagner, a taste for the exotic, and Hebridean folksong. Though much performed at the beginning of the century, when he was at his most productive and a prominent figure in the English musical renaissance, his music has all but disappeared from the repertory; the oratorio Omar Khayyám (1906-09), the overture The Pierrot of the Minute (1908), the Hebridean Symphony (1915) and the Pagan Symphony (1928) have been admired for their undemanding lyricism.

Pagan Symphony

Pagan Symphony. Fifine at the Fair. Two Heroic Ballads
Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Vernon Handley
Hyperion CDA66630 (80 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992 ●

This collection confirms Bantock as a composer of real achievement whose music has been undeservedly neglected. He was a superb technician, and his impressively large-scale structures have a real urgency. Or perhaps we should say a real enjoyment. Despite the potentially tragic undertones of Fifine at the Fair, both works are almost untroubled, filled instead with the geniality of a craftsman joyfully exercising a craft of which he has become master. The cleverness of Bantock's thematic transformations can make you smile with pleasure once you've worked out what he's doing – and then smile again at the realization that the result of the transformation isn't an arid piece of technique for technique's sake, but another jolly good tune. And it is all very beautifully scored. Bantock was a master of the orchestra. Is there anything lacking? Is he just a bit too clever, for ever finding yet another ingenious and delightful thing that can be done with a scale-figure?

Possibly, but then he is never dull. Is real emotional depth lacking, despite hints of it whenever the wronged wife appears in Fifine? Maybe; possibly he was more given to enjoying than to pondering. Horses for courses, Bantock for enjoyment. The performances are stunning, the recordings most sumptuous. Oh, and the two Heroic Ballads, for all that they're concerned with Cuchullan and his ilk, have not a shred of Irish Sea mist hanging around them: they are bold, colourful and stirring.

Further listening

Hebridean Symphony
Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Handley
Hyperion CDA66450 (73 minutes: DDD: 5/91) Ⓕ

A rich, romantic score from 1915 with echoes of Janáček and some particularly fine brass writing.

Alfvén Symphony No 4
Coupling: A tale from the archipelago
Stockholm Philharmonic Orchestra / N Järvi
BIS CD505 (74 minutes: DDD: 8/92) Ⓕ

Alfvén's Symphony No 4 uses a huge orchestra and employs an overtly Romantic language – complete with two soloists. The nearest analogy is Strauss's Alpine Symphony, but the mood and reach would appeal to anyone drawn to Bantock's symphonic language.

Cello Sonatas

Cello Sonatas[a] – No 1 in B minor; No 2 in F sharp minor. Solo Cello Sonata in G minor. Hamabdil[b]. Pibroch[b]. Elegiac Poem[a]
Andrew Fuller vc with [a]Michael Dussek pf
[a]Lucy Wakeford hp
Dutton Laboratories Epoch CDLX7107 Ⓜ
(75 minutes: DDD). Recorded 2000

There are some rewarding discoveries to be had here, not least the two sonatas for cello and piano. Both were penned during the first half of the 1940s (towards the end of Bantock's life), though the sketches for the B minor Sonata originally date back to 1900. The latter is a finely sculpted, generously lyrical creation, boasting a particularly lovely slow movement. For the scherzo Bantock pressed into service his earlier Fantastic Poem of 1925, and the whole work ends in a mood of autumnal nostalgia.

The initial impulse behind the unaccompanied G minor Sonata apparently stemmed from Kodály's magnificent example in the genre (of which Bantock had heard Beatrice Harrison give the British première in 1924). Cast in four compact movements, it's an uncommonly well-knit essay and a demanding workout for any aspiring virtuoso (as the giddy moto perpetuo of the finale attests). We also get two offerings for cello and harp: particularly striking is Pibroch, a wonderfully affecting 'Highland lament'.

Andrew Fuller is an accomplished artist, mellow of tone and technically secure, and he enjoys sympathetic support from Michael Dussek. Lucy Wakeford, too, contributes most beautifully. With eminently truthful sound and balance throughout, this enterprising collection deserves a warm welcome.

Violin Sonatas

Violin Sonatas – No 1 in G; No 2 in D. Coronach (Pro Patria Mori). Salve Regina, 'Hail Queen of Heaven'
Lorraine McAslan vn Michael Dussek pf
Dutton Epoch CDLX7119 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded c2002

Dedicated to that great British violinist Albert Sammons, the first of Bantock's three violin sonatas was penned in 1928-29 and actually appeared in print a year before its first performance (part of a BBC broadcast from June 2, 1930, with Sammons accompanied by the composer). It's a work of strong appeal, whose clean-cut, songful demeanour would seem tailor-made for its legendary dedicatee's wonderfully sweet timbre; but somewhat surprisingly, given its lyricism and thematic resourcefulness, it failed to secure a place in the repertoire.

The opening movement of its D major successor followed quickly in April 1929, but it was another three years before the two remaining movements were completed. It was finally premièred on the BBC on July 7, 1940, but sank into total oblivion thereafter – a great pity in view of its bright-eyed vigour, deftness of touch and impeccable craftsmanship.

Two shorter pieces bring up the rear: originally conceived for strings, organ and harp, Coronach (1918) is a wistful elegy in memory of a friend who had perished in the trenches three years previously; the contemplative Salve Regina is based on a plainsong melody Bantock had heard in Canada during the summer of 1923.

Inquisitive readers need not hold back, for these interpretations from Lorraine McAslan and Michael Dussek are consistently compelling and sure-footed.

Vocal works

Atalanta in Calydon. Vanity of vanities
BBC Singers / Simon Joly
Albany TROY180 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1995

In 1911 Bantock embarked on the first of his two unaccompanied 'choral symphonies', a half-hour setting of texts from Swinburne's 1865 verse drama, Atalanta in Calydon. Written for the amateur Hallé Choir, it is an extraordinarily ambitious offering. Bantock's luxuriant 20-part writing (the composer envisaged 'not less than 10 voices to each part') exhibits a prodigious technical facility allied to a remarkable fluency and poetic sensibility. By comparison, the 35-minute Vanity of vanities (based on Bantock's own selection of verses from the Book of Ecclesiastes) is a model of restraint, being laid out for a mere 12 parts. It was completed in September 1913. Again, the sounds created exhibit a ravishing variety of texture, colour and harmony, further testament to Bantock's fantastically vivid aural imagination. Both works impose great technical demands which are easily surmounted in these incisive, dedicated performances, admirably captured by the recording team.

Samuel Barber American 1910-1981

Barber studied as a baritone and composer GROVE (with Scalero) at the Curtis Institute (1924-32) and while there began to win acclaim with such works as Dover Beach (1931), written for himself to sing with string quartet. His opulent yet unforced Romanticism struck a chord and during the 1930s he was much in demand: his overture The School for Scandal (1933), First Symphony (1936), First Essay (1937) and Adagio (originally the second movement of his String Quartet, 1936) were widely performed, the lyrical, elegiac Adagio remaining a popular classic. In the 1940s he began to include more 'modern' features of harmony and scoring. Of his operas, Vanessa (1958), praised as 'highly charged with emotional meaning', was more successful than Antony and Cleopatra (1966, for the opening of the new Met).

Violin Concerto, Op 14

Awards 1998

Barber Violin Concerto Bloch Baal Shem
Walton Violin Concerto in B minor
Joshua Bell vn Baltimore Symphony Orchestra / David Zinman
Decca 452 851-2DH
(68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●●●

Bell's coupling of the Barber Violin Concerto with Walton and Bloch brings together three highly romantic concertante works. In the Barber, Bell is placed less forward than in the rich-sounding recordings of Gil Shaham and Itzhak Perlman, but if anything the results are even more intense. In the central slow movement the opening oboe solo leads to a magically hushed first entry for the violin, and the balance of the soloist also allows a quicksilver lightness for the rushing triplets in the moto perpetuo finale. Shaham may find more humour in that brief movement, but Bell's view is equally valid.

From an American perspective, Walton can well be seen as Barber's British counterpart. The playing of this American orchestra is warmly idiomatic, defying the idea that non-British orchestras find Walton difficult. Bell gives a commanding account – his expansive treatment of the central cadenza of the first movement, making it more deeply reflective – is most appealing. Not just there but in many gentle moments the rapt intensity of his playing is magnetic. Bell's is among the finest versions ever, with Bloch's own 1939 orchestration of Baal Shem offering a fine, unusual makeweight.

Barber Violin Concerto, Op 14
E Meyer Violin Concerto
Hilary Hahn vn Saint Paul Chamber Orchestra / Hugh Wolff
Sony Classical SK89029 (50 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●●

The 19-year-old Hilary Hahn once again shows her natural feeling for the American brand of late Romanticism, bringing out heartfelt emotion without overplaying it. There have been a number of outstanding versions of the Barber Concerto in recent years and Hahn's is among the finest ever. She stands between the urgently, fullbloodedly romantic Shaham and the more meditative Bell. It is partly a question of recording balances. The latter has the advantage of a recording which, setting him a little further back, allows pianissimos to be registered in a genuine hush. Hahn, like Shaham, is placed well forward, and it is hardly her fault that dynamic contrasts are reduced. The use of a chamber orchestra also affects the balance. The extra weight in the orchestral sound on the DG and Decca discs is here compensated by the incisiveness of the St Paul Chamber Orchestra under Hugh Wolff, with textures a fraction clearer in detail. Even so, in the long introduction to the Andante a smaller body of strings, however refined, cannot quite match in ear-catching beauty the bigger string sections of the LSO and Baltimore Symphony. What Hahn and Wolff nicely achieve between them, though, is a distinction between the first two movements, both of them predominantly lyrical. Deceptively, the first is marked Allegro (hardly sounding it), but here one registers it as a taut first movement leading to a powerful climax. Speeds in both the first two movements are a fraction broader than with either rival, but Hahn reserves her big coup for the Presto finale which is noticeably faster than either rival's, offering quicksilver brilliance and pinpoint articulation.

Meyer's Concerto makes an apt coupling. Unashamedly tonal and freely lyrical, it opens with a yearning folk-like melody that echoes Vaughan Williams, and there is also a folk-like, pentatonic cut to some of the writing in both of the two substantial movements. It is amazing what variety Meyer achieves (a string player himself), considering that conscious limitation of having a sustained drone underlying his argument. Hahn plays with passionate commitment, amply justifying her choice of so approachable a new piece for this important issue.

Barber Violin Concerto
Korngold Violin Concerto, Op 35. Much ado about nothing, Op 11 – The maiden in the bridal chamber; Dogberry and Verges; Intermezzo; Hornpipe
Gil Shaham vn London Symphony Orchestra / André Previn pf
DG 439 886-2GH (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●

This performance of the Barber, warm and rich with the sound close and immediate, brings out above all the work's bolder side, allowing moments that are not too distant from the world of Hollywood music (no disparagement there) and aptly the Korngold emerges as a central work in that genre. There have been subtler readings of Barber's lovely concerto, with the soloist not always helped by the close balance, but it is good to have a sharp distinction drawn between the purposeful lyricism of the first movement, marked Allegro, and the tender lyricism of the heavenly Andante. In the finale Shaham brings out the fun behind the movement's manic energy, with Previn pointing the Waltonian wit.

In the Korngold, Gil Shaham may not have quite the flair and panache of the dedicatee, Jascha Heifetz, in his incomparable reading (reviewed under Korngold), but he is warm and committed. What emerges again and again here is how electric the playing of the LSO is under Previn, rich and full as well as committed. The recording helps, clear and immediate. The suite from Korngold's incidental music to Much ado about nothing, dating from his early precocious period in Vienna, provides a delightful and apt filler, with Previn, as pianist, just as understanding and imaginative an accompanist, and Shaham yearningly warm without sentimentality, clean and precise in attack.

Additional recommendations

Violin Concerto Couplings: Bernstein Serenade. Foss Three American Pieces
Perlman vn Boston Symphony Orchestra / Ozawa
EMI 555360-2 (67 minutes: DDD: 6/95) Ⓕ

A super disc. The extra weight of Perlman's sound brings dividends in this sumptuously Romantic concerto.

Violin Concerto[a]
Coupling: Souvenirs, Op 28. Serenade for Strings, Op 1. Music for a Scene from Shelley, Op 7
[a]Buswell vn Royal Scottish National Orchestra / Alsop
Naxos 8 559044 (64 minutes: DDD: recorded 2001) Ⓢ

A fine performance, notable for its easy spontaneity and unforced eloquence. If the virtuoso finale lacks the devil-may-care bravado of Hahn, there's ample compensation in the wealth of detail Alsop uncovers.

Cello Concerto
Couplings: Britten Symphony for Cello and Orchestra.
Ma vc Baltimore Symphony Orchestra / Zinman
CBS Masterworks MK44900
(62 minutes: DDD: 6/89) Ⓕ

Admirable performances from Yo-Yo Ma and Zinman.

Further listening

Korngold Violin Concerto
Shaham vn London Symphony Orchestra / Previn
DG 439 886-2GH (71 minutes: DDD: 9/94) Ⓕ

Higher in both cholesterol and sugar, Korngold's sole violin concerto makes a wonderful complement to Barber's lyrical work.

Adagio for Strings, Op 11

Adagio for Strings. Symphony No 1, Op 9. First Essay, Op 12. Second Essay, Op 17. Music for a Scene from Shelley, Op 7. The School for Scandal Overture, Op 5
Baltimore Symphony Orchestra / David Zinman
Argo 436 288-2ZH (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1991 ●●

Zinman begins this striking set in quiet understatement with this most challenging of all sustained legatos – the Adagio for Strings. He and his Baltimore strings are calm, collected, resigned; the grief is contained; no wringing of hands at the climax, rather an intense transfiguration. The first of Barber's bite-size symphonies is rather more demonstrative in its tragedy, working up from the deep-set bass lines of an imposing Andante sostenuto to the most public of displays. And then there is the Second Essay, Barber rhetoric at its most biblical. The engineering throughout this disc is exceptionally vivid, but nowhere more so than here: the impact of timpani and bass drum is unnervingly realistic, the brass and tam-tam-laden climax comes at you full on. Add to that a pugnacious fugue with Baltimore woodwinds devilishly incisive, and you've an absolute winner.

Zinman's account of the First Symphony is laudably coherent – whole. There is sweep and a strong sense of evolution about its development. The solo oboe and cellos are heart-breakers in the slow movement, the impassioned climax – like everything else here – magnificently inevitable.

The Music for a Scene from Shelley is an early piece, but a highly accomplished one. It is an especially beguiling example of Barber's precocious lyric gifts. A sunburst of sound brings on one of Barber's most rapturous melodies, voluptuously scored, and there is an exquisite postlude where two horns briefly ruminate on what has been heard and scented, while the nocturnal murmurings of string and harp quickly evaporate to the barely audible.

Barber Adagio for Strings
Bernstein Candide – Overture Copland Appalachian Spring – ballet W Schuman American Festival Overture
Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra / Leonard Bernstein
DG Galleria 439 528-2GGA (54 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded live in 1982 ●

This is a beautiful collection of American music, lovingly and brilliantly performed. With Barber's lovely Adagio you might fear that Bernstein would 'do a Nimrod' and present it with exaggerated expressiveness. Although the tempo is very slow indeed, the extra hesitations are not excessive and the Los Angeles strings play with angelic refinement and sweetness, as they do also in the many hushed sequences of the Copland ballet. There the live recording made in San Francisco in a dryish acoustic brings a degree of constriction at heavy tuttis, but the advantages of digital recording in this beautiful score are obvious, not least at the climax of the haunting variations on the Shaker hymn, Simple Gifts. To the three favourite works here is added William Schuman's brazenly extrovert overture with its virtuoso opening section, its quiet fugato, ominously introduced, and a brazen conclusion to match the opening. It is a splendid work, almost as joyously inspired as Bernstein's Candide Overture, with the composer here adopting a fairly relaxed speed, though with a wild coda.

Symphonies Nos 1 and 2

Symphonies – No 1, Op 9; No 2, Op 19. First Essay for Orchestra, Op 12. The School for Scandal Overture, Op 5
Royal Scottish National Orchestra / Marin Alsop
Naxos 8 559024 Ⓢ
(70 minutes: DDD) ●

Marin Alsop has won golden plaudits for her pioneering work on behalf of Christopher Rouse (RCA) and Joan Tower (Koch International). That she is a musician of outstanding gifts is amply reinforced by this all-Barber anthology. In her red-blooded rendering of the wartime Second Symphony, Alsop shows just what a powerfully inspired creation it is, extracting every ounce of sinewy logic from its fraught outer movements, while distilling plenty of wonder and atmosphere in the haunting central Andante, un poco mosso. No less convincing is Alsop's reading of the magnificent First Symphony, always acutely responsive to the music's daring expressive scope and building climaxes of riveting cumulative intensity. In its unhurried authority, big heart and epic thrust, it's the kind of interpretation one could have imagined from Bernstein in his NYPO heyday.

Elsewhere, Alsop brings an aptly bardic quality to the outer portions of the First Essay, while few could fail to respond to the twinkling affection and gentle wit she lavishes on the irresistible School for Scandal Overture. Were the orchestral contribution just a fraction more polished, this would be a world-beater. Zinman's stylish 1991 anthology with the Baltimore SO tends to throw into sharper relief the relative shortcomings of Alsop's hard-working Scots (their fiddles especially lack something in silk-spun refinement and tone when playing above the stave). Moreover, the expert engineering can't quite disguise the acoustical shortcomings of Glasgow's Henry Wood Hall, but the finished article is tonally truthful and conveys plenty of impact when required.

Piano Sonata, Op 26

Ballade, Op 46. Excursions, Op 20. Nocturne, Op 33. Piano Sonata, Op 26. Souvenirs, Op 28
Eric Parkin pf
Chandos CHAN9177 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992 ●

This is the complete published piano music, apart from Three Sketches, but there are quite a lot of unpublished pieces. None of this matters when the playing is as polished and sympathetic as Parkin's. He responds wonderfully to the nostalgic melancholia of Barber. The ballet score, Souvenirs, is available in the orchestral and piano-duet versions, but this solo piano treatment is just as engaging. Parkin knows exactly how to present this side of Barber and his treatment of the Four Excursions based on different popular idioms is equally convincing. A performer as well versed as Parkin in British post-romantics such as Ireland and Bax finds home ground again in Barber's Nocturne and the late Ballade. In Barber's classic, the Sonata, Parkin treats the work lyrically and never forces us to regard the finale, especially, as a hard-hitting block-buster in the way that so many young pianists do. He is transparent in the Scherzo, sings in the Adagio, and the final fugue subject has exactly the catchy, swinging quality that many players miss. At times there is a lack of brilliance, which the rather dull recording emphasises, but this is a winning anthology of this major American romantic.

Piano Sonata, Op 26. Excursions, Op 20. Nocturne, Op 33, 'Homage to John Field'. Three Sketches. Ballade, Op 46. Interludes – No 1, Intermezzo. Souvenirs, Op 28
Daniel Pollack pf
Naxos 8 550992 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1995

Daniel Pollack studied with (among others) Rosina Lhévinne and Wilhelm Kempf. His playing exudes confidence, especially in the more rhythmic and forthright passages. In his hands the Sonata is powerfully driven and crisply articulated, creating a palpable sense of raw energy and excitement. His full sonorities and sense of shape in the Interlude and the Ballade are also impressive, and while his tempo in the latter may seem a shade fast, it adds to the essential restlessness of the piece. In the more lyrical works, notably the Nocturne, however, Pollack's handling is too brusque, trampling roughshod over the contrast between passion and delicacy. The dance pieces of the Excursions and Souvenirs are generally more sensitive, and he effectively captures the diversity of distinctive flavours, from the slow blues (Excursions) to the Schottische (Souvenirs). Horowitz inevitably remains the benchmark in the Sonata, and his virtuosic fire is in a class of its own. Nevertheless, despite the poor recorded sound from Naxos's problematic Santa Rosa studio, this is an enjoyable disc and quite a bargain.

Knoxville: Summer of 1915, Op 24

Barber Knoxville: Summer of 1915, Op 24[a] Ⓗ
Hermit Songs, Op 29[b] Copland Old American Songs – Set 1[c]; Set 2[d] Thomson Stabat mater[e]. Capital Capitals[f]

[a]Eleanor Steber, [b]Leontyne Price sops [e]Jennie Tourel mez [f]Joseph Crawford, [f]Clyde S Turner tens [cd]William Warfield, [f]Joseph James bars [f]William C Smith bass [b]Samuel Barber [cd]Aaron Copland [f]Virgil Thomson pfs [e]New Music Quartet (Broadus Erle, Matthew Raimondi vns Walter Trampler va Claus Adam vc) [a]Dumbarton Oaks Chamber Orchestra / William Strickland
Sony Classical Masterworks Heritage mono
MHK60899 (80 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1950-54 ●●

In his affectionate memoir to accompany this CD, Ned Rorem recalls the occasion when Barber accompanied Leontyne Price in the European première of his Hermit Songs in 1954 for an audience of what Rorem calls 'serial killer' composers. They hissed 'The monk and his cat' and booed at the end. Today no one can remember any of the other music that was presented in the series, and here are Barber and Price recorded later that year. Knoxville: Summer of 1915 has been recorded by at least half-a-dozen other sopranos since Eleanor Steber's recording, but this is still essential listening. The voice is lovely but the manner somewhat more formal and actressy than later interpreters.

William Warfield's recording of Copland's Old American Songs with the nostalgic 'Long time ago', the reverent 'Simple gifts' and the nowadays politically incorrect 'I bought me a cat', was such a success that the composer came up with a second set which has become almost as well-known, with 'Zion's wall' and 'At the river'. In Warfield's account of this second set, never issued before, he has a delightful way of speaking the lyrics without hindering his firm bass-baritone line.

The sound of these recordings, despite their age, is magnificent and the performances definitive.

Additional recommendation
Knoxville: Summer of 1915
Couplings: works by Menotti, Harbison and Stravinsky
Upshaw sop Orchestra of St Luke's / Zinman
Nonesuch 7559-79187-2 (44 minutes: DDD: 9/89R) Ⓕ

Dawn Upshaw captures the childish innocence of Barber's gorgeous scena in a programme of comparable vocal treats.

Agnus Dei, Op 11

Barber Twelfth Night, Op 42 No 1. To be sung on the water, Op 42 No 2. Reincarnations, Op 16. Agnus Dei, Op 11. Heaven-Haven. Sure on this shining night. The monk and his cat. The Virgin Martyrs, Op 8 No 1. Let down the bars, O Death, Op 8 No 2. God's Grandeur Schuman Perceptions. Mail Order Madrigals
Anthony Saunders pf
The Joyful Company of Singers / Peter Broadbent
ASV CDDCA939 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included
Recorded 1995 ●

Newcomers should make haste to track 6 for a pleasant surprise. Here they will encounter Samuel Barber's indestructible Adagio in its alternative and mellifluous 1967 vocal guise, set to the text of the Agnus Dei. Peter Broadbent's Joyful Company of Singers acquit themselves extremely well. Elsewhere, one particularly relishes the exquisite Op 42 pairing of Twelfth Night and To be sung on the water, the carefree lilt of The monk and his cat and, above all, the majestic, strikingly ambitious 1938 setting of Gerald Manley Hopkins's sonnet, God's Grandeur (perhaps the single most impressive achievement on the disc). Further delights are provided by Barber's countryman and contemporary, William Schuman. The concise, beautifully sculpted Perceptions (1982) are settings of choice aphorisms from the pen of Walt Whitman, while the Mail Order Madrigals (1972) wittily utilise the flowery prose drawn from advertisements contained within a Sears and Roebuck catalogue of 1897. A most attractive issue, in short, excellently produced and engineered.

Béla Bartók

Hungarian 1881-1945

GROVE Bartók began lessons with his mother, who brought up the family after his father's death in 1888. In 1894 they settled in Bratislava, where he attended the Gymnasium (Dohnányi was an elder schoolfellow), studied the piano with László Erkel and Anton Hyrtl, and composed sonatas and quartets. In 1898 he was accepted by the Vienna Conservatory, but following Dohnányi he went to the Budapest Academy (1899-1903), where he studied the piano with Liszt's pupil Istvan Thoman and composition with Janos Koessler. There he deepened his acquaintance with Wagner, though it was the music of Strauss, which he met at the Budapest première of Also sprach Zarathustra in 1902, that had most influence. He wrote a symphonic poem, Kossuth (1903), using Strauss's methods with Hungarian elements in Liszt's manner.

In 1904 Kossuth was performed in Budapest and Manchester; at the same time Bartók began to make a career as a pianist, writing a Piano Quintet and two Lisztian virtuoso showpieces (Rhapsody Op 1, Scherzo Op 2). Also in 1904 he made his first Hungarian folksong transcription. In 1905 he collected more songs and began his collaboration with Kodály: their first arrangements were published in 1906. The next year he was appointed Thoman's successor at the Budapest Academy, which enabled him to settle in Hungary and continue his folksong collecting, notably in Transylvania. Meanwhile his music was beginning to be influenced by this activity and by the music of Debussy that Kodály had brought back from Paris: both opened the way to new, modal kinds of harmony and irregular metre. The 1908 Violin Concerto is still within the symphonic tradition, but the many small piano pieces of this period show a new, authentically Hungarian Bartók emerging, with the 4ths of Magyar folksong, the rhythms of peasant dance and the scales he had discovered among Hungarian, Romanian and Slovak peoples. The arrival of this new voice is documented in his String Quartet No 1 (1908), introduced at a Budapest concert of his music in 1910.

There followed orchestral pieces and a one-act opera, Bluebeard's Castle, dedicated to his young wife. Influenced by Mussorgsky and Debussy but most directly by Hungarian peasant music (and Strauss, still, in its orchestral pictures), the work, a grim fable of human isolation, failed to win the competition in which it was entered. For two years (1912-14) Bartók practically gave up composition and devoted himself to the collection, arrangement and study of folk music, until World War I put an end to his expeditions. He returned to creative activity with the String Quartet No 2 (1917) and the fairytale ballet The Wooden Prince, whose production in Budapest in 1917 restored him to public favour. The next year Bluebeard's Castle was staged and he began a second ballet, The Miraculous Mandarin, which was not performed until 1926 (there were problems over the subject, the thwarting and consummation of sexual passion). Rich and graphic in invention, the score is practically an opera without words.

While composing The Miraculous Mandarin Bartók came under the influence of Stravinsky and Schoenberg, and produced some of his most complex music in the two violin sonatas of 1921-22. At the same time he was gaining international esteem: his works were published by Universal Edition and he was invited to play them all over Europe. He was now well established at home, too. He wrote the confident Dance Suite (1923); there was then another lull until the sudden rush of works in 1926 designed for himself to play, including the Piano Concerto No 1, the Piano Sonata and the suite Out of Doors. These exploit the piano as a percussion instrument, using its resonances as well as its xylophonic hardness. The search for new sonorities and driving rhythms was continued in the next two string quartets (1927-28), of which No 4, like the concerto, is in a five-section palindromic pattern (ABCBA).

Similar formal schemes, with intensively worked counterpoint, were used in the Piano Concerto No 2 (1931) and String Quartet No 5 (1934), though now Bartók's harmony was becoming more diatonic. The move from inward chromaticism to a glowing major (though modally tinged) tonality is basic to the Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta (1936) and the Sonata for Two Pianos and Percussion (1937), both written for performance in Switzerland at a time when the political situation in Hungary was growing unsympathetic.

In 1940 Bartók and his second wife (he had divorced and remarried in 1923) left war-torn Europe to live in New York, which he found alien. They gave concerts and for a while he had a research grant to work on a collection of Yugoslav folksong, but their finances were precarious, as increasingly was his health. It seemed that his last European work, the String Quartet No 6 (1939), might be his pessimistic swansong, but then came the exuberant Concerto for Orchestra (1943) and the involuted Sonata for Solo Violin (1944). Piano Concerto No 3, written to provide his widow with an income, was almost finished when he died, a Viola Concerto left in sketch.

Piano Concertos

No 1, Sz83; No 2, Sz95; No 3, Sz119

Piano Concertos Nos 1-3
Peter Donohoe pf City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI 754871-2 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1990-92 ●

Piano Concertos Nos 1-3
András Schiff pf Budapest Festival Orchestra / Iván Fischer
Warner Elatus 0927-46735-2 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1996 ●●

Making Bartók's First Piano Concerto sound fun must have taken some doing, but Donohoe and Rattle have certainly managed it. The recording blends the instrument in among the orchestra, so that Rattle's sensitivity to nuance, Donohoe's lightness of touch and the accommodating acoustic of Birmingham's Symphony Hall transform what we frequently hear as an angular confrontation into something genuinely palatable. The Second Concerto, in this impressively urgent account, could hold its own in any company, even though there are one or two passages where articulation momentarily falters. The rest is either pungent or evocative: the second movement's 'night music' Adagio sections are beautifully sustained and the finale has terrific élan. Taken overall, this is a marvellous trio of performances and serves as a fresh reminder of just how great these works are.

Although Schiff's free-flowing renditions are never too far from the written page, they rarely stick rigidly to the letter. The first solo statement in the Second Concerto, for example, is lilting and capricious, quite unlike the earnest pronouncements of Anda, Donohoe or Kocsis. True, his Presto isn't quite as nimble as Anda's but most readers will rejoice in the many subtle shifts in pace and dynamics that colour Schiff's performances. The First Concerto suggests a sense of play that rivals Donohoe and Rattle, especially in the first movement – although never letting you forget Donohoe's mesmerizing account of the Andante. The Third Concerto suits Schiff best of all: his tone is nicely rounded, his chords perfectly weighted and there's some delightfully nifty fingerwork. He virtually sings these concertos, which makes for a near-ideal Third but, in the case of the Second, prompts something of an uneven confrontation. Schiff's contribution to the Second is consistently bright, nimble, even a little coquettish, while Fischer's response is brazen and athletic. The same might also be said of the First Concerto, except that there the sound is so astonishingly lifelike that it virtually amounts to an aural drama on its own terms.

Piano Concertos Nos 1-3 🅷
Géza Anda pf Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra / Ferenc Fricsay
DG The Originals 447 399-2GOR Ⓜ
(78 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1959-60 ●

Much as one would like to tout the new as the best, there are some older recordings where a very special chemistry spells 'definitive', and that pose an almost impossible challenge to subsequent rivals. Such is this 1959 recording of Bartók's Second Piano Concerto, a tough, playful, pianistically aristocratic performance where dialogue is consistently keen and spontaneity is captured on the wing (even throughout numerous sessions). The first movement is relentless but never tires the ear; the second displays two very different levels of tension, one slow and mysterious, the other hectic but controlled; and although others might have thrown off the finale's octaves with even greater abandon, Anda's performance is the most successful in suggesting savage aggression barely held in check.

The Third Concerto is again beautifully moulded and carefully thought through. Moments such as the loving return from the second movement's chirpy central episode are quite unforgettable, while the finale is both nimble and full-toned. The First Concerto was the last to be recorded and is perhaps the least successful of the three: here ensemble is occasionally loose, and characterization less vivid than with, say, Donohoe and Rattle. Still, it is a fine performance and the current transfer has been lovingly effected.

Bartók Piano Concerto No 3
Prokofiev Piano Concertos – No 1 in D flat, Op 10; No 3 in C, Op 26
Martha Argerich pf Montreal Symphony Orchestra / Charles Dutoit
EMI 556654-2 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●

As always with this most mercurial of virtuosos, Martha Argerich's playing is generated by the mood of the moment and many listeners may well be surprised at her relative geniality with Dutoit. Personal and vivacious throughout, she always allows the composer his own voice. This is particularly true in Bartók's Third Concerto where her rich experience in chamber music makes her often primus inter pares, a virtuoso who listens to her partners with the greatest care. In the Adagio religioso she achieves a poise that has sometimes eluded her in the past and her finale is specially characterful, her stealthy start to the concluding Presto allowing the final pages their full glory. Dutoit and the Montreal Symphony achieve a fine unity throughout, a sense of like-minded musicians at work.

All true musicians will recognise performances of a special magic and integrity. In the Prokofiev First Concerto, her opening is arguably more authentically brioso than ferocious, her overall view a refreshingly fanciful view of Prokofiev's youthful iconoclasm. The central Andante assai is inflected with an improvisatory freedom she would probably not have risked earlier in her career and in the Allegro scherzando she trips the light fantastic, reserving a suitably tigerish attack for the final octave bravura display. Her performance of the Third Concerto is less fleet or nimble-fingered than in her early days but is more delectably alive to passing caprice. The recordings are clear and naturally balanced and only those in search of metallic thrills and rushes of blood to the head will feel disappointed.

Viola Concerto, Sz120

Bartók Viola Concerto
Eötvös Replica
Kurtág Movement for Viola and Orchestra
Kim Kashkashian va Netherlands Radio Chamber Orchestra / Peter Eötvös
ECM New Series 465 420-2 (50 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●

Kashkashian's superbly engineered recording of the Bartók Viola Concerto bears witness to a total identification between performer and composer. Even the tiny pause bridging the opening and the secondary idea growing out of it, is perfectly judged. Kashkashian makes this music dance, not just in the finale but also in the way that she phrases and articulates the entire piece. Eötvös's conducting offers many parallel insights, not least towards the end of the first movement where a growing sense of agitation throws the succeeding Adagio religioso into a particularly favourable light. Eötvös employs Tibor Serly's completion, revising odd details and accommodating a few articulations and phrasings that Kashkashian has herself instigated. If you need convincing that Bartók's Viola Concerto is a great work, then Kashkashian and Eötvos should, between them, do the trick.

Of the other pieces, Eötvös's Replica for viola and orchestra is astonishing music in which foggy harmonies hover between startled highs and raucous lows, then mutate into a strange, sickly pulsing. By contrast, György Kurtág's early Movement for Viola and Orchestra – two-thirds of a concerto Kurtág completed in 1953-54 – is relatively conventional, with plenty of virtuoso viola writing.

Additional recommendation
Viola Concerto, Sz120
Couplings: S Albert Cello Concerto. Bloch Schelomo
Yo-Yo Ma vc/alto vn Baltimore Symphony Orchestra / Zinman
Sony Classical SK57961 (78 minutes: DDD: 3/95). Ⓕ

An enjoyable alto violin version of the score, performed at the work's original pitch, plus the imaginative Albert coupling make this disc an attractive proposition.

Violin Concerto No 2, Sz112

Bartók Violin Concerto No 2
Stravinsky Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in D
Viktoria Mulova vn
Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra / Esa-Pekka Salonen
Philips 456 542-2PH (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●●

As strong a contender as any for top digital rating in this most communicative of 20th-century concerto masterpieces, forthright and confident, with energetic support from Salonen and his orchestra. Philips's engineering sounds like a digital upgrade of Mercury's Living Presence technique: instrumental imaging is startlingly immediate, the sound stage is very well defined and the bottom end of the spectrum has enormous power, the bass drum especially. Mullova's playing is committed and intense, with a ripe tone (evident from her first entry) and some filigree passagework in the second-movement variations, where Salonen is careful to clarify every bejewelled strand in Bartók's scoring. The first movement is well thought through, though the timing exceeds Bartók's own (as printed in the score) by some three minutes. Still, most rivals are similarly expansive, and the second movement is actually a few seconds faster than prescribed, which is perhaps one of the reasons why it works so well. The finale is again clearly focused, but the big surprise comes with the inclusion – or, rather, the substitution – of Bartók's rarely heard original ending, where the soloist retires and the orchestra alone shoulder the whole of the coda. The notes makes no specific reference to this 'surprise' finale.

The Stravinsky concerto is another winner, with pert outer movements (the LAPO brass are alert but refreshingly unaggressive) and a ravishing account of the second 'Aria'. Tempos are well chosen, the sound is again first-rate and this performance of the Stravinsky can be ranked higher than any digital rival. As to the Bartók concerto, Thomas Zehetmair and Iván Fischer (Berlin Classics) offer less tonal lustre but more in the way of interpretative daring, while Kyung-Wha Chung (with Rattle – EMI) is marginally more attentive to instrumental minutiae – both, however, are currently unavailable. In sum, Mullova is on a par with the best and Philips's demonstration-worthy soundframe may well persuade readers to make her recording a first choice.

Violin Concerto No 2. Rhapsodies for Violin and Orchestra – No 1, Sz87; No 2, Sz90
Gil Shaham vn
Chicago Symphony Orchestra / Pierre Boulez
DG 459 639-2GH (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998

The constituent parts of this carefully considered production include a velvet-toned solo line, fastidious instrumental balancing, fine orchestral playing and considered articulation from all concerned. Wherever the score quietens, the musical tension is well sustained and so is the rarefied atmosphere created by Bartók's exquisite scoring. The playful banter between soloist and orchestra works especially well. There are odd flashes of drama and also some magical details, a particular favourite being at 5'41" into the second movement, where Shaham's passagework flutters within a dark aural environment like a captive butterfly circulating Bluebeard's castle.

The one reservation about this performance is a certain lack of temperament. Shaham's first entry is too urbane, too carefully calculated. Sometimes his attack is strong, sometimes underpowered. Shaham, although an extremely accomplished player, emerges as overly cool, excessively laid-back. He and Boulez present a workable – and enjoyable – overview of the concerto, but sometimes fail to engage the spirit. In the Rhapsodies, No 2's first movement's entrancing recipe of solo violin, woodwinds and gentle percussion make an unforgettable effect.

Additional recommendation
Bartók Violin Concertos Nos ^{a}1 and ^{b}2
Coupling: Piano Concertos^{c}
^{ab}Chung vn; ^{c}Ashkenazy pf; ^{a}Chicago Symphony Orchestra, ^{b}London Philharmonic Orchestra / Solti
Decca Double ② 473 271-2DF2 Ⓜ
(137 minutes: DDD: ^{ab}2/91)

Highly extrovert, likeable performances from Chung with Solti a like-minded collaborator. The piano concertos make a great package – Ashkenazy is on superb form.

Violin Concerto No 2
Coupling: Solo Sonata. Janáček Violin Concerto. Violin Sonata^{c}. Weill Concerto for Violin and Wind Orchestra
Tetzlaff vn ^{c}Andsnes pf
^{a}LPO / Gielen; ^{b}Deutsche Kammerphilharmonie
Virgin Classics ② 562053-2 (DDD; recorded 1990-91) Ⓑ

Tetzlaff's playing has great character and technical security; he generates a consistently stimulating rapport with Gielen and the LPO.

Concerto for Orchestra, Sz116

Concerto for Orchestra. Kossuth, Sz21. Village Scenes, Sz79
Slovak Folk Ensemble Chorus; Budapest Festival Orchestra / Iván Fischer
Philips 456 575-2PH (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●●

Bartók's youthful Kossuth is as enjoyable a tone-poem as any save for Strauss's or Liszt's best, lyrical and dramatic, especially in the eighth section, where perky bassoons prompt a head-on confrontation by poking fun at the Austrian national anthem. Fischer and his orchestra here steal a lead on all the recorded rivals, at virtually every juncture. Solos in all departments are highly distinctive, while tutti passages have an earthy, upfront quality that lends extra fibre to Bartók's textures. Kossuth's musical effect relies on the conviction of its interpreters, and in that respect alone Fischer wins hands down. Bartók completed his five Village Scenes (originally for voice and piano) in 1924, orchestrating three of them two years later at Koussevitzky's suggestion. Bartók places a doleful, slightly unsettling 'Lullaby' between a frisky 'Wedding' and a hyperactive 'Lad's Dance'. The Slovak Folk Ensemble Chorus (all ladies) squeal their hearts out for the wedding and Fischer keeps Bartók's hot-foot syncopations alive and kicking. A pity there are no texts and translations.

As to the Concerto for Orchestra, again it is the flavour of the performance that wins the day. Fischer is a dab hand at shaping and inflecting the musical line. He sails into the movement's 'brass chorale' trio without a hint of a pause and invests the 'Elegia' with the maximum respectable quota of passion. The finale is a riot of sunshine and swirling skirts, except for the mysterious – and notoriously tricky – più presto coda, with its rushing sul ponticello string choirs, which Fischer articulates with great care. One senses that the players are being driven to the very limits of their abilities, which only serves to intensify the excitement. Philips's dynamic sound frame works best in Kossuth and the Village Scenes, though most of the Concerto also sounds excellent. The only complaint is of a marginally flat brass chord in the finale and a quiet, short-lived low electronic hum in the same movement. Otherwise, a clear front runner at full-price.

Concerto for Orchestra. The Miraculous Mandarin
City of Birmingham Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI 555094-2 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992-93 ●●

Simon Rattle's Bartókian credentials have never been better displayed on disc, with this particular version of The Miraculous Mandarin ballet. Tone and texture are securely on target, and those oddly elusive second and third trumpets at fig 21 (which are curiously absent from many rivals) are here properly reinstated. The strings and winds project with impressive confidence throughout, the trumpets prior to 'The Chase' are more rhythmically secure than most, and the various dramatic incidents that succeed the closing pages of the Suite (and which include some of Bartók's most powerful music for the stage) are given with a genuine sense of pathos. The chorus is well balanced, the percussion too, while Rattle himself drives all with a combination of animal vigour and teeming imagination.

This live recording of the Concerto for Orchestra, for sheer character and communicative power, must rank among the top digital recomendations. Right from the opening Andante non troppo, it is clear that everyone is wholly engaged in the task in hand. The flight into Allegro vivace is especially exciting and the 'Elegia' is especially intense, with a positively outraged return of the first movement's initial forte idea – the dotted trumpet lending a genuinely Magyar tang to the proceedings. The closing minute or so of the 'Intermezzo' is more tender than any other in recent years, while the finale is full of witty incident – every little variation played for all its worth and the whole brimming over with life and energy. However, Rattle's most telling interpretative stroke occurs at 7'23", that mysterious, curiously elusive passage that most other conductors treat like some sort of hybrid interpolation marking time until the final pages arrive. Rattle, though, has none of it: his reading betrays pin-point focusing, with intelligent phrasing, careful articulation and a sense of dramatic inevitability that lends the passage a new-found musical logic. The closing moments are thrilling, with a lacerating final chord tailed by a grateful volley of applause.

Concerto for Orchestra. Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta, Sz106. 🄷
Hungarian Sketches, Sz97
Chicago Symphony Orchestra / Fritz Reiner
RCA Victor Living Stereo 09026 61504-2 Ⓜ
(76 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1955 ●

Reiner's recordings were made in Chicago's Orchestra Hall in October 1955 (not that sampling reveals their age – quite the contrary). RCA's sound reportage of the Concerto for Orchestra's quieter moments has uncanny realism and if the climaxes are occasionally reined in, the sheer fervour of Reiner's direction more than compensates. The 'Pair Play' is a very brisk 6'26", the finale taut and agile: compare the movement's opening with, say, Boulez's version, and Reiner's greater precision and control is immediately apparent. His couplings are excellent: a Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta that goes all out for smooth transitions and fleet execution, and a stylishly turned set of Hungarian Sketches – with a substantially augmented percussion line in 'Bear Dance'. These too sound better than ever.

Additional recommendation
Concerto for Orchestra
Couplings: Dance Suite. Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta. Divertimento. Miraculous Mandarin – Suite. Hungarian Sketches. Romanian Folkdances
Chicago Symphony Orchestra / Solti
Double Decca ② 470 516-2DF2 Ⓑ
(138 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1981, 1990 and 1994

A self-recommending Bartók feast by one of the composer's most accomplished advocates. All the Solti magic is there in the Concerto for Orchestra, though it's a little brightly recorded. Solti's readings probably gained in vigour as he got older: the Folkdances are wonderfully lithe and sensitive to change of mood and colour. The Music for Strings is also powerfully done, the Chicago strings sounding quite magnificent. All in all, a great Bartók starter pack.

The Miraculous Mandarin, Sz73

Awards 1998

The Miraculous Mandarin.
Hungarian Peasant Songs, Sz100.
Hungarian Sketches, Sz97. Romanian Folkdances, Sz68. Transylvanian Dances, Sz96. Romanian Dance, Sz47
Hungarian Radio Chorus; Budapest Festival Orchestra / Iván Fischer
Philips 454 430-2PH (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●●●

As Mandarins go, they don't come more miraculous than this – a vivid, no-holds-barred performance. Everything tells – the flavour is right, the pacing too and the sound has a toughened, raw-edged quality that is an essential constituent of Bartók's tonal language. Although lurid – even seedy – in narrative detail, The Miraculous Mandarin is ultimately a tale of compassion, and Fischer never forgets that fact. Observable detail – all of it musically significant – occurs virtually by the minute. Delicacy trails bullish aggression, forcefulness alternates with an almost graphic suggestiveness – and it's all there in the full score. Fischer never vulgarises, brutalises or overstates the case and, what is most important, he underlines the quickly flickering, folkish elements in Bartók's musical language that other conductors barely acknowledge.

The strongly individual character of the Budapest Festival Orchestra is delightful. The strings have a biting edge, the woodwinds a gypsy-style reediness, while brass and percussion are forceful and incisive but never raucous. This is Hungarian-grown Bartók that actually sounds Hungarian; it makes one wish that other European orchestras would reclaim parallel levels of individuality.

The Miraculous Mandarin, Sz73[a].
Concerto for Orchestra, Sz116[b]
[a]Junge Deutsche Philharmonie;
[b]Gustav Mahler Jugendorchester /
Péter Eötvös
BMC BMCCD058 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
[b]Recorded live at the Teatro Donizetti, Bergamo, Italy in May 1992 ●●

This Bartók CD is what recording should be about, and make no mistake. Yes, there are shortcomings – the odd spot of iffy playing, inconsistent balances and an occasional extraneous noise – but the musical qualities are overwhelming. Of course it doesn't compare as a production with Chailly's imaginatively voluptuous though significantly less intense coupling for Decca. But then you wouldn't expect it to. The Miraculous Mandarin in particular has an animalistic impulsiveness, a sense of urgency that drives right to the heart of the drama.

The opening sets the atmosphere with precisely the right feeling of panic, the ejection scenes – where potential punters (for a captured decoy) are thrown out – are positively wild. The chase gains momentum by the second and at the point (soon after) when the tramps decide to kill the Mandarin, Eötvös and his players conjure a series of deathly growls the like of which have surely never been heard this side of Hell! The closing scene has heart-tearing pathos, and the Junge Deutsche Philharmonie play their socks off: they swallow the Mandarin whole and take on every insinuating bar with genuine understanding. But then, they're being conducted by a composer, and Peter Eötvös feels his Bartók from the inside. The Concerto for Orchestra (Gustav Mahler Jugendorchester this time) is scarcely less good, though the sound is entirely different, dry and closely balanced to compare with the Mandarin's more airy acoustic. But the performance is a scorcher. The finale generates plenty of fire (Chailly's more pristine performance seems cautious by comparison) and chosen tempi are spot-on. Again, the spirit burns away a handful of imperfections that never really mattered in the first place.

Additional recommendations
The Miraculous Mandarin
Coupling: Two portraits, Op 5
London Symphony Orchestra / Abbado
DG Masters 445 501-2GMA (minutes: DDD: 9/83^{R}) Ⓜ

Abbado directs an imaginative and atmospheric performance: the climaxes, such as that at the mandarin's entrance, are positively awe-inspiring.

The Miraculous Mandarin
Coupling: Concerto for Orchestra
City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Rattle
EMI 555094-2 (70 minutes: DDD: 1/95) Ⓕ

Reviewed above under 'Concerto for Orchestra'.

Complete String Quartets

No 1, Sz40; No 2, Sz67; No 3, Sz85; No 4, Sz91; No 5, Sz102; No 6, Sz114

Takács Quartet (Edward Dusinberre, Károly Schranz vns Roger Tapping va András Fejér vc)
Decca ② 455 297-2DH2
(152 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●●●

These performances provide more impressive sampling points than one could hope to enumerate in a single review. The First Quartet's oscillating tempo-shifts work wonderfully well, all with total naturalness. Characterization is equally strong elsewhere, not least the first movement of the Debussian arpeggios of the Second Quartet, and the second movement where Fejér races back into the rustic opening subject. The nightmare climax in the last movement has rarely sounded more prophetic of the great Divertimento's central movement. The middle quartets work very well, with prominent inner voices in the Third and plenty of swagger in the Fourth. The high spots of No 4 are Fejér's improvisational cello solo in the third movement and a finale where the violent opening is a hefty legato to compare with the sharper, more Stravinskian attack of, say, the Tokyo Quartet. Likewise, the sudden dance-like episode in the first movement of the Fifth Quartet, savage music played from the pit of the stomach, while the third movement's bleary-eyed viola melody over teeming violin triplets suggests peasants in caricature.

The Takács are responsive to Bartók's sardonic humour – the 'barrel-organ' episode at the end of the Fifth Quartet, and the corny 'Burletta' in the third movement of the Sixth. The Sixth itself has some of the saddest, wildest and wisest music written in the last 100 years: the opening viola solo recalls Mahler's Tenth and the close fades to a mysterious question. Throughout the cycle, Bartók's metronome markings are treated more as guidelines than literal commands. The playing imparts Bartók's all-embracing humanity, and if the greatest string quartets after Beethoven are still unknown to you, this Takács set may well prove the musical journey of a lifetime. The recording here has ambient, full-bodied sound that is more reminiscent of the concert hall than of the studio.

Awards 1998

Emerson Quartet (Eugene Drucker, Philip Setzer vns Lawrence Dutton va David Finckel vc)
DG ② 423 657-2GH2
(149 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1988 ●●●

Any cycle of Bartók quartets has to be pretty special to stand out against the competition. The Emerson Quartet's is, and it does: powerful and refined, paying close attention to the letter of the score, and excelling in virtuoso teamwork. The impression from these recordings is of massive tonal projection and superlative clarity, each textural strand coloured and made audible to a degree possibly unrivalled in the recorded history of these works. DG's close, brightly lit recording quality must share some of the credit for that, of course. Combine this with controlled vehemence, headlong velocity and razor-sharp unanimity (any fast movement from quartets two to five can serve as illustration) and you have a formidable alliance of virtues. Well recorded, when this set first appeared it was hailed as one of the most exciting chamber music recordings for many years.

Additional recommendations
Complete String Quartets
Végh Quartet
Auvidis Naïve ③ V4870 (155 minutes: ADD: recorded 1972: 9/83^R) Ⓜ

The second Bartók cycle from this great Hungarian quartet: their performances are insightful and compelling and, technical fallibilities notwithstanding, remain among the top contenders.

Juilliard Quartet 🏅
Retrospective ③ RET005 (158 minutes: ADD: recorded 1963) Ⓢ

The refinement and energy of the '60s Juilliard is unique. This legendary set, reissued at bargain price, contains superlative performances in vivid stereo sound. It's a more viscerally exciting reading than their more relaxed 1981 digital remake.

Violin Sonatas

Awards 1997

Violin Sonata No 1, Sz75.
Solo Violin Sonata, Sz117
Isabelle Faust vn Ewa Kupiec pf 🏅
Harmonia Mundi Les Nouveaux Interprètes
HMN91 1623 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1996 ●●●

Bartók's First Violin Sonata is notoriously reluctant to yield its secrets yet none is more comprehensively perceptive than this recording by the young violinist Isabelle Faust. Harmonia Mundi counts Faust among the 'cream of the new generation of musicians' and, on this evidence, no one could rightly disagree. Ewa Kupiec provides Faust with motivated support. Faust favours a sensual approach that draws active parallels with the music of Berg. She ventures deep among the first movement's more mysterious episodes. This is empathetic playing, candid, full of temperament and always focused securely on the note's centre. The *crescendo*ing processional that sits at the heart of the second movement is charged with suspense and the steely finale suggests a savage resolve. Faust and Kupiec visit corners in this score that others gloss over, and the recording supports them all the way. The Solo Sonata is virtually as impressive. Here Faust approaches the music from a Bachian axis: her tone is pure, double-stopping immaculate and sense of timing acute. Faust is a persuasive narrator; she and her piano partner break down barriers in the First Sonata that, for some, will mean the difference between approachability and continuing bafflement. Do give them a try.

Violin Sonatas – No 1,Sz75; No 2, Sz76.
Contrasts, Sz111
Kálmán Berkes cl György Pauk vn Jenö Jandó pf
Naxos 8 550749 (75 mins: DDD). Recorded 1993 Ⓢ

Readers who habitually fight shy of Bartók's provocatively astringent piano writing might initially find these endlessly fascinating works rather unpalatable, the First Sonata especially. But careful scrutiny reveals manifold beauties which, once absorbed, tend to haunt one's memory and prompt repeated listening. Jenö Jandó's piano playing is fairly forthright yet without the naked agression of, say, Sviatoslav Richter. Furthermore, it provides an effective foil for György Pauk's warm tone and fluid solo line, especially in the First Sonata, where ungainly tone production could so easily compound one's discomfort. Here, however, the interpretation is at once thoughtful and well shaped, and fully appreciative of the mysterious 'night music' that sits at the heart of the Adagio.

The Second Sonata is both gentler and more improvisatory, its language and structure – although still pretty formidable – somewhat in the manner of a rhapsody. Pauk and Jandó again hit the target, and the full-bodied recording makes for a homogeneous sound picture. To have a spirited performance of the multi-faceted Contrasts (with Kálmán Berkes on clarinet) as a bonus certainly helps promote this well-annotated CD to the front line of competition. A confident mainstream recommendation, then, and superb value for money.

Violin Sonata No 2, Sz76. Rhapsodies – No 1, Sz86; No 2, Sz89. Six Romanian Folkdances, Sz56
Isabelle Faust vn Florent Boffard pf

Harmonia Mundi Les Nouveaux Interprètes
HMN91 1702 (46 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1999 ●

The most striking features of Isabelle Faust's first Bartók CD for Harmonia Mundi (see above), which featured the earthen First Sonata, were an empathetic spirit and a fiery temperament. Here, as there, Faust exhibits a defining use of nuance and inflection.

The two contrasting movements of the tauter, folk-music-derived Second Sonata call for a near-schizoid adaptability to changing moods. In the restless Molto moderato first movement Faust suggests feelings of sensual insinuation, though the lacerating attack of her bow at 3'50" has real grit. As the music grows more agitated, she follows suit and her pianist-partner Florent Boffard brooks no compromise in his handling of Bartók's dissonant chordal writing.

The Sonata's musical contours have rarely sounded better focused. Rivals are unexpectedly plentiful. Anne-Sophie Mutter (DG) is honey and cream next to Faust's chilli and paprika, the Stanzeleit/Fenyö (ASV) and Pauk/Jandó (Naxos – see above) partnerships provide idiomatic though rather less striking options, and while Gidon Kremer (in his second recording, the one with Oleg Maisenberg) comes nearest to Faust in spirit, not everyone will gravitate to his chosen couplings (Enesco, Schulhoff, etc).

Faust offers feisty accounts of the two 1928 Rhapsodies, the Second being the more responsive to interpretative innovation. The stamping 'second part' recalls the orchestral Dance Suite of five years earlier and Faust invests it both with delicacy and a palpably rustic 'edge'. The popular Romanian Folkdances provide a tuneful encore sequence (again, beautifully played). Despite the short measure, this is a marvellous CD.

Contrasts, Sz111. Rhapsodies – No 1, Sz86;
No 2, Sz89. Six Romanian Folk Dances, Sz56
(arr Székely). Solo Violin Sonata, Sz117
Michael Collins cl Krysia Osostowicz vn
Susan Tomes pf
Hyperion CDA66415 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1990 ●

Unusually for a composer who wrote so much fine chamber music Bartók was not himself a string player. But he did enjoy close artistic understanding with a succession of prominent violin virtuosos, including the Hungarians Jelly d'Arányi, Joseph Szigeti and Zoltán Székely, and, towards the end of his life, Yehudi Menuhin. It was Menuhin who commissioned the Sonata for solo violin, but Bartók died before he could hear him play it – Menuhin was unhappy with the occasional passages in quarter-tones and the composer had reserved judgement on his proposal to omit them. It was Menuhin's edition which was later printed and which has been most often played and recorded; but Krysia Osostowicz returns to the original and, more importantly, plays the whole work with intelligence, imaginative flair and consummate skill.

The Sonata is the most substantial work on this disc, but the rest of the programme is no less thoughtfully prepared or idiomatically delivered. There is the additional attraction of an extremely well balanced and natural-sounding recording. As a complement to the string quartets, which are at the very heart of Bartók's output, this is a most recommendable disc.

Violin Duos

Bartók 44 Duos for Two Violins, Sz98 Kurtág Ligatura – Message to Frances-Marie, Op 31*b*
Ligeti Ballad and Dance
András Keller, János Pilz vns
ECM New Series 465 849-2 Ⓕ
(58 minutes: DDD) ●

Hearing top-grade quartet violinists tackle these flavoured educational duos is a delight, though not an original one. (The Emerson's co-leaders Eugene Drucker and Philip Setzer have already done likewise, albeit to quite different effect.) All, or virtually all, is revealed right from the opening 'Transylvanian Dance' where the newcomers' phrasing and rhythm are appropriately unbuttoned, their combined tone full but unforced. (Note: Keller and Pilz actually start at the end with Duo 'No 44'.) Bartók's original plan had been to place the easiest pieces first, then gradually pile on the challenges as the series progressed. However, for concert purposes he sanctioned the idea of not playing them in order.

Their chosen sequence is very well planned. The interpretative axis centres principally on harmony and rhythm, and characterisation is always vivid. In general the slower pieces leave the strongest impression: that's where these players harbour their most personal responses, but then the slowest pieces probably are the best. Though Sándor Végh's accounts with Alberto Lysy are rather more earthy, the advantage of this version is that it seems to have been conceived with continuous listening in mind: the ear never tires.

It would be easy to pigeonhole this set as veering in the general direction of the Végh's Bartók, just as the Keller's Bartók quartet cycle does, then make a parallel observation of Drucker and Setzer as representing the less stylised manner of their own Emerson Quartet. Which would be fairly accurate and explain a preference for this disc, where an extra shot of interpretative re-creativeness ultimately wins the day. The sound quality is spacious and pleasingly full-bodied.

Solo piano works

For Children, Sz42. The First Term at the Piano, Sz53.
15 Hungarian Peasant Songs, Sz71. Three Hungarian
Folksongs from the Csík District, Sz35*a*. Hungarian
Folktunes, Sz66. Eight Improvisations on Hungarian
Peasant Songs, Sz74. Three Rondos on (Slovak)

Folktunes, Sz84. Romanian Christmas Carols, Sz57. Six Romanian Folkdances, Sz56. Two Romanian Dances, Sz43. Suite, Sz62, with original Andante. Piano Sonata, Sz80. Sonatina, Sz55. 14 Bagatelles, Sz38. Four Dirges, Sz45. Petite Suite, Sz105. Violin Duos, Sz98 (arr Sándor) – No 1, Teasing Song; No 17, Marching Song; No 35, Ruthenian kolomejka; No 42, Arabian Song; No 44, Transylvanian Dance. 10 Easy Pieces, Sz39. Allegro barbaro, Sz49. Out of doors, Sz81. Seven Sketches, Sz44. Two Elegies, Sz41. Three Burlesques, Sz47. Nine Little Pieces, Sz82. Three Studies, Sz72
György Sándor pf
Sony Classical ④ SB4K87949 Ⓑ
(287 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1993-95 ●

There can't be many pianists on the current circuit whose fund of experience extends to working with a major 20th-century master; but of those still recording, György Sándor must surely take pride of place. Sándor prepared Bartók's first two piano concertos under the composer's guidance and gave the world premières of the Third Concerto and the piano version of the Dance Suite. The present collection is Sándor's second survey of Bartók's piano music and contains all the major works apart from Mikrokosmos.

Many of these performances are exceptionally fine, even though the passage of time has witnessed something of a reduction in Sándor's pianistic powers, mostly where maximum stamina and high velocity fingerwork are required (as in the first Burlesque). However, you may be astonished at the heft, energy and puckish humour of Sándor's 1994 recording of the Piano Sonata, a more characterful rendition than its predecessor, with a particularly brilliant account of the folkish Allegro molto finale. The Allegro barbaro is similarly 'on the beam', while Sándor brings a cordial warmth to the various collections of ethnic pieces, the Romanian Christmas Carols especially.

His phrasing, rubato, expressive nuancing, attention to counterpoint and command of tone suggest the touch of a master, while his imagination relishes the exploratory nature of the Improvisations, Bagatelles and Miraculous Mandarin-style Studies. Sándor connects with all the music's abundant qualities: harmonic or rhythmic innovation, powerful emotion, humour, introspection, ethnic variety and the sheer scope and complexity of Bartók's piano writing in general. Intuitive interpreters, especially those who knew and understand the composers they perform, are becoming a rare breed. In that respect alone, Sándor's Bartók deserves an honoured place in every serious CD collection of 20th-century piano music.

---

14 Bagatelles, Sz38. Two Elegies, Sz41. Sonatine, Sz55. Six Romanian Folk Dances, Sz56. Three Hungarian Folktunes, Sz66
Zoltán Kocsis pf Philips 434 104-2PH Ⓕ
(54 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1991 ●
The Bagatelles and Sonatine are also available on Philips 50 Great Recordings 464 676-2PM Ⓜ

Bartók himself admitted that his Bagatelles (1908) were largely experimental, and at least half-a-dozen could have fallen from a jazz-pianist's copybook (Nos 7, 11 and 12, particularly). Debussy, too, is much in evidence (No 3), as is Bartók's love of folk-song (Nos 4 and 5). The Elegies would sit nicely among the shorter works of Busoni. These virtuosic effusions recall the moon-flecked world of late Liszt, albeit flushed with a Hungarian rather than a gipsy complexion. Folk-song proper informs Kocsis's last three selections: the familiar Six Romanian Folk Dances, the cheerful and ingenious Sonatine and the relatively dense Hungarian Folktunes, Sz66 – the last bringing us to the far edge of the Great War. It's a cliffhanger of a finale, and has us eager for more. Kocsis's readings are absolutely on target. A peach of a disc.

Two Romanian Dances, Sz43. Three Hungarian folksongs from the Csík district, Sz35a. Allegro barbaro, Sz49. Four Dirges, Sz45. Suite, Sz62. Romanian Christmas Carols, Sz57. Three Studies, Sz72. Three Rondos on Folktunes, Sz84. The first term at the piano, Sz53
Zoltán Kocsis pf
Philips 442 016-2PH (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●

The Romanian Dances, Hungarian Folksongs and Romanian Christmas Carols are also available on Philips 50 Great Recordings 464 676-2PM Ⓜ

Kocsis's Bartók series is the first major interpretative project to call on the substantial evidence of Bartók's own recordings. There was a spontaneity in Bartók's recorded performances, a quality that Kocsis achieves in his own playing. He also displays an ecstatic involvement in Bartók's harmonic writing, most particularly in the delicious, eloquently voiced Three Hungarian folksongs from the Csík district (how the second song seems a natural continuation of the first) and the exploratory Three Studies, the first as violent as the Miraculous Mandarin's murder, the third, a shifting sequence of computations that anticipates the player-piano studies of Conlon Nancarrow. Kocsis tackles all three Studies with absolute confidence. In any case, Kocsis's performances are never mere replications of Bartók's own; rather, they take the composer's lead in generating energy without aggression, poetry without indulgence, accuracy without pedantry.

The rest of the programme is as varied as the incidents within each individual opus. The Two Romanian Dances, both of them rich in novel variation, are thrust forwards in heady excitement, the first breaking half-way for a darkly rhapsodic central section, the second, a sort of mad-cap burlesque. The Allegro barbaro discards its customary metallic sheen and, instead, assumes more authentically Hungarian characteristics. Then there are the deeply expressive Four Dirges, the varied and instantly memorable Romanian Christmas Carols, the masterly Suite, Op 14 and, to end on a simplistic note, The first term at the piano – attractive teaching material, similar in concept to the first books of Mikrokosmos, but strictly for completists. This is a superb CD. The music itself is of exceptionally high quality, the disc contents are imaginatively varied, the interpretations beyond criticism, the recordings superb (warm, close and lifelike) and the documentation highly informative.

Piano Sonata, Sz80. Out of doors, Sz81. Nine Little Pieces, Sz82. Petite Suite, Sz105
Zoltán Kocsis pf
Philips 446 369-2PH (49 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●●

The Piano Sonata and Out of doors are also available coupled with: Two Romanian Dances, Sz43; Three Hungarian Folksongs, Sz35a; Romanian Christmas Carols, Sz57; 14 Bagatelles, Sz38; and Sonatina, Sz55: Philips 50 Great Recordings 464 676-2PM Ⓜ

Kocsis's mastery of tone, rhythm and articulation, allied to his painstaking attention to important source material, make for a level of pianistic distinction that is fairly unique in this repertory. The first movements of the Sonata and Out of doors hit hard without hammering, the former displaying a multitude of tiny inflexional gestures and pulse changes, the latter, a quick-boiling final chase of great intensity. Playing of this calibre takes us back to the days of 78s – where so much rhythmic flexibility is achieved within such a disciplined interpretative framework. In Out of doors, Kocsis's ability to command differing colours simultaneously heightens the musical effect, especially in the 'Barcarolla' and what is surely the most exquisitely tooled performance of 'The Night's Music' ever recorded. 'The Chase' is pin-sharp, its every gear-change expertly negotiated, while Kocsis makes maximum capital out of the rich harmonic world in 'Musettes'. The Nine Little Pieces transcend their brevity, 'Menuetto' recalling the second movement of the First Piano Concerto, the closing 'Preludio – All'Ungherese' providing a little mini-suite all on its own. This production is of superb quality. This is one of the great piano records of the post-war period.

---

10 Easy Pieces, Sz39. Seven Sketches, Sz44. Three Burlesques, Sz47. 15 Hungarian Peasant Songs, Sz71. Eight Improvisations on Hungarian Peasant Songs, Sz74
Zoltán Kocsis pf
Philips 462 902-2PH (62 minutes: ADD/DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1980-98

Kocsis's solo Bartók Volume 6 reveals the versicoloured fundamentals of the composer's harmonic language, from the smoky near-Impressionism of the Seven Sketches to the Miraculous Mandarin sound-alikes squatting at the centre of the Improvisations on Hungarian Peasant Songs (Nos 5 and 6). The 15 Hungarian Peasant Songs are filled with longing or playfulness, the 10 Easy Pieces with the simplest ideas, strategically employed.

Most of these pieces call for profoundly centred thinking, minutely calculated rubato and judicious timing. Kocsis scores on all fronts, even though the Sketches, Peasant Songs and Improvisations were recorded as long ago as 1980. Although there is just a touch more interpretative freedom on the later sessions, the sheer consistency of the playing is remarkable. The sound also matches well, although the later piano image is decidedly richer in texture. The Seven Sketches are in no way related to the orchestral Hungarian Sketches, although three other pieces on the disc are: 'Slightly Tipsy' (the second Burlesque), 'Evening in Transylvania' and 'Bear Dance' (the fifth and tenth of the 10 Easy Pieces). Kocsis's Bartók legacy stands as one of the true pinnacles of the recorded piano repertoire – from any period.

Dance Suite. Four Pieces. Kossuth, Sz21 – Marche funèbre. Rhapsody (2 versions).
Zoltán Kocsis pf
Philips 464 639-2PH (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

The final volume of Zoltán Kocsis's Bartók solo piano series is very much in the nature of a supplement. Only the Dance Suite can be counted a genuine masterpiece, and then not in the piano transcription. Kocsis's digital brilliance – a constant source of pleasure throughout the series – is pretty well unrivalled, and so is his mastery of an authentically Bartókian rubato. Even the finest readings of this piece (this CD and the live performance that András Schiff gave at the Wigmore Hall a few years ago) fall somewhere short of the score's exotic full effect.

By contrast, the Rhapsody, Op 1, is presented very much as it was back in 1904, before Bartók hastily adapted it for piano and orchestra. Kocsis gives a powerful, fastidiously sculpted performance not unlike Bartók's own (of the orchestral version, that is), impetuous and rich in nuance. The merest glance at the CD's contents will be enough to lure the committed Bartók aficionado, whereas the more general collector is handsomely served by the generous mid-price 'Philips 50' programme taken from earlier releases in the series.

Additional recommendation
Solo piano works etc 🄷
Bartók pf
Pearl mono GEMMCD9166 (69 minutes: ADD: 6/96) Ⓜ

This Bartók plays Bartók compilation offers full-bodied transfers of some fascinating commercial recordings, including the first Romanian Dances, Allegro barbaro and Liszt's 'Sursum corda'. A must for all Bartókians.

Vocal works

Five Songs, Sz61. Five Songs, Sz63. Hungarian Folksongs, Sz64 – Black is the earth; My God, my God; Wives, let me be one of your company; So much sorrow; If I climb the rocky mountains. Five

Songs, Sz61 (orch Kodály). Five Hungarian Folksongs, Sz101
Júlia Hamari contr Ilona Prunyi pf
Hungarian State Orchestra / János Kovács
Hungaroton HCD31535 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1992

Kodály's rose-tinted orchestrations of Bartók's uncompromisingly erotic Op 15 (Sz61) make for pleasant listening, but they sidetrack the real heart of the matter. Bartók had a year-long relationship with the 15-year-old Klára Gombossy, and three of the songs are based on her poetry; the fourth sets a poem by the daughter of Klára's piano teacher, while the remaining 'In Vivid Dreams' is a re-working of another poem by Klára, added later. Heard in its original form for voice and piano, Op 15 is a bold, harmonically far-reaching cycle (countless passages anticipate the harsher Bartók of the 1920s), often angular in design but, within its tough framework, passionately suggestive. Kodály's orchestrations date from 1961 and soften the music's contours in a way that Bartók himself would not have countenanced – at least not in 1915, the year in which the songs were composed. The Five Songs, Op 16 consolidate the dark, introspective language of Op 15, while the 10 folk-song settings – Bartók's clearly focused orchestrations (Sz101) and the five for voice and piano (Sz64) – are rather more outgoing and varied.

All this music is so absorbing that one tends temporarily to forget the performers – which wouldn't be possible were they less than good. Júlia Hamari projects a secure, strong body of tone and fully comprehends the potent love images of Op 15, while her accompanist, Ilona Prunyi, etches Bartók's vivid piano writing with a sure hand and much imagination. The orchestral items are patchily dealt with (winds are good, strings not), but the impressionistic nature of the writing (Kodály's especially) responds better to Kovács's soft-centred approach than, say, the Village Scenes would have done. The recordings are perfectly adequate. Recommended to all Bartókians and Lieder aficionados.

Duke Bluebeard's Castle

Walter Berry bass-bar Bluebeard;
Christa Ludwig mez Judith
London Symphony Orchestra / István Kertész
Decca Legends 466 377-2DM Ⓜ
(59 minutes: ADD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1965 ●

John Tomlinson bass Bluebeard; Anne Sofie von Otter mez Judith; Sandor Elès spkr
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
EMI 556162-2 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included.
Recorded live in 1995 ●●

Bernard Haitink's poetic axis is vividly anticipated in the rarely recorded spoken prologue where Sandor Elès bids us search beneath the story's surface. Elès's timing and his sensitivity to word-colouring and the rhythmic inflexions of his native language greet the Gothic imagery of Bartók's solemn opening bars. The main protagonists soon establish very definite personalities, Bluebeard/Tomlinson as commanding, inscrutable and just a little arrogant, von Otter/Judith as profoundly frightened but filled with curiosity. Haitink and the Berlin Philharmonic paint a rich aural backdrop that is neither too slow nor overly lugubrious and that shows due appreciation of Bartók's seamless scoring, especially in terms of the woodwind. The disembodied sighs that greet Judith's violent hammering on the first door mark a momentary retreat from the Philharmonie's ambient acoustic (or so it seems) and in so doing suggest – quite appropriately – a chilling 'world beyond'. Judith's shock as she recoils in horror is conveyed in clipped, halting tones by von Otter (note too how seductively she manipulates Bluebeard into opening the first door).

Beyond the expansive introduction come the doors themselves, and here too Haitink balances the 'outer' and 'inner' aspects of Bartók's score to perfection – whether in the torture chamber, the glowing textures of 'The Secret Garden' or the Brucknerian expanses of the fifth door, 'Bluebeard's Kingdom' (the opera's structural apex), launched here on a series of epic crescendos. Von Otter's stunned responses suggest lonely disorientation within a vast space, whereas the sullenness of the 'Lake of Tears' prompts an exquisite blending of instrumental timbres, most particularly between brass and woodwind. Haitink draws an aching curve to the string writing, but when Judith rushes panic-stricken towards the seventh door, fearful of Bluebeard's secret murders, he effects a gradual but cumulatively thrilling accelerando. The internment itself is devastating, while Bluebeard's helpless retreat marks a slow journey back to the questioning void. Recording live can have its pitfalls, but here the atmosphere is electric, the grasp of Bartók's sombre tone-painting – whether sung or played – absolute.

EMI's engineering favours a full sound stage rather than picking out specific instrumental details, but the overall effect remains comprehensively satisfying. Kertész, on the other hand, favours a far richer sound stage, with softer contours (his armoury suggests more weight than glinting steel, his torture chamber, anxiety rather than cruelty) and a passionate swell to the string writing. Kertész represents the opera's compassionate core.

When it comes to the husband-and-wife team of Walter Berry and Christa Ludwig, one senses more a woman discovering sinister aspects of the man she loves than an inquisitive shrew intent on plundering Bluebeard's every secret. Here, Judith seems perpetually poised to take Bluebeard's arm and linger lovingly about him, while Berry's assumption of the title-role – which is beautifully, if not terribly idiomatically, sung – suggests neither Angst nor impatience. Ludwig, too, was in wonderful voice at the time of this recording, and instances of her eloquence are far too numerous to list individually. The transfer is superb, with a thunderous organ beyond the fifth door and merely the odd rogue edit or spot of tape hiss to betray the passing years.

Additional recommendation
Duke Bluebeard's Castle
Troyanos Judith Nimsgern Bluebeard
BBC Symphony Orchestra / Boulez
Sony Classical SMK64110 (61 minutes: ADD: 3/95) Ⓜ

This is the more forceful of Pierre Boulez's two readings (Jessye Norman's soulless Judith mars his later DG set). Tatiana Troyanos's vocally winning Judith and Boulez's ideal pacing put this set among the top recommendations.

Sir Arnold Bax British 1883-1953

GROVE Bax studied at the Royal College of Music, London, (1900-05). After discovering the poetry of Yeats, with which he was deeply impressed, he strongly identified with Irish Celtic culture. Drawing on many sources (Strauss, Debussy, Ravel, Elgar) he created a style of luxuriant chromatic harmony, rich ornament and broad melody, notably deployed in his tone poems The Garden of Fand (1916), November Woods (1917) and Tintagel (1919). Other important works of this period include his First Quartet (1918) and Second Piano Sonata (1919). In the 1920s his music became clearer in outline and more contrapuntal, though without losing its wide range of harmonic resource: Sibelius became an influence. His main works were now symphonies, seven written 1922-39, though he remained a prolific composer in all non-theatrical genres. In 1942 he was made Master of the King's Music, after which he composed little.

Tone Poems

Festival Overture. Christmas Eve on the Mountains. Dance of Wild Irravel. Paean. Nympholept. Tintagel[a]
London Philharmonic Orchestra; [a]Ulster Orchestra / Bryden Thomson
Chandos CHAN9168 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1983-88

These pieces first appeared mostly as fillers to Bryden Thomson's complete recording of the Bax symphonies. Those who are beginning to explore this composer but would rather not start with a symphony will find the purest Bax, of course, in Tintagel, and a sumptuous reading it receives, but also in Nympholept – alluring wood magic of a kind Bax made peculiarly his own, here ravishingly scored. Christmas Eve is a less expected side of him, a moving vision of radiant peace descending upon a troubled Ireland. It just occasionally stumbles into his two besetting sins: sheer density of sound and a certain repetitiveness of rhythm – but Bax's Irish vein is strong within it, so is a powerful solemnity.

Dance of Wild Irravel is Bax's La valse; altogether too close to its model, you might think, until you realise that Bax's delirious waltz fantasy precedes Ravel's by a good few years. Paean is a deafening piece of pomp and circumstance for an enormous orchestra, redeemed by its exuberance and its brevity. The Festival Overture is exactly what its name suggests, but just when you think festivity is wearing a touch thin, a moment of truly Baxian wildness or a vintage Bax tune will lift it from among his occasional works into one of his characteristic ones. Thomson had a pretty well unerring instinct for Bax's elusive, glintingly changing moods – both playing and recorded sound are first-class.

In Memoriam. Concertante for Piano (Left-Hand) and Orchestra[a]. The Bard of the Dimbovitza[b]
[b]Jean Rigby mez [a]Margaret Fingerhut pf
BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Vernon Handley
Chandos CHAN9715 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998

The glorious tune that dominates the 1916 tone-poem In Memoriam will be familiar to many Bax enthusiasts from its use in his 1948 film score for David Lean's Oliver Twist, and to hear it in its original surroundings is both a moving and thrilling experience. It had long been assumed that the 32-year-old composer never got round to scoring this deeply felt elegy (originally entitled In Memoriam Pádraig Pearse), so it's pleasing to find that Vernon Handley and the BBC Philharmonic do full justice to its opulent yet iridescent sound world, with its strong echoes of The Garden of Fand and Nympholept.

The Concertante for left-hand piano and orchestra, written for Harriet Cohen after a domestic accident had left her right hand disabled, is not top-drawer Bax but remains an immensely appealing creation, boasting a central Moderato tranquillo in the composer's sweetest lyrical vein. Margaret Fingerhut is the deftest and most sympathetic of soloists.

The five orchestral songs that make up The Bard of the Dimbovitza, setting poems allegedly based on Romanian folk-songs, contain not a hint of local colour but are purest Bax, the harmonic idiom and overall mood strikingly similar to his Enchanted Summer. Jean Rigby vividly characterises the dialogue in the last two songs ('My girdle I hung on a tree-top tall' and 'Spinning Song'), while bringing plenty of drama to the almost operatic scena that is 'The Well of Tears'. Some typically lustrous Chandos engineering adorns this valuable triptych of recorded premières, and the issue as a whole deserves the heartiest of welcomes.

Additional recommendation
Tintagel
Coupling: Vaughan Williams Symphony No 5
Philharmonia Orchestra; London Symphony Orchestra / Barbirolli
EMI British Composers 5652110-2 Ⓑ
(54 minutes: ADD: 3/95)

Bax's rugged, wind-swept seascape finds Barbirolli in his element, and his reading is on the whole more passionately involving than either Boult's or Thomson's.

Symphonies Nos 1 and 7

Symphonies – No 1 in E flat^a; No 7^b
London Philharmonic Orchestra / ^{a}Myer Fredman, ^{b}Raymond Leppard
Lyrita SRCD232 (78 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded ^{a}1970, ^{b}1974 ●●

Few English composers have expressed such intense and fiercely passionate emotions as Bax has in the first two movements of his First Symphony. Such rage and grief as can be found there seem to suggest a psycho-drama being played out, and when we learn that at the time of its composition (1921) Bax may still have been coming to terms with the aftermath of the First World War, the loss of friends in the Easter Rising in Ireland and the irretrievable breakdown of his marriage, it is tempting to imagine that the symphony is indeed exercising some kind of personal exorcism on these events. Bax himself, however, was always reluctant to admit the existence of such a 'programme' behind the symphony, and in many ways he was probably right to do so. Whatever personal experiences Bax had poured into it, the end result is unquestionably a powerful, cogent symphony of universal appeal.

The Seventh and last of Bax's symphonies makes an intelligent and well-contrasted coupling. The first movement, though not without tension and some storm-tossed passages (very much a Baxian seascape this), has a prevailing mood of hope and expectation – as though embarking on some adventurous seaward journey to new lands, whilst the second movement finds Bax in wistful 'legendary' mood so evocative of the early tone-poems. The last movement begins by echoing the optimism of the first movement, but finally gives way, in the long and beautiful epilogue, to a mood of autumnal nostalgia and sad farewell. These are classic Lyrita recordings, with exceptionally fine performances and superb digital transfers.

Symphony No 2

Symphony No 2 in E minor/C. November Woods
Royal Scottish National Orchestra / David Lloyd-Jones
Naxos 8 554093 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1995 ●

From the grinding dissonances at the outset through to the inconsolable coda, Lloyd-Jones and his orchestra bring out the unremitting toughness of Bax's uncompromising, breathtakingly scored Second Symphony; even the gorgeous secondary material in the first movement offers an occasional shaft of pale, wintry sunlight. It helps, too, that Lloyd-Jones has clearly thought hard about the task in hand. How lucidly, for example, he expounds the arresting introduction, where the symphony's main building-blocks are laid out before us, and how well he brings out the distinctive tenor of Bax's highly imaginative writing for low wind and brass. The Scottish brass have a field-day.

Lloyd-Jones proves an equally clear-sighted navigator through the storm-buffeted landscape of November Woods, for many people, Bax's greatest tone-poem. Thoroughly refreshing in its enthusiasm and exhilarating sense of orchestral spectacle, this recording has a physical impact and emotional involvement that genuinely compel. A veritable blockbuster.

Additional recommendation
November Woods
Couplings: Northern Ballad No 1. Mediterranean. The Garden of Fand. Tintagel
London Philharmonic Orchestra / Boult
Lyrita SRCD231 (62 minutes: ADD: 9/92) Ⓕ
Boult's performance of this tone-poem is masterly and he generates a great deal of tension, atmosphere and drama.

Symphony No 3

Symphony No 3. The Happy Forest
Royal Scottish National Orchestra / David Lloyd-Jones
Naxos 8 553608 (54 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1996 ●

Dedicated to Sir Henry Wood, Bax's Symphony No 3 boasts arguably the richest store of memorable melodic invention to be found in any of the composer's cycle of seven, culminating in an inspired epilogue of wondrous, jaw-dropping beauty. David Lloyd-Jones's clear-headed, purposeful conducting of this intoxicating repertoire is the most judiciously paced and satisfyingly cogent Bax Third we've had since Barbirolli's pioneering 1943-44 Hallé account. Moreover, not only does Lloyd-Jones keep a firm hand on the tiller, he also draws some enthusiastic playing from the RSNO, which responds throughout with commendable polish and keen application.

Finely poised, affectingly full-throated solo work from principal horn and trumpet illuminates the progress of the ensuing Lento, whose ravishing landscape Lloyd-Jones surveys in less lingering fashion than either Barbirolli or Thomson. The first half of the finale, too, is a great success, Lloyd-Jones negotiating the fiendish twists and turns dictated by Bax's copious tempo markings with impressive aplomb. Only in the epilogue do you feel a need for a touch more rapt poetry. Tim Handley's excellently balanced recording is rich and refined, though the perspective is perhaps fractionally closer than ideal for The Happy Forest, which receives a performance of bounding vigour, gleeful mischief and muscular fibre; just that last, crucial drop of enchantment remains elusive. No matter, a disc not to be missed.

Additional recommendation

Symphony No 3[a]

Coupling: Violin Concerto[b] H

Kersey vn [a]Hallé Orchestra / Barbirolli; [b]BBC Symphony Orchestra / Boult

Dutton Laboratories Epoch CDLX7111 Ⓜ

(73 minutes: ADD: recorded 1943-44) ●

Barbirolli's recording of Bax's Third was the first of any Bax symphony and is quite simply a spellbinding achievement. No account on disc since – not even Lloyd-Jones – can match it for sheer authority and depth of feeling. The transfer boasts remarkable body and miraculously quiet surfaces.

Further listening

Bainton Symphony No 2 in D minor

Couplings: Clifford Symphony 1940

Gough Serenade

BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Handley

Chandos CHAN9757 (73 minutes: DDD: 12/99) Ⓕ

A most enjoyable release of enticingly off-the-beaten-track repertoire, including a glowing account of Edgar Bainton's imposing and powerfully communicative Third Symphony.

Symphony No 4

Symphony No 4. Nympholept.
Overture to a Picaresque Comedy

Royal Scottish National Orchestra / David Lloyd-Jones Ⓢ

Naxos 8 555343 (65 minutes: DDD) ●

David Lloyd-Jones and the RSNO continue their stimulating championship of Bax with this extremely persuasive account of the Fourth Symphony. It's at once the most exuberantly inventive and most sheerly colourful of the cycle (the instrumentation includes six horns and organ). Lloyd-Jones steers a tauter, more athletic course through the eventful first movement than his Gramophone Award-winning rival (Bryden Thomson on Chandos), yet there's no want of playful affection, and the orchestral playing satisfyingly combines polish and eagerness. In the gorgeous central Lento moderato Lloyd-Jones perceptively evokes a bracing, northerly chill wafting across Bax's dappled seascape. The unashamedly affirmative finale is a great success, its festive pomp and twinkling sense of fun conveyed with personable panache and swagger. If the symphony's jubilant closing pages reverberate in Thomson's version with just that crucial bit of extra weight and splendour in Belfast's Ulster Hall, Tim Handley's expert sound and balance do ample justice to Bax's distinctive scoring and his writing for low woodwind in particular.

The Overture to a Picaresque Comedy makes an apt and boisterous curtain-raiser, Lloyd-Jones's rip-roaring rendering knocking Thomson's limp LPO version into a cocked hat. Nympholept could hardly form a greater contrast: a ravishing nature-poem in Bax's most enchanted Celtic vein. Again, this sensitive account is far preferable to Thomson's curiously laboured conception. Altogether a superb release.

Symphony No 5

Symphony No 5 in C sharp minor. The Tale the Pine Trees Knew 💰

Royal Scottish National Orchestra / David Lloyd-Jones

Naxos 8 554509 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ

Recorded 1996 ●

The Fifth is perhaps the most characteristic of Bax's cycle of seven symphonies. For all the music's powerful range of emotion and its seemingly bewildering profusion of material and countless moments of bewitching beauty, its resourceful symphonic processes are not easy to assimilate on first hearing. Lloyd-Jones's intelligent and purposeful direction pays handsome dividends, and a well-drilled RSNO responds with sensitivity and enthusiasm. Lloyd-Jones excels in the opening movement's tightly knit canvas, its epic ambition matched by a compelling sense of momentum, architectural grandeur and organic 'wholeness'.

In the slow movement Lloyd-Jones paints a chillier, more troubled landscape than does Bryden Thomson (Chandos). The finale's main Allegro sets out with gleeful dash and a fine rhythmic snap to its heels. Lloyd-Jones judges that tricky, crisis-ridden transition into the epilogue well, and the apotheosis is a hard-won, grudging victory. The 1931 tone-poem The Tale the Pine Trees Knew makes an ideal bedfellow, foreshadowing as it does the bracingly 'northern' (to quote the composer) demeanour of the Fifth. Lloyd-Jones's comparatively extrovert treatment of the work's exultant final climax works perfectly convincingly within the context of his overall conception. Another eminently truthful, judiciously balanced sound picture from producer/engineer Tim Handley.

Symphony No 6

Symphony No 6. Into the Twilight. Summer Music

Royal Scottish National Orchestra / David Lloyd-Jones

Naxos 8 557144 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ

Recorded c2002 ●

David Lloyd-Jones's Bax series goes from strength to strength with this clear-headed interpretation of the exhilarating Sixth Symphony (arguably the last work to show the composer at creative white-heat).

Lloyd-Jones rides the tempest of the opening movement with particular success, while still allowing himself plenty of expressive leeway for the ravishing secondary material. In the central Lento he paints a bleakly beautiful, snow-flecked landscape. As for the ambitious finale (a tour de force of structural innovation and thematic integration), the conductor steers a superbly confident course, and the RSNO respond with unflagging spirit and no mean skill (there's a wonderfully rapt horn solo at the outset of the sublime epilogue).

As for the competition, Lloyd-Jones's band may not possess the silky sheen of the LPO under Bryden Thomson, but his conception is unquestionably the more satisfyingly taut of the two. Both Lloyd-Jones's fill-ups are sensitively done, although Into the Twilight doesn't equal the fragrant beauty and haunting allure of Thomson's intoxicating Ulster version. Unfortunately, the sound, while enormously vivid and wide-ranging, is neither quite as natural in timbre nor judiciously blended as on previous instalments (bigger tuttis tend towards an aggressive blur). None the less, a firm recommendation.

Further listening
Tubin Symphony No 2, 'The Legendary'
Coupling: Symphony No 6
Swedish Radio Symphony Orchestra / N Järvi
BIS CD304 (DDD: 4/86) Ⓕ

Tubin's Second Symhony possesses a luminous beauty and wonderfully organic power that repays acquaintance, especially in so convincing a performance as this.

Chamber works

Violin Sonatas – No 2 in D; No 3; [No 4] in F
Robert Gibbs vn Mary Mei-Loc Wu pf
ASV CDDCA1098 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded in 2000 ●

Robert Gibbs may not command the sheer projection or outsize personality of some of his more illustrious, globe-trotting colleagues, but his neat technique, soft-spoken eloquence and attractively husky tone give enormous pleasure, while Mary Mei-Loc Wu tenders ideally deft support. Theirs is a less 'public', more thoughtfully intimate reading of Bax's turbulent Second Sonata than either of their rivals', an approach well suited to this most autobiographical of Bax's utterances.

Their reading of the Third Sonata exhibits similar interpretative and poetic insights. Completed in 1927, it's a two-movement work of strong appeal, comprising a wondrously beautiful Moderato in this composer's most wistfully Celtic vein and a dashing Allegro whose exuberantly dancing outer portions frame a more poignantly reflective central episode. Gibbs and Wu also do full justice to the F major Sonata, which Bax subsequently recast as his bewitching Nonet.

The sound picture is beguilingly warm and the disc as a whole earns the heartiest of welcomes.

Ballad. Legend. Violin Sonatas – in G minor; No 1 in E
Robert Gibbs vn Mary Mei-Loc Wu pf
ASV CDDCA1127 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

The First Sonata is a passionate, deeply personal outpouring, essayed here with rapt understanding and tender intimacy. The rival Chandos performance may exhibit rather more in the way of commanding projection and urgent expression, but these newcomers' keen poetic instincts are never in doubt.

Both the Legend and Ballad date from the First World War years (of the broodingly elegiac Legend – much liked by Vaughan Williams, apparently – Bax later recalled to violinist May Harrison that it 'came straight out of the horror of that time'), whereas the single-movement Sonata in G minor is an amiable, confidently argued student effort from November 1901. Again, Gibbs and Wu lend consistently idiomatic and warm-hearted advocacy to this material. A very appealing collection, in short, and a mandatory purchase for confirmed Baxians.

String Quartets – No 1 in G; No 2 in E minor
Maggini Quartet
(Laurence Jackson, David Angel vns
Martin Outram va Michal Kaznowski vc)
Naxos 8 555282 (54 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 2001

Had Dvořák written an Irish Quartet to sit alongside his delectable American, it might well have sounded like the start of Bax's First String Quartet. Completed in 1918, this is one of Bax's most endearing and approachable scores. The clean-cut opening Allegretto semplice positively beams with happiness, and it's succeeded by a wistfully intimate slow movement. The finale begins and finishes in a mood of pagan revelry, though there's time for a ravishing episode in Bax's sweetest lyrical vein, its indelible tune a close cousin to the folksong The Fair Hills of Ireland. The Second Quartet of 1924-25 proves an altogether tougher nut to crack. Conceived at the same time as the Second Symphony, it's a knotty, densely plotted creation, as harmonically daring as Bax ever ventured and demanding formidable concentration from performers and listeners alike.

The Maggini Quartet do Bax absolutely proud, their performances striking an ideal balance between urgent expression and purposeful clarity. Both rival readings on Chandos have considerable strengths, but the Maggini's scrupulously dedicated advocacy will captivate both seasoned Baxians and newcomers alike. An outstanding coupling in every way.

String Quartet No 3 in F. Adagio ma non troppo, 'Cathleen-ni-Hoolihan'.
Lyrical Interlude for String Quintet[a] Maggini Quartet (Laurence Jackson, David Angel vn Martin Outram va Michal Kaznowski vc) with
[a]Garfield Jackson va 💰
Naxos 8 555953 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded c2002 ●●

Bax composed the last of his three mature string quartets between May and September 1936, inscribing it to the Griller Quartet who gave the first performance on the BBC National Programme the following May. An appealing, cogently structured 37-minute work, it is cast (unusually for Bax) in four movements, the joyous first of which 'was probably influenced by the coming of spring in beautiful Kenmare' (to quote the composer's own descriptive notes in The Radio Times). An Irish flavour also permeates the bardic Poco lento, while the third movement's 'dreamy, remotely romantic' trio melody is eventually cleverly welded to the 'rather sinister and malicious' scherzo material (try from the fugato passage at 7'26"). The vigorous finale builds up a fine head of steam and incorporates a wistful backward glance just before the close that is entirely characteristic of its creator.

The Maggini Quartet forge a well-paced and concentrated interpretation, playing with assurance, infectious rhythmic snap and heartwarming dedication. They are joined by violist Garfield Jackson for the haunting Lyrical Interlude from 1922 (a reworking of the slow movement from Bax's ambitious String Quintet of 1908), and there's another rarity in the shape of the lovely Adagio ma non troppo centrepiece from the 1903 String Quartet in E major that Bax orchestrated two years later as his first tone-poem, Cathaleen-ni-Hoolihan.

Throughout, the sound is faithful in timbre and the balance most musically judged. Don't miss this outstanding disc.

Octet. String Quintet. Concerto. Threnody and Scherzo. In Memoriam
Margaret Fingerhut pf
Academy of St Martin in the Fields Chamber Ensemble
Chandos CHAN9602 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●

This is a beautiful and enterprising collection of works by Bax. In Memoriam for cor anglais, harp and string quartet probably dates from 1917. Subtitled 'An Irish Elegy', and like the Elegiac Trio from the same period, its poignant mood reflects Bax's despair at the tragic events of the Easter Rising. In the single-movement String Quintet (completed in January 1933) Bax draws some luscious, almost orchestral sonorities from his chosen forces. Scored for horn, piano and string sextet, the 1934 Octet (labelled 'Serenade' on the short score) is a two-movement work of strong appeal and engaging charm: the magically evocative opening brings with it echoes of those unforgettable horn solos in the Third Symphony's central Lento, while the icy glitter of the piano part from 1'53" in the second-movement Scherzo momentarily conjures up the far-Northern landscape of Winter Legends.

The Threnody and Scherzo for bassoon, harp and string sextet of 1936 is perhaps less immediately striking. The writing is as fluent and accomplished as ever but the melodic material isn't as fresh as one might have wished. By contrast, the Concerto for flute, oboe, harp and string quartet is one of Bax's most likeable chamber offerings. This is a captivating transcription for septet of a Sonata for flute and harp from 1928 and proves an exquisite gem, its deft and joyous outer movements framing a lovely central 'Cavatina'. The sound is warm and transparent.

Nonet. Oboe Quintet. Elegiac Trio. Clarinet Sonata. Harp Quintet
Nash Ensemble (Philippa Davies fl Gareth Hulse ob Michael Collins cl Marcia Crayford, Iris Juda, Elizabeth Wexler vns Roger Chase va Christopher van Kampen vc Duncan McTier db Skaila Kanga hp Ian Brown pf)
Hyperion CDA66807 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ●●

A truly first-rate modern recording of Bax's Nonet. What a bewitching creation it is, overflowing with invention and breathtakingly imaginative in its instrumental resource (the sounds created are often almost orchestral). Bax worked on the Nonet at the same time (1929-30) as he was composing his Third Symphony and there are striking similarities between the two. The Nash Ensemble gives a masterly, infinitely subtle reading.

The remainder of the disc brings comparable pleasure. The delightful Oboe Quintet (written for Leon Goossens in 1922) receives immensely characterful treatment, especially the jaunty, Irish-jig finale (such richly communicative playing). The same is true of the lovely Harp Quintet, essayed here with rapt intensity and delicious poise. In the hands of these stylish artists, the Elegiac Trio possesses a delicacy and poignancy that are really quite captivating. That just leaves the engaging Clarinet Sonata, a work that has fared well in the recording studio over the last few years. Suffice to report, Michael Collins and Ian Brown are compelling advocates, and theirs is a performance to set beside (if not supersede) all rivals. Beautiful sound throughout.

Additional recommendation
Nonet
Couplings: Delius Violin Sonata No 3. 🄷
Ferguson Octet Moeran String Trio in G
Goossens ob various artists; Griller Quartet
Dutton CDAX8014 (72 minutes: ADD: 12/95) Ⓜ
Superb performances from a constellation of top artists.

Elegiac Trio[a]. Fantasy Sonata[b]. Quintet for Harp and Strings[c]. Sonata for Flute and Harp[d]
Mobius ([ad]Lorna McGhee fl [c]Kanako Ito, [c]Philippe Honoré vns [abc]Ashan Pillai va [c]Martin Storey vc Alison Nicholls hp) 🏵
Naxos 8 554507 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1999 ●●

Mobius is a gifted young London-based ensemble comprising seven prize-winning instrumentalists from four different countries, and their scrupulously shaded, fervent playing betokens a very real empathy with this gorgeous repertoire. In both the Elegiac Trio and Harp Quintet these artists favour a more boldly etched, less delicately evanescent approach than that of the Nash Ensemble (which is perhaps marginally more successful in distilling the poignant heartache of two works indissolubly associated with the tragic events of the 1916 Easter Rising). Especially valuable here is the impassioned rendering of the marvellous Fantasy Sonata for harp and viola of 1927. Certainly, harpist Alison Nicholls (a beguiling presence throughout) copes heroically with the daunting technical demands of Bax's writing (tailored for the virtuosity of the great Russian harpist, Maria Korchinska); moreover, she is splendidly partnered by violist Ashan Pillai. Likewise, the engagingly relaxed Sonata for Flute and Harp that Bax subsequently reworked into his Concerto for Seven Instruments (Chandos) emerges with delightful freshness, its plangent central 'Cavatina' as haunting as ever.

Sound and balance are just fine. Terrific value and strongly recommended.

Amy Beach

American 1867-1944

Amy Marcy Cheney Beach was born in New Hampshire in the United States. Musically precocious, she sang improvised harmony parts at the age of two, composed aged four, and began piano studies with her mother, Clara Imogene Marcy Cheney, at six, giving her first public recitals at seven. In 1885 she made her piano debut with the Boston Symphony. That same year she married Dr Henry Beach, a Harvard professor and amateur musician. In accordance with his wishes, she limited her public appearances and concentrated on composition until after his death in 1910.

Beach compsed works in many genres, including a Mass, a symphony, a piano concerto, and works for chamber ensembles, piano, mixed chorus, and solo voice. Her 30 works for women's chorus, including several cantatas, are well-crafted in a Romantic idiom, always with intelligent text setting.

Piano Concerto

Piano Concerto in C sharp minor, Op45[a]. Symphony in E minor, Op 32, 'Gaelic'
[a]Alan Feinberg pf Nashville Symphony Orchestra / Kenneth Schermerhorn
Naxos 8 559139 (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded c2002

Composed in 1898-99, Amy Beach's ambitious, singularly impressive Piano Concerto is at long last coming in from the cold. An expansively rhetorical Allegro moderato launches the work before a playful perpetuum mobile scherzo and moody Largo (described by its creator as a 'dark, tragic lament'); the finale goes with a delightful swing. In fact, it's a rewarding achievement all round, full of brilliantly idiomatic solo writing (Beach was a virtuoso pianist herself and performed the work many times) and lent further autobiographical intrigue by its assimilation of thematic material from three early songs.

Alan Feinberg brings more charisma to bear than Joanne Polk on her rival account for Arabesque, without any loss of delicacy or poetry, and his collaboration with Kenneth Schermerhorn and the Nashville Symphony undoubtedly generates greater thrust and spontaneity. The recording, too, is more pleasingly spacious, if a little lacking in body.

Following the success of her 1889 Mass in E flat, Beach knew that she needed to produce a large-scale symphony to cement her reputation; it was the Boston première of Dvořák's New World that finally spurred her into action. Responding to the Czech master's exhortation that American composers should turn to spirituals, plantation songs and minstrel-show music for inspiration, Beach selected four Irish melodies of 'simple, rugged and unpretentious beauty', moulding any additional themes 'in the same idiom and spirit'.

That the Gaelic Symphony (1894-96) won golden opinions from the outset comes as no surprise, given its big heart, irresistible charm and confident progress. Happily, Schermerhorn and his eager Nashville band more than hold their own by the side of Neeme Järvi and the Detroit SO. Theirs is a convincingly paced, tidy performance with real fire in its belly and plenty of character. A thoroughly enjoyable issue.

Ludwig van Beethoven

German 1770-1827

GROVE

Beethoven studied first with his father, Johann, a singer and instrumentalist in the service of the Elector of Cologne at Bonn, but mainly with CG Neefe, court organist. At 11 he was able to deputise for Neefe; at 12 he had some music published. In 1787 he went to Vienna, but quickly returned on hearing that his mother was dying. Five years later he went back to Vienna, where he settled.

He studied first with Haydn, though there was some clash of temperaments, and also with Schenk, Albrechtsberger and Salieri. Until 1794 he was supported by the Elector at Bonn, but he found patrons among the music-loving Viennese aristocracy and soon enjoyed success as a piano virtuoso, playing at private houses or palaces rather than in public. His public début was in 1795; about the same time his first important publications appeared, three piano trios Op 1 and three piano sonatas Op 2. As a pianist, it was reported he had fire, brilliance and fantasy as well as depth of feeling. It is naturally in the piano sonatas, writing for his own instrument, that he is at his most original in this period; the Pathétique belongs to 1799, the Moonlight ('Sonata quasi una fantasia') to 1801, and these represent only the most obvious innovations in style and emotional content. These years also saw the composition of his first three piano concertos, first two symphonies and a set of six string quartets Op 18.

1802, however, was a year of crisis for Beethoven, with his realisation that the impaired hearing he had noticed for some time was incurable and sure to worsen. That autumn, at a village outside Vienna, Heiligenstadt, he wrote a will-like document, addressed to his two brothers, describing his bitter unhappiness over his affliction in terms suggesting that he thought death was near. But he came through with his determination strengthened and entered a new creative phase, generally called his 'middle period'. It is characterised by a heroic tone, evident in the 'Eroica' Symphony (No 3, originally to have been dedicated not to a noble patron but to Napoleon), in Symphony No 5, where the sombre mood of the C minor first movement ('Fate knocking on the door') ultimately yields to a triumphant C major finale with piccolo, trombones and percussion added to the orchestra, and in his opera Fidelio. Here the heroic theme is made explicit by the story, in which (in the post-French Revolution 'rescue opera' tradition) a wife saves her imprisoned husband from murder at the hands of his oppressive political enemy. The three string quartets of this period – Op 59, are similarly heroic in scale: the first, lasting some 45 minutes, is conceived with great breadth, and it too embodies a sense of triumph as the intense F minor Adagio gives way to a jubilant finale in the major, embodying (at the request of the dedicatee, Count Razumovsky) a Russian folk melody.

Fidelio, unsuccessful at its première, was twice revised by Beethoven and his librettists and successful in its final version of 1814. Here there is more emphasis on the moral force of the story. It deals not only with freedom and justice, and heroism, but also with married love, and in the character of the heroine Leonore, Beethoven's lofty, idealised image of womanhood is to be seen. He did not find it in real life: he fell in love several times, usually with aristocratic pupils (some of them married), and each time was either rejected or saw that the woman did not match his ideals.

With his powerful and expansive middle-period works, which include the Pastoral Symphony (No 6, conjuring up his feelings about the countryside, which he loved), Symphonies Nos 7 and 8, Piano Concertos Nos 4 (a lyrical work) and 5 (the noble and brilliant 'Emperor') and the Violin Concerto, as well as more chamber works and piano sonatas (such as the 'Waldstein' and the 'Appassionata') Beethoven was firmly established as the greatest composer of his time. His piano-playing career had finished in 1808 (a charity appearance in 1814 was a disaster because of his deafness). That year he had considered leaving Vienna for a secure post in Germany, but three Viennese noblemen had banded together to provide him with a steady income and he remained there, although the plan foundered in the ensuing Napoleonic wars in which his patrons suffered and the value of Austrian money declined.

The years after 1812 were relatively unproductive. He seems to have been seriously depressed, by his deafness and the resulting isolation, by the failure of his marital hopes and (from 1815) by anxieties over the custodianship of the son of his late brother, which involved him in legal actions. But he came out of these trials to write his profoundest music. There are seven piano sonatas in this, his 'late period', including the turbulent 'Hammerklavier' Op 106, with its dynamic writing and its harsh, rebarbative fugue, and Op 110, which also has fugues and much eccentric writing at the instrument's extremes of compass; there is a great Mass and a Choral Symphony, No 9 in D minor, where the extended variation-finale is a setting for soloists and chorus of Schiller's Ode to Joy; and there is a group of string quartets, music on a new plane of spiritual depth, with their exalted ideas, abrupt contrasts and emotional intensity. The traditional four-movement scheme and conventional forms are discarded in favour of designs of six or seven movements, some fugal, some akin to variations (these forms especially attracted him in his late years), some song-like, some martial, one even like a chorale prelude. For Beethoven, the act of composition had always been a struggle, as the tortuous scrawls of his sketchbooks show; in these late works the sense of agonising effort is a part of the music.

Musical taste in Vienna had changed during the first decades of the 19th century; the public were chiefly interested in light Italian opera (especially Rossini) and easygoing chamber music and songs, to suit the prevalent bourgeois taste. Yet the Viennese were conscious of Beethoven's greatness: they applauded the Choral Symphony, even though, understandably, they found it difficult, and though baffled by the late quartets they sensed their extraordinary visionary qualities. His reputation went far beyond Vienna: the late Mass was first heard in St Petersburg, and the initial commission that produced the Choral Symphony had come from the Philharmonic Society of London. When he died 10,000 are said to have attended the funeral. He had become a public figure, as no composer had done before. Unlike composers of the preceding generation, he had never been a purveyor of music to the nobility: he had lived into the age, indeed helped create it, of the artist as hero and the property of mankind at large.

Complete Piano Concertos

No 1 in C, Op 15; No 2 in B flat, Op 19;
No 3 in C minor, Op 37; No 4 in G, Op 58;
No 5 in E flat, Op 73, 'Emperor'

Piano Concertos Nos 1-5
Pierre-Laurent Aimard pf Chamber Orchestra of Europe / Nikolaus Harnoncourt
Teldec ③ 0927-47334-2 (184 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded c2002 ◉◉◉

The freshness of this set is remarkable. You do not have to listen far to be swept up by its spirit of renewal and discovery, and in Pierre-Laurent Aimard as soloist Harnoncourt has made an inspired choice. Theirs are not eccentric readings of these old warhorses – far from it. But they could be called idiosyncratic – from Harnoncourt would you have expected anything else?

These are modern performances which have acquired richness and some of their focus from curiosity about playing styles and sound production of the past. Harnoncourt favours leaner string textures than the norm and gets his players in the excellent Chamber Orchestra of Europe to command a wide range of expressive weight and accent; this they do with an immediacy of effect that is striking. Yet there is a satisfying body to the string sound, too.

The playing seems to have recourse to eloquence without having to strive for it, and that is characteristic of Aimard's contribution as well. Strong contrasts are explored and big moments encompassed as part of an unforced continuity in which nothing is hurried. The big moments do indeed stand out: one of them is the famous exchange of dramatic gestures between piano and orchestra in the development of the E flat Concerto's (No 5's) first movement; another the equally dramatic but very different exchange when the piano re-enters at the start of the development in the first movement of the G major Concerto (No 4). At these junctures, conductor and pianist allow the gestures to disrupt the rhythmic continuity to a degree this reviewer doesn't remember previously encountering. Over the top? No, but risky maybe, and if you have strong views as to what the rubrics permit in Beethoven, or have swallowed a metronome, you may react strongly. For make no mistake, Aimard is as intrepid an explorer here as Harnoncourt – by conviction, not simply by adoption.

Technically, he is superbly equipped. You notice this everywhere but perhaps especially in the finales, brimful of spontaneous touches and delight in their eventfulness and in the sheer pleasure of playing them. The finale of the Emperor tingles with a continuously vital, constantly modulated dynamic life that it rarely receives; so many players make it merely rousing. And among the first movements, that of the G major Concerto is a quite exceptional achievement for the way Harnoncourt and his soloist find space for the fullest characterisation of the lyricism and diversity of the solo part – Aimard begins almost as if improvising the opening statement, outside time – while integrating these qualities with the larger scheme. It is the most complex movement in the concertos and he manages to make it sound both directional and free as a bird.

The first movement of the E flat Concerto is nearly as good, lacking only the all-seeing vision and authority Brendel brings to it, and perhaps a touch of Brendel's ability to inhabit and define its remoter regions. In general, Aimard imposes himself as a personality less than Brendel. In spite of being different exercises, their distinction touches at several points and is comparable in degree. What Aimard doesn't match is the variety of sound and the amplitude of Brendel's expressiveness in the first two concertos' slow movements. Balances are good, with the piano placed in a concert-hall perspective.

This set balances imagination and rigour, providing much delight and refreshment, and playing that will blow you away.

Piano Concertos Nos 1-5.
Piano Sonata in C minor, Op 111
Wilhelm Kempff pf
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Ferdinand Leitner
DG ③ 427 23726-GX3 (195 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1960s ●●

Kempff was never a heavyweight among Beethoven pianists. What he had was intellect and imagination in perfect balance, a fabulous touch, great rhythmic élan, and a kind of improvisatory zeal that – translated into other terms – can best be described as a true and abiding sense of wonder. And how beautifully Leitner and the Berlin Philharmonic accompany Kempff. This was the new young Berlin Philharmonic of the early 1960s, poet-musicians to a man, trained to listen and respond and then, in performance, take wing into precisely those areas of mind and imagination that were Kempff's own natural habitat.

Kempff's recording of the first two concertos dates from the early 1960s, but the sound quality is pleasingly open and full-bodied, so that the soloist's pearly, immaculate tone quality is heard to good effect. Kempff and Leitner enjoy what is obviously a close rapport and their aristocratic, Olympian but poetic music-making suits both works admirably. His cadenzas, his own in the first four concertos, will infuriate some as much as they will delight those of us – people who like steam trains and still refer to the wireless – who occasionally tire of all the regimentation and ratiocination of modern music-making.

His account of the Emperor remains a classic recording that sounds very well in DG's remastering of the 1962 originals which often bring out previously unnoticed orchestral details with remarkable immediacy. This applies to the set as a whole, which is a very tempting proposition, quirky cadenzas and all. In the Fourth Piano Concerto (1961) you may be less than happy with his decision to use his own cadenzas, but the performance as a whole is such a joy, so light-filled, that even that qualification tends to fade into insignificance. It sounds especially radiant in these transfers. Despite a touch of gruffness in some of the orchestral tuttis in the Emperor it, too, generally comes up with glistening clarity. In many ways these are the liveliest performances of all the complete sets available, physically and intellectually, since Schnabel's pre-war set.

Piano Concertos Nos 1-5.
Choral Fantasia C minor, Op 80
Daniel Barenboim pf John Alldis Choir;
New Philharmonia Orchestra / Otto Klemperer
EMI ③ 763360-2 (211 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1967 ●

Klemperer had done concert cycles, perhaps most memorably in London in the 1950s with Claudio Arrau but his decision to record the piano concertos at the age of 82 came as a result of his admiration for the most precociously talented of all young Beethoven pianists at the time, Daniel Barenboim. Barenboim was 25 and about to embark on what was to be an exceptionally fine cycle of the Beethoven piano sonatas. He was steeped in Beethoven and perhaps peculiarly well suited to the concertos which, we should not forget, are essentially a young man's music. It was a fascinating pairing, Klemperer and Barenboim contrasted in age and to some extent in temperament but at the same time symbiotically at one musically. Had this not been the case, Barenboim would have been swamped, lost in the wash of Klemperer's accompaniments which deliver the orchestral argument and the orchestral detail with an articulacy and authority unique in the history of these works on record.

The performance of the B flat Concerto, the first historically if not numerically, is a typical joy, full of fire and grace and unstoppably vital. Given Klemperer's propensity for taking slow tempos in Beethoven, you might imagine him being taken for a ride by the young Barenboim in the B flat and C major finales. But not a bit of it. It is Klemperer, as much as his youthful soloist, who seems to be the driving force here. Rarely on record has the slow movement of the C major Concerto been played with so natural a sense of concentrated calm, the whole thing profoundly collected on the spiritual plane. One of the joys of the Barenboim/Klemperer cycle is its occasional unpredictability: rock-solid readings that none the less incorporate a sense of 'today we try it this way'.

Ensemble is mostly first-rate during the cycle. The tricky coda of the first movement of the C minor Concerto is both rapt and dramatic. But in the coda of the first movement of the G major there is little doubt that Klemperer drags the pulse. And elsewhere there are some occasionally awkward adjustments to be made between soloist and orchestra. At the time of its initial appearance, the Emperor performance was generally adjudged a success. It is again broadly conceived. At first the finale seems a little staid; but later the 6/8 rhythms are made to dance and the performance has a burning energy by the end. So does the account of the Choral Fantasia. Given Klemperer's magisterial style and authority, this set could have emerged as five symphonies with piano obbligato. In fact, it is a set of rare authority and spontaneity, and given the slightly unconventional idea of the soloist as primus inter pares, it is probably unique.

Piano Concertos Nos 1-5
Murray Perahia pf Concertgebouw Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Sony Classical ③ S3K44575 (178 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1983-86
Nos 3-4 won a 1986 Gramophone Award ●●

Perahia's account of the C minor Concerto (No 3) is a joy from start to finish, wonderfully conceived, executed conducted and recorded. The single issue, coupled with this account of the G major Concerto (No 4), began life by winning the 1986 Gramophone Concerto Award. In these two concertos, and in the two earlier ones, Perahia and Haitink are difficult to fault. The First Concerto is especially well done with a quick first movement and the apt and delightful inclusion in the finale of a cadenza that Beethoven sketched in 1800. If Perahia is anywhere slightly below par it is in the Emperor Concerto. The reading gives us an emergent view of the work, undiscursive but perhaps at times lacking in a certain largeness of vision and purpose. For that we must return to Kempff or Arrau, which only confirms the pitfalls of buying cycles rather than separate performances. However, the Perahia cycle is one of the most consistently accomplished of those currently available; the recordings are a joy to listen to.

Piano Concertos Nos 1-5
Alfred Brendel pf
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
Philips ③ 462 781-2PH3 (178 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●

Nos 1 and 4 available on Philips 462 782-2PH Ⓕ
Nos 2 and 3 available on Philips 462 783-2PH Ⓕ
No 5 on Philips 468 666-2PH Ⓕ

Happily, Alfred Brendel's fourth recorded cycle of the Beethoven piano concertos shares with the previous three qualities of energy, sensibility, intellectual rigour and high pianistic finish which made the earlier recordings so interesting. Brendel has always played all five slow movements supremely well, drawing the orchestra around him like a celebrant at the communion table and here we have even finer performances than previously.

In the two early concertos the Vienna Philharmonic's playing has a sweetness and allure, in the grander, later works a black-browed power, that is specially its own. Brendel's playing in the early concertos recalls his fine recordings of the early sonatas and the early and late Bagatelles, but it is as a private person impatient with the conventions and frock-coated formalities of the concertos as 'public' works. With the Third Concerto we move into a different world. This is a marvellous performance from all three partners, purposeful and robust, the tonic C minor the cue for a reading which is full of darkness and menace, basses to the fore, drums at the ready. The finale is particularly ominous (relieved only by a gloriously lustrous clarinet solo) after an account of the slow movement, full-toned yet deeply quiet, the like of which one might dream of but rarely hope to hear. The C minor Concerto's heroic antitype, the Emperor in E flat, fares less well. Not the slow movement or finale, but the first movement which is slower than heretofore, to no very good effect. Perhaps it is that interpreters nowadays are less happy than their predecessors were with Beethoven's heroic persona. Back in the private world of the Fourth Concerto, where charmed magic casements open on the foam of perilous seas in faerie lands forlorn, soloist, orchestra and conductor are at their inspired best. Brendel's glittering, wonderfully propelled account of the solo part is superbly backed by playing of real fire and sensitivity. It is a powerful performance, too. The recordings are first-rate.

Piano Concertos Nos 1-5
Maurizio Pollini pf Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
DG ③ 439 770-2GH3 Ⓕ
(174 minutes: DDD). Recorded live in 1992-93

There may be more individual and idiosyncratic interpreters of the music than Maurizio Pollini but there is none whose command, at best, is sovereign. The Fourth Concerto has a keenly felt sense of the evolving drama, and a slow movement where the dialogue between piano and orchestra is spellbinding in its intensity. Maybe Pollini is not yet entirely reconciled to Beethoven's prankish first concerto, the Concerto No 2 in B flat. In the outer movements, he can seem brusque: ill-at-ease with Beethoven in his rumbustious, amorous, Hooray Henry mood. By contrast, the performance of the Third is a joy from start to finish. Abbado and Pollini are hand-in-glove, which gives this cycle a cohesiveness which Pollini's previous set with Jochum and Böhm (for DG) rather obviously lacked, though the Berliners don't play the first movement of the Emperor Concerto as commandingly as Böhm and the VPO on the earlier recording. But the slow movement goes well, and the finale is more jovial than before. Musically, though, there are evident gains – in these live recordings – moments where the tension is palpable in a way that it rarely is in the recording studio. The sound is full-bodied and immediate, with applause, a few squeaks and ill-timed coughs.

Piano Concertos Nos 1[a] and 2[b]
Solomon pf Philharmonia Orchestra / [a]Herbert Menges, [b]André Cluytens Ⓕ
Testament [b]mono SBT1219 (63 minutes: ADD) ◉

Piano Concertos Nos 3[a] and 4[b]
Solomon pf Philharmonia Orchestra / [a]Herbert Menges, [b]André Cluytens Ⓕ
Testament [b]mono SBT1220 (70 minutes: ADD) ◉

Beethoven Piano Concerto No 5
Mozart Piano Sonatas – No 11 in A, K331; No 17 in D, K576
Solomon pf Philharmonia Orchestra / Menges
Testament mono SBT1221 (74 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1952-56 ◉

Here, on three CDs, are Solomon's legendary 1952-56 recordings of the Beethoven piano concertos and two Mozart piano sonatas, a felicitous coupling. Time and again Beethoven's exuberant, unpredictable nature is qualified by playing of a supreme poise and equanimity that omits so little of his essential character. It is also one of Solomon's cardinal qualities that he makes it impertinent to single out this or that detail, offering instead a seamless argument as supple and natural as it is understated.

Solomon makes the slow movements the expressive centres of each concerto, and here his ability to sustain an Adagio or Largo is without equal. This is notably true of the first two concertos, where such writing becomes music to soothe the savage breast rather than awake more immediate emotions. In the outer movements his superfine technique and musicianship make light of every difficulty, and at 6'55" in the Second Concerto, after an impatient if very Beethovenian entry, he recreates a truly magical sense of stillness and repose.

In the Third Concerto the Largo is impeccably controlled and so, too, is the central Andante con moto from the Fourth Concerto. Solomon's momentary lack of control in the first movement at 9'37" is, perhaps, an indication of problems caused by Cluytens' less than vital or stimulating partnership. And yet the finale could hardly be more vivace, with all the clarity and grace for which Solomon was celebrated.

In the Emperor Concerto Solomon somehow bridges the gap between the Fourth and Fifth Concertos. His immaculate ease and buoyancy in the double-note descent just before the first movement's conclusion, his limpid and serene traversal of the central Adagio are pure Solomon, and his finale is among the least opaque on record. Surprises include the shorter cadenza in the First Concerto, Clara Schumann's cadenza in the Third (enterprising if less distinguished than Beethoven's own magnificent offering) and a few teasing elaborations in the two cadenzas from the Fourth.

The recordings come up well (though the sound in the Fifth needs some opening out; it lacks ring and brilliance), and the Mozart sonatas are a delectable bonus. Listening to Solomon's peerless pianism and musicianship, the critic discards pen and paper and listens in awe, wonder and affection.

Piano Concertos Nos 1 and 2

Lars Vogt pf
City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI 556266-2 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Includes a bonus disc of Piano Concerto No 1 with Glenn Gould's cadenzas. Recorded 1995 ◉

This is a remarkable disc, as fine a recorded account of these two concertos as we've had in the 1990s. Alongside these performances, most rivals sound unduly one-dimensional. Vogt's playing in the two slow movements is wonderfully pellucid, but deep too. One thinks of Kempff, here and in the exquisite shaping of the lyric meditation midway through the Second Concerto's first movement. The CBSO's playing is also a miracle of finely wrought colours and despite the fact that these performances have evidently been worked out with great care, they remain spontaneously alive in a way that is rare on record.

In the B flat Concerto, the dialogue between soloist and orchestra in the first movement has a Haydnesque alertness. The slow movement is exquisitely done; the finale is an almost perfect re-enactment of Beethoven's impish game of musical hide-and-seek. Vogt is a great admirer of Glenn Gould. So much so that we have here a rather strange 'bonus'. The performance of the First Concerto is reprinted on a separate CD not with Beethoven's cadenzas (Vogt uses the big third cadenza in the first movement of the main performance) but with Gould's. Although it would probably not sway you one way or another in deciding whether or not to buy this disc, who needs further persuasion when faced with performances of this order of delight?

Piano Concertos Nos 1 and 2
Murray Perahia pf
Concertgebouw Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Sony Classical SK42177 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1986 ●

It is a pleasure here to salute such all-round excellence: a very remarkable soloist, superb orchestral playing and direction, and a recording which gets everything right, offering the kind of sound picture and natural perspective of solo piano with orchestra as we might experience them from a good seat in the Concertgebouw itself where these performances were recorded.

Precision, clarity of expression, variety of character, beauty of sound: these are the qualities which Haitink and Perahia sustain and through which their readings gain an illuminating force. And it's perhaps in the slow movements that the illumination brings the most distinguished results. Their raptness and distinctive colouring are established from the first notes, and the inward quality of the expression takes breath as if there was nothing to the business of delineating these great set-pieces, so special among the achievements of Beethoven's first maturity, except to sing them through. Perahia has the gift of reducing his voice to the quietest level and still remaining eloquent. The poise of the playing is classical, his authority unblemished by any hint of exaggeration or false emphasis.

Piano Concertos Nos 1 and 2
Martha Argerich pf
Philharmonia Orchestra / Giuseppe Sinopoli
DG Masters Series 445 504-2GMA Ⓜ
(65 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1985

Argerich is an exceptionally brilliant pianist, but she needs to be if she is to master a world in which great issues are often rumbustiously addressed. Some works in the Beethoven canon have been tellingly illuminated by pianists like Clara Haskil and Dame Myra Hess but women who can take on Beethoven in his most bullish mood are few and far between. Argerich has something of the necessary dauntlessness; she has also studied with some of the most distinguished as well as the most radical of post-war Beethoven pianists, including Gulda, Michelangeli, and Kempff. She is, of course, a brilliant technician; but there is also a fantastic streak in her make-up, a capacity for creative fantasy, which is needed if areas of these remarkable works are to be brought fully and vividly to life. In both these early concertos, her touch is light and expert. It is difficult to fault Argerich although her performance will unsettle the concentration of some collectors who may be happier with Kempff's performances with Leitner (reviewed above).

Sinopoli is at once attentive and unobtrusive in the C major Concerto, a perfect foil to Argerich. In the B flat Concerto, both Argerich and Sinopoli seem intent on personal point-making. There is room for private improvisation in this concerto as Kempff has amply demonstrated, but it is the pianist who must give the lead here. DG's recording is very agreeable, the ampleness of the orchestral acoustic offset by a certain distance and depth of perspective.

Piano Concertos Nos 2 and 5

Evgeni Kissin pf
Philharmonia Orchestra / James Levine
Sony Classical SK62926 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

From his very first entry, in the B flat Concerto, Kissin is revealed as a Beethoven player of great articulacy, brilliance and sensitivity after the manner of such pianists as Kempff, Solomon, and Gilels. The playing is vital and fluent, the technique awesome, not least in the way Kissin is able to refine his tone and taper dynamics in the high-lying coloratura passages where Beethoven's writing is at its most inspired and rarefied. The recitative at the end of the slow movement is predictably beautiful: intense and otherworldly. Levine draws from the Philharmonia playing that is both spirited and engaged. The recorded sound is admirable, too: strong and clean yet appropriately intimate.

The performance of the Emperor Concerto is also very fine. If you take the view that this is essentially a symphony with piano obbligato, you may hanker after a grander kind of musical theatre than that provided by Levine. He directs with decision and accompanies superbly. Kissin, too, plays with great flair and technical security. If there is a problem here it is with the articulation of the simple-seeming lyric statements where a degree of self-consciousness occasionally creeps in: where the flow is arrested and music suddenly seems to be walking on stilts. There is an element of this in the slow movement, though Kissin's playing of the bleak, trailing 24-bar-long diminuendo close is masterly. This is very much a young man's view of the music, but weighty too, such is the power of his technique.

Piano Concertos Nos 3 and 4

Awards 1986

Murray Perahia pf
Concertgebouw Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Sony Classical SK39814
(70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1986 ●●●

These performances have rightly been described as exceptional. They were directly compared to Alfred Brendel's accounts with James Levine (on Philips) but in the event, there is little to choose between these two distinguished soloists. The first movements are brilliantly and sensitively etched (Perahia uses Beethoven's bigger first cadenza in the first movement of the G major Concerto). Tempos are steady but with a fine degree of forward projection. Once past the daunting opening solo, Perahia plays the C minor's slow movement with great sureness and subtlety of touch; and with Haitink as his partner the exchanges in the G major's slow movement are memorably brought off. Note the superior quality of the Sony recordings and the wonderfully judicious accompaniments prepared for Perahia by the Concertgebouw Orchestra under Haitink. If there is little to choose between Perahia and Brendel as soloists, there is a great gulf between Haitink, who is exemplary, and Levine who is unexceptional.

Piano Concertos Nos 3ᵃ and 4
Mitsuko Uchida pf
Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra / Kurt Sanderling
Philips 446 082-2PH (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded (ᵃlive) 1994 ●

The playing on this formidable pairing of works is at once brilliant and sensitive, rigorous and free-spirited. Of the two performances, that of the Fourth Concerto is perhaps the more memorable. Uchida re-creates the solo part with flair and imagination, and dazzling technique. And what a wonderful voyage of discovery the slow movement is here. If the performance seems a touch mellower and more confiding than that of the C minor Concerto, it is perhaps because it was being played live to an audience in the Concertgebouw, a hall whose famous acoustic can be a shade severe when empty. What we have here is a first-rate concert-hall perspective.

Some might argue that the C minor Concerto is a severe piece. Certainly, this generally appears to be Sanderling's and Uchida's view of the first movement. The performance is wonderfully alive, which is more than can be said for 75 per cent of extant recordings of this music, but there are pianists – Kempff for example – who have made the music of the first movement move a shade more gracefully and songfully than Uchida does here. The slow movement, by contrast, emerges as a wonderfully rapt soliloquy for the solo pianist, the orchestra doing little more than make simple acts of obeisance before the soloist. (Rather stiff acts of obeisance: throughout the C minor Concerto Sanderling is inclined to make the orchestra sit rather heavily on down-beats and sforzandos.) The recording of the C minor Concerto is best heard at a safe distance. Played too loud or heard too close it can seem unduly fierce and odd blemishes show up.

Piano Concertos Nos 4 and 5

Emil Gilels pf H
Philharmonia Orchestra / Leopold Ludwig
Testament SBT1095 (73 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1957 ●●

This is one of the – perhaps the most – perfect accounts of the Fourth Concerto recorded. Poetry and virtuosity are held in perfect poise, with Ludwig and the Philharmonia providing a near-ideal accompaniment. The recording is also very fine, though be sure to gauge the levels correctly by first sampling one of the tuttis. If the volume is set too high at the start, you will miss the stealing magic of Gilels's and the orchestra's initial entries and you will be further discomfited by tape hiss that, with the disc played at a properly judged level, is more or less inaudible.

The recording of the Emperor Concerto is also pretty good, not quite on a par with that of the Fourth. Ludwig and the orchestra tend to follow Gilels rather than always integrate with him and there are times, too, especially in the slow movement, when Gilels's playing borders on the self-indulgent. This is not, however, sufficient reason for overlooking this fine and important Testament reissue.

Piano Concertos Nos 4 and 5
Maurizio Pollini pf
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Karl Böhm
DG Classikon 439 483-2GCL (71 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1976

This is an outstanding coupling of Pollini's earlier recordings of these works (the complete set of his later recordings with Abbado is reviewed above). The present performances are, arguably, more spontaneous and the recording (especially of the piano) more natural, with the VPO expanding warmly within the ambience of the Grosser Saal of the Vienna Musikverein. These readings are freshly individual, with poise and poetry nicely balanced in both works, and with Böhm providing admirable accompaniments (the interchange in the slow movement of the G major is memorable). And Pollini is suitably magisterial in the Emperor. Most enjoyable, and stimulating too.

Piano Concertos Nos 4 and 5
Murray Perahia pf
Concertgebouw Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Sony Classical Theta SMK89711 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1986 ●●●
No 4 won a 1986 Gramophone Award (reviewed above)

This is a superb bargain, combining Perahia's Gramophone Award-winning Fourth with an excellent Emperor, on a level with the best. Comparisons with other pianists, at this level, can be rather futile. It is a splendidly engineered recording, with a natural concert-hall type of balance, and there is good presence to the sound and depth to the perspective. The presentation of the orchestral detail allows one to delight in it, and perhaps to discover new subtleties, without a moment of unease as to whether anything has been forced into the wrong kind of relief. Perahia's performance has the freshness and natural authority one has now come to expect of him in Beethoven. His reading might be described as uncomplicated if that didn't risk implying that it is in some way lightweight, or that he plays like a child of nature. The weight is certainly there, in sound (when he wants it) as in expression.

Perahia himself has spoken of the happy experience of making this Beethoven cycle with Haitink (the other concertos including the complete set are reviewed above). It has indeed been a successful collaboration, and a joyous quality about the music-making communicates itself quite strongly from the beginning.

Piano Concerto No 5
Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli pf
Vienna Symphony Orchestra / Carlo Maria Giulini
DG 419 249-2GH (42 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1979 ●

There has, over the years, been mixed reactions to Michelangeli's Beethoven. He was a most perplexing artist, perplexing because he liked to keep his musical personality well hidden – or at any rate mysterious – behind the armour-plated magnificence of his playing; disconcerting too because it is hard to arrive at a reasoned assessment of readings of classical music by someone who is evidently not a man of balance. To interpret texts of the classical masters in a way which will give them the most vivid life does not seem to be his principal concern. There could be an intellectual froideur about his playing of Beethoven which verges on the disdainful and which was sometimes more than off-putting.

Not here though. This performance was recorded at a public performance in the Musikverein. He drives the opening flourishes hard, and thereafter responds keenly to Giulini's exposition, grand but always moving forward, matching it with a purpose that seems to derive from just that long-range musical thinking which is so often missing in his accounts of the other concertos. There is spaciousness, and time for everything, and always that rock-like strength of rhythm. The detailing could hardly be bettered but isn't allowed to deflect attention from our perception of the form. The security of the technique is enough to make most other pianists attempting an Olympian view of the concerto seem clumsy; but it does not draw attention to itself. Since the depth of his sonority is perfectly matched to the orchestra's, it makes for some especially exciting listening in the finale. Great playing by a great pianist.

Piano Concerto No 5. Triple Concerto in C, Op 56[a]
Leon Fleisher, Eugene Istomin pfs Isaac Stern vn
Leonard Rose vc
Cleveland Orchestra / George Szell; [a]Philadelphia Orchestra / Eugene Ormandy
Sony Classical Essential Classics SBK46549 Ⓑ
(74 minutes: ADD) Recorded 1961, [a]1964 ●

Leon Fleisher's recording of the Emperor is very powerful indeed. He was relatively young at the time and obviously George Szell had a considerable influence on the reading, but the solo playing is remarkably fresh and its pianistic authority is striking. That great octave passage in the first movement, just before the recapitulation, is enormously commanding, and Fleisher's lyrical playing, in the slow movement especially, has striking poise. Szell keeps the voltage high throughout, but for all its excitement this is by no means a hard-driven, unfeeling interpretation. The recording is bright, bold and forward in the CBS 1960s manner, and the Severance Hall acoustic prevents any ugliness.

A splendid Emperor, then, but what makes this disc even more enticing is the inclusion of an equally distinguished version of the Triple Concerto, recorded in Philadelphia Town Hall (a much more successful venue than many used over the years for this great orchestra). The very gentle opening by the orchestra is full of anticipatory tension, and at the beginning of the slow movement Ormandy's preparation for Rose's glorious cello solo demonstrates what a superb accompanist he is. Indeed, this is no mere accompaniment, but a complete partnership. Although Stern's personality dominates marginally, the three soloists play together like a chamber-music team, without in any way submerging their individuality. The sound is very good for its time. This entire disc is a prime example where Sony's sobriquet 'Essential Classics' is justly appended.

Piano Concerto No 5. Choral Fantasia in C minor, Op 80
Alfred Brendel pf London Philharmonic Choir and Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Philips Insignia 434 148-2PM (61 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1976-77 ●

Philips achieves consistent success with digital remastering, adding a presence and firmness of focus that seldom produce unwanted edginess. This certainly applies to Alfred Brendel's recording of the Fifth Concerto, coupled with his even more impressive Choral Fantasia. This latter is unforgettable, he and Haitink making something especially dazzling of this work. No one plays the big opening cadenza with more power and authority than Brendel and a similar magisterial breadth informs the Emperor, even though the first movement perhaps sounds a little too controlled, this is still a very satisfying performance. The choral contribution to the Fantasia is quite splendid. The recording combines orchestral weight with brilliance, and a most believable piano image.

Violin Concerto in D, Op 61

Awards 1981

Violin Concerto
Itzhak Perlman vn Philharmonia Orchestra / Carlo Maria Giulini
EMI Great Recordings of the Century 566900-2
(44 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1980 ●●●

This is a very distinguished performance indeed, as much from Giulini as from Perlman. Early on Guilini makes clear the importance of recognizing the difference between forte and fortissimo in Beethoven – for example the ff of bars 73 and 74 and the f which surrounds them; and the marvellous way he gets the Philharmonia to play sfp is a pleasure in itself. The liquid smoothness of the wind playing is another joy.

The slow movement has the utmost calm beauty from both soloist and orchestra, while Perlman plays the finale at an admirably swift speed, yet with all the flexibility it needs, so that it really dances lightly. Contrast Chung on Decca whose finale is almost lethargic in comparison, and Kremer for Philips who takes it at a terrible lick but puts it firmly into a strait-jacket. The clarity of the orchestral texture is outstanding too. The bassoon, for example, sings its solos in the finale easily and without the least forcing, whereas on the Chung recording it sounds more consciously brought forward. The Decca is no match in general sound either.

Violin Concerto. Romance No 2
Oscar Shumsky vn Philharmonia Orchestra / Sir Andrew Davis
ASV Quicksilva CDQS6080 (54 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1988 ●●

Oscar Shumsky's recording of the Violin Concerto is one of the finest in the catalogue and was strongly recommended at premium price. In this reissue it is a bargain par excellence. The reading is relaxed and assured and has a serene purity of line, notably so in the memorable Larghetto, which is quite beautifully played. Andrew Davis provides his soloist with admirable support and the orchestral contribution is highly sympathetic. The sound balance favours the soloist with something of a spotlight, but otherwise the recording is very good: those wanting a bargain-price version of this work could hardly better this, especially as the Romance in F major is given as an encore.

Beethoven Violin Concerto
Bernstein Serenade
Hilary Hahn vn Baltimore Symphony Orchestra / David Zinman
Sony Classical SK60584 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●

At first glance, this would seem a pretty strange coupling, yet by trailing the most Olympian of classical violin concertos with a semi-concerto based on a Platonic dialogue Hilary Hahn and Sony suggest their own quaint form of programming logic. Hahn employs her sweet-centred tone with utmost finesse and David Zinman's Baltimore accompaniment is smooth, unhurried and clear-sighted. Hahn opts for Kreisler's cadenza and makes a special feature of the simultaneous projection of themes, broadening the pace then re-entering into the movement, as if caught in a trance. Her approach is lyrical and unindulgent, though most definitely post-Romantic. She is an immaculate technician who favours a calculated though richly expressive approach to phrasing. She breathes considerable warmth into the Larghetto and offers a crisp account of the finale. Of its kind, this performance looks unbeatable.

One of Bernstein's most enduring works, the lovable 1954 Serenade, draws on ideas from Plato's The Symposium, principally those concerning love, and includes a gorgeous three-part song and a finale that looks sideways at On the Waterfront and forwards to West Side Story. Hahn's tender-hearted rendition lays claim to being the finest interpretation ever, aided and abetted by Zinman's firmly focused conducting. Both works are beautifully recorded.

Violin Concerto. Romances – No 1 in G, Op 40; No 2 in F, Op 50
Gidon Kremer vn Chamber Orchestra of Europe / Nikolaus Harnoncourt
Warner Elatus 0927-49773-2 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded live in 1992 ●

Gidon Kremer offers one of his most commanding performances, both polished and full of flair, magnetically spontaneous from first to last. Rarely do you hear such consistently pure tone in this work and the orchestral writing too is superbly realised. It has become customary to treat the long first movement as expansively as possible but Kremer takes a more urgent view, and after his thoughtful and dedicated, slightly understated reading of the slow movement, he and Harnoncourt round the performance off magically with a finale that skips along the more infectiously thanks to light, clean articulation and textures. Traditional performances seem heavyweight by comparison. The controversial point for some will be the cadenza in the first movement where he uses a transcription of the big cadenza which Beethoven wrote for his piano arrangement of the work. However, this is altogether one of the most refreshing versions of the concerto ever committed to record, backed up by crisp, unsentimental readings of the two Romances.

Violin Concerto. Romances Nos 1 and 2 🄿
Thomas Zehetmair *vnOrchestra of the Eighteenth Century / Frans Brüggen
Philips 462 123-2PH (54 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1997 ●●

This is a great performance, one that simply has to be heard. The first movement is built on a tug of war between dynamic extremes and, for once, it actually sounds like a concerto, and a brilliant one at that. The more familiar average playing time of around 25 minutes (Zehetmair's lasts a mere 22) tends, for all its beautiful effect, to compromise on forward momentum. Here, the use of period instruments adds extra fibre to the aural mix, and Brüggen's conducting has a pressing urgency about it that, again, intensifies the drama. The Larghetto is full of subtle nuances and telling inflexions, and the Rondo has great rhythmic verve.

Two recording venues are used, the excellent Muziekcentrum at Enschede for the two Romances and the rather cavernous Vredenburg, Utrecht for the concerto. The former yields the more sympathetic acoustic (Zehetmair and Brüggen offer limpidly flowing performances of both pieces), but it is unlikely that the slightly rougher-edged concerto recording will give much cause for complaint. This is one of the recordings of Beethoven's Violin Concerto, and is to be strongly recommended.

Beethoven Violin Concerto[a] 🅷
Mendelssohn Violin Concerto in E minor, Op 64[b]
Yehudi Menuhin vn
[a]Philharmonia Orchestra, [b]Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Wilhelm Furtwängler
EMI Great Recordings of the Century mono
566975-2 (71 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1952-53

Furtwängler and Menuhin recorded the Beethoven Concerto on two occasions, and this second version has an extraordinary quality of spirituality and profundity. Furtwängler's conducting of the opening tutti has a magnificently arresting, weighty quality, and Menuhin's response, profound and rich in re-creative imagination shows the two great artists in perfect accord. Their account of this movement is on the largest scale, yet they convey Beethoven's vision in a humane, approachable fashion. The slow movement has a highly concentrated yet serene character, with Menuhin's rapt, singing tone achieving rare eloquence, and the finale is superbly balanced, with an affecting sense of a shared, joyful experience. The recording sounds quite similar to the original LP issue, but the quality is quite acceptable.

The Mendelssohn was recorded a year earlier, and here remastering has brought a slight roughening in an orchestral sound which was never very ingratiating, though the defect is not serious. Menuhin and Furtwängler float the first movement in an unhurriedly serene, elegantly shaped fashion. In the slow movement they achieve a touchingly tender, almost innocent quality and the finale, taken at a moderate tempo, has lightness and an appealingly eager character.

Beethoven Violin Concerto[a] 🅷
Brahms Violin Concerto in D, Op 77[b]
Jascha Heifetz vn [a]NBC Symphony Orchestra / Arturo Toscanini; [b]Boston Symphony Orchestra / Serge Koussevitzky 🏵
Naxos Historical mono 8 110936 (77 minutes: AAD) Ⓢ
Recorded [a]1939 and [b]1940 ●●●

'An old diamond in the rough' is how Robert C Marsh (Toscanini and the Art of Orchestra Performance; London: 1956) recalled the original Victor 78s of this 1940 Heifetz Studio 8-H recording of the Beethoven. Of the LP reissue he wrote: 'On the whole, the recording is so dead and artificial that at times the thin line of violin sound reminds one of something from the golden age of Thomas Edison's tinfoil cylinder rather than 1940.' Early CD transfers suggested that all was not lost but even they barely anticipated the extraordinary fineness of the sound we now have on this transfer by archivist and restorer Mark Obert-Thorn.

The performance itself is one of the most remarkable the gramophone has ever given us. The visionary, high tessitura violin writing is realised by Heifetz with a technical surety which is indistinguishable, in the final analysis, from his sense of the work as one of Beethoven's most sublime explorations of that world (in Schiller's phrase) 'above the stars where He must dwell'. Those who would query the 'depth' of Heifetz's reading miss this point entirely. To adapt Oscar Wilde, it is they who are in the gutter, Heifetz who is looking at the stars.

As for Toscanini's contribution – another cue for rancorous comment in the past – it, too, is masterly. Now that we can actually hear the performance, the orchestral tuttis seem beautifully balanced both within themselves and vis-à-vis the soloist. As for the actual accompaniment, it is discreet and self-effacing, fiery yet refined, and always wondrously subtle.

In the case of the Brahms, it is more reasonable to argue that there are other ways of playing the concerto. Heifetz's is not a Romantic reading. It is lean, athletic, classical, aristocratic, finely drawn, an approach which wears exceptionally well on record. The Brahms enjoys another impeccable transfer. Musically and technically, this is a real thoroughbred of a release, unignorable at any price.

Beethoven Violin Concerto[a] 🅷
Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto in D, Op 35[b]
Bronislaw Huberman vn [a]Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / George Szell; [b]Staatskapelle Berlin / William Steinberg 🏵
Naxos Historical mono 8 110903 (67 minutes: AAD) Ⓢ
Recorded [a]1934 and [b]1928 ●●

Virtuoso violinist Bronislaw Huberman was an idealist, an ardent Pan-European and co-founder (with William Steinberg) of the Israel Philharmonic. He was, in a sense, the prototype for such present-day fiddling mavericks as Kremer, Zehetmair, Tetzlaff and Kennedy. Huberman's open letter to the conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler, in which he pledged support of the persecuted and refused to perform in Nazi Germany, has become famous, and his astringent though frequently dazzling playing translates that steely resolve into musical terms.

This Naxos coupling should have been the answer to a prayer. Indeed, it very nearly is, save for a less-than-perfect transfer of the Beethoven. Huberman's interpretation is more in line with, say, Zehetmair and Brüggen than with the stately readings of Kreisler, Szigeti, Menuhin or David Oistrakh. Huberman's lively speeds and darting inflections spin silver beams where others opt for (for some misplaced) 'Olympian' heights. The sheer luminosity of the reading, its radiance and refusal to dawdle, run counter to the languid sweetness favoured by various of Huberman's peers and successors.

The 1929 Tchaikovsky recording is peerless. Huberman's first entry reveals all: elastic phrasing, sweeping portamentos and generous rubato stamp a giant personality. Thereafter, quicksilver bowing and a steely spiccato level with the best of the period.

Brahms loved Huberman's playing (he promised the budding youngster a Fantasy but never lived to compose it) and no wonder, given the veiled beauty of Huberman's tone (Canzonetta) and the uninhibited swagger of his bravura style (finale).

You simply have to hear Huberman's recording, and Naxos's give-away price makes their coupling a mandatory purchase. Unless you're fussy about transfers, in which case, read on. David Lennick's transfer of the Beethoven, although perfectly adequate, is rather spoiled by excessive digital noise reduction. On one occasion, in the first movement, the violinist momentarily disappears while in the second movement, two chords have inadvertently become one.

Still, these technical reservations will likely prove trifling for anyone who has never heard Huberman before. There are no greater violin recordings in existence, and we urge you to buy them.

Triple Concerto in C, Op 56

Beethoven Triple Concerto[a]
Brahms Double Concerto in A minor, Op 102[b]
David Oistrakh vn Mstislav Rostropovich vc
Sviatoslav Richter pf
[a]Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan; [b]Cleveland Orchestra / George Szell
EMI Great Recordings of the Century mono 566902-2 (70 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1969 OO

These are illustrious performances and make a splendid coupling. EMI planned for a long time to assemble this starry line-up of soloists, conductor and orchestra for Beethoven's Triple Concerto, and the artists do not disappoint, bringing sweetness as well as strength to a work which in lesser hands can sound clumsy and long-winded. The recording, made in a Berlin church in 1969, is warm, spacious and well balanced, placing the soloists in a gentle spotlight. The account of Brahms's Double Concerto is perhaps the most powerful recorded performance since the days of Heifetz and Feuermann or Thibaud and Casals. The recording has come up extremely well in this remastering: although one cannot deny that the sound is not as smooth as can be achieved nowadays, one soon forgets that and is caught up in the magnificent music-making.

Triple Concerto. Choral Fantasia in C minor, Op 80
Beaux Arts Trio (Ida Kavafian vn Peter Wiley vc Menahem Pressler pf)
Mid-German Radio Chorus; Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra / Kurt Masur
Philips 438 005-2PH (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992-93 OO

Kurt Masur has rarely conducted more electrifying Beethoven performances on disc. The opening tutti of the concerto establishes a speed markedly faster than usual, and if the three soloists modify it slightly, the characteristic which marks this performance is its urgency. But there is no feeling of breathlessness, simply exhilaration. The evenness and clarity of Pressler's articulation in scales and passagework is a delight. As for the brief central meditation, led by the cello, it flows very warmly and naturally, with Peter Wiley just as rich and positive an artist as Pressler. This now stands as one of the very finest versions of a work which at last looks like being appreciated, not as a rarity, but as a pillar of the Beethoven canon.

The Choral Fantasia is hardly likely to establish itself in a comparable niche, but this performance is most persuasive. The variations on the corny main theme are regularly pointed with engaging wit, not just by Pressler but by the wind soloists, and the brass sound is glorious. It is rather like having the choral finale of the Ninth anticipated with tongue-in-cheek. Balances are always difficult, not just in this work but notoriously in the Triple Concerto. The soloists are well focused and the orchestral sound is warm and full.

Additional recommendation
Triple Concerto
Coupling: Choral Fantasia in C minor, Op 80
Perlman vn Ma vc Barenboim pf
Chorus of the Deutsche Oper, Berlin; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Daniel Barenboim pf
EMI 555516-2 (55 minutes: DDD: 12/95). Ⓕ

Superb live performances which grab you with their refreshing spontaneity. Choice between this and Masur's (see above) comes down to a preference for crisp co-ordination and the inspiration of the moment.

Complete Symphonies

Awards 1992

Charlotte Margiono sop Birgit Remmert mez Rudolf Schasching ten Robert Holl bass Arnold Schoenberg Choir; Chamber Orchestra of Europe / Nikolaus Harnoncourt
Warner Elatus ⑤ 0927-49768-2 (358 minutes: DDD). Recorded live in 1990-91 Ⓜ

Symphonies Nos 1 & 2 also available separately on Warner Elatus 0927 49003-2 Ⓜ
Symphony No 3 (plus Overtures – Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus, Leonore III) on Warner Elatus 2564 60034-2 Ⓜ
Symphonies Nos 4 & 5 on Warner Elatus 2564 60012-2 Ⓜ

Symphony No 6 (plus Overtures, Leonore II, Coriolan & Fidelio) on Warner Elatus 0927 49004-2 Ⓜ
Symphonies Nos 7 & 8 (plus Overture, The Ruins of Athens) available on Warner Elatus 0927 49620-2 Ⓜ
Symphony No 9 on Warner Elatus 0927 46736-2 Ⓜ

Brimful of intrepid character and interpretative incident, this is surely one of the most stimulating Beethoven symphony cycles of recent times. As Harnoncourt himself states in the booklet: 'It has always been my conviction that music is not there to soothe people's nerves...but rather to open their eyes, to give them a good shaking, even to frighten them.' So it transpires that there's a re-creative daring about Harnoncourt's conducting – in essence an embracement of recent scholarly developments and his own pungent sense of characterisation – which is consistently illuminating, thus leaving the listener with the uncanny sensation that he or she is encountering this great music for the first time. In all of this Harnoncourt is backed to the hilt by some superbly responsive, miraculously assured playing from the COE: their personable, unforced assimilation of his specific demands, allied to his intimate knowledge of the inner workings of these scores, make for wonderfully fresh, punchy results. In this respect Nos 6-8 in particular prove immensely rewarding, but the Eroica and the Fourth, too, are little short of superb. In sum, a cycle which excitingly reaffirms the life-enhancing mastery of Beethoven's vision for many years to come.

Symphonies Nos 1-9
Gundula Janowitz sop Hilde Rössel-Majdan contr
Waldemar Kmentt ten Walter Berry bass
Vienna Singverein; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
DG Collectors Edition
⑤ 463 088-2GB5 (332 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1961-2

This was the first set of the Nine to be planned, recorded and sold as an integral cycle. It was also a set that had been extremely carefully positioned from the interpretative point of view. Where Karajan's 1950s Philharmonia cycle had elements in it that owed a certain amount to the old German school of Beethoven interpretation, the new-found virtuosity of the Berliners allowed him to approach more nearly the fierce beauty and lean-toned fiery manner of Toscanini's Beethoven style as Karajan had first encountered it in its halcyon age in the mid-1930s. Nothing demonstrates this better than the 1962 recording of the Fourth Symphony, fiery and radiant as Karajan's reading had not previously been, and never would be again. The old shibboleth among writers and musicians that the even-numbered symphonies were somehow less dramatic than the odd-numbered ones meant nothing to Karajan. His accounts of the Second, Fourth, Sixth and Eighth Symphonies were every bit as intense as their allegedly sturdier neighbours. Only in the Seventh Symphony's third movement Trio and the Menuetto of the Eighth Symphony – where he continued to follow Wagner's idea of this as an essentially stately dance, a kind of surrogate slow movement – did he deviate significantly from the Toscanini model. And it worked. True, the first movement of the Pastoral Symphony was a touch airless, lacking some of the easy wonderment of Karajan's old Philharmonia recording. But, then, Toscanini himself had never managed to replicate the unique charm of his pre-war English recording with the BBC SO.

The original review of the cycle entered a number of caveats, some of which still pertain, though it is the lack of certain repeats and the non-antiphonal dispensation of the violins that may worry some most nowadays. What so enthused us back then was the urgency of the music-making, its vitality and, ultimately, a fierce sense of joy that had its natural point of culmination in a thrillingly played and eloquently sung account of the finale of the Ninth. The playing of the new rejuvenated BPO dazzled throughout (it still does), as did Günther Hermanns recordings: clean and clear, and daringly 'lit' with a bright shimmer of reverberation. The recordings have always transferred effortlessly to CD and the present reissue is no exception.

Symphonies Nos 1-9 🄿
Luba Orgonasova sop Anne Sofie von Otter mez
Anthony Rolfe Johnson ten Gilles Cachemaille bar
Monteverdi Choir; Orchestre Révolutionnaire et Romantique / Sir John Eliot Gardiner
Archiv Produktion ⑤ 439 900-2AH5 Ⓕ
(328 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1993-94 ●●

This set is remarkable and many will rate it as Mr Knightley rates Emma Woodhouse 'faultless in spite of her faults'. In his booklet essay, Peter Czorny tells us that the recordings are offered in the hope of transporting the listener back 'to that moment when this music burst forth into a world of heroes, wars and revolution, creating its own world of the sublime and ineffable'. This theme is developed by Gardiner in a robust 20-minute talk on the project that comes free on a sixth CD. Gardiner's opinion that Beethoven wanted his musicians to live dangerously has some peculiar consequences.

Symphony No 1: The opening is superbly judged. Gardiner doesn't overplay the Adagio molto, and the Allegro con brio, often played with a fatal languor by members of the old German School, is pretty quick. After his absurdly brisk reading of the second movement, Gardiner goes on to conduct dazzlingly successful accounts of the Scherzo and finale. Symphony No 2: This is very fine throughout. By following the written tempo markings and his own musical instincts Gardiner produces a perfomance of the first movement that opens out the drama most compellingly. Symphony No 3: More révolutionnaire than romantique. A very fast first movement gets within spitting distance of an impossible metronome mark. That and keen texturing make for tremendous dramatic urgency. Unfortunately, there is also too little accommodation en route of the rich cargo of ideas that Beethoven has shipped into this movement. In their haste to get to the recapitulation itself, Gardiner and his players are decidedly unpoised. He is superb in the last two movements; but these are considerably less than half the story where the Eroica is concerned. Symphony No 4: An unusually quick introductory and brisk Allegro vivace. Gardiner treats the pivotal drum entry before the recapitulation atmospherically. Glorious slow movement, impossibly quick finale.

Symphony No 5: Here is the stuff of which revolutions are made. Gardiner plays the piece pretty straight, and at white heat. The orchestra is superb, helped by the Francophone bias of its sound base. That said, the Scherzo (with repeat) is surely too fast. It starts briskly and not especially quietly. The pace drops back for the Trio, which is just as well since the strings are hard-pressed to articulate clearly. The finale is also very fast, again ahead of what is generally regarded as a good metronome. There is a grandeur to the Scherzo-cum-finale that could be seen to reflect a vision that transcends the politics of revolution. Still, for its éclat terrible, this is unbeatable. The slow movement is also superbly shaped and directed.

Symphony No 6: Despite some lovely playing in the slow movement and an air of brisk efficiency, this is a rather joyless Pastoral. Nor is it a spiritually uplifting one. The Scherzo – 'A merry gathering of country folk' – is a very high-speed affair. At such a pace the various amusing false entries rather lose their point; to play in this village band you would need to be a virtuoso, and teetotal to boot.

Symphony No 7: A glorious performance. The introduction sets the scene with an ideal blend of weight and anticipation. The Vivace has a splendid dance feel and a power that is utterly unforced. Scherzo and finale are also superbly paced. The Allegretto is eloquent with a sense of barely sublimated grieving. The recording is magnificent. Symphony No 8: In general, the symphony thrives on the Gardiner approach, though in the finale the emphasis is again on high-speed locomotion.

Symphony No 9: The first movement has never been dispatched as rapidly as here. In fact, Gardiner doesn't get the bit between the teeth until bar 51, so the celebrated introduction has room to breathe. Of course, he isn't entirely inflexible and he and his players show remarkable skill in making busy detail 'tell'. Yet a lot does go by the board. The slow movement is also played very quickly. However, Gardiner's finale is superb. Tempos are unerringly chosen, the choral singing is beyond criticism, and there is a rare expressive quality to the singing of the solo quartet.

High quality playing from the orchestra and often exceptional Archiv sound. At best, the physical and intellectual vitality of this music-making brings us close to the Ding an sich'. It is a best that occurs only intermittently. That it occurs at all is perhaps a sufficient miracle.

Symphonies Nos 1-9
Ruth Ziesak sop Birgit Remmert contr
Steve Davislim ten Detlef Roth bar
Swiss Chamber Choir; Zurich Tonhalle Orchestra / David Zinman
Arte Nova Classics ⑤ 74321 65410-2 Ⓢ
(336 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1997-99 ●●

Also available separately – 74321 63645-2: Nos 1 and 2 (54 minutes). 74321 59214-2: Nos 3 and 4 (75 minutes). 74321 49695-2: Nos 5 and 6 (74 minutes). 74321 56341-2: Nos 7 and 8 (61 minutes). 74321 65411-2: No 9 (73 minutes)

Viewed overall, the performances of Nos 1, 4, 6 and 8 are the best in this set, though there is a certain levelling of dynamics in the Eighth. In the Seventh and the Fifth, the finales might have benefited from a wider curve of dynamics and a little more in the way of tonal weight. On the other hand, Zinman's fleet-footed Eroica grows on you, and the Fourth is among the most vivacious accounts available. As to the Ninth, the Scherzo's super-fast Trio makes particular sense at the very end of the movement where Trio and outer section engage in a brief comic tussle. The fast first movement is suitably dangerous and while the finale will no doubt court controversy (primarily for some unusual tempo relations), the Adagio sounds matter-of-fact, even a little impatient. Indeed, it is the one movement in this cycle that seems to misfire.

Zinman has used Bärenreiter's new edition of Beethoven's texts, although the extra appoggiaturas and ornaments, invariably sewn along the woodwind lines – were inserted by the conductor, based on sound musicological principles. All repeats are observed, and so are the majority of Beethoven's metronome markings. What matters most is the overall character of Zinman's Beethoven which is swift, lean, exhilarating and transparent. The Tonhalle copes bravely, often with exceptional skill, and the recordings easily compare with their best full-price rivals.

And the best bargain alternatives? Günter Wand's sense of structure (RCA) draws a sympathetic response, while Leinsdorf's solid, strong-arm Beethoven also has much to commend it (RCA). Karajan's 1962 cycle is surely the best of four (see above) and although Mackerras (Classics for Pleasure), like Zinman, sheds revealing beams of light here and there, this Zurich set has the greater impact. Those who favour the darker, weightier, more obviously 'heroic' Beethoven known (wrongly, perhaps) as 'old school' will probably not respond quite so readily, but they should still give Zinman a try. On balance, his cycle remains the best bargain digital option. Besides, Arte Nova's asking price is so ludicrously cheap that it is worth buying on impulse, if only for the sake of a refreshing change. Just try to have someone else's Choral in reserve.

Symphonies Nos 1-9^{a}. Overtures – Coriolan, Op 62; Egmont, Op 84
Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus, Op 43

[a]The Schütz Choir of London; London Classical Players / Sir Roger Norrington
Virgin Classics ⑤ 561943-2 (DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1986-88 ◉◉
Symphonies Nos 2 and 8 won a 1987 Gramophone Award

The symphonies in this bargain-price set are also available separately – see the individual symphony entries on the following pages for our review of the set.

Additional recommendations
Complete Symphonies
Wiens sop Hartwig contr Lewis ten Hermann bar Hamburg State Opera Chorus; North German Radio Chorus; North German RSO / Wand
RCA Red Seal ⑤ 74321 20277-2 Ⓜ
(356 minutes: DDD: 5/95: also available separately)

Consistently inspired: Wand's tempos are superbly judged, the orchestral balance ideal, and in the Ninth the soloists make a first-rate team.

NBC Symphony Orchestra / Toscanini 🄷
RCA Red Seal ⑦ 74321 666562/7 Ⓢ
Also available separately: ② 74321 55835-2: Symphonies Nos 1-4; Egmont Overture. ② 74321 55836-2: Symphonies Nos 5-8. ② 74321 55837-2: Symphony No 9; Missa solemnis (136, 129 and 139 minutes: ADD: 5/90^{R}) Ⓜ

Recorded from 1949 to 1952, these recordings constitute Toscanini's only complete cycle. Strong, lean and direct performances, there isn't a single bar which is unconsidered or routine. Harsh sound but the transfers seem faithful.

Rodgers sop Jones mez Bronder ten Terfel bass-bar Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Choir and Orchestra / Mackerras
Classics for Pleasure ⑤ 575751-2 Ⓑ
(327 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1991-97

A blend of period consciousness and traditional classicism, a Mackerras performance is always a persistently enlivening affair rhythmically. His Fifth and Seventh are particularly fine, and the Liverpool playing rarely less than accomplished. They're at their best in the Pastoral, bright and fresh as a spring morning. The soloists in the Ninth are first-rate, though the choral singing is below par.

Symphonies Nos 1 and 4

Symphonies Nos 1 and 4. Egmont Overture, Op 84[a]
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
DG Galleria 419 048-2GGA (64 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded [a]1969, 1975-76 ◉

The opening of the First, perfectly timed and chorded, announces playing of rare pedigree, though the Allegro itself, taken at a gently ruminative pace, is a surprise. The autumnal side of Karajan's make-up is one we don't often see. It is a beautifully shaped reading, with glorious wind playing and a nobly sustained through-rhythm. The mellow Andante, like the Minuet and Trio, emerges as a miracle of instrumental ensemble, reminding one how summer by summer Karajan encouraged his players to make chamber music together on vacation. After so gentle a start, the finale seems strangely quick. Orchestrally, it is the finest quick Beethoven playing imaginable and for all the aerial excitement the final ff peaks are compelling placed.

Karajan's instinctively dynamic approach to Beethoven is modified in the Fourth by a contrasted but equally strong feel for the German symphonic tradition. The performance strikes deepest at the points of stasis midway through each of the first three movements. Indeed, the sonority of the performance is remarkable throughout, with great use made of bass and cello colourings (something which the BPO had perfected by this time) and a huge dynamic range – implicit in the score from massive tutti chords down to the most perfectly regulated quiet drum rolls. Thus it is, in playing as subtle as it is creatively alive, that the flame of Beethoven's genius can be seen to burn brightly on. The Egmont Overture, played superbly and surprisingly swiftly, makes a welcome filler.

Symphonies Nos 1 and 3, 'Eroica'

Symphonies Nos 1 and 3. Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus, Op 43. 🄿
London Classical Players / Sir Roger Norrington
Virgin Veritas 561374-2 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1987 ◉

Norrington's reading of the finale of the First Symphony is as lithe and witty as you could wish for. The first movement is more difficult to bring off and it is a measure of the competence and confidence of the London Classical Players that the difficult slow introduction is brought off with superb aplomb and that the Allegro con brio is reasonably quick but with space in the lyrical subjects and the most ferocious account of the coda on record, the period brass snarling viciously in the tuttis and the timpani roaring menacingly on the final page. Other conductors have played the Andante cantabile con moto reasonably swiftly but Norrington is very brisk, the tone nicely sec, the whole thing playful and witty in a delightfully brittle way. Again, the articulation of the players is first-rate, giving the performance real presence, style and individuality. This is one of the best accounts of the First.

Norrington's Eroica is unusually fleet and even-tempered, an essay in symphonic writing, with a diminished emphasis on the music's heroic or iconoclastic elements. This is a sure-footed and utterly delightful reading, with such things as wonderfully gambolling clarinets in the long lead towards the coda and a general litheness and fluency that decide one that, after all, everything is for the best in this best of all possible worlds. In the third and fourth movements the playing of the woodwinds is a particular joy, and the third movement Trio a sonic delight. But overall the performance's fluency and relative amiability, though a delight in the finale, may strike you as surprisingly urbane.

Symphonies Nos 2 and 8

Awards 1987

Symphonies Nos 2 and 8. P
Overtures – Coriolan, Op 62; Egmont, Op 84
London Classical Players / Sir Roger Norrington
Virgin Veritas 561375-2 Ⓜ
(73 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1986 ●●●

Norrington's way with Beethoven – which is recognizably Toscaninian in some of its aspects – is, in his own words, his aim of recapturing much of 'the exhilaration and sheer disturbance that his music certainly generated in his day'. Like Toscanini, Erich Kleiber, and others before him, Norrington achieves this not by the imposition on the music of some world view but by taking up its immediate intellectual and physical challenges. Norrington is not unduly preoccupied by matters of orchestral size but sound interests him a good deal. Throughout, the contributions of horns, trumpets and drums most rivet the attention (the introduction to the Second Symphony's first movement is glorious).

What really fascinates Norrington, though, is rhythm and pulse and their determining agencies: 18th-century performing styles, instrumental articulacy (most notably, bowing methods), and Beethoven's own metronome markings. In the Second Symphony Norrington makes the music smile and dance without any significant loss of forward momentum, and he treats the metronome marks more consistently than Karajan (who spins out the symphony's introduction), while sharing with him a belief in a really forward-moving pulse in the Larghetto (again an approach to the printed metronome if not the thing itself). The recordings are warm and vivid and generally well balanced.

The fff climax of the development of the Eighth Symphony's first movement is slightly underpowered, which is odd when the horns and trumpets are elsewhere so thrillingly caught; perhaps, in the Eighth, the recording could have been a shade tighter and drier in order better to define the playing of the London Classical Players. None the less, when it first appeared, it was hailed as the most interesting and enjoyable new record of a Beethoven symphony recorded for some considerable time. This reissue also includes vigorous accounts of the Coriolan and Egmont Overtures.

Symphony No 3, 'Eroica'

Symphony No 3. Overtures – Leonore Nos 1 and 2
Philharmonia Orchestra / Otto Klemperer
EMI Great Recordings of the Century mono
567740-2 (76 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1954-55 ●●

In 1955 the Philharmonia Orchestra was at the peak of its powers. And what cogency there is sustaining and feeding the drama. Where other orchestras and conductors whip themselves into a terrible lather at the start of the finale, Klemperer and the Philharmonia sail majestically on. This is a great performance, steady yet purposeful, with textures that seem hewn out of granite. There is no exposition repeat, and the trumpets blaze out illicitly in the first movement coda, but this is still one of the great Eroicas on record. As Karajan announced to Klemperer after flying in to a concert performance around this time: 'I have come only to thank you, and say that I hope I shall live to conduct the Funeral March as well as you have done'. In the Leonore Overtures, recorded in 1954, the playing is a bit more rough-edged.

Symphony No 3. Overture – Coriolan, Op 62 P
Le Concert des Nations / Jordi Savall
Astrée Naïve ES9959 (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1994

There is a real sense of burgeoning excitement at the start of Savall's performance; and the sound of the orchestra really does conjure up the sense of one being transported back to some dusky Viennese concert room *c*1805 where the musicians are as dangerous a crew as the militias roaming the mud-filled streets outside. Yet as the musical arguments begin to multiply and deepen, so the performance gets slightly garbled. For all Savall's skill in moulding and modifying the pulse, there's a jauntiness about parts of the first movement development section which muddles and trivialises the music.

In the Marcia funèbre, the performance is astonishing for the mood it conjures. The drum (calf skin head, hard sticks) is fierce and seductive, an instrument of war that suggests also the soft thud of death. Savall's brass are similarly remarkable, at once brazen and mellow-sounding. The horn section alone – Thomas Muller, Raul Diaz and Javier Bonet – deserves an award for the way the players colour and characterise this astonishing music. There is no disguising the fact that Savall's thinking about tempo is controversial. It is all very modern: postmodern, even. (After Savall, conductors like Norrington sound distressingly 'safe'.) It is typical of Savall that though he conducts very quick, very earthy, very exciting accounts of the Eroica's Scherzo (those horns again!) and finale, he still slows up pretty massively for the finale's oboe-led Poco andante at bar 348. It is a performance, none the less, that you will want for the sonic profile alone. The Auvidis recording is first-rate: warm and immediate.

Symphonies Nos 1 and 3. Fidelio – Overture H
NBC Symphony Orchestra / Arturo Toscanini
Naxos Historical mono ② 8 110802/3 Ⓢ
(91 minutes: ADD). Recorded live in 1939 ●

Symphony No 3 H
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra /

Wilhelm Furtwängler
Tahra mono FURT1031 (53 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1944 ●●

These two Eroicas confound critical clichés about their respective conductor. Furtwängler's recording is swifter than you might imagine, certainly in the first movement and Toscanini's forceful 1939 radio broadcast is among the most songful, most flexibly phrased on disc. They both lay claim to being the best of various alternatives under the same conductors, and both have been reissued many times before; but while Naxos's transfer is only moderately successful, Tahra's is among the finest around. There have been various unofficial transfers – both on CD and LP – in better-focused sound, that run this rather rough-edged Naxos transfer pretty close. Furtwängler's first movement is distinguished above all by warmly arched string phrasing. The second subject slows less perceptibly than in Toscanini's performance. Toscanini keeps the same passage very much in tempo and while his handling of the coda is incandescently intense, Furtwängler draws greater attention to the *crescendo*ing repeated string figures that lead up to it. In the Marcia funèbre, Furtwängler is broadly paced and loose-jointed, with mellow lower strings and impressive weight of tone, while Toscanini is anxious, candid and desperately expressive. Furtwängler slows the closing bars so dramatically that the fragmented theme all but disintegrates. Toscanini, however, holds fast to the lyrical line, and the effect is hardly less devastating. His Scherzo is fleet and furious, whereas Furtwängler's gentler manner breaks the Marcia's spell like a lone dove fluttering against a stormy sky. Both finales work well, though Toscanini 'holds the plot' with a firmer grip.

You end up being equally well disposed towards both Toscanini and Furtwängler, although not everyone will want Toscanini's hard-driven account. Still, in the Eroica, both conductors offer a singular musical experience: gripping, inspired and always worth the effort needed to 'listen through' old sound. The further we journey from these venerable old masters, the more we treasure their individuality and commitment. True, opposing camps will lock horns over who best realises the composer's intentions (as if we could ever know), but those listeners sensible enough to keep an open mind on the matter cannot fail to perceive that both routes lead to the same life-enhancing destination. Which is surely what great music-making is all about.

Symphonies Nos 4 and 7

Symphonies Nos 4 and 7 P
London Classical Players / Sir Roger Norrington
Virgin Veritas 561376-2 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1988

Norrington's opening to the Fourth is subdued, but the tension lies beneath the surface and facilitates a striking contrast with the allegro, which is light in feeling, with a very brisk tempo indeed. Norrington presses the Adagio forward but it is light and songful. His briskness continues in the Scherzo but is slightly tempered by the relatively mellow acoustic. The London Classical Players articulate the bustling finale with great panache.

In this splendid version of the Seventh, Norrington's allegiance to Beethoven's metronome markings is particularly convincing, and not only in the second movement Allegretto. His sharp pointing of the accents of the introduction is immediately arresting, and the dance rhythms in the main theme of the first movement and again in the finale bring joyously buoyant articulation to match the sparkle of the Scherzo. In the finale the hammering of the timpani is unforgettable and at the close the horns sing out as they do at the triumphant ending of the first movement. Like the pairing of Nos 2 and 8, Norrington's coupling of Nos 4 and 7 is well worth seeking out.

Symphonies Nos 5 and 7

Symphonies Nos 5 and 7
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Carlos Kleiber
DG The Originals 447 400-2GOR (72 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1974 ●●●

The recording of the Fifth, always very fine, comes up superbly in this transfer. What, though, of the Seventh, an equally distinguished performance though always perceptibly greyer-sounding on LP, and on CD? Well, it too is superb. What the Original-Image Bit-Processing has done to it, heaven only knows, but the result is a performance of genius that now speaks to us freely and openly for the first time. In some ways this is a more important document than the famous Fifth. Great recordings of the Seventh, greatly played and conducted, but with first and second violins divided left and right, are as rare as gold-dust. Freshly refurbished, this Kleiber Seventh would go right to the top of any short list of recommendable Sevenths. It is wonderful to have these two legendary performances so expertly restored.

Symphonies Nos 5^a and 7^b H
New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra / Arturo Toscanini
Naxos Historical mono 8 110840 Ⓢ
(77 minutes: ADD). Recorded at Carnegie Hall, New York in ^{b}1936 and ^{a}live in 1933 ●●●

Toscanini is a near-impossible act to follow. But then in a sense he was fortunate. He didn't have a fat record catalogue full of Rostrum Greats to live up to and he wasn't under pressure to say something new, or at least something different. On the contrary, Toscanini's avowed mission was to clean up where others had indulged in interpretative excess. And he could as well have been cleaning up for the future.

There are numerous Toscanini Fifths in public or private circulation, at least four of them dating from the 1930s. This one is lithe, dynamic and consistently commanding. Comparing it with Toscanini's 1952 NBC recording finds numberless instances where a natural easing of pace helps underline essential transitions, such as the quiet alternation of winds and strings that holds the tension at the centre of the first movement. The glow of the string playing towards the close of the second movement has no parallel with the 1952 version and while the NBC Scherzo is better drilled, this finale really blazes. Mark Obert-Thorn has done a first-rate job with the sound, focusing the orchestra's whispered pianissimos while keeping surface noise to a minimum.

The commercially released 1936 New York Seventh has already been hailed as a classic. As with the Fifth, Toscanini's ability to gauge pauses to the nth degree – in this case the rests that separate the finale's opening fortissimo rallying calls – is truly inimitable. The nobility and the visceral thrill of Toscanini's pre-war version remains unchallenged. The transfer is excellent.

Symphonies Nos 5 and 6, 'Pastoral'

Symphonies Nos 5 and 6 🅿
London Classical Players / Sir Roger Norrington
Virgin Veritas 561377-2 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1988

Norrington conducts an enjoyable, memorable account of the Fifth. He throws off the introduction to the first movement with crisp brilliance, and the Allegro conveys enormous underlying energy. His Andante is beautifully phrased and flows most delicately; in the bustling double-bass theme at the centre of the Scherzo the bowing is light, the effect refined and offering easy virtuosity. Norrington's finale is strongly accented, his horns broadly sonorous, partly as a result of the resonant EMI sound.

The Pastoral is also a revelation. Norrington adopts a swift tempo in the joyous first movement but there's no hint of that relentless, driven quality which we have sometimes had on record. He is fully up to tempo in the vibrant tuttis; elsewhere he's most careful to allow the music to dance and breathe, the transitions always most sensitively moulded. It is also a joy to hear this symphony on period instruments. This Pastoral is a real voyage of aural discovery. Sometimes the wind tuning is not 100 per cent true, at others it is simply a matter of Norrington teasing us with the timing of a trill's release or pointing up dissonances that usually get smoothed over. The sound is wonderfully clear and trenchant.

Beethoven Symphony No 6
Schubert Symphony No 5 in B flat, D485
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Karl Böhm
DG The Originals 447 433-2GOR
(74 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1971 and 1979 ◎◎◎

Karl Böhm's Beethoven is a compound of earth and fire. His VPO recording of Beethoven's Sixth of 1971 dominated the LP catalogue for over a decade, and has done pretty well on CD on its various appearances. His reading is generally glorious and it remains one of the finest accounts of the work ever recorded. It still sounds well (perhaps the bass is a bit lighter than on LP) and the performance (with the first movement exposition repeat included) has an unfolding naturalness and a balance between form and lyrical impulse that is totally satisfying. The brook flows untroubled and the finale is quite lovely, with a wonderfully expansive climax. The Schubert dates from the end of Böhm's recording career. It is a superb version of this lovely symphony, another work that suited Böhm especially well. The reading is weighty but graceful, with a most beautifully phrased Andante (worthy of a Furtwängler), a bold Minuet and a thrilling finale. The recording is splendid. If you admire Böhm this is a worthy way to remember his special gifts.

Symphony No 8

For a recommendation for Symphony No 8 see Norrington's account on Virgin Veritas listed under 'Symphonies Nos 2 and 8'.

Symphony No 9, 'Choral'

Anna Tomowa-Sintow sop Agnes Baltsa mez
Peter Schreier ten José van Dam bass-bar Vienna Singverein; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
DG Galleria 415 832-2GGA (67 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Text and translation included
Recorded 1976 ◎◎

Symphony No 9 also available, coupled with Symphonies Nos 5 & 6 (rec 1977/1976), on DG ② 474 260-2 Ⓜ

All collections need Beethoven's Choral Symphony as one of the works at the very core of the 19th-century romantic movement. Within its remarkable span, Beethoven celebrates both the breadth and power of man's conception of his position in relation to the Universe; his sense of spirituality – especially in the great slow movement – and in the finale the essential life-enhancing optimism emerges, which makes human existence philosophically possible against all odds. Karajan lived alongside the Beethoven symphonies throughout his long and very distinguished recording career, and he recorded the Ninth three times in stereo. His 1976 version is the best of the three. The slow movement has great intensity, and the finale brings a surge of incandescent energy and exuberance which is hard to resist. All four soloists are excellent individually and they also make a good team. The reading as a whole has the inevitability of greatness and the recording is vivid, full and clear. At mid-price this is very recommendable indeed.

Symphony No 9 H
Aase Nordmo-Løvberg sop Christa Ludwig mez
Waldemar Kmentt ten Hans Hotter bass-bar
Philharmonia Chorus and Orchestra / Otto Klemperer
Testament SBT1177 (71 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1957 ●●

This is a revelatory live recording by EMI's engineers of Klemperer's performance of the Ninth Symphony at the Royal Festival Hall, immediately before his 1957 EMI recording. Where the studio recording gives us a frontal, ground-level view of the players spread out across the spaces of the Kingsway Hall, this live Festival Hall recording offers us that special Klemperer balance which gave particular prominence to the winds and the timpani. Strings, and in the finale the chorus, are nicely focused; but from where we are sat, somewhere above the first oboe, it is winds and timpani which are the centre of interest. No one would have dared balance a studio recording this way, yet this is far closer to what a Klemperer performance really sounded like.

There are a couple of oddities in the finale. In the preliminary orchestral statement of the 'joy' theme, the bassoon descant drowns out the violas and cellos; then, later on, we get a less than clear view of the tenor. (A blessed relief, perhaps, given Kmentt's thin, dried-out sound here.) Interpretatively, the two performances are identical, though the live performance is just that bit more intense. The first movement does not benefit greatly but the Scherzo is transformed; what rather lumbers in the studio is here a thrilling dance of the Titans. The finale is wonderfully performed, thrillingly articulated by the newly-founded Philharmonia Chorus and by the Philharmonia players. Detail after detail shines out, etched into one's imagination by the playing and the persistently enquiring recording.

Symphony No 9 H
Elisabeth Schwarzkopf sop Elisabeth Höngen mez
Hans Hopf ten Otto Edelmann bass Bayreuth Festival Chorus and Orchestra / Wilhelm Furtwängler
EMI Great Recordings of the Century mono
566901-2 (75 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded live in 1951 ●●

This performance has become a legendary one, as much for the occasion of its happening as for the music-making itself. The reopening of Wagner's Festival Theatre in Bayreuth in 1951 after the catastrophe of war was nothing if not symbolic. If anything could lay the ghost of Bayreuth's immediate past, the years from 1930 to 1944 when the theatre was run by the English-born, Nazi-worshipping Winifred Wagner, it might be a performance of the Ninth Symphony under the most celebrated of the German conductors who had lived through Nazi rule without being, in any real sense, morally or artistically party to it. Certainly, it is not difficult to think of the slow movement's second subject, unfolded here in a way that has never been bettered, as an atonement and a benediction.

However, not everyone will respond to this vision of the Ninth: as an interpretation it is broadly based, with some slow tempos and some quirky adjustments of pace; though beneath everything – beneath the gear changes and failures in ensemble – a great current massively flows. The solo vocal and choral work in the finale is electric after the fugato but is breezily, bumpily Teutonic before that; Hans Hopf is his usual restless, hectic self. The CD transfer provides some added clarity of image for the generally excellent mono recording; and it also provides an all-important continuity. Instrumental bass frequencies are rather wooden but the recording reproduces higher frequency string, wind, and vocal sound more smoothly than was often the case at this time. Many collectors will be looking to a stereo, digital recording of the Ninth as a CD library acquisition; yet we would be prepared to argue that this performance has a prior, if not absolute, claim on collectors' attention.

Awards 1995

Symphony No 9 H
Elisabeth Schwarzkopf sop Elsa Cavelti mez Ernst Haefliger ten Otto Edelmann bass Lucerne Festival Chorus; Philharmonia Orchestra / Wilhelm Furtwängler
Tahra mono FURT1054/7 Ⓕ
(78 minutes: ADD). Recorded live in 1954 ●●●

The 40th anniversary of Furtwängler's death on November 30, 1954 brought forth a rich crop of reissues and remasterings, most notably on the French label Tahra, which secured the rights to publish limited editions of some of Furtwängler's most important (and, it must be said, most frequently pirated) live recordings. Some of Furtwängler's finest performances of Beethoven's music were given in the last months of his life, an odd paradox given his failing health and, by November, the apparent extinction of his will to live. Yet this Lucerne Ninth is a seismic utterance, the final heroic regrouping of musical and psychic powers that in certain works of the repertory have this gangling figure towering over all his rivals. This is arguably the greatest of all Furtwängler's recordings of the symphony. Walter Legge wanted to acquire the performance as EMI's official replacement for the momentous 1951 Bayreuth account, but it wasn't to be. Since then, there have been various 'unofficial' editions. The Tahra differs in being 'official', well transferred, and further enhanced by a few introductory remarks made by Furtwängler himself.

Here, the most significant section is that in which Furtwängler sees the problem of interpreting the Ninth as one that effectively post-dates the performing culture into which it was born. Furtwängler understood the Ninth as well as any conductor in the 20th century. You can argue this way or that over the pacing of the slow movement (though we defy anyone to say that his performance is anything other than deeply eloquent) or the leisurely speed of the second movement Trio. In the all-important first movement, though, there is no doubt that Beethoven's written tempo markings and frequent subsequent modifications clearly presuppose the kind of uniquely singing, flexible, harmonically searching (but by no means over-slow) reading Furtwängler invariably gave us.

Additional recommendation
Symphony No 9 🏵
Wiens sop Hartwig mez Lewis ten Hermann bass Hamburg State Opera Chorus; North German Radio Symphony Orchestra and Chorus / Wand
RCA Red Seal 74321 68005-2 (66 minutes: DDD: 4/87) Ⓢ

A real bargain. Wand's 1986 recording enshrines a wonderfully wise and humane Ninth, unerringly paced and always intensely refreshing in its lean purposefulness, if at times lacking that last ounce of lump-in-the-throat universality.

Piano Quintet, Op 16

Beethoven Piano Quintet in E flat, Op 16 🅷
Mozart Piano Quintet in E flat, K452. Sinfonia concertante in E flat, K297*b*
Walter Gieseking pf Philharmonia Wind Quartet (Sidney Sutcliffe ob Bernard Walton cl Dennis Brain hn Cecil James bn); Philharmonia Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
Testament mono SBT1091 (80 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1955 ●●

There have never been any doubts about these performances. The horn playing in the Sinfonia concertante is unsurpassable and in the quintets Gieseking's lightness and his clarity and sense of style is simply beyond praise. The tempos are on the slow side in the first movement of the Mozart and the finale of the Beethoven but somehow with Gieseking, slow tempos have a way of seeming to be just about right. Richard Osborne's excellent notes quote a letter from Sidney Sutcliffe of touching modesty. Speaking of their run-through of the Mozart, he says, 'On reaching the Allegro moderato, the great man played two bars at an absolutely perfect tempo and then stopped and asked in the most gentle and hesitant manner, "Will that be all right for you?" So it was a most happy occasion although I found it a grave responsibility matching the artistry of my colleagues when Bernard [Walton], Cecil [James] and Dennis [Brain] were producing sounds of breath-taking beauty'. Breathtaking is just the right word for all concerned here on what is, after all, one of the great chamber music records of the LP era.

Considerable pains have been taken with the transfers, which now sound fresh and full-bodied. Thoroughly recommended.

Beethoven Piano Quintet. Horn Sonata in F, Op 17 🅿
Mozart Piano Quintet in E flat, K452
Robert Levin fp Academy of Ancient Music Chamber Ensemble (Frank de Bruine ob Antony Pay cl Danny Bond bn Anthony Halstead hn)
Decca L'Oiseau-Lyre 455 994-2OH Ⓕ
(67 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1996 ●

A captivating record. If you like the Viennese classics to sound suave and demure, it may not be for you: there's plenty of mellifluous playing, but the dominant impression is one of rhythmic energy, drama and colour – with the characters of all five instruments vividly projected. Robert Levin is an unusually creative performer – not just in the way that he searches for the right sound and style for every passage, but also in his ability to add happily conceived extra ornamentation and short cadenzas, in the Mozart especially, where he starts to elaborate the text as early as the third bar. The wind players catch the mood and make appropriate decorations, too, particularly during repeated sections. Some may feel that this sort of thing has no place on a recording which may be played many times. The counter-argument is that a recording can never be more than one performance, that the ornamentation, wonderfully stylish, really does add something to the music, and that it's impossible to imagine that Mozart himself would have always stuck to the written text. And the disc would be well worth acquiring just for the Horn Sonata; Levin and Halstead give it a touch of extravagance and bravado that seems to capture the essence of early Beethoven. The recording is clear, with a pleasingly intimate quality.

Septet, Op 20

Beethoven Septet in E flat, Op 20 🅷
Mendelssohn Octet in E flat, Op 20
Members of the Vienna Octet
Decca 421 093-2DM (74 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1959 and 1972 ●

After its triumphant first performance in 1800, Beethoven's Septet went on to become not only one of the most popular but also one of the most influential chamber works of the period. The composer himself grew to dislike the piece, but it remains one of the most treasured products of the classical era. Curiously, compared to the 1972 Mendelssohn coupling, the 1959 sound in the Septet seems sweeter and more natural, to complement a performance which is an utter delight. Here is that old-fashioned, spontaneous yet relaxed Viennese style, with ample, beautifully-shaped phrasing and an engaging, slightly rustic quality in the clarinet tone which, alas, seems to have gone out of fashion.

In the Mendelssohn Octet, the playing has a delicious buoyancy of spirit and an abundance of charm. The Andante, in particular, has an affecting, wistful delicacy and there is total clarity in the fugato which launches a strongly-played finale. The recording is clean and well balanced.

Septet in E flat, Op 20. Piano Quintet in E flat, Op 16. Sextet in E flat, Op 81*b*
Ottó Rácz ob József Balogh cl József Vajda bn
Jenö Keveházi, János Keveházi, Sándor Berki hns
Ildikó Hegyi, Péter Popa vns Gyözö Máthé va
Peter Szabó vc István Toth db
Naxos 8 553090 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1994

These talented Hungarian players offer a fluent, responsive account of the Septet that highlights the music's intimate chamber character – delight in the music's elegance and perfect balance of instrumental forces. In the present instance, vivid recording creates a clear, natural ambience for this alert, sensitively blended ensemble. In the Sextet, horn players, Jenö and János Keveházi play with subtlety and panache as required, their tone spontaneous and free. This excellent, value-for-money Naxos disc also offers an elegant, well-turned performance of Beethoven's E flat Quintet.

Piano Quartets

WoO36 – No 1 in E flat; No 2 in D; No 3 in C.
Op 16 in E flat

Beethoven Piano Quartet in E flat, Op 16
Schumann Piano Quartet in E flat, Op 47
Isaac Stern vn Jaime Laredo va Yo-Yo Ma vc
Emanuel Ax pf
Sony Classical SK53339 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992 ●

There are numerous recordings of Beethoven's Op 16 in its original Mozart-inspired quintet version for piano and wind against only a few for the piano quartet arrangement in which it rapidly re-emerged. But this 1992 performance of the quartet from Isaac Stern and his eminent younger colleagues makes it hard to believe that it was conceived for any other combination than theirs – and what higher praise than that? The Andante cantabile, with its delicately embellished melodic strands, surely gains in expressive eloquence from the more personal inflexions of caressing strings. And with their bold dynamic contrasts and piquant accentuation, what drama all four players draw from the opening movement. As a brilliant pianist himself, Beethoven entrusted the pianist with a great degree of responsibility, at once arrestingly and effortlessly discharged here by Emanuel Ax.

As for Schumann's Piano Quartet, no longer is it dwarfed in popularity by its immediate predecessor in the same key, the Piano Quintet. The performers' impulse in the two flanking movements is unflagging and the overall impression is of spontaneous enjoyment – friends making music together for their own delight rather than as just another professional engagement. The sound is as vibrant as the playing.

Piano Quartets, WoO36 – Nos 1-3.
E flat, Op 16 (arr Beethoven)
Raphael Oleg vn Miguel da Silva va Marc Coppey vc Philippe Cassard pf
Astrée Naïve ② V4715 (88 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

This issue of the three piano quartets Beethoven completed at the age of 15 but subsequently suppressed, in double harness with the 26-year-old composer's piano quartet arrangement of his Op 16 Quintet for piano and wind, is more than welcome. Indebted to the still youthful Mozart the teenage Beethoven may well (and should) have been, as also tempted to entrust too much to the piano But the unpredictability of even immature genius is striking. Never can you for a second foretell what surprise, whether of key, harmony, rhythm or scoring, lies just around the corner. His fluent, confident craftsmanship makes you marvel no less. Even when borrowing the three-movement sequence of Mozart's G major Violin Sonata (K397) for his own E flat major work, Beethoven gives his chromatically intensified opening Adagio assai, his stormy minor-key Allegro and even the beguiling variations, an unmistakable stamp of his own.

The playing itself of course contributes to the pleasure, with first praise to Philippe Cassard for never allowing the keyboard to dominate. But all four Paris Conservatoire-trained colleagues are artists of taste and finesse. Their characterization is most sensitively attuned to the music's own true scale. Never does point-making sound self-consciously inflated. The recording itself has a pleasingly soft-grained intimacy.

Complete String Quartets

No 1 in F, Op 18 No 1; No 2 in G, Op 18 No 2; No 3 in D, Op 18 No 3; No 4 in C minor, Op 18 No 4; No 5 in A, Op 18 No 5; No 6 in B flat, Op 18 No 6; No 7 in F, Op 59 No 1, 'Rasumovsky'; No 8 in E minor, Op 59 No 2, 'Rasumovsky'; No 9 in C, Op 59 No 3, 'Rasumovsky'; No 10 in E flat, Op 74, 'Harp'; No 11 in F minor, Op 95, 'Serioso'; No 12 in E flat, Op 127; No 13 in B flat, Op 130; No 14 in C sharp minor; Op 131; No 15 in A minor, Op 132; No 16 in F, Op 135

String Quartets Nos 1-16
Grosse Fuge in B flat, Op 133
Quartetto Italiano (Paolo Borciani, Elisa Pegreffi vns Piero Farulli va Franco Rossi vc)
Philips ⑩ 454 062-2PB10 (544 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1967-75 ●●

The early and middle quartets are also available on Philips Duo: 426 046-2PM (Nos 1-6) and 420 797-2PM3 (Nos 7-11) Ⓑ
The late quartets are also available on Philips Duo: 454 711-2PM2 (Nos 12, 13, 16; Grosse Fuge) and 454 712-2PM2 (Nos 14, 15) Ⓑ
They have also been remastered on a three-disc set: Philips 50 Great recordings ③ 464 684-2PM3 Ⓜ

It goes without saying that no one ensemble can unlock all the secrets contained in these quartets.

The Quartetto Italiano recordings have assumed a variety of formats since their first appearance. The quartets now comprise 10 CDs but Philips wisely offers the performances at a highly competitive price in three separate sets and it is as separate entities they should be considered. Their claims are strongest in the Op 18 Quartets. The Quartetto Italiano offer eminently civilised, thoughtful and aristocratic readings. Their approach is reticent but they also convey a strong sense of making music in domestic surroundings. Quite frankly, one could not do very much better than this set. Turning to the middle-period quartets the Italians are hardly less distinguished, even though there are times when the Végh offer even deeper insights: one thinks in particular of the slow movement of Op 59 No 1. Taken in isolation, however, the Quartetto Italiano remain eminently satisfying both musically and as recorded sound. As far as sound quality is concerned, it is rich and warm. In Opp 74 and 95, the Quartetto Italiano more than hold their own against all comers. These are finely proportioned readings, poised and articulate.

The gain in clarity because of the remastering entails a very slight loss of warmth in the middle register, but as recordings the late quartets, made between 1967 and 1969, can hold their own against their modern rivals. Not all of these received universal acclaim at the time of their first release. The opening fugue of No 14 is too slow at four-in-the-bar and far more espressivo than it should be but, overall, these performances still strike a finely judged balance between beauty and truth, and are ultimately more satisfying and searching than most of their rivals.

String Quartets Nos 1-16
Végh Quartet (Sándor Végh, Sándor Zöldy vns Georges Janzer va Paul Szábo vc)
Astrée Naïve ⑧ V4871 (8 hours 46 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1974 ●●

The Végh's classic accounts of the String Quartets are in a completely different league from any of their rivals: there is no cultivation of surface polish but there is no lack of elegance and finesse. Above all, there is no attempt to glamorise their sound. In No 1 they find the tempo giusto right at the beginning and they find more depth in the slow movement than anyone else on record. Végh himself floats the melodic line in this movement in a most imaginative way and is wonderfully supported. In the civilised exchanges that open No 2 the Végh brings an altogether light touch to bear and has an elegance and wit that is almost unmatched and, of course, great refinement of tone. There were complaints of the bottom-heavy recording when is appeared on LP, and it is less transparent and lifelike than more modern recordings.

The Rasumovsky set is admirable for its alertness of articulation, rhythmic grasp and flexibility and its subtle range of tone-colour. The effortlessness with which the dialogue proceeds silences criticism. The Végh brings special insights to this inexhaustible music. The style and the quality of perception seem so remarkable and so well sustained here that any deficiencies can be overlooked. There are lapses in tone and intonation, most of them on the part of the leader, yet what a musician he is, and what a remarkable guide to the visionary content of these quartets. Where the music demands most in such matters he is never wanting. In sum, these are neither the most 'perfect' nor the most sumptuously recorded accounts available, yet they are the deepest and most searching. When listening to them you are conscious only of Beethoven's own voice. The transfers give a slightly firmer focus and sharper detail though that slight bottom-heaviness still remains.

String Quartets Nos 1-10 (individual discs)

CDDCA1111: String Quartets Nos 1-3
CDDCA1112: String Quartets Nos 4 and 5.
String Quartet in F, H34
CDDCA1113: String Quartet No 6.
String Quintet in C, Op 29[a]
The Lindsays (Peter Cropper, Ronald Birks vns Roger Bigley va Bernard Gregor-Smith vc)
[a]Louise Williams va
ASV CDDCA1111-3 Ⓕ
(oas: 78, 66 and 58 minutes: DDD). Recorded 2000 ●

It's wonderful how the Lindsays, after a career of more than 30 years, can still sound so fresh and spontaneous. From the start of Op 18 No 1 we feel that every phrase is shaped individually, the music felt as it's being played. The dynamics are beautifully differentiated; pianissimo always has an altered sound compared with piano. Presenting the sense of the music and its emotions is always a priority, which leads to some daring interpretative decisions. The fast and fantastical finale of the Op 29 Quintet, with its scary tremolos and wild-sounding rubato in the first violin arpeggios is one example of a no-holds-barred approach that gets into the character of the music in a way that a more measured style couldn't. It's a splendid idea to include this neglected quintet as well as Beethoven's brilliant arrangement of the Op 14 No 1 Piano Sonata; the Quintet's rich, often complex, textures are relished, helping us to hear this work as a halfway house between the C major Quintets of Mozart and Schubert.

Despite the air of spontaneity, the Lindsays' interpretations of Op 18 have remained very similar to those they offered us 20 years ago. The new recordings are certainly more crisp, immediate than their analogue predecessors, yet the sound has a warmth that enhances the often very atmospheric playing; the mysterious pianissimo passages at the ends of the slow movements of Nos 3 and 6, for instance. The main difference in the playing is that the new performances are generally faster, brighter and rhythmically lighter, tending towards clearer articulation. The earlier version of No 2's highly ornamented Adagio has a beautiful sustained sound; in this recording

Peter Cropper plays the melody with more fantasy, giving a powerful, rhetorical expression to each phrase. The slight increase in speed of most of the allegros brings them more into line with Beethoven's often challenging metronome marks – as a result there's more sparkle and excitement, and the light touch means there's rarely any sense of strain. The two Minuets, in Nos 4 and 5, benefit, too, from being played faster; the passionate C minor character in No 4 is brought out most persuasively. For the Adagio of No 6 the Lindsays, in common with most other groups, adopt a more flowing speed than Beethoven's very slow suggestion, and their new recording is noticeably faster than the old. Yet, this is one of the most finely played movements in the set, with soft, sensuous tone, delicate ornamentation, and mysterious, tenuous unisons.

For the Adagio of No 1, on the other hand, Beethoven provides what seems to be a very fast tempo (138 quavers to the minute). The Lindsays play it a good deal slower – their earlier version has a particularly impressive, concentrated atmosphere. The 1933 Busch Quartet recording, however, shows how it's possible for the movement to sound even more impressive at a speed close to Beethoven's mark; the fiercely dramatic interruptions lose the somewhat ponderous effect they have when taken more slowly.

With these much-recorded quartets – in their way just as challenging to the performers as the later works – it's impossible to have a single favourite version. The Alban Berg Quartet, as daring in their expressive range as The Lindsays, give an unrivalled spring to the more dance-like movements – No 5's Minuet, the allegretto section of No 6's finale. The Emerson Quartet, extraordinarily nimble and precise in the quicker music, impart a fizzy, opera buffa quality to No 3's finale. The Quartetto Italiano's 1970s recordings still sound amazingly fine – no daringly fast speeds here, but the most finely blended sound and nobility of expression. Into this Pantheon The Lindsays fit very easily. No group that brings out better the startling range of the youthful Beethoven's imagination.

String Quartets Nos 3 and 6
Leipzig Quartet (Andreas Seidel, Tilman Büning vn Ivo Bauer vc Matthias Moosdorf vc)
Dabringhaus und Grimm MDG307 0856-2 Ⓕ
(51 minutes: DDD). Recorded c2002 ●

These are performances of exceptional finesse and integrity. Such qualities are immediately apparent at the opening of No 6 where, amid the splendidly vigorous, bustling atmosphere, they manage to give the answering phrases in violin and cello a gentler articulation. The second movement of this Quartet, though marked Adagio ma non troppo, has a surprisingly slow metronome mark, which the Leipzigers observe, their fine sense of line allowing the music to flow easily even at this spacious tempo, and they impart an especially chilling aspect to the sinister minor-key middle section.

The D major Quartet starts sweetly and gently, gradually and effortlessly picking up more liveliness as the movement progresses. The Andante flows easily, with notably rich, dark-hued tone in the passages in low register, and the third movement winningly combines a lively tempo with a slightly wistful manner.

In short, these must be among the most persuasively played, finely recorded Op 18 performances available. There are places where one might prefer other versions – The Lindsays' spontaneity in the finale of No 6, or the joyful virtuosity of the Emerson in the last movement of No 3 – but, overall, the Leipzig Quartet is as satisfying as any.

String Quartets Nos 3 and 7
Orpheus Quartet (Charles-André Linale, Emilian Piedicuta vns Emile Cantor va Laurentiu Sbarcea vc)
Channel Classics CCS6094 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993

The Orpheus Quartet does not use this music as a vehicle for its virtuosity or prowess; and they do not draw attention to their spot-on ensemble, immaculate intonation and tonal finesse, though they possess all these qualities in no small measure. Take the Presto finale of the D major. The sense of pace is in harmony with the horse-drawn rather than the jet-driven; every note speaks, every phrase tells and the overall effect is all the more exhilarating. Generally speaking, the Orpheus find the tempo giusto throughout. They remain attuned to the sensibility of the period and relate their pace to a dance movement in a manner that their rivals have lost. There is something very natural about the players' music-making. They are inside these scores and convey their involvement; no auto pilot, no ersatz feeling, no exaggerated or mechanised sforzatos. What a relief! The recording is bright and clean.

Awards 2002

String Quartets Nos 7-9, 'Rasumovsky', Op
59. String Quartet No 10
Takács Quartet (Edward Dusinberre,
Károly Schranz vns Roger Tapping va
András Fejér vc)
Decca ② 470 847-2DH2 (144 minutes: Ⓕ
DDD). Recorded 2001 ●●●

The Takács do a fine job here: controlled, well paced and impeccably balanced. They manage to balance the music's vertical and horizontal aspects beautifully, long-breathed contrapuntal lines gliding serenely above a sharp, occasionally dramatic accompaniment – masterful playing indeed and typical of this first lap of the Takács' projected Beethoven cycle.

The Takács hold both line and rhythm in Op 59 No 1 with imposing control. Their manner of badinage in the mischievously hocketing second movement is more intense than the rival account by The Lindsays, and their tempos consistently swifter. In Op 59 No 3 the Takács approximate the Busch in a broad, soulful Andante con moto. And in the fugal finale they are almost on a par with the Emersons, whose demonic DG account is one of the most viscerally exciting quartet recordings around. The finale of Op 59 No 2 is a tautly braced canter whereas in the Scherzo of the Harp, taken at a hair-raising lick, the Takács make obsessive music of the dominating four-note idea – and there is absolutely no let up in tension for the cello-led trio. Indeed, the Takács' Harp is one of the finest ever recorded, with fiery reportage of the first movement's central development and a delightfully playful account of the finale, the 'tipsy' first variation especially.

The jewel then here is Op 59 No 2, though you'd be hard pressed to find a rival digital set of Opp 59 and 74 that is better overall. Andrew Keener's recording (St George's, Bristol) reports a realistic 'edge' within a sympathetic acoustic. You won't find a finer quartet recording anywhere.

String Quartets Nos 11-16

String Quartets Nos 13 and 8
Talich Quartet (Petr Messiereur, Jan Kvapil vns
Jan Talich va Evzen Rattai vc)
Calliope CAL9637 (73 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1977-80

The advantage of this Talich recording is that it couples a masterpiece from Beethoven's middle period, the great E minor Quartet, with one of the greatest of his last years. The B flat was the third of the late quartets to be composed and at its first performance in 1826 its last movement, the Grosse Fuge, baffled his contemporaries. Later that same year, he substituted the present finale. The Talich Quartet has a no less impressive technical command than other ensembles but theirs are essentially private performances, which one is privileged to overhear rather than the overprojected 'public' accounts we so often hear on record nowadays.

String Quartets Nos 11 and 12
The Lindsays (Peter Cropper, Ronald Birks vns Robin Ireland va Bernard Gregor-Smith vc)
ASV CDDCA1116 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●●●

The prospect of actually listening to Beethoven never loses its appeal. It's also clear that The Lindsays approach Beethoven's quartets with undiminished enthusiasm. This is immediately apparent in the physical energy with which they attack the opening of Op 95. Along with enthusiasm comes a deep understanding, expressed most strikingly in the way their fine internal balance is adapted to allow important subsidiary lines to make their effect. Nothing as crude as making a decision to 'bring out' an inner part; just the feeling that each player knows how much pressure is needed to fulfil a line's potential. Such expressive detail allied to a lovely dolce sound makes a contrapuntal movement like Op 95's Allegretto especially memorable.

The Lindsays aren't the smoothest, slickest ensemble to have recorded this music. In the Scherzo of Op 95 the Quartetto Italiano's tone is more blemish-free, and the fast coda to this quartet's finale sees the Emerson Quartet create a more brilliant, sparkling impression. But such things only become noticeable with comparative listening; if you stick with The Lindsays what will impress you is the splendid rhythm and drive of the Op 95 Scherzo, the magnificent, rich sound, without any sense of aggressiveness or strain, at the start of Op 127, the way the expression is sustained throughout the great adagio variations of Op 127, and the delicate, magical atmosphere established at the beginning of this quartet's final section. A hugely compelling set.

String Quartets Nos 15 and 16
Talich Quartet (Petr Messiereur, Jan Kvapil vns
Jan Talich va Evzen Rattai vc)
Calliope Approche CAL5639 (68 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1977-79 ●

After the expansive canvas of the Op 59 Quartets and the Eroica, Beethoven's F minor Quartet, Op 95, displays musical thinking of the utmost compression. The first movement is a highly concentrated sonata design, which encompasses in its four minutes almost as much drama as a full-scale opera. With it comes one of the greatest masterpieces of his last years, the A minor, Op 132. The isolation wrought first by his deafness and secondly, by the change in fashion of which he complained in the early 1820s, forced Beethoven in on himself. Op 132 with its other-worldly Heiliger Dankgesang, written on his recovery from an illness, is music neither of the 1820s nor of Vienna, it belongs to that art which transcends time and place. Though other performances may be technically more perfect, these are interpretations that come closer to the spirit of this great music than any other on CD. The Talich Quartet's readings bring a total dedication to this music: their performances are innocent of artifice and completely selfless. There is no attempt to impress with their own virtuosity or to draw attention to themselves. The recordings are eminently faithful and natural, not overbright but the effect is thoroughly pleasing.

Beethoven String Quartet No 11
Schubert String Quartet No 15 in G, D887
Hagen Quartet (Lukas Hagen, Rainer Schmidt vns Veronika Hagen va Clemens Hagen vc)
DG 457 615-2GH (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996-98 ●

This disc provides inspiring confirmation of how great music constantly renews itself. That 'perennial newness' is evident from the ferocious opening bars of Op 95 (more furioso than serioso), through the concise arguments that follow, to the Allegretto's contrapuntal purity, the startled Scherzo and the nervously lilting finale. Virtually every bar carries its own neon light, whether read off the page or, as presented here, with maximum drama and inflexional expression. Schubert's glacial G major is given an even more remarkable reading. The Hagen's fine-tipped tone production accentuates the feeling of epic chill, as does the repeated six-minute exposition. That wonderful moment at 15'08" when the recapitulation summons a beam or two of sunlight comes off especially well, and so does the clipped return of the second set. The Andante's opening melody is chaste and a little distracted, rather like a chamber-music equivalent of Winterreise's hurdy-gurdy. The savage interjections at 2'54" have rarely sounded angrier (they gain a further notch of intensity for their second appearance at 6'27"), and the Scherzo's tart outer sections are offset by a soft-textured Trio. The uneasy finale sounds like an inebriated half-brother to the parallel movement from Death and the Maiden, full of quiet point-making and ghostly half-lights.

Attentive listening locates a wealth of colour in both performances and the recordings have impressive clarity.

String Quartets Nos 4 and 15
Petersen Quartet (Conrad Muck, Gernot Süssmuth vns Friedemann Weigle va Hans-Jakob Eschenburg vc)
Capriccio 10 722 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ●

The Petersen Quartet possesses impeccable technical address, immaculate ensemble, flawless intonation and tonal finesse. Tempos are judged with real musicianship, and dynamic markings are observed without being exaggerated. The C minor Quartet, Op 18 No 4, has dramatic tension without loss of lyrical fervour and the Scherzo has wit. When we move to the first movement of the A minor Quartet the sound world changes as if youth has given way to wisdom and experience. They hardly put a foot wrong here and their Heiliger Dankgesang is rapt and inward-looking. They press ahead fractionally in one or two places – on the reprise of the main section in the second movement and when the main theme returns in the finale. But one or two minor reservations apart, theirs is quite simply the most satisfying late Beethoven to have appeared in recent years. Above all the Petersen do not invite you to admire their prowess. They appear to be untouched by the three 'g's (Gloss, Glamour and Glitz) and their concern is with truth rather than beauty.

String Quartets Nos 14 and 16
Végh Quartet (Sándor Végh, Sándor Zöldy vns Georges Janzer va Paul Szabó vc)
Astrée Naïve V4408 (66 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1973 ●●

Every ensemble brings a different set of insights to this great music so that it is not possible to hail any single quartet as offering the whole truth – yet these are as near to the whole truth as we are ever likely to come. The Végh give us music-making that has a profundity and spirituality that completely outweigh any tiny blemishes of intonation or ensemble. One does not get the feeling of four professional quartet players performing publicly for an audience but four thoughtful musicians sharing their thoughts about this music in the privacy of their own home. They bring us closer to this music than do any of their high-powered rivals.

String Quartets Nos 13 and 16. Grosse Fuge in B flat, Op 133
Juilliard Quartet (Robert Mann, Joel Smirnoff vns Samuel Rhodes va Joel Krosnick vc)
Sony Classical SK62792 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●●

The Juilliard take Op 130's long first-movement repeat then play the Grosse Fuge as its rightful finale, relegating the lighter-hearted 'rewrite' to encore status at the very end of the piece. Hearing the fugue as a structural summation rather than a disembodied torso makes good musical sense (its replacement turns most of Op 130 into a sort of elevated divertimento), and the Juilliard's concentration more than justifies their decision. The performance itself is full of subtle beauties, not least in the first movement, at the point near the onset of the development (around 8'29") where Allegro fragments prompt espressivo Adagio responses and where the players gauge the music's oscillating moods with characteristic perception. Similarly, there is a sense of infinite sadness at 5'16" into the Andante con moto third movement, whereas the Presto and Alla danza tedesca are, by turns, fleeting and elegant; the Grosse Fuge struts, sings and swings, and the 'second' finale dances to a pointed staccato.

This is profound, deeply pondered music-making, the sort that would be impossible to achieve in less than half a lifetime. Op 135 is similarly persuasive, with a playfully disruptive Vivace, a heart-rending Lento assai and, most significantly, an account of the finale that includes the important second repeat.

String Quartets Nos 15 and 16
Cleveland Quartet (William Preucil, Peter Salaff vns James Dunham va Paul Katz vc)
Telarc CD80427 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

The Cleveland Quartet are upholders of tradition, rather than seekers after new truths. One of this ensemble's most notable characteristics is its rich, warm tone, well captured here. The first movement of the A minor Quartet has a level of emotional commitment that's quite compelling – all the details of this complex music fall into place and contribute to the overall effect.

If the rest isn't quite so outstanding it's still very good, with a lovely swinging rhythm to the second movement, and delightfully sprightly accounts of the Andante episodes in the slow movement – absolutely 'feeling new strength', as Beethoven's caption puts it. Their Op 135 is also very impressive. The Lento is deeply felt, their rich sound coming into its own. And the finale must be one of the best versions on record – spirited, touching, playful, as the music's mood demands.

Piano Trios

Piano Trios – No 1 in E flat, Op 1 No 1; No 2 in G, Op 1 No 2; No 3 in C minor, Op 1 No 3; No 4 in B flat, Op 11; No 5 in D, 'Ghost', Op 70 No 1; No 6 in E flat, Op 70 No 2; No 7 in B flat, 'Archduke', Op 97; No 8 in E flat, WoO38; No 9 in B flat, WoO39; No 10 in E flat, Op 44; No 11 in G, Op 121a. Trio in E flat,Op 38. Trio in D (after Symphony No 2). Triosatz
Beaux Arts Trio (Isidore Cohen vn Bernard Greenhouse vc Menahem Pressler pf)
Philips ⑤ 468 411-2 (356 minutes: DDD/ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1980 ●

Growing older doesn't always mean growing wiser, though in the case of the Beaux Arts Trio and Beethoven the passage of some 20-odd years signalled a rare and fruitful broadening of musical vision. In the period between their two recordings of the Beethoven Piano Trios there had been just one personnel change – Daniel Guilet was replaced by ex-Juilliard Quartet second violin Isidore Cohen.

The principal route of the Beaux Arts' interpretative development was forged by the pianist, Menahem Pressler, whose increased tonal subtlety and willingness to widen expressive dynamics lent the trio a whole new palette of colours. Just listen to the opening of Op 1 No 2's ineffably deep Largo con espressione. Heard superficially, there's not that much in it between the Pressler of the 1960s and of 1980, but labour the comparison and you'll soon hear the benefits of a more variegated touch and a freer approach to phrasing. There are many other plus-points. The Archduke, for example, is at once softer-grained and more wistful than its energetic predecessor and you couldn't hope for a happier rendition of the Septet transcription (ie, the E flat Trio, Op 38). Another good reason for choosing the new Beaux Arts over the old: repeats, which were less plentiful in their earlier set.

Philips' latest slim-line packaging takes up less shelf space than the original, and the sound quality is of course just as good: clear, full-bodied and well balanced. Given the price, the superior sound quality, the comprehensive coverage of repertoire (14 works as opposed to 11 in the 1960s Philips set) and the profundity of the Beaux Art's later interpretative standpoint, this new reissue justifies a front-ranking recommendation. So much is said with so much feeling – and so little fuss – that you're drawn back again and again.

Piano Trios – No 5 in D, 'Ghost', Op 70 No 1; No 6 in E flat, Op 70 No 2; No 9 in B flat, WoO39
Florestan Trio (Anthony Marwood vn Richard Lester vc Susan Tomes pf)
Hyperion CDA67327 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●

Here's a recording that immediately, from the first, impetuous bars of Op 70 No 1, feels just right. In this movement the Florestan makes the long second repeat, but there's such a sense of momentum that no one could find it too extended or repetitious. Indeed, the reiterated chords that precede the lead-back reignite our concentration with their air of tense mystery. And when we reach this point for the second time, the G major harmony at the start of the coda has a wonderful, dense tranquillity. The famous 'Ghost' movement creates a powerful, chilling effect, with stark, senza vibrato string tone and the extraordinary writing in the piano's deep bass register exploited by Susan Tomes with superb control and sensitivity.

The E flat Trio is something of a Cinderella work, but the Florestan performance helps us to see it as a major achievement of Beethoven's middle period. Although they are a thoughtful, highly controlled group, there's room for moments of the most intense expression. And the finale, one of Beethoven's most prodigiously inventive pieces, has in this performance a feeling of uninhibited enjoyment. The recorded sound and balance are equally fine.

Additional recommendations
Piano Trios Nos 1-3 and 7, 'Archduke'
Coupling: 14 Variations in E flat, Op 44; Allegrettos – in B flat; in E flat
Barenboim pf Zukerman vn du Pré vc
EMI Double Forte ② 574831-2 (DDD) Ⓜ

Piano Trios Nos 5, 'Ghost', and 8 in E flat, WoO 38. Piano Trio in E flat (1790/91)
Coupling: 10 Variations on Müller's song 'Ich bin der Schneider Kakadu'. Cello Sonatas Nos 3 and 5
Barenboim pf Zukerman vn du Pré vc
EMI Double Forte ② 574834-2 (DDD) Ⓜ

The players respond beautifully to the raw emotional content of Beethoven's works – listen especially to the moving intensity of the Ghost's slow movement.

String Trios, Op 9

No 1 in G, No 2 in D, No 3 in C minor

String Trio in E flat, Op 3; Serenade in D, Op 8
Leopold String Trio (Marianne Thorsen vn Sarah-Jane Bradley va Kate Gould vc)
Hyperion CDA67253 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●

String Trios, Op 9 Nos 1-3
Leopold String Trio
Hyperion CDA67254 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●

The Leopold String Trio have the kind of virtues that come from long study together: polished ensemble, excellent intonation and notably consistent and well-conceived interpretations. Just occasionally the viola is swamped by the outer voices, but this is only an infrequent problem; overall it's a particularly well-balanced and recorded set. They show that a restrained style can bring out the inward aspect to the music. On the fourth track of Op 8, where Beethoven alternates a sombre

Adagio with a facetiously jolly Scherzo, the stark yet gentle Leopold playing of the slow music expresses more pathos and melancholy than the intensity of other versions. And the Leopold's care and respect for the text also tips the balance in its favour – in Op 3's second Minuet, for example, Marianne Thorsen's beautiful and exact interpretation is utterly winning. In Op 9 No 1's Scherzo, another splendidly poised and spirited reading, there's a special bonus – a second Trio, omitted from most editions. It's an attractive bit of music and gives the movement a new dimension.

Cello Sonatas

No 1 in F, Op 5 No 1; No 2 in G minor, Op 5 No 2;
No 3 in A, Op 69; No 4 in C, Op 102 No 1;
No 5 in D, Op 105 No 2

Cello Sonatas Nos 1-5.
12 Variations on Mozart's 'Ein Mädchen oder Weibchen', Op 66. 12 Variations on Handel's 'See the conqu'ring hero comes', WoO45. Seven Variations on Mozart's 'Bei Männern, welche Liebe fühlen', WoO46
Heinrich Schiff vc Till Fellner pf
Philips ② 462 601-2PH2 (140 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998

Schiff and Fellner for the most part give a suave, civilised impression of Beethoven; there are moments of profound contemplation, but fewer rough edges, fewer uncontrollable flights of passion than usual. Fellner's smooth, expressive touch and Schiff's warm, well-rounded tone make for particularly memorable interpretations of the more cantabile music: the opening Allegro of Op 69 doesn't want for energy, but the emphasis is on the beautifully shaped melodic lines. In one or two of the quicker movements, the playing is perhaps just too civilised – the first Allegro of Op 5 No 2 could have had more urgency and intensity (incidentally they omit all the long repeats in both Op 5 sonatas). The fugal finale of Op 102 No 2 sounds extraordinarily smooth and poised for such a notoriously knotty piece. That something is lost by such an approach is clear from a comparison with Maisky and Argerich's high-speed, explosively dynamic performance.

In lively movements Schiff sometimes plays the medium-fast detached notes very short and strongly accented, and fast passagework with a rather fierce off-the-string bow-stroke. His desire may be to achieve maximum clarity, but Fellner is so sensitive to balance that (on this very clear recording) the cello has no difficulty being heard and these very unclassical bowings can seem intrusive. What you remember most, though, are the beautifully realised introspective moments. All three variation sets are very fine – the brilliant piano passages in the two earlier works (WoO45 and Op 66) tossed off with unostentatious virtuosity, the dialogue between the instruments both playful and expressive.

Cello Sonatas Nos 2, 3 and 5 🅿
David Watkin vc Howard Moody fp
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0561 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ◉

If you're not sure about the advantages of original-instrument performance of classical chamber music, try this disc! Watkin and Moody demonstrate that 'authentic' Beethoven need not diminish the music's grandeur and emotional depth. David Watkin, very correctly, uses vibrato discreetly and selectively, and is most imaginative in finding just the right bow-stroke for each musical nuance – his urgent phrasing of the G minor Sonata's first Allegro, and the way he breathes the phrases at the start of the D major's slow movement are two examples of many memorable details.

Howard Moody plays two original period instruments – a Rosenberger fortepiano of *c*1800 for the G minor Sonata, and an 1826 Graf for the two later works – and seems always able to find reserves of sonority to encompass Beethoven's most dramatic moments. The climactic codas of the A major Sonata's outer movements are especially exciting.

The 'big' feeling of these performances is partly due to the lively, intimate recording – the sound is not diluted in any large spaces and we can also hear quite a bit of mechanical noise from the piano, and sniffs from the players.

Additional recommendation
Cello Sonatas – in E flat, Op 64; No 3
Coupling: 12 Variations on Mozart's 'Ein Mädchen oder Weibchen', Op 66
Kliegel vc Tichman pf
Naxos 8 555786 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ

A sound recommendation, both for the rare Op 64 (an arrangement of the Op 3 String Trio) and as an excellent bargain version of the more familiar items. Kliegel and Tichman give highly sympathetic performances; in the A major their playing has a breadth and confidence that easily encompasses the music's great emotional range.

Variations for Cello

12 Variations on Handel's 'See the conqu'ring hero comes', WoO45. 12 Variations on Mozart's 'Ein Mädchen oder Weibchen', Op 66. Seven Variations on Mozart's 'Bei Männern, welche Liebe fühlen', WoO46. Horn Sonata, Op 17 (arr vc) 🅿
Pieter Wispelwey vc Lois Shapiro fp
Channel Classics CCS6494 (45 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ◉

There are only 45 minutes of it, but this recital teems with fresh insights in the irresistible serendipity of its playing. Lois Shapiro partners Wispelwey's 1701 cello on a 1780 Viennese fortepiano whose wiry energies she unleashes in an attention-grabbing opening theme for Handel's See the conqu'ring hero comes. Her bright-eyed first variation glints as phrases dart from dynamic shadow to light and back again. Then the cello's lean, slightly astringent voice makes itself felt in no uncertain terms before the keyboard gets its own back in mercurial scale passages. The players' delight in teasing, sparring and debating with each other comes into its own in the variations on Ein Mädchen oder Weibchen. The theme itself struts forward cheekily, only to peck its way through the first variation, before the cello makes the most of the wry harmonic subtext of the second. In the seventh, one half of a shared phrase caresses and preens the other; the 10th casts the shadow of Papageno's noose. Each player's imagination and technique is tested to the full in an absorbing account of the more abstracted Bei Männern variations. The world of Singspiel is not far away, either, in this performance of the Sonata, Op 17: Wispelwey and Shapiro summon up the nascent world of Marzelline and Jacquino in their quick, ardent responses to the music and to each other.

Complete Violin Sonatas

No 1 in D, Op 12 No 1; No 2 in A, Op 12 No 2; No 3 in E flat, Op 12 No 3; No 4 in A minor, Op 23; No 5 in F, Op 24, 'Spring'; No 6 in A, Op 30 No 1; No 7 in C minor, Op 30 No 2; No 8 in G, Op 30 No 3; No 9 in A, Op 47, 'Kreutzer'; No 10 in G, Op 96

Violin Sonatas Nos 1-10
Itzhak Perlman vn Vladimir Ashkenazy pf
Decca Ovation ④ 421 453-2DM4 Ⓜ
(239 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1973-75 ●●

Although Beethoven designated these works as 'for piano and violin', following Mozart's example, it is unlikely that he thought of the piano as leading the proceedings, or the violin either, for that matter: both instruments are equal partners and in that sense this is true chamber music. Perlman and Ashkenazy are artists of the first rank and there is much pleasure to be derived from their set. Such an imaginative musician as Ashkenazy brings great subtlety to these works composed by a supreme pianist-composer. And the better the pianist is in this music, the better does the violinist play. Discernment is matched by spontaneity and the whole series is remarkably fine, while their celebrated performance of the Kreutzer Sonata has quite superb eloquence and vitality.

The recording boasts unusually truthful violin sound capturing all the colour of Perlman's playing.

Violin Sonatas Nos 1-10 H
Wolfgang Schneiderhan vn
Wilhelm Kempff pf
DG The Originals ③ 463 605-2GOR3 Ⓜ
(236 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1952 ●

In the 1950s these recordings would have probably given a very up-to-date impression; the playing is extremely clean – there's never a hint of sentimental violin slides or over-use of the sustaining pedal. But nearly half a century later, perhaps we're more conscious of the old-world virtues – Schneiderhan's beautiful legato bowing and gentle vibrato, Kempff's full, unforced tone, and a flexible approach from both artists, with finely graded ritardandos and subtle variations of tempo.

Though not regular sonata partners, Kempff and Schneiderhan have an admirable collective sense of rhythm. They favour moderate, poised speeds, and so tend to miss something of the impulsive quality of early Beethoven. And, in the same way, their dedication to pure, well-balanced, unforced tone means that the grotesque element in such a movement as the finale of Op 30 No 2 is underplayed. It is a delight to hear them find so many ways of interpreting Beethoven's frequent sforzando markings, from sharp accents to the expressive melodic emphasis they give to the theme of the Kreutzer Sonata's variations. But quite often Kempff downgrades or ignores these accents, smoothing away any angular corners, and this tendency towards blandness occasionally leads to disappointingly inexpressive playing, at the start of the Spring Sonata, for instance, where Schneiderhan's beautifully lyrical opening doesn't elicit a comparable response from the piano.

If there are a few let-downs, however, there are far more moments where the characteristically moderate, unexaggerated approach bears rich dividends. Schneiderhan's beautiful singing tone is a constant delight; witness the intensely vocal style of Op 24's finale and the luminous sound of his high register in the last of the Kreutzer variations. Similarly, Kempff's continual care for clear textures and his finely balanced chordal playing seem to offer glimpses into the essence of Beethoven's thought. The mono sound is beautifully clear and well balanced.

Additional recommendation
Complete Violin Sonatas
Oistrakh vn Oborin pf
Philips ④ 468 406-02PB4 (229 minutes: Ⓕ
ADD: 4/63) ●

The most striking asset of this famous set is Oistrakh's fabulous tone. The other great virtue is the close unity of style and purpose between the pair, both players striving to present a beautifully shaped, unexaggerated picture of the music. Pretty perfect stuff – you might find it at times just a little too comfortable for the music to have its full impact.

Violin Sonatas

Violin Sonatas Nos 6-8
Gidon Kremer vn Martha Argerich pf
DG 445 652-2GH (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●

Beethoven's Op 30 Violin Sonatas are three irresistibly lively and individual spirits in the hands and imaginations of Martha Argerich and Gidon Kremer. The first, in A major, has that particular quality of blithe and elusive joy reminiscent of the Spring Sonata, and created here by the lightest and truest touch on string and key, fused with bright rhythmic clarity. The slow movement is a tremulous song of long-forgotten, far-off things, in which violin and piano find an intimate balance of tone.

The second sonata of the group is here less an heroically clenched C minor fist, more the unfolding of a gripping and tense Märchen: a dark children's fairy-tale told through the rapid tapering of a phrase-ending on the violin, the gutsy ebb and flow of a piano crescendo, the sudden pianissimo picking up after the loud chords of a second theme. At the start of the development, Argerich even seems to be asking if her listeners are sitting comfortably – and rather hoping they are not.

The G major Sonata's centrepiece is its Minuet and Trio, which Argerich and Kremer cunningly tease and charm into revealing its archaic qualities: a dance glimpsed through a lace veil. It is framed by two fast movements that would identify their performers anywhere, with their high-voltage velocity and wittily imaginative anticipation of each other's every move.

Andante favori

Beethoven Andante favori in F, WoO57
Chopin Waltzes, Op 34 – No 2 in A flat;
No 3 in A minor; No 4 in F. Scherzo No 2 in
B flat minor, Op 31. Barcarolle in F sharp, Op 60
Debussy Suite bergamasque. Estampes
Sviatoslav Richter pf
Orfeo d'Or C491981B (75 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded live in 1977 ●●

This live Richter recital from Salzburg must go close to the top of the priority list. Unlike some of his other live recordings, it's superbly recorded, with plenty of air in the sound and an instrument capable of withstanding fairly imperious fortissimos without losing its tonal bloom or firmness of tuning. The Andante favori is a gem of a performance, tonally ravishing yet unerringly responsive to the structural flow. In the Chopin group Richter not only displays his customary authority but revels in the music and the occasion. Abandon without indiscipline is the key, and the result is a tremendous sense of élan, bordering on exaltation; the applause and bravos between each piece seem only fitting. Debussy's Suite bergamasque goes like a dream, with a 'Clair de lune' hypnotically slow yet never in danger of becoming merely prosaic. Richter's concentration wavers a little more in Estampes, but what a treasurable recital this is otherwise.

Bagatelles

Bagatelles – Op 33; Op 119; Op 126; A minor,
WoO59, 'Für Elise'[a]; B flat, WoO60. Rondo in C,
Op 51 No 1. Allegretto in C minor, WoO53
Alfred Brendel pf
Philips 456 031-2PH (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996, item marked [a]1984 ●

Listening to Beethoven's Bagatelles can be like looking over the composer's shoulder as he works. A scrap of a theme, a repeated chord, a formulaic accompanying figure – suddenly blossoms into something rich and strange; the one-dimensional turns magically into the three-dimensional. An unassuming little Andante con moto tune dissolves into a cadenza, then emerges transfigured in ecstatic counterpoint (Op 126 No 1); an innocent, almost plain folk-melody reappears floating on high, a voice from another world (Op 119 No 11). And so often in the Bagatelles humour is at the core. If there's such a thing as profound levity, this is it. Brendel, who has written so effectively about humour in Beethoven, plainly revels in this aspect of the Bagatelles. The quirkiness, the delight in pulling the rug from under the listener's feet – he seems to have made it all his own. One could argue with the approach here or there – Op 119 No 5 strikes one as more laboured than Risoluto; the strange half-pedal at the end of Op 119 No 3 produces a momentarily metallic aura around the notes – but much more often, character and texture are calculated to a nicety. He also conveys a sense of Op 126 as – in Beethoven's own words – a 'cycle of Bagatelles', the extraordinary No 11 (a gorgeous Andante amabile) making a very thought-provoking finale.

Bagatelles – Op 33; Op 119; C minor, WoO52;
C, WoO56. Rondos – Op 51: No 1 in C; No 2 in G;
C, WoO48; A, WoO49. Six Minuets, WoO10.
Polonaise in C, Op 89. Andante favori in F, WoO57.
Variations – Six in F on an Original Theme, Op 34;
Nine in C minor on a March by Dressler, WoO63; Six in F on a Swiss Song, WoO64; 24 in D on Righini's
'Venni amore', WoO65; 12 in C on Haibel's 'Menuet à la Viganò', WoO68; Six in G on Paisiello's 'Nel cor più non mi sento', WoO70
Mikhail Pletnev pf
DG ② 457 493-2GH2 (152 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●●

From the very first notes of the Dressler Variations – Beethoven's first-known composition, dating from 1782 – it is clear that Pletnev is a master of piano texture, and that he is going to use his mastery not only to ravish the ear but also to delight the mind. His nuances in the baby-simple Swiss theme and its artless variations are quite delicious. At the opposite extreme, the grand set of 24 Variations on Righini's 'Venni amore' comes across as a dry run for later cycles such as the Eroica or even the Diabelli Variations, both in overall design and in certain idiosyncratic details. Technical tours de force abound here, and Pletnev negotiates them all not only with phenomenal pianistic aplomb but, where appropriate, with dry wit. This makes for a fascinating glimpse into the laboratory of the 20-year-old Beethoven's mind.

In the two early Rondos Pletnev is freer than some might wish with the notated dynamics, phrasing and articulation, and his touch suggests at times that he is thinking more of Scarlatti than of Beethoven. Nevertheless the most startling moments of whimsy in these pieces are not his but the composer's. By contrast, in the Vienna-period Rondos of Op 51 Pletnev seems to be thinking forward to the age of Lisztian rhetoric. But the fact that he is never satisfied with the default response to the surface of the music is much to be welcomed, and almost always his initiatives are stylish and effective. Similarly the bagatelles radiate openness to all sorts of possibilities. In some instances Brendel finds more of a rough-and-tumble edginess; but Pletnev's range of touch and tonal nuance outstrips them both and brings rewards of its own, as in the proto-Schubertian touches of Op 119.

Instrument and recording quality are near to ideal. In short, an outstanding issue.

Additional recommendation

Bagatelles 🏵

Buchbinder pf

Warner Apex 0927-49080-2 (60 minutes: AAD) Ⓑ ●

Everything is clear and spruce, and perfectly caught. All the performances are of the most concentrated musical quality and there are fewer finer recorded versions of the Bagatelles.

Diabelli Variations

33 Variations on a Waltz by Diabelli, Op 120

Alfred Brendel pf
Philips 426 232-2PH (53 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1988 ●
Stephen Kovacevich pf 🏵
Philips Concert Classics 422 969-2PCC Ⓑ
(54 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1969 ●●

Here is a treat, indeed; for in Brendel and Kovacevich we have two of the gramophone's finest interpreters of the Diabelli Variations. Brendel has now recorded the work three times. His live 1977 recording of the work, made by Philips in collaboration with the BBC, is still something of a landmark. The piano itself may sound a trifle battle-weary by the end, but the performance is a tour de force, a finely thought-out reading seemingly improvised into life with astonishing fire and intellectual acumen. By contrast, this 1988 recording is a calmer affair and this relates not so much to tempos but the general mood. We are off the hustings and back in the study. This version is more measured as befits a reading that works its way slightly more circumspectly to the newly poised expressiveness of the final variations, the concluding Minuet now an even more sophisticated essay in sublime gracefulness.

The reissue of Kovacevich's famous recording does, however, present a considerable challenge to Brendel. The reissue is at bargain-price and though the booklet is bereft of notes, the CD has the full range of cueing points and the sound has almost as much clarity and bloom as the 1988 rival. Kovacevich was a pupil of Dame Myra Hess and his performance has a clarity, poise and vitality that has commended itself to more than one generation of collectors over the past 30 years. It is a performance that avoids other people's mistakes – whilst teaching us to relish uncomplicated skill. Try the Variations Nos 25-27 and you will find playing that is sensitive and exciting but quite unselfregarding; and even where Kovacevich adopts slow tempos, as in Var 14, there is always light in the texture and the rhythms are cleanly sculpted. Where the Diabelli is concerned one version can never be enough but Kovacevich remains the safest recommendation.

'Diabelli' Variations
Piotr Anderszewski pf
Virgin Classics 545468-2 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●●

This is the most intelligent, searching and sheerly delightful account of the Diabelli Variations to have reached us since Alfred Brendel's. It gives opportunities everywhere to admire a superfine control of every aspect of piano playing, but that isn't the great thing about it, splendid though the finish is. The performance is entirely composer-led, driven by the music, not by ideas about the music, and in that sense you hardly notice the means to the end at all. It is an account of the Diabelli based on a much closer reading of the text than one usually gets, and you have only to hear the theme and the first variation to perceive an exceptional balance of rigour and imagination: rigour in the way Anderszewski has thought about every inflection marked by Beethoven; imagination, evident here and throughout, in the quality with which he has realised them in terms of expression and vividness of character. His rhythm is tremendous. More remarkable still is his feeling for dynamics, so copiously prescribed in this work and yet treated with approximation by so many players.

He is not one to play the daredevil, and one could say that his tempos in the quick numbers are sometimes surprisingly moderate; but he is not a sober sides. He has fingers which are always saying something, a varied and attractive sound, usually built from the bass up, and that rare ability to get from one thing to another with pinpoint accuracy, expressively speaking, as if forging sonority and character with a laser.

A fine recording, and the sound is at an apt distance. An outstanding issue.

32 Variations on an Original Theme

32 Variations on an Original Theme in C minor, WoO80. Six Variations on an Original Theme in F, Op 34. Fifteen Variations and a Fugue on an Original Theme in E flat, 'Eroica', Op 35. Six Variations on an Original Theme, 'Die Ruinen von Athen', Op 76. Six Variations on an Original Theme in G, WoO77. Seven Variations in C on 'God save the King', WoO78. Five Variations in

D on 'Rule Britannia', WoO79.
Cédric Tiberghien pf
Harmonia Mundi HMC90 1775 Ⓕ
(76 minutes: DDD). Recorded c2002 OO

Cédric Tiberghien commences the Eroica Variations with a meticulous weight and balance of textures and although exceptionally delicate and precise, rarely misses the force and energy underlining one of Beethoven's lithest, most vigorous arguments. He sinks gratefully into reflection in Variation 8 and his musicianship in the richly ornamented Largo of Variation 15 is at once individual but unsullied by personal idiosyncrasy. Again, in the 32 Variations in C minor – that compendium of classical virtuosity – Tiberghien is meticulous but never severe, precisely yet generously registering the mood and character of each brief Variation in a manner that may well have caused Beethoven to alter his unfavourable opinion of his work ('Beethoven, what a fool you have been!'). His stretto in Variations 21-22 makes the dark place of Variation 23 sound unusually mysterious while Variations 10-11 show an unfaltering assurance and style.

Tiberghien is no less outstanding in less demanding fare, relishing the explosive whimsy of the Rule Britannia and God save the King Variations, with their mock solemnity and affectionate digs at British assumptions of superiority. So here, clearly, is a pianist to watch, making one curious to hear him in many other composers. Harmonia Mundi's sound is excellent, making this an altogether exceptional disc.

Further listening
Six Variations in F on an Original Theme, Op 34. Six Variations in D, Op 76. 15 Variations and a Fugue on an Original Theme in E flat, Op 35, 'Eroica'
Coupling: Schumann Etudes symphoniques, Opp 13 and posth
Sviatoslav Richter pf
Olympia OCD339 (77 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ

> Fantastic performances: the Eroica Variations end with Richter playing most pianists under the table. A disc not to be missed.

Complete Piano Sonatas

No 1 in F minor, Op 2 No 1; No 2 in A, Op 2 No 2; No 3 in C, Op 2 No 3; No 4 in E flat, Op 7; No 5 in C minor, Op 10 No 1; No 6 in F, Op 10 No 2; No 7 in D, Op 10 No 3; No 8 in C minor, Op 13, 'Pathétique'; No 9 in E, Op 14 No 1; No 10 in G, Op 14 No 2; No 11 in B flat, Op 22; No 12 in A flat, Op 26; No 13 in E flat, Op 27 No 1, 'quasi una fantasia'; No 14 in C sharp minor, Op 27 No 2, 'Moonlight'; No 15 in D, Op 28, 'Pastoral'; No 16 in G, Op 31 No 1; No 17 in D minor, Op 31 No 2 'Tempest'; No 18 in E flat, Op 31 No 3; No 19 in G minor, Op 49 No 1; No 20 in G, Op 49 No 2; No 21 in C minor, Op 53, 'Waldstein'; No 22 in F, Op 54; No 23 in F minor, Op 57 'Appassionata'; No 24 in F sharp, Op 78; No 25 in G, Op 79; No 26 in E flat, Op 81*a*, 'Les adieux'; No 27 in E minor, Op 90; No 28 in A, Op 101; No 29 in B flat, Op 106, 'Hammerklavier'; No 30 in E, Op 109; No 31 in A flat, Op 110; No 32 in C minor, Op 111

Piano Sonatas Nos 1-32
Alfred Brendel pf
Philips ⑩ 446 909-2PH10 (656 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994-96; No 29 live in February 1995 OO

Also available separately – 442 124-2PH: Nos 1-3 (70 minutes). 446 624-2PH: Nos 4, 15 and 20 (65 minutes). 446 664-2PH: Nos 5-7 (59 minutes). 442 774-2PH: Nos 8-11 (75 minutes). 438 863-2PH: Nos 12-14 and 19 (60 minutes). 438 134-2PH: Nos 16-18 (72 minutes). 438 472-2PH: Nos 21, 22 and 28 (68 minutes). 442 787-2PH: Nos 23-25 and 27 (59 minutes). 446 093-2PH: Nos 26 and 29 (62 minutes). 446 701-2PH: Nos 30-32 (66 minutes)

Intensity is very much the order of the day in this latest sonata cycle, a throwing open of the gates, with a far greater use of declamatory effects and rhetorical tropes than was the case in either of his two earlier cycles. Nos 4, 15 and 20: Brendel's reading of the Pastoral has changed – and its status has stratospherically soared – in two interrelated respects. In the first place, the two outer movements are both slower than on either the 1960s Turnabout or 1970s Philips recordings. Some will think the opening movement too slow, but that would be to ignore the thrilling way he now opens up the musical argument. What we have here is not some amiable musical ramble; rather, it is a multilayered music-drama in which the pianist's relish in debating the issues the music is already asking itself makes for the most exhilarating kind of listening. Nos 12-14 and 19: Beethoven's description of the two Op 27 sonatas as quasi una fantasia may refer primarily to structure, but it is the element of the fantastic that is most missing: in No 13 the quirky turns of harmony and texture in the opening Andante-Allegro or the surprise return of the Adagio just before the end, in the 'Moonlight' (No 14) the equally surprising appearance of the light-footed Minuet after the sad, introverted musing of the opening Adagio. No, for Op 27 it's in the 1960s cycle that you find him at his most penetrating.

Nos 16-18: The highlight of Op 31 here is the Tempest: it is a perceptive reading in which the thematic threads scattered across the piece are revealed with great artistry. Nos 21, 22 and 28: Brendel displays a technical mastery and visionary quality which surpasses his own previous fine recordings of these three sonatas. In the Waldstein (No 21), his sense of line and standard of pianism falls only marginally short of Gilels's superb 1972 version. Nos 23-25 and 27: Something about the proceedings in these recordings has resulted in an unwelcome monumental quality being imparted to the music. It comes and goes; at its worst it makes you feel Beethoven is being set down on tablets of stone rather than borne aloft. As to the sound, which is predominantly neutral, we are quite close to the instrument – Brendel's sing-along is audible in the first movement of Op 90 – and the sonorities tend to register as chunky and rather airless. Yet, in Op 90 Brendel makes the sun come out magically at the beginning of the second movement, after a true pianissimo at the close of the first. It is this performance along with that of the Appassionata that are the best here.

Nos 26 and 29: Brendel said that this was the last recording of the Hammerklavier Sonata we would have from him. He felt that this one, given in Vienna in the Musikverein, was good enough to be 'a decent way of leaving the piece'. There can be no doubt about that for Brendel is at his very best. The fusion of sound and sense is thrilling, the pianism marvellous – an object-lesson in how technique, at this level, is a matter of knowing what you're doing and of fortune favouring the brave. Hats off! The recording is a good one, and the distance from the sound is just right, with a wide dynamic range defined at all levels. Brendel in Les adieux – less agitated, warmer and more relaxed than many players – is very enjoyable, but the gem of these two is the Hammerklavier.

Nos 30-32: What does one do about a performance so satisfying that, after it, even single well-honed sentence seems an irrelevance? Retire, possibly, and devote oneself to a more useful and benign trade such as growing vegetables. So much, then, for his Op 109. As for Op 111, a brute of a thing to interpret, Brendel has always been one of its most lucid exponents, neither stalling the introduction, which he plays with a well-nigh ideal blend of grandeur and impetus, nor mismanaging the shifting pulses of the subsequent Allegro con brio ed appassionato. Brendel plays the whole of Op 110 superbly too. His playing is lucidity itself, in a way that seems at once natural, moving, and true to the letter of Beethoven's text.

Piano Sonatas Nos 1-32
Richard Goode pf
Nonesuch ⑩ 7559-79328-2 (608 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1990s ●●

Richard Goode's interpretation of the A major Sonata, Op 101, is one of the finest ever put on record. Reservations? You may have a doubt as to whether all the playing represents everything Goode is capable of: sometimes he disappoints, slightly, by appearing to hold back from the listener the boldness and fullness of communication the greatest players achieve. One might say that, for all their insight and illumination, some of the performances lack the final leap and a degree of transcendence. A quality often to be observed in Goode is allure. Maybe that is why his playing is so very likeable: the finish of his playing, technical and musical, is immaculate but on top of that he is exciting. His sound always makes you listen. His feeling for it and for fine gradations of sound from one end of his wide dynamic range to the other are those of a virtuoso and inform everything he does. And when he's more obviously on virtuoso territory, he responds to the demands for brilliance and thrilling projection as to the manner born. He is constantly inside the music, and what a lively, cultivated, lucid and stimulating guide he is. There is nothing diffident or half-hearted about the way he makes this cycle of Beethoven resound wonderfully, the earlier sonatas appearing as no less masterly or characteristic of their composer than the later.

Piano Sonatas Nos 1-32 H
Artur Schnabel pf
EMI Références mono ⑧ 763765-2 Ⓜ
(605 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1932-38 ●●

Schnabel was almost ideologically committed to extreme tempos; something you might say Beethoven's music thrives on, always provided the interpreter can bring it off. By and large he did. There are some famous gabbles in this sonata cycle, notably at the start of the Hammerklavier, with him going for broke. In fact, Schnabel also held that 'It is a mistake to imagine that all notes should be played with equal intensity or even be clearly audible. In order to clarify the music it is often necessary to make certain notes obscure.' If it is true, as some contemporary witnesses aver, that Schnabel was a flawless wizard in the period pre-1930, there is still plenty of wizardry left in these post-1930 Beethoven recordings. They are virtuoso readings that demonstrate a blazing intensity of interpretative vision as well as breathtaking manner of execution. Even when a dazzlingly articulate reading like that of the Waldstein is home and dry, the abiding impression in its aftermath is one of Schnabel's (and Beethoven's) astonishing physical and imaginative daring. And if this suggests recklessness, well, in many other instances the facts are quite other, for Schnabel has a great sense of decorum.

He can, in many of the smaller sonatas and some of the late ones, be impeccably mannered, stylish and urbane. Equally he can be devilish or coarse. At the other extreme, he is indubitably the master of the genuinely slow movement.

For the recorded sound, CD is a godsend. There is nothing that can be done about the occasional patch of wow or discoloration but, in general, the old recordings come up very freshly.

Piano Sonatas Nos 1-32 H
Wilhelm Kempff pf
DG Dokumente mono ⑧ 447 966-2GDO8 (511 minutes: ADD). Includes bonus disc,
'Wilhelm Kempff – An All-Round Musician'. Ⓜ
Recorded 1951-56 ●●●

Wilhelm Kempff was the most inspirational of Beethoven pianists. Those who have cherished his earlier stereo cycle for its magical spontaneity will find Kempff's qualities even more intensely conveyed in this mono set, recorded between 1951 and 1956. Amazingly the sound has more body and warmth than the stereo, with Kempff's unmatched transparency and clarity of articulation even more vividly caught, both in sparkling Allegros and in deeply dedicated slow movements. If in places he is even more personal, some might say wilful, regularly surprising you with a new revelation,the magnetism is even more intense, as in the great Adagio of the Hammerklavier or the final variations of Op 111, at once more rapt and more impulsive, flowing more freely.

The bonus disc, entitled 'An All-Round Musician', celebrates Kempff's achievement in words and music, on the organ in Bach, on the piano in Brahms and Chopin as well as in a Bachian improvisation, all sounding exceptionally transparent and lyrical. Fascinatingly, his pre-war recordings of the Beethoven sonatas on 78s are represented too. Here we have his 1936 recording of the Pathétique, with the central Adagio markedly broader and more heavily pointed than in the mono LP version of 20 years later.

Piano Sonatas

74321-30459-2 – Piano Sonatas Nos 4^b, 13^c, 14^c and 24^c
74321-30460-2 – Piano Sonatas Nos 5-7^b and 26^b
74321-27762-2 – Piano Sonatas Nos 1-3^a
74321-27764-2 – Piano Sonatas Nos 8^b, 12^b, 27^b, 28^b
Alfredo Perl pf
Arte Nova Classics 74321-30459/60-2, 27762/64-2
(oas: 73, 72, 73 and 74 minutes: DDD)
Recorded ^{a}1992-93, ^{b}1994, ^{c}1995 Ⓢ

Alfredo Perl does not follow the sonatas strictly in sequence: this may irritate some collectors, but it does allow each disc to stand as an independent 'recital' while also forming just one part of the complete journey. There is an enormous amount to celebrate in these performances. The rhythmic power of these works is communicated with a genuine sense of enjoyment, and one of the most striking features of Perl's playing is that he never shies away from the sforzandos or the subito pianos which are so important to Beethoven's style. Indeed, he attacks these dynamic accents and contrasts with such dramatic rigour that certain movements – the finale to the Moonlight, for example – are animated with a rare vitality. It is in the more highly charged movements where Perl is most compelling (the outer movements of the Pathétique, the opening movement of Op 10 No 1, and the finales of Op 2 No 1 and Op 10 No 2). The A major Sonata, Op 101, receives a tremendous performance, both musically and technically, and the second movement in particular is a marvel of understated virtuosity. In the movements of more lyrical simplicity Perl can be less convincing. In the second movement of Op 90, for example, he does not make the piano sing, and his tone can occasionally sound a little bland. His fortes, too, can be rather hard-edged, although the bright recording does not help him here. Perl's tempos have been the cause of some debate: he favours extremes, juxtaposing especially rapid fast movements with protracted slow movements. In Op 101, for example, he follows the march-like second movement, taken dangerously fast, with a particularly drawn-out Adagio.

If you wish to sample just one disc from this series to get a flavour of Perl's playing, then try Vol 4 (ranging from the Pathétique to Op 101).

SBT1188 – Piano Sonatas – Nos 1; 3; 32 H
SBT1189 – Piano Sonatas – Nos 7; 8; 13; 14
SBT1190 – Piano Sonatas – Nos 17; 18; 21; 22
SBT1191 – Piano Sonatas – Nos 26; 27; 29
SBT1192 – Piano Sonatas – Nos 23; 28; 30; 31
Solomon pf
Testament mono/^{e}stereo SBT1188-92 Ⓕ
(oas: 73, 78, 80, 78 and 79 minutes: ADD)
Recorded 1951-56

By the autumn of 1956, when a stroke ended Solomon's career at the absurdly early age of 54, he had recorded 18 of the Beethoven piano sonatas, 12 of which had been released. Had his career continued, the cycle would almost certainly have been revised and completed. The immediate rivals would have been the two cycles Wilhelm Kempff recorded for Deutsche Grammophon (mono 1951-56, stereo 1964-65) and the pre-war Schnabel recordings which EMI reissued in its series Great Recordings of the Century in 1963-64. In the event, Solomon's cycle remained incomplete, as did later Emil Gilels's not dissimilar DG cycle.

Some will fret over this but sanguine folk will reflect that all the 'important' sonatas are here in performances that can generally be reckoned 'representative'. Testament's Paul Baily has done a first-rate job on the transfers and the layouts: five CDs, each packed to the gunnels, each logically planned. The only sonata that is significantly out of sequence is Op 111 (No 32) yet that, curiously, is the one performance from among the late, great sonatas which isn't entirely up to scratch. Here one does think back to Schnabel. Alongside Schnabel's not dissimilar reading, Solomon's sounds scampered (in the first movement), lacking in depth (in the second), and oddly unspontaneous, as though haunted by the knowledge of the older reading. The rather hollow-sounding 1951 recording doesn't help.

Op 111 is coupled here (SBT1188) with two of the Op 2 sonatas (Nos 1 and 3), the playing by turns fiery and lucid, gracious and gay. If anything is missing, it is the sense of tragic pathos Schnabel finds in the slow movement of the C major Sonata and his radical recklessness of spirit in the two finales.

The second disc contains celebrated readings of the Moonlight (No 14) and the Pathétique (No 8). Solomon's reading of the opening movement of the Moonlight is famously long-breathed, his reading of the opening movement of the Pathétique, and the Moonlight's finale, wonderfully tense and austere.

The remaining three discs are, quite simply, indispensable, Solomon at the peak of his powers as a Beethoven player. In sonata after sonata, we hear virtuosity of the finest and most discriminating kind put at the service of some of the loftiest yet at the same time physically beautiful and physically exciting music known to man. Solomon was famous for the Cistercian clarity of his quick playing (the Waldstein – No 21, and Appassionata – No 23, sonatas passim) and for the concentrated calm of his playing of the great slow movements (this 1952 recording of the Hammerklavier – No 29, as fine an example as any). Underpinning both these phenomena is a quality of dynamic control that both gratifies the eye (Beethoven's text lifted off the page with rare precision) and bewitches the ear. It is this latter point which gives Solomon his special ability to define for us that element of unalloyed wonder in Beethoven's writing, those moments when we are brought to what T S Eliot calls 'the still point of the turning world'.

There are minor disappointments on each of these three final discs. The 1951 recording of Op 54 (SBT1190) is dowdily recorded and would almost certainly have been remade had circumstances allowed. Both the 1956 Op 90 (SBT1191) and the 1954 Op 101 (SBT1192) are good without being a match for what we have elsewhere on the discs. In the case of Op 90, this is Solomon's legendary elucidation of the Hammerklavier Sonata and his well-nigh definitive account of Les adieux (No 26), a performance, humane and vivid, that is fine almost beyond belief.

Piano Sonatas – Nos 2, 14, 'Moonlight', 31 & 32
Friedrich Gulda pf
Orfeo mono C591021B (80 minutes: AAD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1964

This succinct, magically fleet recital (Gulda's first at the Salzburg Festival, given in 1964) comes, ironically, from an iconoclast who announced: 'it is not Beethoven that speaks, but jazz…the modern world lives with jazz, not with the glorious dead.' Here, most oddly, is the pianist who journeyed from shock to shock, issued furious diatribes against the Viennese establishment, attempted to give recitals in the nude and finally gave a 'resurrection' recital after he had supposedly died. Yet the finest irony of all is that his actual performances suggest a 'truth that wakes to perish never' and the true recreation of 'monuments of unaging intellect,' contradicting his increasingly crazed philosophy. His playing is of a near flawless clarity and lucidity and throughout you always sense Gulda's musical sophistication beneath his outwardly plain-speaking surface.

A scrupulously modern pianist, he wore his immense talent lightly, maintaining his individuality yet never allowing anything to obtrude between audience and composer. The finale of Op 2 No 2 may seem fast and metronomic when compared to, say, Kempff's endearing whimsy and idiosyncrasy, but everything is given with an ease and dexterity that will make other pianists weep with envy. The Adagio from Op 27 No 2 is supremely natural and unstudied, and in the turbulent finale there is a sudden hush at 4'31" and a gravity to the cadenza just before the final onslaught that are truly breathtaking. Thoroughly recommended.

Beethoven Piano Sonatas Nos 8, 'Pathétique', 23, 'Appassionata', and 31 H
Handel Keyboard Suite in D minor, HWV428 – Prelude; Air and Variations; Presto.
Chaconne and Variations in G, HWV435
Edwin Fischer pf
APR Signature mono APR5502 (72 minutes: AAD). Ⓜ
Recorded 1931-38 ●●

On this invaluable disc are some of Fischer's finest and most legendary performances. His very first published recording (1931) of the Handel Chaconne, for example, was made at a time when his matchless leggiero and radiant tone were unimpeded by obvious blemishes or erratic pianism. Both this performance and that of the pieces from the Suite No 3 are endowed with an improvisatory magic, a strength and grace and supreme assurance. Fischer commences the Pathétique with a scrupulous adherence to Beethoven's fp marking, a sudden shift of sound that is fascinatingly modernist or prophetic. The Allegro di molto e con brio is exactly that, dancing with an irrepressible lightness and urgency; and if one listens to the slow octave descent just before the final outburst one will hear a rapt 'all-passion-spent' quality, something that Fischer was able to achieve with supreme naturalness, without even a hint of artifice or calculated effect. All past vicissitudes are finally resolved in Op 110 in what is a blaze of heroic glory, and time and time again he makes you pause to consider key points and details that have somehow eluded others. There is here a richness and humanity that was uniquely Fischer's.

Piano Sonatas Nos 8, 'Pathétique', 14, 'Moonlight', 15, 'Pastoral', 17, 'Tempest', 21, 'Waldstein', 23, 'Appassionata', and 26, 'Les adieux'
Alfred Brendel pf
Philips Duo ② 438 730-2PM2 (152 minutes: ADD). Ⓜ
Recorded 1970-77 ●

The Philips reissue, containing seven of Beethoven's most popular named sonatas admirably played by Alfred Brendel, is in every way an outstanding bargain, and is well worth obtaining, even if duplication is involved. All the performances are authoritative and offer consistently distinguished playing, while the recording is very realistic indeed. The Tempest resonates in the memory and the central movements of the Pastoral are most beautifully shaped. The Pathétique, Moonlight and Appassionata all bring deeply satisfying readings that are compellingly conceived and freshly executed. This set can be recommended without any reservations whatsoever.

Piano Sonatas Nos 8, 'Pathétique', 14, 'Moonlight', 17, 'Tempest', 23, 'Appassionata' Artur Pizarro pf
Linn Records CKD209 (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002

Artur Pizarro gives performances of four Beethoven sonatas sufficiently individual and freshly conceived to make them emerge as new-minted rather than over-familiar. Let no one say that there is no room for another set of established masterpieces when the pianist is possessed with this sort of recreative energy and exuberance!

The contrast between Beethoven's opening Grave and Allegro di molto e con brio in the Pathétique Sonata is vividly and romantically caught; and if the weight at climactic points is punishing, the impetus and momentum are unflagging. Everything is experienced anew: Pizarro presents the central Adagio as an uneasy truce between two outer storms (even the finale is fast and urgent; no tame or wistful Allegretto anticlimax for him); and in the opening of the Moonlight Sonata his free-flowing Andante is an entirely valid alternative to, say, the eternally pensive Adagio of Solomon fame. The fires of both this and the other Sonatas are raised to fever pitch, conveyed with an unfaltering assurance and sheer musical character. In the Tempest he casts a romantic haze across the problematic first-movement recitatives yet still maintains clarity.

Linn's recording, of an uncommonly warm-toned Blüthner, is exceptional.

Piano Sonatas Nos 14-18. Variations on an Original Theme in F, Op 34. Seven Bagatelles, Op 33 🄷
Artur Schnabel pf
Pearl mono ② GEMMCDS9123 (141 minutes: AAD)
Recorded 1933 Ⓜ ●●

Heavy background hiss is a small price to pay for Schnabel's immediacy and quality, and both of these discs, the original material transferred with a courageous candour and honesty, do much to convince one that Beethoven and Schnabel are, indeed, synonymous. How characteristic is that gruff but musicianly refusal in No 14 of all undue solemnity, all notion of romantic, moonlit effusion. Such robust eloquence will hardly appeal to those who long for a prolonged gaze into the infinite, but the balance of sense and sensibility provides a superbly authoritative alternative. Of course, there are moments when Schnabel's impetuosity, his embattled rather than fluent resolution of purely pianistic problems, can cause momentary confusion. Yet the odd snatched phrase or telescoped rhythm pales into oblivion given Schnabel's overall achievement, his salty brio and the profound eloquence of his slow movements (has anyone played the central Adagio of No 17 so directly yet so speculatively?). His technique, while undeniably erratic, was brilliant; and every page pulses with a vividness and rough-hewn vitality that are somehow pure Schnabel, pure Beethoven.

Time and again he wears his immense learning lightly and in, say, the dazzling wit and repartee of No 16 the dust of ages seems to fall away before one's very eyes and ears. The Op 33 Bagatelles also prove that Schnabel was as much at home in concentrated aphorism as in lengthy working-out. So, true Beethoven lovers will treasure these discs, even when they turn to a different sort of enlightenment from Wilhelm Kempff, Schnabel's nominated heir. But then Schnabel and Kempff are like North and South Poles of interpretation, and both are indispensable.

Piano Sonatas Nos 19, 20, 22, 23, 'Appassionata', 30, 31 and 32
Sviatoslav Richter pf
Philips ② 438 486-2PH2 (122 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1992 ●●

Piano Sonatas Nos 18 and 28. Two Rondos, Op 51. Piano Trio in B flat, Op 97, 'Archduke'[a]. Quintet for Piano and Wind in E flat, Op 16[b]
Sviatoslav Richter pf
[a]members of the Borodin Quartet; [b]members of the Moraguès Quintet Ⓕ
Philips ② 438 624-2PH2 (131 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1986-92 Ⓕ

There are times in a reviewer's working life when he or she folds away the notebook, discards the score, and just listens – the performance demands it. This was one such event. Those whose chief pleasure is to pounce on minute blemishes would no doubt have a joyous time here – Richter is no chromium-plated perfectionist. But to go glitch-hunting in the face of playing of this quality would require a heroic degree of insensitivity. Granted, Richter would hardly be Richter if there wasn't something bizarre to pick out, and there is one detail that does call for comment. In the Quintet for piano and wind, Op 16, Richter and the four members of the Moraguès Quintet repeat not only the first movement exposition, but the exposition plus the slow introduction. For those who listen for structural signposts it is disorientating; and yet it is all so wonderfully played – the colour, the vitality, the sense of creative give-and-take between the players are all you could wish for in this youthful piece.

Throughout these two sets the sheer aliveness of the playing can be breathtaking – and that's no exaggeration. It doesn't matter whether the territory is the most searching late Beethoven or an early, 'easy' sonata (Beethoven's own description) such as the G minor, Op 49 No 1. One could make endless lists of favourite details – little touches that show how thorough Richter's understanding is, but what finally distinguishes Richter's Beethoven is a quality ... the word is 'improvisatory': it is as though you were hearing the music not merely played, but composed. This is what holds the attention even when Richter's conscious decisions go against what you expect – the slow tempos in the Scherzo and Fugue of Op 110, for instance.

These four discs form a valuable counterweight to the modern nostalgists' claim that great playing – and especially great Beethoven playing – is a thing of the remote past. The transfers serve Richter excellently: intrusive audience noise is minimal, in fact in Op 111 you might only realize that there is an audience at all when clapping and cheering thunders in at the end. The engineering is good.

Piano Sonatas Nos 21, 'Waldstein', 23, 'Appassionata', and 26, 'Les adieux'
Emil Gilels pf
DG 419 162-2GH (68 minutes: ADD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1970s ●●

This reissue couples the Waldstein, the Appassionata, and Les adieux, and immediately establishes a claim to being one of the most desirable of all Beethoven piano sonata reissues. Perhaps there is something rather chilly and understated about Gilels' reading of the Waldstein's brief slow movement (by contrast, his playing of the slow movement of Les adieux is ravishing), but Beethoven must take some of the blame here, too.

Throughout these three sonatas Gilels plays the music with an architect's sense of structure, great technical brilliance, and that uncanny blend of intellectual attack and intellectual distance which give his recordings their peculiar distinction. The transfers are brilliant and true. The opening of Les adieux sounds a trifle muted and there is some tape background, but the ear dismisses this as rapidly as it picks it up.

Piano Sonatas Nos 27-32 H
Solomon pf
EMI Références mono/stereo ② 764708-2 Ⓜ
(141 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1951-56 ●●●

Solomon's 1952 recording of the Hammerklavier Sonata is one of the great recordings of the century. At the heart of his performance there is as calm and searching an account of the slow movement as you are likely to hear this side of the Great Divide. And the outer movements are also wonderfully well done. Music that is so easy to muddle and arrest is here fierily played; Solomon at his lucid, quick-witted best.

The CD transfer is astonishing. It is as though previously we have merely been eavesdropping on the performance; now, decades later, we are finally in the presence of the thing itself. It is all profoundly moving. What's more, EMI has retained the juxtaposition of the 1969 LP reissue: Solomon's glorious account of the A major Sonata, Op 101 as the Hammerklavier's proud harbinger. We must be grateful that Solomon had completed his recording of these six late sonatas before his career was abruptly ended by a stroke in the latter part of 1956.

The Sonatas, Op 90 and Op 110, were recorded in August 1956. The warning signs were – in retrospect – already there; yet listening to these edited tapes one would hardly know anything was amiss. There is the odd fumble in the Scherzo of Op 110; but, if anything, the playing has even greater resolve, both in Op 110 and in a songful (but never sentimental) account of Op 90. The recordings of Opp 109 and 111 date from 1951. Sonata, Op 109, is very fine; Op 111 is – by Solomon's standards – a shade wooden in places, both as a performance and as a recording.

Still, this is a wonderful set, and very much a collectors' item.

Piano Sonatas Nos 27^a, 28^b and 29^c, 'Hammerklavier'
Sviatoslav Richter pf
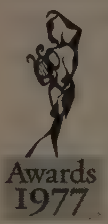
Praga PR254022 (75 minutes: ADD). Ⓜ
Item marked ^{a} recorded 1965, ^{b}1986, ^{c}1975

These entirely unedited performances feel not only live but somehow extraordinarily real. Not that Richter ever gives the impression of playing for the microphone, and his vision of musical structures remains constant whether he is in the studio or the concert hall. Nevertheless the atmosphere within which that vision is realized differs from venue to venue, and in Prague it seems to have been extraordinarily conducive. This is outstanding Beethoven playing, though frustratingly the 1965 Hammerklavier has a little memory black-out at 8'20" in the first movement, without which it might have grown into something even more extraordinary.



Piano Sonatas Nos 28-32
Maurizio Pollini pf
DG The Originals ② 449 740-2GOR2 Ⓜ
(126 minutes: ADD)
Recorded 1975-77 ●●●

This reissued DG Originals set makes an exceptionally neat package. Consistent praise has been heaped on these recordings since they won the Instrumental Record Award way back in 1977. One of Pollini's greatest strengths is his ability to stand up to the accumulated momentum of Beethoven's structure, but he can also build on it so as to leave the impression of one huge exhalation of creative breath. In the first movement of the Hammerklavier the astonishing technical assurance has you right on the edge of your seat with excitement. His controlled vehemence is without rival in the outer movements, and though he does not get right to the bottom of No 29's poetry, his far-sighted phrasing and paragraphing is again remarkable (hear the build-up to the finale recapitulation and resist it if you can!).

In the last three sonatas there are others who stop to peer deeper into some of the psychic chasms, but Pollini's mastery of integration and continuous growth, and his ability to hold potentially conflicting musical demands in balance, are again sources of wonderment.

In terms of the qualities just mentioned, who is Pollini's equal? Other than small touches of pre-echo in Op 111, there is nothing here to distract from the exalted quality of both the music and the playing.

An die ferne Geliebte

Sechs Gellert Lieder, Op 48. Lieder – Op 52: No 3, Das Liedchen von der Ruhe; No 4, Mailied; Op 75: No 2, Neue Liebe, neues Leben; No 3, Aus Goethes Faust; Op 83: No 1, Wonne der Wehmut; No 2, Sehnsucht. Adelaide, Op 46. An die Hoffnung, Op 94. An die ferne Geliebte, Op 98. Klage, WoO113. Der Liebende, WoO139. An die Geliebte, WoO140
Stephan Genz bar Roger Vignoles pf
Hyperion CDA67055 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1998 ●●●

The young baritone Stephan Genz is in the first bloom of his youthful prime. Beethoven's setting of Goethe's 'Mailied', with its lightly breathed, springing words, could have been written with Genz in mind. Roger Vignoles, Genz's regular accompanist, contributes an irresistible bounding energy and even a sense of mischief to one of Beethoven's most spontaneous yet subtle settings, 'Neue Liebe, neues Leben'; and an elusive sense of yearning is created as the voice tugs against the piano line in 'Sehnsucht'. The six Gellert Lieder form the centrepiece of this recital: Beethoven's song-cycle, An die ferne Geliebte, its grand finale. The intensity of Genz's cry 'Is there a God?' in An die Hoffnung, at the start of the disc, gives some indication of the gravitas he brings to his firmly enunciated 'spiritual songs' of Gellert. Genz and Vignoles have here reinstated a number of the original verses omitted by Beethoven in the first printed edition, creating a greater sense of balance and proportion within the set. The concluding song-cycle is quite simply one of the best performances currently available. Fresh and bright of tone, awe-filled and beautifully paced and scaled, Genz's singing is modulated exquisitely from song to song by Vignoles's sentient piano accompaniment.

Cantatas

Cantata on the death of the Emperor Joseph II, WoO87. Cantata on the accession of the Emperor Leopold II, WoO88. Opferlied, Op 121*b*. Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt, Op 112
Janice Watson, Judith Howarth sops Jean Rigby mez John Mark Ainsley ten José van Dam bass-bar
Corydon Singers and Orchestra / Matthew Best
Hyperion CDA66880 (80 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996

Beethoven was only 19 when he was commissioned to write this 40-minute cantata on the Emperor's death. It was never performed, the musicians claiming it was too difficult; and remained buried for almost a century. Arguably Beethoven's first major masterpiece, it was one of his few early unpublished works of which the master approved. When he came to write Fidelio, he used the soaring theme from the first of the soprano arias here, 'Da stiegen die Menschen an's Licht', for Leonore's sublime moment in the finale, 'O Gott! Welch' ein Augenblick'. The tragic C minor power of the choruses framing the work is equally memorable. Dramatic tension is then kept taut through all seven sections, with recitatives indicating the young composer's thirst to write opera. Matthew Best conducts a superb performance, fresh, incisive and deeply moving, with excellent soloists as well as a fine chorus. In this first cantata the solo quartet simply contribute to the opening and closing choruses.

The second cantata, only a little more than half the length of the first, was written soon after, when Leopold II had succeeded as Emperor. It is apt to have the two works presented successively, when one seems to develop out of the other. This second work is less ambitious, expressing less deep emotions, yet it brings fascinating anticipation of later masterpieces. Much more specific is the way that the finale of the cantata, 'Heil! Stürzet nieder, Millionen', clearly anticipates the choral finale of the Ninth Symphony (even with the word 'Millionen'), a point reinforced by the key of D major. The two shorter pieces, both dating from Beethoven's difficult interim period between middle and late, with Jean Rigby as soloist in the Opferlied, make a generous fill-up, performed with equal dedication.

With plenty of air round the chorus, the recording has ample weight yet is transparent enough to clarify even the heaviest textures. A revelatory issue.

Songs

'Irish, Welsh and Scottish Songs'
Irish Songs, WoO152 – No 1, The Return to Ulster[b]; No 5, On the Massacre of Glencoe[b]; No 6, What shall I do to shew how much I love her[b]; No 8, Come draw we round a cheerful ring[b]; No 9, The Soldier's Dream[c]; No 19, Wife, Children and Friends[abc]; WoO153 – No 4, Since greybeards inform us that youth will decay[b]; No 9, The kiss, dear maid, thy lip has left[c]; WoO154 – No 3, The Farewell Song[b]; No 4, The Pulse of an Irishman[c]. Welsh Songs, WoO155 – No 2, The Monks of Bangor's March[bc]; No 9, To the Aeolian Harp[a]; No 14, The Dream[ab]; No 19, The Vale of Clwyd[a]; No 22, Constancy[bc]; No 25, The Parting Kiss[b]. Scottish Songs, Op 108 – No 5, The sweetest lad was Jamie[a]; No 8, The lovely lass of Inverness[a]; No 11, Oh! thou art the lad of my heart, Willy[a]; No 13, Come fill, fill, my good fellow[abc]; No 20, Faithfu' Johnie[a]; No 24, Again, my Lyre[b]; WoO156 – Womankind[abc]. God save the King!, WoO157[abc]
[a]Sophie Daneman sop [b]Paul Agnew ten
[c]Peter Harvey bar Alessandro Moccia vn
Alix Verzier vc Jérôme Hantaï fp
Astrée Naïve E8850 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, texts and translations included

With 140 to choose from, here is an excellent selection of Beethoven's folksong arrangements, performed with all due care and accomplishment, spirit and affection. They are a joy: the songs in themselves, for a start, but more especially Beethoven's work on them. Or put it another way: 'work' is exactly what it does not sound like. It sounds as though he met these tunes (sent him, mostly, by George Thomson of Edinburgh), took to them like magic, found something in each that warmed his heart or set him dancing round the room, and eventually, sorry when the verses had run out, made him add a ritornello or coda like a pat on the back to send each on its way.

Each number is a delight, but among the favourites are Faithfu' Johnie, with its deep cello underlining the heart's affections, The Pulse of an Irishman, both rumbustious and delicate in its fun, and, unexpectedly, God save the King, in which, in spite of its two peremptory calls to attention, Beethoven seems to be doing anything but. A special feature is the use of period instruments, effective in the more dramatic arrangements such as The Return to Ulster and the jovial party-pieces, Come, fill, fill, my good fellows and Since greybeards inform us. All three singers contribute ably, and the occasional collaborations in duet and trio are welcome.

Missa solemnis

Mass in D, Op 123, 'Missa solemnis'

Charlotte Margiono sop Catherine Robbin mez William Kendall ten Alastair Miles bass Monteverdi Choir; English Baroque Soloists / Sir John Eliot Gardiner 🅿

Awards 1991

Archiv Produktion 429 779-2AH Ⓕ

(72 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included. Recorded 1989 ●●●

The Missa solemnis is generally agreed to be one of the supreme masterpieces of the 19th century, but attempts to record a genuinely great performance have over many years run into difficulties. Usually the greatness itself is flawed, perhaps in the quality of the solo singers or in passages where the conductor's approach is too idiosyncratic or momentarily not up to the challenge of Beethoven's inspiration. The strain upon the choir, especially its sopranos, is notorious; similarly the technical problems of balance by producer and engineers. This performance mixes discipline and spontaneous creativity, the rhythms are magically alive and the intricate texture of sound is made wonderfully clear. The great fugues of the Gloria and Credo achieve at the right points their proper Dionysiac sense of exalted liberation. Gardiner uses a choir of 36 and an orchestra of 60 playing on period instruments, aiming at a 'leaner and fitter' sound. With Gardiner, the exceptional clarity of his smaller body of singers and players, their meticulous responsiveness to direction and concentrated attention to detail is impressive; yet one is aware of it as a performance. Sometimes, as in the first sounding of drums and trumpets signifying war, Gardiner's additional intensity brings a real gain.

Missa solemnis 🅿

Eva Mei sop Marjana Lipovšek contr Anthony Rolfe Johnson ten Robert Holl bass

Arnold Schönberg Choir; Chamber Orchestra of Europe / Nikolaus Harnoncourt

Teldec Ultima ② 0630-18945-2 (81 minutes: DDD).

Text and translation included. Ⓑ

Recorded live in 1992 ●●

There are many marvellous performances in the catalogue of Beethoven's great Mass. Gardiner catches the greatness, rises to it with his uncanny freshness of perception, and secures a performance produced virtually without fault. Levine on DG, with what we would probably still call 'conventional' forces (but of totally unconventional magnificence), presents a large-scale performance, not universally liked, but one which impresses you almost unequivocally on every hearing.

And here is Harnoncourt: very different from either of the others, but having at least equally upon it the stamp of devotion and of high attainment. Choir and orchestra achieve wonderful precision and clarity of articulation; they are sensitive to the needs of shading, to the ever-shifting balance of the parts, and to the purpose of cross-rhythms which at first may look like anarchy.

The soloists, all of them meeting their immense individual challenges, also work intelligently as a quartet. It might be good simply to stop there and say, 'Enjoy it'. But once comparisons start, such simplicity begins to melt. There is no doubt that Gardiner's performance is more brightly, sharply, recorded. Returning to Harnoncourt after listening to a few minutes of that is to feel a relative remoteness of contact with the sound. Moving then to Levine, there is again a more immediate presence in the sound. Yet Harnoncourt in this three-way comparison emerges as a kind of halfway-house between Gardiner and Levine, and not quite as colourful as either. It may well be that an undecided reader may opt for Gardiner finally for the much more mundane reason that his performance is confined to a single disc (and after all it was Gramophone Record of the Year in 1991). Yet, listening again to the Credo, there is something almost military in the way Gardiner's people march along, and, as Harnoncourt stresses, the whole Mass is above all 'an appeal for peace'. Harnoncourt's is a performance of great integrity: that is, it is a complete, consistent whole, and all its parts are sound.

Missa solemnis 🅷

Zinka Milanov sop Bruna Castagna contr Jussi Björling ten Alexander Kipnis bass

Westminster Choir; NBC Symphony Orchestra / Arturo Toscanini

Istituto Discografico Italiano mono IDIS6365

(79 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded live in New York on Dec 28, 1940 ●●

A very fine line separates the 1939 performance (available on BBC Legends, listed below), which has been described, quite rightly, as a triumph, from the 1940 reading listed here. On the other hand, John Steane – in his chapter on the work in Choral Music on Record (CUP: 1991) – heaped praise on 1940, commenting – inter alia – that 'all elements seem in equilibrium' and that 'the total effect...is not adequately represented by references to "electricity"'.

In deciding between these views one is comparing two readings of such overwhelming conviction and power that either will come as a revelation to the newcomer to work and/or conductor. If the preference here is ever so slightly for the 1940 account it is because the sound is marginally better, the singing of the Westminster Choir even more inspired than that of the BBC Choral Society and the Carnegie Hall soloists by a small margin superior the their Queen's Hall counterparts mainly due to the presence of the irreplaceable Björling and Kipnis. Zinka Milanov is common to both, but in more confident form on the later occasion. Listen to this quartet at 'Et incarnatus' in the Credo or in the whole of the Benedictus and you will hear singing fit for the gods both in tone and expression, not forgetting the subtle use of portamento, out-of-fashion today. As for the chorus, hear the end of the Gloria and you must realise why Toscanini, in this work, is supreme.

Although this Italian issue has fairly primitive sound, it is worth every penny for anyone wanting to encounter what must be one of the greatest accounts ever of this challenging work. Toscanini's 1953 version on RCA, though in better sound, is by general consent a less commanding performance with inferior soloists.

Additional recommendation
Missa solemnis^{a}
Couplings: Symphony No 7 Ⓗ
Cherubini Anacréon – Overture. Mozart Symphony No 35 in D, 'Haffner', K385
^{a}Milanov sop ^{a}Thorborg mez ^{a}Pataky ten
^{a}Moscona bass ^{a}BBC Choral Society; BBC Symphony Orchestra / Toscanini
BBC Legends/IMG Artists mono ② BBCL4016-2 Ⓜ
(145 minutes: ADD: recorded live in 1939) ●●

This is an absolute triumph of a performance – a hair's breadth separates this from the 1940 account reviewed above; both performances are equally gripping. The transfer eschews excessive de-hissing for a quiet sea of surface noise that soon ceases to matter.

Mass in C, Op 86

Mass in C. Ah! perfido, Op 65. Ⓟ
Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt, Op 112
Charlotte Margiono sop Catherine Robbin mez
William Kendall ten Alastair Miles bar Monteverdi Choir; Orchestre Révolutionnaire et Romantique / Sir John Eliot Gardiner
Archiv Produktion 435 391-2AH (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1989-91 ●●

Gardiner's genius is plentifully in evidence here. Of course it is true that the opening movement, the Kyrie eleison, is a plea for mercy. But its opening bars speak of comfort: there is almost the simple good faith of a quiet, very Germanic carol about them. Gardiner sets a mood of deliberate seriousness, with lowered period, pitch and a tempo rather slower than that suggested by Beethoven's direction: Andante con moto, assai vivace, quasi allegretto ma non troppo. He also appears to have encouraged the soloists, especially the soprano, to shape and shade the phrases, so intensifying the feeling of seriousness and deliberation. Happily, this policy prevails for only a short time, and to some extent the music itself goes out to meet it. As the second Kyrie (following the Christe) moves towards its climax, the fortissimo brings suspensions where the alto part grinds against the soprano, and then come sudden fortissimos with intense modulations and momentary discords, all of which are particularly vivid in this performance. What follows has the same exhilarating quality as that which was so applauded in Gardiner's Missa solemnis and, just as he did there, Gardiner is constantly illuminating detail while maintaining an apparently easy natural rightness throughout.

Again, an outstanding contribution is made by the Monteverdi Choir. Splendidly athletic, for instance, are the leaps of a seventh in the fugal 'Hosanna'. The tone-painting of Meeresstille finds them marvellously alert and vivid in articulation. Ah! perfido brings a similar sense of renewal: there is not even a momentary suspicion of concert routine, but rather as though it is part of an exceptionally intense performance of Fidelio. Charlotte Margiono sings the angry passages with the concentration of a Schwarzkopf, and brings to those that are gentler-toned a special beauty of her own. Other soloists in the Mass sing well if without distinction. Distinction is certainly a word to use of the disc as a whole.

Fidelio

Inga Nielsen sop Leonore; Gösta Winbergh ten Florestan; Alan Titus bar Don Pizarro; Kurt Moll bass Rocco; Edith Lienbacher sop Marzelline; Herwig Pecoraro ten Jaquino; Wolfgang Glashof bass Don Fernando; Péter Pálinkás ten First Prisoner; József Moldvay bass Second Prisoner
Hungarian Radio Chorus; Nicolaus Esterházy Sinfonia / Michael Halász 🏆
Naxos ② 8 660070/1 (114 minutes: DDD). Ⓢ
Text included. Recorded 1998 ●●

Naxos has an uncanny knack for choosing the right artists for its operatic ventures. On this occasion, four of the singers are among the better known in the field, each judiciously cast.

Halász projects every facet of the score, inspiring his forces to live every moment of the plot in words and music. This isn't an interpretation in the romantic, quasi-philosophical mode of Furwängler or Klemperer, rather one that alerts the mind and ear to the human agony of it all.

In those respects it challenges the hegemony of Maazel's forceful mid-price set on Decca, the admired, early-stereo Fricsay, also at mid-price and Mackerras at full price, the last-named vocally outclassed in almost every case by this super-bargain Naxos. Nielsen's Leonore is no projection of subservient femininity but a tormented wife seeking to save her husband, her plight expressed in every key phrase. She doesn't provide the heroic sounds of a Nilsson (Maazel) or all the warmth of Rysanek (Fricsay), but her slimmer, more compact tone exactly fits this performance. Winberg is a Florestan equal to his Leonore in vocal and interpretative assets. Not even Heppner (Davis) or Seiffert (Harnoncourt), among modern interpreters, sings the role better. His voice poised between the lyrical and the heroic, his tone warm, his technique firm, Florestan's scene can seldom have been so satisfyingly sung and enacted. As Marzelline, Edith Lienbacher is something of a discovery, catching the eagerness, also the sense of nerves a-jangle predicated by the part.

The dialogue, rather drastically foreshortened, is well spoken by all and intelligently directed. The orchestral and choral singing need fear no comparisons, and the recording has plenty of presence, no tricks. This is undoubtedly a performance that fulfils almost all the exigent demands made on its principals and – at the price – should be eagerly sought after. Even in absolute terms, its most notable predecessors are matched, if not surpassed.

Fidelio

Christa Ludwig mez Leonore; Jon Vickers ten Florestan; Walter Berry bass Don Pizarro; Gottlob Frick bass Rocco; Ingeborg Hallstein sop Marzelline; Gerhard Unger ten Jaquino; Franz Crass bass Don Fernando; Kurt Wehofschitz ten First Prisoner; Raymond Wolansky bar Second Prisoner Philharmonia Chorus and Orchestra / Otto Klemperer

EMI Great Recordings of the Century ② 567364-2 (128 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ

Includes notes, text and translation. Rec 1962 ○○

If you accept Klemperer's broad, metaphysical view of Fidelio, his account of Beethoven's only opera is also a classic. On its own terms it is superb, as are the Philharmonia's playing and the recording, but it lacks the theatrical intensity of some other versions, notably Maazel's (Decca) and Halász's recent Naxos set. That kind of intensity is there in Klemperer's own Budapest recording (in Hungarian on Hungaroton) and in an off-the-air recording of his 1961 Covent Garden production. Legge made the mistake of replacing Jurinac, in this 1962 set, with Ludwig, a wonderful singer but not as natural a Leonore as Jurinac. Similarly, Hotter's raging Pizarro is not quite matched by Berry's. Vickers' searing, slightly sentimentalised Florestan is common to both. When Klemperer returned to Covent Garden in 1968, Silja was his Leonore, and no one who saw and heard those performances, the conductor's operatic swan-song, will ever forget the occasion – as Richard Osborne says in his perceptive notes. He fails to point out, though – a small but important matter – that Schwarzkopf speaks Marzelline's dialogue for Hallstein.

Fidelio

Charlotte Margiono sop Leonore; Peter Seiffert ten Florestan; Sergei Leiferkus bar Pizarro; László Polgár bass Rocco; Barbara Bonney sop Marzelline; Deon van der Walt ten Jaquino; Boje Skovhus bar Don Fernando; Reinaldo Macias ten First Prisoner; Robert Florianschütz bass Second Prisoner Arnold Schoenberg Choir; Chamber Orchestra of Europe / Nikolaus Harnoncourt

Teldec ② 4509-94560-2 (119 minutes: DDD)

Notes, text and translation included Ⓕ

Recorded 1994 ○○

Highlights available on Warner Apex 0927-401374-2 Ⓢ

Everything Harnoncourt touches leaves one with a sense of a country rediscovered: we listen to the piece in hand with new ears. So it is again here. Beethoven's sole but intractable opera has seldom emerged from the recording studio, or indeed the theatre, with such clarity of texture, such promptness of rhythm, such unity of purpose on all sides. This is a reading that gives full play to winds and horns, making one aware, whether it's in the Overture, Pizarro's aria, Leonore's big scena or the Prelude to Act 2, just how important they are to the structure and character of each movement. Where tempos are concerned, Harnoncourt is almost bound to be controversial somewhere. If many speeds are to their advantage just on the measured side of the customary, as in the Dungeon quartet, allowing us for once to hear every strand of the argument, that for 'O namenlose Freude' is uncommonly moderate. At this pace, Leonore and Florestan seem to be conducting a gentle exchange of deeply felt emotions on an interior level rather than allowing their pent-up emotions to burst forth in an explosion of joy, as is more usual.

The dialogue is delivered in an understated fashion. Two vocal interpretations stand out for excellent singing and pungent characterisation. Once Leiferkus's Pizarro takes centre-stage the action lifts on to a new, more tense plane. This vicious little dictator with his incisive diction, spoken and sung, and his biting, vital voice is a commanding presence. But Evil is up against an equally arresting advocate of Good in Margiono's gloriously sung and read Leonore. Hers isn't the quasi-dramatic soprano usually associated with the part, but she never sounds strained in the context of a more lyrical, smaller-scale performance. Seiffert fills Florestan with more refulgent tone than any other tenor on recent recordings – the high tessitura of his aria's close causes him no distress at all – but one has to admit that there is little of the Schmerz in the tone found, quite differently, in the recording of Vickers (Klemperer). In that sense, though, he fits into Harnoncourt's well-ordered scheme of things. The only piece of miscasting is Don Fernando: a role that needs a solid bass with strong low notes has been given to a high baritone who sounds anything but authoritative. Harnoncourt has opted for a professional chamber choir to second the superb Chamber Orchestra of Europe. By the side of the superb Teldec recording, the Klemperer and Maazel sound less than immediate.

Fidelio
Hildegard Behrens mez Leonore; James King ten Florestan; Donald McIntyre bass-bar Don Pizarro; Kurt Moll bass Rocco; Lucia Popp sop Marzelline; Norbert Orth ten Jaquino; Nikolaus Hillebrand bass Don Fernando; Friedrich Lenz ten First Prisoner; Hans Wilbrink bar Second Prisoner; Bavarian State Orchestra and Opera Chorus / Karl Böhm
Orfeo d'Or ② C560012I (141 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded live in 1978 ●●

At 84 this was to be Böhm's last Fidelio, and he knew it. Yet absolutely no allowances have to be made for his age in this life-enhancing, dramatically alert reading, quite on a par with his earlier versions of the work on disc. Indeed this now joins those other legendary live performances by great conductors of the past – Böhm himself in 1944 in Vienna, Bruno Walter at the Met in the same year, Toscanini at a concert in New York in 1945 and Furtwängler at Salzburg in 1950. But, of course, this one is in vastly superior sound. Everyone seems determined to give of their best. None more than Hildegard Behrens, the very epitome of the dedicated, highly strung wife on a rescue mission and singing her heart out at all the important moments, not least in her 'Abscheulicher!'. She far surpasses her performance for Solti on Decca a year later. By her side throughout is the sterling, warm, authoritative Rocco of Kurt Moll in a reading that surpasses his own high standards on other versions. James King, though his voice had dried out a little by 1978, sings a Florestan imbued with anguish. As Pizarro, McIntyre, in powerful voice, is evil personified. For all the vocal glories, Böhm remains the evening's hero. Above all, he makes the opera living drama. Were this Fidelio all of his work that survived for us to judge him by, it would be enough to clinch his reputation as a great conductor.

The only drawback for some may be the inclusion of more dialogue than we usually hear either in the theatre or on disc. There is also a deal of stage action to be heard. None of that should deter you from hearing such a truthful enactment of this masterpiece, few if any better on CD.

Additional recommendations
Fidelio
Nilsson Leonore McCracken Florestan
Krause Don Pizarro
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Maazel
Decca Double 448 104-2DF2
(119 minutes: ADD: 11/96) Ⓑ

A fine and often overlooked recording with Nilsson on superb form. McCracken is a suitably impassioned Florestan and Maazel generates real electricity in the pit.

Fidelio
Coupling: Leonore – Overture No 3
Jurinac Leonore Peerce Florestan Neidlinger Don Pizarro Bavarian State Orchestra and Opera Chorus / Knappertsbusch
DG Westminster Legacy ② 471 204-2GWM2 (156 minutes: ADD: 12/01: recorded 1961) Ⓜ

Jurinac's glorious Leonore is as good a reason as any to buy this set. Knappertsbusch's direction is big-boned but may be too broad for some.

Leonore

Hillevi Martinpelto sop Leonore; Kim Begley ten Florestan; Matthew Best bass Pizarro; Franz Hawlata bass Rocco; Christiane Oelze sop Marzelline; Michael Schade ten Jaquino; Alastair Miles bass Don Fernando; Robert Burt ten First Prisoner; Colin Campbell bar Second Prisoner Monteverdi Choir; Orchestre Révolutionnaire et Romantique / Sir John Eliot Gardiner 🅿
Archiv Produktion ② 453 461-2AH2
(138 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1996 Ⓕ ●

Romain Rolland described Beethoven's Leonore as 'a monument of the anguish of the period, of the oppressed soul and its appeal to liberty'. John Eliot Gardiner, in the first complete recording of Fidelio's predecessor for more than two decades, reveals musically and verbally how the early, more radical opera has worked its spell on him, too. This, he says, is Beethoven struggling to recover the revolutionary fervour of his Bonn years; this is the score where the direct expression of spontaneous emotion, rather than the nobility of philosophical abstraction, is really to be found. The slower musical pace of Leonore is counterbalanced by a stronger narrative thrust and the actor, Christoph Bantzer, contributes a sprightly narration which interleaves, deftly and movingly, brief asides from the likes of Wordsworth, Goethe and Hölderlin. And then, of course, there is the music.

The Leonore No 2 Overture is distinguished by the telling contrasts Gardiner draws between brooding strata of strings and the pearly light of the woodwind; and a reversal of the first two numbers gives Christiane Oelze a head start as a radiant Marzelline. The trio (Rocco, Marzelline and Jaquino) which prepares the Quartet, 'Mir ist so wunderbar', does tend to impede the momentum but it has a telling effect on the beat of the work's human heart, and Gardiner's sensitivity to its pulse throughout makes good any shortfall in dramatic impetus. The D major March which introduces Act 2 is here restored to its original place for the first time since the première. With brass and timpani making menacing circumstance out of what can be mere pomp, it makes the entry of Don Pizarro darker still.

Matthew Best is, in articulation if not in range, one of the most blood-curdling Pizarros on disc, just as Alastair Miles is one of the noblest Don Fernandos. 'Komm, Hoffnung' reveals the resilience and steady, gleaming core of Hillevi Martinpelto's Leonore. There are times when one craves a fiercer edge of passion; but, with the equally sharply focused tenor of Kim Begley, it is a joy to hear 'O namenlose Freude' perfectly paced, and really sung. This Florestan sings his great aria without Fidelio's vision of an 'Engel Leonore': Begley, no Heldentenor after all, is well suited to the constant, dark minor key of this 'Lebens Frühlingstagen', which presages Gardiner's triumphant – and often surprising – finale.

Vincenzo Bellini

Italian 1801-1835

GROVE Bellini was given piano lessons by his father, and could play well when he was five. At six he wrote a Gallus cantavit and began studying composition with his grandfather. After a few years his sacred pieces were being heard in Catania churches and his ariettas and instrumental works in the salons of aristocrats and patricians. In 1819 he went to Naples to study at the conservatory, entering the class of the director, Nicola Zingarelli, in 1822. In 1825 his opera semiseria, Adelson e Salvini, was produced at the conservatory. Its success led to commissions from the Teatro S Carlo and from La Scala, Milan.

Bellini's first opera for Milan, Il pirata (1827), instantly laid the foundation of his career, and with it began his fruitful collaborations with the librettist Felice Romani and the tenor GB Rubini. From 1827 to 1833 Bellini lived mostly in Milan, and during this time his operas, including La sonnambula and Norma, earned him an international reputation, while he himself went through a passionate love affair with Giuditta Cantù, the wife of a landowner and silk manufacturer, Ferdinando Turina. Bellini's amatory entanglements have been romanticized in popular literature but the realities are less creditable.

In 1833 Bellini visited London, where four of his operas were performed with great success at the King's Theatre and Drury Lane. He then proceeded to Paris, where he was commissioned to write I puritani for the Théâtre-Italien and formed a close acquaintance with Rossini and got to know Chopin and other musicians. I puritani enjoyed a genuine triumph in January 1835, and Bellini was appointed a Chevalier de la Légion d'honneur. He decided to remain in Paris and formulated several projects for his future there, but in August 1835 he fell ill and the following month he died, from 'an acute inflammation of the large intestine, complicated by an abscess of the liver' according to the post-mortem report.

Bellini's importance to posterity is as a composer of opera, especially opera seria; his other works can be ignored without great loss. His first influences were the folksong of Sicily and Naples, the teaching of Zingarelli and, above all, the music of Rossini. The Naples performance of Rossini's Semiramide in 1824 was one of the most decisive musical experiences of his student years, and the novel lyrical style of his early operas represented a sentimentalization and heightening of Rossinian lyricism, which in Il pirata broadens to include forceful and dramatic emotions. With this opera Bellini became one of Italy's most influential composers; Donizetti and Pacini, Mercadante and Verdi all learnt from him.

The quintessential feature of Bellini's operatic music is its close relationship with the text. He did not look for musical delineation of character, but the content and mood of each scene are given thorough-going musical interpretation and the text is precisely declaimed. His melodic style, of which the famous 'Casta diva' in Norma is a perfect example, is characterized by the building of broad melodic curves from small (usually two-bar) units. While his treatment of rhythm is more conventional, his melodies are supported by some colourful harmony and reticent though effective orchestration. More than any other Italian composer of the years around 1830, Bellini minimized the difference between aria and recitative by introducing a large number of cantabile, aria-like passages into his recitative. His expressive range goes far beyond the delicate, elegiac aspects of his art, which have been frequently overemphasized.

I Capuleti ed i Montecchi

I Capuleti ed i Montecchi. Lorenzo
Edita Gruberová sop Giulietta; Agnes Baltsa mez Romeo; Dano Raffanti ten Tebaldo;
Gwynne Howell bass Capellio; John Tomlinson bass Royal Opera House Chorus and Orchestra, Covent Garden / Riccardo Muti
EMI ② 764846-2 (130 minutes: DDD). Text Ⓜ
and translation included. Recorded live in 1984 ●

Muti and his two principals, caught at white heat on the stage of Covent Garden, offer a rendition of Bellini's supple, eloquent score that gives the work a new definition and standing in the Bellini canon. Away from the limbo of studio recording, the music lives at a heightened level of emotion and the sound reflects a true opera-house balance. Muti persuades his singers and the Royal Opera House players to noble utterance. Baltsa's Romeo has a Callas-like conviction of phrase and diction: here is a Romeo who will go to his death for the love of his Juliet. Who wouldn't when that role is sung so delicately and affectingly as by Gruberová, then at the height of her powers, as was Baltsa? Raffanti's open-throated Italian tenor is just right for Tebaldo's bold incursions. Gwynne Howell and John Tomlinson contribute effectively to what is an engrossing performance.

Norma

Maria Callas sop Norma; Christa Ludwig mez Adalgisa; Franco Corelli ten Pollione;
Nicola Zaccaria bass Oroveso; Piero De Palma ten Flavio; Edda Vincenzi sop Clotilde
Chorus and Orchestra of La Scala, Milan / Tullio Serafin
EMI ③ 5 66428-2 (161 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1960 ●●

Norma 🄷
Maria Callas sop Norma; Ebe Stignani mez Adalgisa; Mario Filippeschi ten Pollione; Nicola Rossi-Lemeni bass Oroveso; Paolo Caroli ten Flavio; Rina Cavallari sop Clotilde
Chorus and Orchestra of La Scala, Milan / Tullio Serafin
EMI Callas Edition mono ③ 556271-2
(160 minutes: ADD). Notes, text and translation Ⓕ included. Recorded 1954 ●●

Norma may be considered the most potent of Bellini's operas, in its subject – the secret love of a Druid priestess for a Roman general – and its musical content. It has some of the most eloquent music written for the soprano voice. The title-role has always been coveted by dramatic sopranos, but there have been few in the history of the opera who have completely fulfilled its considerable vocal and histrionic demands: in recent times the leading exponent has been Maria Callas. Is the 1960 recording better or worse than the 1954 recording? The answer cannot be put in a word. But those who heard Callas sing Norma at Covent Garden in 1953-54, and then again, slim, in 1957, will know the difference. The facts are that in 1954 the voice above the stave was fuller, more solid and more certain, but that in 1960 the middle timbres were more beautiful and more expressive; and, further, that an interpretation which was always magnificent had deepened in finesse, flexibility and dramatic poignancy.

The emphasis you give to these facts must be a matter of personal opinion. Certainly Callas's voice lets her down again and again, often when she essays some of her most beautiful effects. The F wobbles when it should crown a heart-rending 'Oh rimembranza'; the G wobbles in an exquisitely conceived 'Son io' – and yet how much more moving it is than the simpler, if steadier messa di voce of the earlier set. There are people who have a kind of tone-deafness to the timbres of Callas's later voice, who don't respond to one of the most affecting and eloquent of all sounds. They will stick to the earlier set. But ardent Callas collectors will probably find that it is the later one to which they will be listening again and again, not unaware of its faults, but still more keenly responsive to its beauties. 'Casta Diva', by the way, is sung in F, as in 1954 – not in the original G, as in the Covent Garden performances of June 1953. The big duet with Adalgisa is again down a tone, 'Deh! con te' in B flat, 'Mira, o Norma' in E flat, and the change is once again effected in the recitative phrase 'nel romano campo'. Callas does not decorate the music. Adalgisa, a soprano role, is as usual taken by a mezzo. Ludwig blends beautifully with Callas in the low-key 'Mira, o Norma' (though her downward scales are as ill-defined as her colleague's). She is no veteran Adalgisa, but youthful and impetuous except when she lets the rhythm get heavy, and Serafin does nothing to correct her.

On the earlier set, Stignani is a worthy partner whilst Filippeschi is rough but quite effective. On both sets, Serafin restores the beautiful quiet coda to the 'Guerra' chorus, and on both sets, Callas disappointingly does not float over the close of that slow rising arpeggio. In the later set, the conducting is spacious, unhurried, elevated and eloquent. Only in his handling of the mounting tension and the two great climaxes and releases of the finale, might you prefer the earlier version. The La Scala playing is superlative, and the recording is excellent.

I Puritani

Montserrat Caballé sop Elvira; Alfredo Kraus ten Arturo; Matteo Manuguerra bar Riccardo; Agostino Ferrin bass Giorgio; Júlia Hamari mez Enrichetta; Stefan Elenkov bass Gualtiero; Dennis O'Neill ten Bruno; Ambrosian Opera Chorus; Philharmonia Orchestra / Riccardo Muti
EMI ③ 769663-2 (172 minutes: ADD). Notes, Ⓜ
text and translation included. Recorded 1979 ●

I Puritani 🄷
Maria Callas sop Elvira; Giuseppe di Stefano ten Arturo; Rolando Panerai bar Riccardo; Nicola Rossi-Lemeni bass Giorgio; Aurora Cattelani mez Enrichetta; Carlo Forti bass Gualtiero; Angelo Mercuriali ten Bruno
Chorus and Orchestra of La Scala, Milan / Tullio Serafin
EMI mono ② 556275-2 (142 minutes: ADD)
Notes, text and translation included Ⓕ
Recorded 1953 ●●

I Puritani
Dame Joan Sutherland sop Elvira; Luciano Pavarotti ten Arturo; Piero Cappuccilli bar Riccardo; Nicolai Ghiaurov bass Giorgio; Anita Caminada mez Enrichetta; Gian Carlo Luccardi bass Gualtiero; Renato Cazzaniga ten Bruno
Chorus of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden; London Symphony Orchestra / Richard Bonynge
Decca ③ 417 588-2DH3 (174 minutes: ADD)
Notes, text and translation included Ⓕ
Recorded 1973 ●

One could spend a lifetime of opera-going and not come upon a performance as distinguished as any of these. It may be simplest and safest to allow personal preferences for one or other of the three great ladies to settle the matter: all are at their characteristic best and each has her own special gift to bring to the role. Puritani is a tenor's opera as well as a soprano's. Di Stefano, who partnered Callas so well in Puccini, is out of his element here. His untidy approach to notes from below, his uncovered upper register and wide-open vowels cause one again to regret the loss of that elegance imparted to some of his earlier recordings. He is never merely bland and can often be exciting, but comparison with either Kraus or Pavarotti in the other recordings shows him at a disadvantage. Both of these tenors make a particularly lovely thing of the solo 'A una fonte' in Act 3, and do impressively well in the bel canto test-piece, 'A te, o cara'. For the baritones, Panerai with Callas has most character in his voice, though both the others have good solid tone and offer no offence to the vocal line even if they fail to caress or excite it.

Perhaps the conductors can decide the issue. Bonynge and Serafin are brisker than Muti, who takes a languorous approach, no bad thing in Bellini as long as there is tenderness and sensitivity, as indeed there is. All secure good orchestral playing, Bonynge having a little extra liveliness, Serafin a little more weight.

The Callas version from 1953, by now 'historic', lacks the detailed clarity of the others yet is still remarkably vivid and full-bodied, not obviously dated. The EMI sound in the Muti recording perhaps has more opera-house atmosphere than the Decca, which compensates with brighter definition.

Back to the three great ladies. But here again the account is largely predictable. Caballé, often exquisite, especially in the quieter music, loses quality in loud high passages and has not much sparkle in the cabaletta, 'Vien, diletto'. Callas constantly amazes. The thrill of the first sound of her voice at the start of the great solo scene, the sadness which underlies the gaiety of the Polonaise, the affection of her verse in the final duet – all have the stamp of greatness. On the other hand there are occasional sour or raw high notes, where in Sutherland's performance these are the crowning glory. She also sings with feeling, phrases broadly, invests her fioriture with unequalled brilliance, but commands less dramatic intensity than her rivals. Clearly, objectivity is getting us nowhere: time to fall back on pure personal prejudice.

La sonnambula

La sonnambula H
Maria Callas sop Amina; Cesare Valletti ten Elvino; Giuseppe Modesti bass Rodolfo; Eugenia Ratti sop Lisa; Gabriella Carturan mez Teresa; Pierluigi Latinucci bass Alessio; Giuseppe Nessi ten Notary; La Scala, Milan Chorus and Orchestra / Leonard Bernstein
EMI mono ② 567906-2 (141 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded live at La Scala Theatre, Milan in 1955 OO

This important historical document comes from live performances at La Scala in the mid-1950s when the diva was at the height of her powers. Callas gives a more vital performance here than on the set recorded in the studio. The only drawback is the intrusive distortion at climactic moments.

It was Callas's particular genius to find exactly the appropriate mode of expression for every role she tackled. Here Callas gives us Amina, the shy, vulnerable sleepwalker. Bernstein and Callas join forces (having performed Médée together the previous year) for an utterly charming account of Sonnambula. The conductor's feeling for rhythm and colour and Callas's subtle responses to her fragile role are everywhere felt. And it isn't only Callas and Bernstein who make this set so unmissable. Cesare Valletti – a still underrated artist – is as sensitive and involved an Elvino as any on disc – and that's not forgetting Pavarotti – and he duets to perfection with Callas, Bernstein giving them the space to phrase as only they can phrase. And Giuseppe Modesti is a warm Rodolfo. Not to be missed.

La sonnambula
Dame Joan Sutherland sop Amina; Nicola Monti ten Elvino; Fernando Corena bass Count Rodolfo; Margreta Elkins mez Teresa; Sylvia Stahlman sop Lisa; Giovanni Foiani bass Alessio; Angelo Mercuriali ten Notary
Chorus and Orchestra of the Maggio Musicale Fiorentino / Richard Bonynge
Decca Grand Opera ② 448 966-2DMO2 (136 minutes: ADD). Notes, text and translation included.
Recorded 1962 Ⓜ OO

La sonnambula was Bonynge's and Sutherland's first Bellini recording. Sutherland's Amina in the early 1960s was sung with extraordinary freedom and exuberance. It is difficult to describe her in the role: it is felt. She does not touch a thrilling nerve of passion as Callas can; but in the final scene – a wonderfully sustained and imaginative piece of dramatic, as well as delicate and brilliant singing – she is very moving. Far more so, in fact, than Callas, who overloaded 'Ah! non credea' and made 'Ah non giunge' too artful.

It's no good comparing Sutherland with Callas at this late stage – but it is inevitable where this is concerned, especially as the Elvino, Nicola Monti, sings the role on both sets. No Sutherland admirer is going to convert to Callas in this opera, but it is quite fascinating to find that one's remembered reactions sometimes wrong. Callas does superb things in the coloratura of 'Sovra il sen', Sutherland is full of dramatic fire in the scene in the inn – the tone, the note-shaping is simply exquisite. And Bonynge excels in conducting the choruses. A very fine disc.

Arthur Benjamin

Australian-British 1893-1960

GROVE Arthur Benjamin studied at the RCM with Stanford and began teaching there in 1926. Through travels he came into contact with Caribbean music, which he used in his Jamaican Rumba (for two pianos, 1938, later orchestrated) and other light pieces. His diverse output includes operas, concertante pieces, songs and chamber music, in a cheerful style; though the late works (e.g. Concerto quasi una fantasia for piano and orchestra, 1949) are darker. He was an accomplished pianist who gave several premières.

Chamber Works

Five Negro Spirituals^{a}. Sonatina^{b}. Pastoral Fantasy^{c}. Viola Sonata^{d}. Three Pieces^{e}. A Tune and Variations for Little People^{e}
Locrian Ensemble (^{be}Lorraine McAslan, ^{c}Rita Manning, ^{c}Steve Morris vns ^{cd}Philip Dukes va ^{ac}Justin Pearson vc ^{abd}Sophia Rahman pf)
Dutton Laboratories Epoch CDLX7110 Ⓜ
(77 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 2001

This wide-ranging survey is very welcome indeed. The enormous popular success of Jamaican Rumba has tended to obscure the more substantial, thoughtful works that he wrote. Four of the six pieces here date from the 1920s, giving an illuminating outline of his stylistic development.

The influence of Ravel and other French sources marks most of Benjamin's music from his early period, though there is always a British flavour too. This is the Pastoral Fantasy's first ever recording, and it proves quite a revelation. Benjamin's imaginative use of the string quartet involves fascinating and original textures such as Ravel would have approved of, and the Locrian players bring out the tender refinement of the writing.

The Violin Sonatina of 1925 is even more Ravelian in its first movement, reminding us of some of the music that Benjamin's friend, Herbert Howells, was writing at that period. Like the Pastoral Fantasy, it suggests a composer feeling his way towards his own individual style.

It is in the Five Negro Spirituals of 1929 that Benjamin emerges as a memorable tunesmith, using the spirituals most imaginatively in contrasting ways. The Tune and Variations was designed as a simple piece for young students, but in the hands of Lorraine McAslan it emerges as a hauntingly beautiful piece in its own right.

By far the toughest, most ambitious piece is the Viola Sonata, written during the war when the composer was in Canada, reflecting the period's dark mood. It is superbly played by Philip Dukes. Sophia Rahman is the sensitive and sympathetic pianist.

The sound is vivid and well-balanced. All round, a thoroughly enjoyable disc.

George Benjamin

British 1960

GROVE Benjamin studied at the Paris Conservatoire with Messiaen and at Cambridge with Goehr: Ligeti and Boulez have been other influences. He first came to attention with the vividly imagined orchestral piece Ringed by the Flat Horizon (1980); this was consolidated with A Mind of Winter (1981) for soprano and small orchestra and At First Light for chamber ensemble (1982).

Antara

Ringed by the flat horizon^{a}. A Mind of Winter^{b}. At first light^{c}. Panorama^{d}. Antara^{e}
^{b}Penelope Walmsley-Clark sop ^{e}Sebastian Bell, ^{e}Richard Blake fls ^{c}Gareth Hulse ob ^{b}Paul Archibald tpt ^{a}Ross Pople vc ^{e}Pierre-Laurent Aimard, ^{e}Ichiro Nodaira pfs
^{a}BBC Symphony Orchestra / Mark Elder,
^{bce}London Sinfonietta / George Benjamin
^{d}electronics
Nimbus NI5643 (71 minutes: DDD). Text included. Ⓕ
Recorded 1985-86 ●●

This reissue is a necessary and valuable complement to Nimbus's earlier Benjamin CD (see below), which was built around compositions from the 1990s. But between March 1979, when Ringed by the flat horizon was begun, and March 1987, when Antara was completed, foundations of remarkable potential were well and truly laid, and it is fascinating to be able to trace that process through four such different works. There are, of course, five items on the disc, but the two minutes 24 seconds of Panorama – a beguiling, all-too-brief indication of Benjamin's work using pre-recorded tape – form a study for Antara rather than a wholly independent conception. The overall impression is certainly one of progress, in that the accomplished but in some ways rather stiff procedures to be heard in Ringed by the flat horizon led directly to the magnificently fluent setting of Wallace Stevens in A Mind of Winter, in which lucid instrumental textures provide the ideal foil for a brilliantly resourceful vocal line. In At first light, the stylistic spectrum opens up further, with clear hints of Varèse and even Xenakis. This disc is an essential document of the music of our time.

Sudden Time

Sudden Time^{a}. Upon Silence^{b}. Upon Silence^{c}. Octet^{d}. Three Inventions^{d}
^{bc}Susan Bickley mez ^{a}London Philharmonic Orchestra, ^{bd}London Sinfonietta, ^{c}Fretwork / George Benjamin
Nimbus NI5505 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1994-96

Sudden Time, originally issued as a CD single, is here reissued in the context of a range of other works which underline its distinctive textural refinement and expressive conviction. Upon Silence (1993) is a setting for mezzo-soprano and five viols of a poem by Yeats in which textures of exceptional subtlety reflect a response to the text which is captivating in its blend of spontaneity and stylization. The alternative version, with the viols replaced by a septet of violas, cellos and double-basses is no less imaginative, while obviously lacking the unique quality – old instruments used in an entirely viable modern way – of the original.

Three Inventions (1994) has ear-opening instrumental effects on every page, but these never detract from the essential processes of argument and cogent form-building in music perhaps more urgently expressive (especially in the third piece) than anything else of Benjamin's. With the astonishingly precocious Octet, written in 1979, when the composer was 18, and with highly effective recordings of definitive performances, this disc is an outstanding success.

Sir Richard Rodney Bennett

British 1936

GROVE Richard Rodney Bennett studied at the Royal Academy of Music (1953-57) and with Boulez in Paris (1957-9), though his public career as a composer had begun before this. At 16 he was writing 12-note music, and the period with Boulez encouraged him towards Darmstadt techniques. But in the 1960s he recovered more conventional aspects to develop a style of Bergian expressionism (e.g. in his opera The Mines of Sulphur, 1965); his opera Victory was given at Covent Garden in 1970. His subsequent output is large, including many concertos, settings of English poetry, chamber music, and, notably, big Romantic film scores. A musician of great versatility, he has worked as a jazz pianist (several of his scores of the 1960s are in a sophisticated jazz style) and has played and arranged American popular music.

Film Music

Murder on the Orient Express – Suite. Far from the Madding Crowd – Suite. Lady Caroline Lamb – Elegy[a]. Tender is the Night – Nicole's Theme. Enchanted April – Suite[b]. Four Weddings and a Funeral – Love Theme
[a]Philip Dukes va [b]Cynthia Miller ondes martenot
BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Rumon Gamba
Chandos Movies CHAN9867 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●

Anyone who has heard Richard Rodney Bennett's score with John Tavener for Gormenghast (Sony) will know that he possesses a natural flair for composing within the constraints of the medium, whether big screen or small. The concept of presenting the music in suites (no credit here for the arrangers) makes the best possible case for it, circumventing the problems encountered on the original soundtracks where fragmentation sometimes marrs enjoyment.

It is a measure of Bennett's standing in the film world that all these scores were issued on disc concurrently with the film. The earliest of them, Far from the Madding Crowd (1967, MGM – nla), belongs to another era sonically speaking, but on this sumptuously recorded Chandos disc one can imagine oneself back in that state-of-the-art Odeon, Marble Arch, as the curtains parted to reveal Hardy's Dorset landscape on its giant curved screen, with Bennett's wistful unaccompanied theme for flute answered by oboe on the soundtrack.

Like that film, Lady Caroline Lamb was presented on its initial run as a road-show attraction, with an Overture, Entr'acte and Exit Music on the soundtrack, played respectively before the showing, during the intermission and after the film. The Suite reveals RRB's fondness for a lyrical line at its most impassioned, with Philip Duke's eloquent viola playing going to the heart of the story of this aristocratic lady's doomed affair with Byron. A harpsichord touches in the picture of cobbled streets in 19th-century London.

Enchanted April moves us to the sunshine of Italy where the colours of the percussion and ondes martenot lend a sweet fragrance to the scene. Elgar's Chanson de matin makes an unexpected but entrancing appearance. When concentrating on the music without visual distractions it is easier to note the discreet Love Theme for Four Weddings and a Funeral. Beginning on low flute with broken chords on the harp, it subtly underlines the weddings and the funeral where John Hannah reads Auden's poem Stop all the Clocks.

From television comes Tender is the Night – Nicole's Theme, a popular foxtrot, '20s style, representing Scott Fitzgerald's ill-fated character Nicole Diver, inspired by his wife Zelda. Period dance music plays a part, too, in Murder on the Orient Express, where Yuri Torchinsky, leader of the BBC Philharmonic, catches to a tee that sweet sound so characteristic of Oscar Grasso, leader of Victor Silvester's ballroom orchestra.

Conductor Rumon Gamba knows just how to levitate Bennett's celebrated train waltz theme, and the response of his orchestra throughout this disc suggests that they can turn their hand to the idiom of this music at the flick of a wrist.

Alban Berg

Austrian 1885-1935

GROVE Berg wrote songs as a youth but had no serious musical education before his lessons with Schoenberg, which began in 1904. Webern was a pupil at the same time, a crucial period in Schoenberg's creative life, when he was moving rapidly towards and into atonality. Berg's Piano Sonata Op 1 (1908) is still tonal, but the Four Songs Op 2

(1910) move away from key and the Op 3 String Quartet (1910) is wholly atonal; it is also remarkable in sustaining, through motivic development, a larger span when the instrumental works of Schoenberg and Webern were comparatively momentary. Berg dedicated it to his wife Helene.

Then came the Five Songs for soprano Op 4 (1912), miniatures setting poetic instants by Peter Altenberg. This was Berg's first orchestral score, and though it shows an awareness of Schoenberg, Mahler and Debussy, it is brilliantly conceived and points towards Wozzeck – and towards 12-note serialism, notably in its final passacaglia. More immediately Berg produced another set of compact statements, the Four Pieces for clarinet and piano Op 5 (1913), then returned to large form with the Three Orchestral Pieces Op 6 (1915), a thematically linked sequence of prelude, dance movement and funeral march. The prelude begins and ends in the quiet noise of percussion; the other two movements show Berg's discovery of how traditional forms and stylistic elements (including tonal harmony) might support big structures.

In May 1914 Berg saw the Vienna première of Büchner's Woyzeck and formed the plan of setting it. He started the opera in 1917, while he was in the Austrian army (1915-18), and finished it in 1922. He made his own selection from the play's fragmentary scenes to furnish a three-act libretto for formal musical setting: the first act is a suite of five character pieces (five scenes showing the simple soldier Wozzeck in different relationships), the second a five-movement symphony (for the disintegration of his liaison with Marie), the third a set of five inventions on different ostinato ideas (for the tragedy's brutally nihilist climax). The close musical structuring, extending to small details of timing, may be seen as an analogue for the mechanical alienness of the universe around Büchner's central characters, though Berg's music crosses all boundaries, from atonal to tonal (there is a Mahlerian interlude in D minor), from speech to song, from café music to sophisticated textures of dissonant counterpoint. Wozzeck had its première in Berlin in 1925 and thereafter was widely produced, bringing Berg financial security.

His next work, the Chamber Concerto for violin, piano and 13 wind (1925), moves decisively towards a more classical style: its three formally complex movements are still more clearly shaped than those of the op.6 set and the scoring suggests a response to Stravinskian objectivity. The work is also threaded through with ciphers and numerical conceits, making it a celebration of the triune partnership of Schoenberg, Berg and Webern.

Then came the Lyric Suite for string quartet (1926), whose long-secret programme connects it with Berg's intimate feelings for Hanna Fuchs-Robettin – feelings also important to him in the composition of his second opera, Lulu (1929-35). The suite, in six movements of increasingly extreme tempo, uses 12-note serial along with other material in projecting a quasi-operatic development towards catastrophe and annulment.

The development of Lulu was twice interrupted by commissioned works, the concert aria Der Wein on poems by Baudelaire (1929) and the Violin Concerto (1935), and it remained unfinished at Berg's death: his widow placed an embargo on the incomplete third act, which could not be published or performed until 1979. As with Wozzeck, he made his own libretto out of stage material, this time choosing two plays by Wedekind, whom he had long admired for his treatment of sexuality. Dramatically and musically the opera is a huge palindrome, showing Lulu's rise through society in her successive relationships and then her descent into prostitution and eventual death at the hands of Jack the Ripper. Again the score is filled with elaborate formal schemes, around a lyricism unloosed by Berg's individual understanding of 12-note serialism. Something of its threnodic sensuality is continued in the Violin Concerto, designed as a memorial to the teenage daughter of Mahler's widow.

Violin Concerto

Berg Violin Concerto
Stravinsky Violin Concerto in D Ravel Tzigane[a]
Itzhak Perlman vn
Boston Symphony Orchestra / Seiji Ozawa;
[a]New York Philharmonic Orchestra / Zubin Mehta
DG The Originals 447 445-2GOR (57 minutes: ADD/[a]DDD). Recorded 1978 Ⓜ ●●

Perlman's account of the Berg Violin Concerto with the Boston orchestra under Ozawa has long occupied a respected place in the catalogue. The original reviewer in Gramophone in March 1980 was completely convinced by Perlman's 'commanding purposefulness'. As to the recording, he wrote that 'though Perlman's violin – beautifully caught – is closer than some will like, there is no question of crude spotlighting'. Twenty years later and in a different competitive climate, his verdict ('These are both performances to put with the very finest') still holds good. Perlman is also a little too close in the Tzigane, the recording of which sets him very firmly front-stage again. All the same, this is playing of stature and is still among the best available versions. There are, however, more desirable recordings now available of the Stravinsky Concerto.

Berg Violin Concerto Rihm Gesungene Zeit
Anne-Sophie Mutter vn
Chicago Symphony Orchestra / James Levine
DG 437 093-2GH (52 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1992 Ⓕ ●

One of the very few 12-note pieces to have retained a place in the repertory, Berg's Violin Concerto is a work on many levels. Behind the complex intellectual façade of the construction is a poignant sense of loss, ostensibly for Alma Mahler's daughter, Manon Gropius, but also for Berg's own youth; and behind that is a disconcerting mixture of styles which resists interpretation as straightforward Romantic consolation. Not that performers need to go out of their way to project these layers; given a soloist as comprehensively equipped as Anne-Sophie Mutter and orchestral support as vivid as the Chicago Symphony's they cannot fail to register. Their recording makes a fine demonstration-quality recording alternative to the version of Krasner and Webern.

Violin Concerto. H
Lyric Suite (original version)
Louis Krasner vn Galimir Quartet
(Felix Galimir, Adrienne Galimir vns Renee Galimir va Marguerite Galimir vc);
BBC Symphony Orchestra /
Anton Webern
Testament mono SBT1004 (57 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1936 ○○○

This is an extraordinary issue of more than mere documentary interest. Krasner commissioned the Violin Concerto and had just given the first performance at the 1936 ISCM Festival in Barcelona (with Hermann Scherchen conducting) only three months after Berg's death. Webern was to have conducted on this occasion but withdrew at the last moment much to the consternation of the BBC who had booked him for the following month with (it would seem) some misgivings. Fortunately adequate rehearsal time had been allotted and the players of the BBC Symphony Orchestra proved more expert in coping with the score than their Barcelona colleagues. Webern had appeared on a number of occasions with the BBC orchestra, but no recording of him survives in the BBC Archives. Berg's death had shocked the musical world, though not as much as the death of the 18-year-old Manon Gropius had shaken the composer, who wrote the concerto as a memorial to her.

What strikes one most about this performance is its glowing intensity. There is no sense of the bar-line or of the music ever being 'moved on'; time seems to stand still and yet there is also a natural sense of musical pace. The surface noise on this recording, made before an invited audience in the Concert Hall of Broadcasting House, London, cannot disguise the care with which the textures are balanced and the finesse of the wind players. This was only the work's second performance and yet the players sound as if they had lived with the music all their lives. It has all the anguish and poignancy this music demands and Krasner is an eloquent exponent. The opening bars suffer from some minor audience coughs and the surface noise and moments of distortion call for a tolerance that is well worth extending. The Galimir Quartet specialized in contemporary music and its playing has commendable ensemble and dedication. Unfortunately its pioneering account of the Lyric Suite, recorded shortly before the performance of the Violin Concerto took place, was hampered by a very dry acoustic and this must have deterred many listeners. It was the only version for many years and in spite of its musical excellence cannot have made many new friends for the work. The dry sound is worrying, of course, but that should not deter collectors from acquiring this remarkable issue.

Lyric Suite

String Quartet, Op 3. Lyric Suite (original version)
Alban Berg Quartet (Günther Pichler, Gerhard Schulz vns Thomas Kakuska va Valentin Erben vc)
EMI 555190-2 (46 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1991-92

This disc brings into focus Berg's two masterpieces for the medium. EMI offers a broad perspective, the four players very forward and distinct. Details may at times seem too intrusive for the good of an integrated interpretation, and the concern to make every emotional nuance tell risks spilling the music over into melodrama. The Berg Quartet probes the extremes of the music determinedly, and their unfailingly bright sound can sometimes seem larger than life. However, there's no doubting the emotional power of the recording.

Piano Sonata, Op 1

Berg Piano Sonata, Op 1
Schoenberg Drei Klavierstücke, Op 11. Sechs Klavierstücke, Op 19. Fünf Klavierstücke, Op 23. Piano Suite, Op 25. Klavierstücke, Op 33*a* and Op 33*b* Webern Variations, Op 27 💰
Peter Hill pf
Naxos 8 553870 (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1996 ○○

When interviewed by Gramophone back in September 1989, Peter Hill said he felt he had things to say about the Schoenberg piano works which had not been said on record. Here is the complete vindication of that statement. These are scrupulously prepared performances, with all the polyphonic strands clarified and all the myriad articulation marks respected. In order to accommodate that detail and let it speak musically, Hill takes tempos on the relaxed side of Schoenberg's frequently rather manic metronome indications. The first two of the Op 11 pieces gain a gravity that might have surprised the composer, and the fourth piece of Op 23 loses some of the suggested schwungvoll character. Yet there is no lack of brilliance and velocity in such pieces as the Gigue from Op 25, and time and again Hill's thoughtfulness and search for expressiveness and beauty of sound justify his spacious approach.

Hill probes with equal subtlety, sympathy and high intelligence in the Webern Variations, while in the Berg Sonata, Hill's unforced lyricism, inwardness and flexibility of phrasing are again immensely appealing. Apart from its amazing value for money, Naxos's first-rate recording quality, Peter Hill's own lucid booklet-essay, and what sounds like an ideally regulated instrument, all contribute to the outstanding success of this issue.

Five Orchestral Songs, Op 4

Fünf Orchesterlieder nach Ansichtskartentexten von Peter Altenberg, Op 4. Lyric Suite (arr cpsr; originally for string quartet). Lulu – Symphonie
Juliane Banse sop Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
DG 447 749-2GH (54 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1994 Ⓕ ●●

This is a marvellous disc. Juliane Banse is admirable in the Altenberg Lieder (or Five Orchestral Songs): expressive, unhampered by the range of the vocal line, and bringing to the last song a wide-spanning lyricism that seems almost a foretaste of Geschwitz's death-song in Lulu.

Aside from a slightly blunted edge, even a slight loss of wit, in its opening movement, the Lyric Suite has the same admirable combination of richness and orchestral detail as the Altenberg Lieder – in the central movement Abbado demonstrates that clarity and a marking of misterioso are not incompatible – and the third movement, as it should be, is the Suite's emotional nub: the Vienna Philharmonic's strings respond with glowing passion.

Claudio Abbado's account of Lulu is ravishingly beautiful, with a warmly poetic ardour to Alwa's music that so few real-life singers can give it (the 'Hymne', too, is genuinely hymn-like). The concluding scene has a dark, passionate vehemence and pity that are deeply moving. Any suspicion that he might be overbeautifying the music is erased by the hectic, almost garish drama of the second movement ostinato and the sober gravity that both he and Juliane Banse bring to the 'Lied der Lulu'. One can say no better of the recording than that it sounds as though Abbado did his own balancing.

Seven Early Songs

Seven Early Songs. Three Orchestral Pieces, Op 6. Der Wein
Anne Sofie von Otter mez Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
DG 445 846-2GH (49 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1992-93 ●

Anne Sofie von Otter included the Seven Early Songs on a recital disc, a programme glowing in the sunset of German romanticism. Singing with orchestra, von Otter naturally works on a larger scale. The words are more firmly bound into the vocal line; there is not the detailed give-and-take that is possible with a pianist. But the outline of her interpretation remains that of a true Lieder singer, always lighting upon unexpected subtleties of colour and emphasis to inflect the poetry. In all this Abbado is an equal partner. Von Otter needs careful accompaniment in the concert hall if she is to dominate an orchestra and Abbado, in co-operation with DG's technical team, has produced a balance that never drowns her, but still sounds fairly natural. In Der Wein, Berg's late concert aria, von Otter and Abbado catch the lilt of the jazz rhythms. In the Seven Early Songs are they a touch too cool? Perhaps, but in the final song, 'Sommertage', they throw caution to the winds and end the cycle on a passionate high.

Abbado has recorded the Three Orchestral Pieces before and his 1970s recording has long been one of the standard versions of this work. The opportunity to see how his thoughts have developed since then brings more surprises than one might have expected. In short, his outlook is progressing from the Italianate to the Germanic. No doubt the influence of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra has much to do with this and their marvellously eloquent playing is one of the prime attractions of the disc. In their company Abbado finds more depth and complexity in the music than before, although that does mean that the March loses the Bartókian attack and driving rhythms that made his first version so exciting.

Berg Seven Early Songs
Korngold Liebesbriefchen, Op 9 No 4; Sterbelied, Op 14 No 1; Gefasster Abschied, Op 14 No 4; Drei Lieder, Op 18; Glückwunsch, Op 38 No 1; Alt-spanisch, Op 38 No 3; Sonett für Wien, Op 41
R Strauss Wie sollten wir geheim sie halten, Op 19 No 4; Ich trage meine Minne, Op 32 No 1; Der Rosenband, Op 36 No 1; Hat gesagt – bleibt's nicht dabei, Op 36 No 3; Meinem Kinde, Op 37 No 3; Befreit, Op 39 No 4; Die sieben Siegel, Op 46 No 3
Anne Sofie von Otter mez Bengt Forsberg pf
DG 437 515-2GH (64 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1991-93 Ⓕ ●●

At the centre of this recital are the Seven Early Songs. The first, 'Nacht', which is also the longest and most readily memorable, is taken rather more slowly than usual, but gaining in its subtler evocations of the mists and then the silvered mountain paths. Von Otter's draining the voice of all vibrato also helps to create the sense of watchful stillness, just as in the sixth song, 'Liebesode', it makes for an almost other-worldly dreaminess, deepening to a full-bodied passion as the rose scent is borne to the love-bed. Always the mezzo-soprano voice is resourcefully used, able to colour deeply at such points, to float a pure head-tone in 'Traumgekrönt' or launch to a simply radiant high A in 'Die Nachtigall'.

The chosen Strauss songs here are gentle and affectionate, a mood in which von Otter is often at her best. Not that, having captured a mood, she is content to let it lie dully over as much as a verse or a line.

For lightness of touch, the Op 38 songs endear themselves among the Korngold group: Glückwunsch has an unaffected, comfortable way with it, and Alt-spanisch (with its reminiscence of 'On yonder hill there stands a maiden') is an absolute charmer. All in all a thoroughly seductive disc.

Lulu

Awards
1986

(Orchestration of Act 3 completed by Friedrich Cerha)
Teresa Stratas sop Lulu; Franz Mazura bar Dr Schön, Jack; Kenneth Riegel ten Alwa; Yvonne Minton mez Countess Geschwitz; Robert Tear ten The Painter, A Negro; Toni Blankenheim bar Schigolch, Professor of Medicine, The Police Officer; Gerd Nienstedt bass An Animal-tamer, Rodrigo; Helmut Pampuch ten The Prince, The Manservant, The Marquis; Jules Bastin bass The Theatre Manager, The Banker; Hanna Schwarz mez A Dresser in the theatre, High School Boy, A Groom; Jane Manning sop A 15-year-old girl; Ursula Boese mez Her Mother; Anna Ringart mez A Lady Artist; Claude Meloni bar A Journalist; Pierre-Yves Le Maigat bass A Manservant
Paris Opéra Orchestra / Pierre Boulez
DG The Originals ③ 463 617-2GOR2 Ⓜ
(172 minutes: ADD)
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1979 ◉◉◉

Now here's a masterpiece that fulfils all the requirements for a commercial smash hit – it's sexy, violent, cunning, sophisticated, hopelessly complicated and emotionally draining. Lulu was Berg's second opera and easily matches his first – Wozzeck – for pathos and dramatic impact. The meaningful but gloriously over-the-top story-line, after two tragedies by Frank Wedekind, deserves acknowledgement, but what matters is that Berg's music is magnificent, Romantic enough to engage the passions of listeners normally repelled by 12-tone music, and cerebral enough to keep eggheads fully employed. It's opulent yet subtle (saxophone and piano lend the score a hint of jazz-tinted decadence), with countless telling thematic inter-relations and much vivid tonal character-painting. Berg left it incomplete (only 390 of the Third Act's 1326 bars were orchestrated by him), but Friedrich Cerha's painstaking reconstruction is a major achievement, especially considering the complicated web of Berg's musical tapestry. This particular recording first opened our ears to the 'real' Lulu in 1979, and has transferred extremely well to CD.

The performance is highly distinguished. Teresa Stratas is an insinuating yet vulnerable Lulu, Yvonne Minton a sensuous Gräfin Geschwitz and Robert Tear an ardent artist. Dr Schön is tellingly portrayed by Franz Mazura, Kenneth Riegel is highly creditable as Schön's son and that Boulez himself is both watchful of detail and responsive to the drama, hardly needs saying. It's not an easy listen, but it'll certainly keep you on your toes for a stimulating, even exasperating evening.

Additional recommendation
Lulu (without Act 3)
Lear Lulu Fischer-Dieskau Dr Schön
Coupling: Wozzeck
Orchestra of the Deutsche Oper, Berlin / Böhm
DG ③ 435 705-2GX3 (216 minutes: ADD: 1/93) Ⓑ
Böhm's beautifully shaped, Romantic view of the opera is well worth hearing for Fischer-Dieskau's fascinating Dr Schön and Evelyn Lear's Lulu, though the three-act version has greater allure these days.

Wozzeck

Franz Grundheber bar Wozzeck; Hildegard Behrens sop Marie; Heinz Zednik ten Captain; Aage Haugland bass Doctor; Philip Langridge ten Andres; Walter Raffeiner ten Drum-Major; Anna Gonda mez Margret; Alfred Sramek bass First Apprentice; Alexander Maly bar Second Apprentice; Peter Jelosits ten Idiot Vienna Boys' Choir; Vienna State Opera Chorus; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
DG ② 423 587-2GH2 (89 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded live in 1987 ◉

A live recording, in every sense of the word. The cast is uniformly excellent, with Grundheber good both at the wretched pathos of Wozzeck's predicament and his helpless bitterness, and Behrens as an outstandingly intelligent and involving Marie, even the occasional touch of strain in her voice heightening her characterisation. The Vienna Philharmonic responds superbly to Abbado's ferociously close-to-the-edge direction. It is a live recording with a bit of a difference, mark you: the perspectives are those of a theatre, not a recording studio. The orchestra is laid out as it would be in an opera-house pit and the movement of singers on stage means that voices are occasionally overwhelmed. The result is effective: the crowded inn-scenes, the arrival and departure of the military band, the sense of characters actually reacting to each other, not to a microphone, makes for a grippingly theatrical experience. This version has a raw urgency, a sense of bitter protest and angry pity that are quite compelling and uncomfortably eloquent.

Wozzeck (sung in English)
Andrew Shore bar Wozzeck; Dame Josephine Barstow sop Marie; Alan Woodrow ten Drum Major; Peter Bronder ten Andres; Stuart Kale ten Captain; Clive Bayley bass Doctor; Jean Rigby contr Margret; Leslie John Flanagan, Iain Paterson bass Apprentices; John Graham-Hall ten Idiot; Susan Singh Choristers; Geoffrey Mitchell Choir; Philharmonia Orchestra / Paul Daniel
Chandos/Peter Moores Foundation Opera in English
② CHAN3094 (92 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Notes and English libretto included. Recorded c2002

This is a fine new Wozzeck; the perfect complement to the outstanding Abbado version (DG) which has been the top recommendation for so long (reviewed above). Abbado's was recorded live at the Vienna Staatsoper, and any studio recording of an opera risks sounding score-bound when compared with a real, live performance in the theatre. But with Wozzeck a studio ambience can bring real advantages, especially if it underlines the kind of claustrophobic intimacy and obsessiveness which theatrical histrionics inevitably broaden and – in some instances – coarsen. Ranting and raving are kept to a minimum in Paul Daniel's interpretation, and the result is intensely moving without in any way underplaying the music's visceral dramatic power.

One result of Daniel's concentrated yet warmly expressive moulding of the score is a strong sense of its late-Romantic background in Strauss and also in Mahler. The Philharmonia play superbly throughout, and the recording successfully balances a spacious orchestral canvas of the widest dynamic range while placing the voices effectively. Nor are there any weak links in the cast, with three tenors, John Graham-Hall, Stuart Kale and Alan Woodrow, making particularly telling contributions. Josephine Barstow has one or two squally moments in delineating Marie's bewilderment and fear, but her voice remains in remark- ably good shape, and the character's conflicting impulses are brilliantly conveyed. Shore is one of the best operatic baritones of our time, and he dominates the drama with an utterly convincing blend of the menacing and the pathetic. Moreover, his way with the text is exemplary.

This performance proves that an English Wozzeck can easily match the impact of the best German performances. Its virtues are such that it makes as powerful a case for this extraordinary work as any other version.

Additional recommendation
Wozzeck
Falkman Wozzeck Dalayman Marie Qvale Captain
Swedish Opera Chorus & Orchestra / Segerstam
Naxos ② 8 660076/7 (100 minutes: DDD: 4/00) Ⓢ

A few minor quibbles apart – both the Captain and the Doctor are portrayed as being more 'normal' than is usual, and the orchestral balance is a little skewed in places – this is close to being a giant among Wozzeck recordings.

Luciano Berio Italian 1925-2003

GROVE Berio studied with his father and grandfather, both organists and composers, and with Ghedini at the Milan Conservatory in the late 1940s. In 1950 he married the American singer Cathy Berberian, and the next year at Tanglewood he met Dallapiccola, who influenced his move towards and beyond 12-note serialism in such works as his Joyce cycle Chamber Music for voice and trio (1953). Further stimulus came from his meetings with Maderna, Pousseur and Stockhausen in Basle in 1954, and he became a central member of the Darmstadt circle. He directed an electronic music studio at the Milan station of Italian radio (1955-61), at the same time producing Sequenza I for flute (1958, the first of a cycle of solo explorations of performing gestures), Circles (1960, a loop of Cummings settings for voice, harp and percussion) and Epifanie (1961, an aleatory set of orchestral and vocal movements designed to show different kinds of vocal behaviour). These established his area of interest: with the means and archetypes of musical communication.

For most of the next decade he was in the USA, teaching and composing, his main works of this period including the Dante-esque Laborintus II for voices and orchestra (1965), the Sinfonia for similar resources (1969, with a central movement whirling quotations round Mahler and Beckett) and Opera (1970), a study of the decline of the genre and of Western bourgeois civilization. Two more operas, La vera storia (1982) and Un re in ascolto (1984), came out of his collaboration with Calvino. Other works include Coro (1976), a panoply of poster statements and refracted folksongs for chorus and orchestra, and numerous orchestral and chamber pieces.

Concerto II, 'Echoing Curves'

Rendering. Concerto II, 'Echoing Curves'. Quattro versioni originali della 'Ritirata notturna di Madrid'
Andrea Lucchesini pf
London Symphony Orchestra / Luciano Berio
RCA Victor Red Seal 09026 68894-2 (68 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1995 Ⓕ ●

Reworking takes many different forms with Berio. The simplest kind is to be heard here in the maddeningly repetitive but gloriously witty fusing together of Boccherini's four versions of his successful pot-boiler, Ritirata notturna di Madrid. On a much grander scale comes Rendering, which works around Berio's orchestration of the sketches for Schubert's 10th Symphony. At 35 minutes this is a big piece – the composer's own reading is phrased throughout with special sensitivity, and relishes the gentle and strange discontinuities between Schubert and Berio with absorbing delicacy. Berio is at his best, and most distinctive, when the composer he reworks is Luciano Berio. Concerto II, 'Echoing Curves', from 1988-89, is a rich, complex elaboration of a work for piano and ensemble called Points on the curve to find … from 1974. More Boulezian than much Berio in its slow-moving tissue of clusters, trills and tremolandos, its shimmering textures conjure up remarkable density and luminosity, and the music is perfectly shaped to prepare a finely graded 'dying fall'. The performances have absolute authorial conviction, and the 'big hall' sound is plushy without excessive resonance.

Chamber Works

Notturno. Quartetto. Sincronie. Glosse
Arditti Quartet (Irvine Arditti, Graeme Jennings vns Dov Scheindlin va Rohan de Saram vc)
Naïve Montaigne MO782155 Ⓕ
(62 minutes: DDD). Recorded c2002

Luciano Berio is one of the leading figures from the great, innovative generation of composers born in the 1920s – up there with Boulez and Ligeti. Here we have his music for string quartet which, if hardly central to Berio's composing life, contains much that is characteristic and impressive.

The two pairs of compositions are separated by a 30-year gap, yet it is fascinating to hear how clearly Sincronie (1963-64) anticipates the manner of Notturno (1993) in the wide range of its materials, from simple to complex, and the skill with which a large-scale single-movement structure is balanced and sustained. Sincronie and Notturno give us Berio at his best. Just as Sincronie uses its initial perception about the homogeneity of the four string instruments as the starting point for an enthrallingly spontaneous journey which never loses its sense of direction, so Notturno ventures well beyond the connotations of tranquil repose into the kind of dark, concentrated volatility which Berio has made his own. Notturno was recorded some years ago by the Alban Berg Quartet (EMI), but their bold pairing – late Haydn – provides a rather less persuasive context than the Arditti's all-Berio programme. These new performances are no less persuasive, bringing the music to fascinating life, with the help of a recording that is well-nigh ideal.

Recital I for Cathy

Berio Recital I for Cathy[a]. 11 Folk Songs[b]
Weill (arr Berio. Sung in English) Die Dreigroschenoper – Ballade von der sexuellen Hörigkeit. Marie Galante – Le grand Lustucru. Happy End – Surabaya-Johnny
Cathy Berberian mez
[a]London Sinfonietta; [b]Juilliard Ensemble / Luciano Berio
RCA Victor Gold Seal 09026 62540-2
(65 minutes: ADD). Texts included. Ⓜ
Recorded 1972 ●●

These are classic recordings that no contemporary music enthusiast or Berberian/Berio admirer will want to be without. This disc could be regarded as a fitting tribute to Cathy Berberian and her inimitable vocal genius. As an artist she was unique. As a champion of contemporary music (particularly music by her one-time husband Berio) she was second to none – not only for her interpretative prowess but also the inspirational quality of her highly individual style.

The recordings gathered together here were all composed, or arranged for her, by Luciano Berio. The two principal items are perhaps among the most famous of the Berberian/Berio collaborations. Recital I for Cathy makes use of Berberian's dramatic training in a composition in which the vocalist, frustrated by the non-appearance of her pianist, struggles through the programme while simultaneously sharing a Beckett-like stream-of-consciousness monologue with her audience. Berberian's performance here is a monumental tour de force. Another example of the extraordinary qualities of Berberian's voice can be found in the celebrated Folk Songs of 1964.

The three songs by Kurt Weill reveal Berberian as a natural Weill interpreter (perhaps the best since Lotte Lenya).

All in all, this is a wonderful tribute to a phenomenal talent.

Sequenzas

Sequenzas – I-VIII, IXa, IXb and X-XIII, 'Chanson'
Luisa Castellani sop Sophie Cherrier fl Lazlo Hadady ob Alain Damiens cl Pascal Gallois bn Christian Wirth alto sax Gabriele Cassone tpt Benny Sluchin tbn Jeanne-Marie Conquer vn Christophe Desjardins va Frédérique Cambreling hp Elliot Fisk gtr Florent Boffard pf Teodoro Anzellotti accordion
DG ③ 20/21 457 038-2GH3 (158 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994-97 ●●●

Berio's ongoing sequence of solo compositions complements his larger-scale vocal and orchestral works in various productive ways. That does not make the Sequenzas 'miniatures', however: one of the most recent, No 12 for bassoon (1995), is at 18 minutes also the longest, and even the shortest (No 1, for flute, at just over six minutes) offers a distillation which, for all its elegance, is far from lightweight. Berio has come a long way since 1958, when No 1 was written, yet the flexible eloquence with which he imbues some ordinary avant-garde gestures in that piece is early evidence of a distinctive quality of thought which was to mature and intensify in the years ahead. Five years on, in No 2 for harp (1963), the instrument's conventionally genteel image is transformed into vivid confrontations between the seductive and the aggressive, and this formula is developed still more radically in No 3 for female voice (1965). No 4 (1966) is also highly expressionistic, concentrating on the brittle, dense textures of which the piano is capable, rather than seeking to spin a long, connected line. No 5 for trombone (1965), by contrast, is a haunting exploration of the instrument's 'voice', as well as of the voice of the player, the use of long, slow glissandos a model for the more elaborate treatment of the device in the bassoon Sequenza 30 years later.

That all the performers on these discs – most are members of the Ensemble Inter-Contemporain – are on top of challenging material goes without saying. They might not always stick to the letter of dynamic markings, but the spirit of the music is always vividly conveyed, and the recordings are good. Of the later Sequenzas, none is finer than the staggeringly virtuosic No 6 for viola (1967) charting Berio's complex response to the Paganinian romantic heritage, and No 8 for violin (1976) where Bach replaces Paganini as model in a piece with enough of the grandeur and sense of inevitability of Bach's great Chaconne to justify the comparison. With the short No 7 for oboe (1967) Berio hit on the strategy of placing the instrument's intensely volatile line against a single sustained tone (off-stage or electronic), and a comparable effect is used in No 10. Here the trumpet occasionally plays into an open grand piano, which catches and transforms the resonance to create ethereal echo-effects. No 9 from 1980 (for clarinet, and also for saxophone) is to some extent an experiment in constraint, limiting the melodic materials and developing dialogues between varied repetitions, while No 11 (1988) for guitar wittily explores the ways in which the instrument's own limitations can be exploited and challenged. With No 12's superbly long-drawn out but never monotonous bassoon lament, and No 13 for accordion (also 1995) revealing the instrument's capacity for delicate and poetic, as well as brusque, even sinister utterance, it is clear that Berio's interest in putting single instruments under the spotlight was as strong in the mid-1990s as it had been nearly 40 years before.

These discs are a wonderful reminder of why Berio's music matters, and a definitive document of a very special 20th-century achievement.

Sinfonia

Sinfonia. Eindrücke
Regis Pasquier vn
New Swingle Singers; French National Orchestra / Pierre Boulez
Warner Apex 8573-89533-2 (45 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1980s ●

This was the first complete recording of Berio's Sinfonia. Until this, this absorbing and bewilderingly complex work was available only in the four-movement version that Berio himself prepared in 1969 for the first performance with the Swingle Singers and the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. Within a few months, Berio had completed a fifth and final movement which, though ostensibly an appendix, arguably stands as the apotheosis of the entire work; for it is genuinely a 'sounding together' (sinfonia) of the preceding movements, a rich sequence of reminiscences, just as the celebrated third movement leads us through memories of the standard orchestral repertoire in a kind of stream of subconsciousness.

To hear the work in its completed form is nothing short of a revelation, and for this reason alone Boulez's performance must be said to supersede Berio's own. To complete the disc he has chosen one of Berio's less-familiar orchestral works, Eindrücke ('Impressions') of 1973-74. This is a complete contrast: a vast monody, projected by the string orchestra against the stuttering interjections and lingering trills of the wind and percussion, a stark and uncompromising conception. Again, the reading is a powerful one. This is a most important issue, far too good to miss.

Hector Berlioz French 1803-1869

GROVE As a boy Berlioz learnt the flute, guitar and, from treatises alone, harmony (he never studied the piano); his first compositions were romances and small chamber pieces. After two unhappy years as a medical student in Paris (1821-23) he abandoned the career chosen for him by his father and turned decisively to music, attending Le Sueur's composition class at the Conservatoire. He entered for the Prix de Rome four times (1827-30) and finally won. Among the most powerful influences on him were Shakespeare, whose plays were to inspire three major works, and the actress Harriet Smithson, whom he idolized, pursued and, after a bizarre courtship, eventually married (1833). Beethoven's symphonies too made a strong impact, along with Goethe's Faust and the works of Moore, Scott and Byron. The most important product of this time was his startlingly original, five-movement Symphonie fantastique (1830).

Berlioz's 15 months in Italy (1831-32) were significant more for his absorption of warmth, vivacity and local colour than for the official works he wrote there; he moved out of Rome as often as possible and worked on a sequel to the Symphonie fantastique (Le retour à la vie, renamed Lélio in 1855) and overtures to King Lear and Rob Roy, returning to Paris early to promote his music. Although the 1830s and early 1840s saw a flow of major compositions – Harold en Italie, Benvenuto Cellini, Grande messe des morts, Roméo et Juliette, Grande symphonie funèbre et triomphale, Les nuits d'été – his musical career was now essentially a tragic one. He failed to win much recognition, his works were considered eccentric or 'incorrect' and he had reluctantly to rely on journalism for a living; from 1834 he wrote chiefly for the and the Gazette musicale and the Journal des débats .

As the discouragements of Paris increased, however, performances and recognition abroad beckoned: between 1842 and 1863 Berlioz spent most of his time touring, in Germany, Austria, Russia, England and elsewhere. Hailed as an advanced composer, he also became known as a leading modern conductor. He produced literary works (notably the Mémoires) and another series of musical masterpieces – La damnation de Faust, the Te Deum, L'enfance du Christ, the vast epic Les troyens (1856-58; partly performed, 1863) and Béatrice et Bénédict (1860-62) – meanwhile enjoying happy if short-lived relationships with Liszt and Wagner. The loss of his father, his son Louis (1834-67), two wives, two sisters and friends merely accentuated the weary decline of his last years, marked by his spiritual isolation from Parisian taste and the new music of Germany alike.

A lofty idealist with a leaping imagination, Berlioz was subject to violent emotional changes from enthusiasm to misery; only his sharp wit saved him from morbid self-pity over the disappointments in his private and professional life. The intensity of the personality is inextricably woven into the music: all his works reflect something in himself expressed through poetry, literature, religion or drama. Sincere expression is the key – matching means to expressive ends, often to the point of mixing forms and media, ignoring pre-set schemes. In Les troyens, his grand opera on Virgil's Aeneid, for example, aspects of the monumental and the intimate, the symphonic and the operatic, the decorative and the solemn converge. Similarly his symphonies, from the explicitly dramatic Symphonie fantastique with its idée fixe (the theme representing his beloved, changed and distorted in line with the work's scenario), to the picturesque Harold en Italie with its concerto element, to the operatic choral symphony cum tone poem Roméo et Juliette, are all characteristic in their mixture of genres. Of his other orchestral works, the overture Le carnaval romain stands out as one of the most extrovert and brilliant. Among the choral works, Faust and L'enfance du Christ combine dramatic action and philosophic reflection, while the Requiem and Te Deum exploit to the full Berlioz's most spacious, ceremonial style.

Though Berlioz's compositional style has long been considered idiosyncratic, it can be seen to rely on an abundance of both technique and inspiration. Typical are expansive melodies of irregular phrase length, sometimes with a slight chromatic inflection, and expressive though not tonally adventurous harmonies. Freely contrapuntal textures predominate, used to a variety of fine effects including superimposition of separate themes; a striking boldness in rhythmic articulation gives the music much of its vitality. Berlioz left perhaps his most indelible mark as an orchestrator, finding innumerable and subtle ways to combine and contrast instruments (both on stage and off), effectively emancipating the procedure of orchestration for generations of later composers. As a critic he admired above all Gluck and Beethoven, expressed doubt about Wagner and fought endlessly against the second-rate.

Overtures

Overtures – Les francs-juges, Op 3. Waverley, Op 1. King Lear, Op 4. Le carnaval romain, Op 9. Béatrice et Bénédict. Le corsaire, Op 21. Benvenuto Cellini
Staatskapelle Dresden / Sir Colin Davis
RCA Victor Red Seal 09026 68790-2 (74 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1997 Ⓕ ●●

Berlioz's seven overtures fit comfortably into an hour and a quarter, in performances that reflect Sir Colin's long absorption with music that remains difficult, original, surprising. The most extrovert, the Ball Scene in Le carnaval romain, is exhilaratingly played, but done so without the strenuous attempts after excitement at all costs, through speed and volume, which are all too familiar. The music is more interesting than that, its tensions more dramatic. What are perhaps the two hardest overtures to play successfully, Waverley and King Lear, benefit from some understatement, especially in the quieter sections when, particularly in Lear, a sense of trouble animates the music. As elsewhere, Berlioz's melodies made out of awkward rhythms and uneven metres call for a skilled hand: nowhere is this more evident than at the opening of Benvenuto Cellini, whose oddity does not immediately strike the listener but whose 'rightness' is proved by its wonderful verve. Davis handles this superbly, as in different vein he does the soft music answering the opening of Le carnaval romain, in which he is given some beautiful playing (especially from the cor anglais) by the Dresden orchestra. It responds to his understanding of the different levels of tension and expression, as well as different dynamic levels, at which Berlioz can make his effects, such as at the start of Les francs-juges. Sometimes a slight emphasis in the accompaniment, even the touch of warmth on a single note, can illuminate much in the melody. It is all beautifully done.

Benvenuto Cellini – Overture. Le carnaval romain. Le corsaire. Béatrice et Bénédict – Overture. Les Troyens – Chasse royale et orage. Symphonie fantastique. Roméo et Juliette – Queen Mab Scherzo. Les nuits d'été[a]
[a]Victoria de los Angeles sop Boston Symphony Orchestra / Charles Munch
RCA Red Seal Artistes et Répertoires ②
74321 84587-2 (129 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1955-62

Munch's Berlioz is a set to cherish, less for the Symphonie fantastique (fine though that is; properly volatile), as for the Overtures and shorter pieces, the performances electric with energy, and dispatched with an élan that is at once French in spirit but emphatically transatlantic in execution. Given the mostly fine sound in this set – especially the astonishing width and depth of the image in 'The Royal Hunt and Storm' – it is a shame that stereo tapes do not appear to exist of the 1955 sessions for Les nuits d'été. Still, for a marriage of style and content, it remains a benchmark – Victoria de los Angeles with all the vocal range, and variety of expression needed for these songs.

Additional recommendation
Overtures: Le carnaval romain. Le corsaire. Les francs-juges. King Lear. Les Troyens – Act 3 Prelude; March. Waverley 🅗
Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Beecham
Sony Classical SMK89807 (69 minutes: ADD: 2/02: recorded 1950s) Ⓜ
Astonishing performances. All are played with a wonderful shaping of phrases and with a fiery attack and zest that are utterly satisfying.

Harold in Italy, Op 16

Harold in Italy. Tristia, Op 18.
Les Troyens à Carthage – Act 2, Prelude
Nobuko Imai va John Alldis Choir; London

Symphony Orchestra / Sir Colin Davis
Philips 416 431-2PH (70 minutes: ADD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1969-80 Ⓕ ●●

Berlioz was much influenced by the British romantic poet, Byron, and his travels in Italy – where he went in 1831 as the winner of the Prix de Rome – led him to conceive a big orchestral work based on one of Byron's most popular works, Childe Harold's Pilgrimage. Like Berlioz's earlier Symphonie fantastique, Harold in Italy was not only a programme work but brilliantly unconventional and imaginative in its structure and argument. A commission from the great virtuoso, Paganini, led him to conceive a big viola concerto, but the idea of a Byronic symphony got in the way of that. Though there is an important viola solo in the symphony as we know it – richly and warmly played on Davis's recording by Nobuko Imai – it is far from being the vehicle for solo display that Paganini was wanting.

Sir Colin Davis's 1975 performance, beautifully transferred to CD, emphasizes the symphonic strength of the writing without losing the bite of the story-telling.

The shorter works are also all valuable in illustrating Berlioz's extraordinary imagination. Excellent sound on all the different vintage recordings.

Harold in Italy. Tristia, Op 18 P
Gérard Caussé va Monteverdi Choir; Orchestre Révolutionnaire et Romantique / Sir John Eliot Gardiner
Philips 446 676-2PH (60 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included. Recorded 1994 Ⓕ ●●

It is to Gardiner's credit that, like Davis, he conveys that element of wildness without ever slackening control. With Gardiner dynamic contrasts are extreme, far more strikingly so than in most period-instrument performances, and some of the pianissimos from the ORR strings are ravishing. The central Canto religioso of the second movement of the Pilgrims' hymn provides a remarkable instance, with the arpeggios sul ponticello of the solo viola far more eerie than usual. Gardiner's soloist, Gérard Caussé, uses vibrato sparingly. Yet for the smooth phrases of Harold's theme, the work's motto, Caussé consciously produces warm tone. It is a fine solo performance, but not so dominant that one feels the lack of a soloist in the last three-quarters of the finale. It is there that Gardiner's reading, intense from the start, reaches white heat, and it is worth noting that there, as in the rest of the performance, his speeds are never excessively fast. Altogether a thrilling performance, highly recommendable to those who would not normally consider a version with period instruments.

Gardiner gives equally refreshing performances in Tristia. The epilogue to the 'Hamlet Funeral March', the third of the three movements, is the more chilling and broken in mood for the extreme hush of the pianissimo.

Harold in Italy[a]. Le corsaire – Overture[b]. King Lear – Overture[c]. Trojan March[d] H
[a]Frederick Riddle va [abd]Royal Philharmonic Orchestra; [c]BBC Symphony Orchestra / Sir Thomas Beecham
BBC Legends/IMG Artists mono BBCL4065-2 (72 minutes: ADD). Recorded live in [a]1956, [b]1951, [c]1954 and [d]1951 Ⓜ ●●

These radio recordings of Beecham in full flight could not be more welcome. The mono sound here is limited but beefy and immediate, with fine transfers by Paul Baily, even though the opening Corsaire Overture is taken from an acetate disc, not a tape. What above all hits one hard from first to last is that Beecham in such live performances of Berlioz conveyed a manic intensity, a red-blooded thrust that brings out to the full the characterful wildness in this ever-original composer, making almost any rival seem cool.

So, the Corsaire Overture has a fierceness and thrust entirely apt to the Byronic subject, culminating in a swaggering climax that verges on the frenetic. It will have you laughing with joy. You find a similar approach in Beecham's studio performances of this overture, but this is even more uninhibited in its excitement. King Lear – with the BBC Symphony Orchestra, not the RPO – surges with warmth in the lyrical first half, before similarly building excitement in the Allegro.

Harold in Italy, recorded in 1956 in the dry acoustic of the Usher Hall, Edinburgh, with the dynamic range compressed so as to magnify pianissimos, as at the very start, is specially valuable for having as soloist Beecham's chosen leader of his viola section, Frederick Riddle. It was Riddle who made the first recording of the Walton Viola Concerto in 1937 with the composer conducting, arguably still the finest ever interpretation, and here his expressive warmth and responsiveness to Beecham's volatile inspiration make up for the sort of intonation problems that the viola at that period always seemed to invite, even with players of this calibre. The pauseful tenderness of the Adagio section just after the start of the finale, is similarly magnetic, thanks to both conductor and soloist, bringing out the parallel in the review of themes with the finale of Beethoven's Ninth. The Trojan March makes a swaggering encore, a performance the more electrifying for being recorded at the opening concert of the Colston Hall in Bristol in 1951.

Symphonie fantastique, Op 14

Symphonie fantastique, Op 14
Béatrice et Bénédict – Overture 🏅
London Symphony Orchestra / Sir Colin Davis
LSO Live LSO0007CD (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded live in 2000 ●●

This latest LSO performance of the Symphonie fantastique is in many ways the subtlest of Davis's four accounts to date, conveying more mystery, with pianissimos of extreme delicacy beautifully caught. There is an overall gain, too, from having a live recording of a work with such an individual structure, with its hesitations and pauses. In overall timings it is marginally longer than earlier versions, maybe also reflecting the conditions of a live performance, even though some of this must have been put together from rehearsal tapes as there is no applause at the end.

The Béatrice et Bénédict Overture is taken from the complete recording of the opera on the same label, and makes both a welcome bonus and a tempting sampler. Though the disc comes at super-budget price, it offers splendid notes by David Cairns, author of the definitive, prize-winning biography of the composer.

Symphonie fantastique, Op 14
Concertgebouw Orchestra / Sir Colin Davis
Philips 50 Great Recordings 464 692-2PM Ⓜ
(55 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1974 ●

Sir Colin Davis's second recording of the Symphonie fantastique (an earlier one with the LSO dates from 1963) has remained a first recommendation for a remarkable 27 years. It has acquired excellent rivals in that time but Davis's 1974 reading has withstood all challenges (except possibly for his own – see above).

The Symphonie fantastique was in its way as revolutionary a score as Stravinsky's Rite of Spring, and the precise ways in which it is so original are apparent throughout this performance. Listen, for example, to the idée fixe itself: no one had ever written a melody quite like it before, and Davis's phrasing makes this abundantly clear. The discreet use of the cornet in the second movement makes 'Un bal' a sinister as well as a glittering event, that and Berlioz's way of treating it as though it were a member of the woodwind family; both these are made unassertively obvious. So is the shock, after an apparently tranquil close to the 'Scène aux champs', of the return of the solo oboe, answered now by ominous timpani chords – and Davis makes sure that they are audible as chords, just as he makes one realise how many nervous or spine-chilling quietnesses there are in both the concluding movements.

The remastered sound is excellent: indeed, there is nothing that gives away its age.

Berlioz Symphonie fantastique
Dutilleux Métaboles
Paris Opéra-Bastille Orchestra / Myung-Whun Chung
DG 445 878-2GH (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●

Not many versions of the Symphonie fantastique rival Myung-Whun Chung's in conveying the nervously impulsive inspiration of a young composer, the hints of hysteria, the overtones of nightmare in Berlioz's programme. He makes one register it afresh as genuinely fantastic; the volatile element in this perennially modern piece is something which Chung brings out to a degree rarely known before, and that establishes his as a very individual, sharply characterised version with unusually strong claims. Such an approach as Chung's might easily have sounded fussy or self-indulgent, but the rapport between conductor and orchestra is so complete that all the subtleties of expression, the highly complex rubato, sound natural and spontaneous, regularly making one register this – despite the nationality of the conductor – as a very French performance. The conclusion brings all the expected thrills in its impulsiveness, with the bass drum vividly caught.

The coupling is original, the set of five brilliant pieces Dutilleux wrote for Szell and the Cleveland Orchestra in 1964. Chung's view is both poetic and atmospheric, bringing out the subtly contrasting timbres in each piece. An exciting and volatile reading.

Symphonie fantastique 🅿
Orchestre Révolutionnaire et Romantique / Sir John Eliot Gardiner
Philips 434 402-2PH (53 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1991 ●

Even if we have here only an approximation to the sounds heard in that first performance, that is a good starting point. Gardiner's reading is in some ways sharper than Norrington's (whose own ground-breaking performance is available on EMI), and more insistent on detail. This can lead to over-phrasing, though he does almost nothing that cannot be justified from Berlioz's intricately, often oddly, marked score. Both performances are of endless fascination and enjoyment. But Gardiner is perhaps more interested in the kind of performance with which Berlioz might have startled his audience that December night in 1830. So he plays the music with an extra emphasis on sudden flicks of phrasing, an extra abruptness in the stamp of a rhythm or the snap of an interrupting chord, a concern for the extreme. Who can tell what the instruments really sounded like? What matters is that we have, to set beside other well-loved performances with a modern orchestra, this one that takes us very close to the sound world out of which Berlioz created a completely new kind of music.

La damnation de Faust, Op 24

La damnation de Faust, Op 24
Enkelejda Shkosa mez Giuseppe Sabbatini ten David Wilson-Johnson bar Michele Pertusi bass
London Symphony Orchestra and Chorus / Sir Colin Davis 💰
LSO Live ② LSO0008CD (132 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Notes, texts and translations included
Recorded live in 2000 ●●

This Damnation de Faust matches and even outshines previous sets at whatever price, not least in the gripping drama of the performance, the more intense for being recorded live. Even more than in his classic 1973 recording for Philips, Davis involves you in the painful quandry obsessing Faust, never letting tension slip for a moment.

There may be different views over the portrayal of the central character by Giuseppe Sabbatini. He is more overtly emotional than any of his immediate rivals. In the heat of the moment he tends to resort to an Italianate style, with the hint of a half-sob or the occasional phrase which is only half vocalised. Purists may resist, yet with his firm, golden, finely shaded tone and his radiant treatment of the most high-lying passages the total impact is intensely characterful and involving.

As for Davis, the differences between his reading here and in 1973 are ones of detail and refinement, for there is an extra lightness and resilience in the playing of the current LSO, as in Mephistopheles' Flea song, which is more wittily pointed than before. The little snarling flourishes which herald the arrival of Mephistopheles have you sitting up immediately, while the excitement generated in a number such as the Trio at the end of Part 3 leaves you breathless.

Michele Pertusi as Mephistopheles matches Sabbatini in the red-blooded fervour of his singing, weighty yet agile, and Enkelejda Shkosa is a warm, vibrant Marguerite, with a flicker in the voice giving a hint of the heroine's vulnerability. Not just the LSO but the London Symphony Chorus, too, are in searing form, and the recording brings out the detail of Berlioz's orchestration with ideal transparency, though the transfer is at rather a low level, needing fair amplifications for full impact. Davis is given wonderfully refined sound, with any problems from the Barbican acoustic completely eliminated. An astonishing bargain.

La damnation de Faust
Susan Graham sop Thomas Moser ten José van Dam bass-bar Frédéric Caton bass; Chorus and Orchestra of Opéra de Lyon / Kent Nagano
Erato ② 0630-10692-2 (122 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1994 ●

New versions of Faust appear regularly, but it is rare to encounter one as good this. At its centre is a perception of Berlioz's extraordinary vision, in all its colour and variety and humour and pessimism, and the ability to realise this in a broad downward sweep while setting every detail sharply in place. La damnation is a work about the steady failure of consolations in a romantic world rejecting God, until all Faust's sensations are numbed and Mephistopheles has him trapped in the hell of no feeling. Every stage of the progress is mercilessly depicted here. The chorus is brilliant in all its roles, offering in turn the lively charms of peasant life, raptures of faith in the Easter Hymn, beery roistering in Auerbach's Cellar that grows as foul as a drunken party, cheerful student Latin bawls; later they sing with delicacy as Mephistopheles's spirits of temptation and finally become a vicious pack of demons. Nagano takes the Hungarian March at a pace that grows hectic as the dream of military glory turns hollow. It is all brilliantly realised.

There is the same care for orchestral detail. Nagano seems to be conducting from the New Berlioz Edition score, and he uses his imagination with it. He has an unerring sense of tempo, balancing weight of tone against speed, and he can light upon the telling contrapuntal line, or point a detail of instrumental colour or even a single note (like the snarl in the Ride to the Abyss), elements that give Berlioz's marvellous orchestration its expressive quality. José van Dam is outstanding as Mephistopheles, curling his voice round phrases with hideous elegance, relishing the mock-jollity of the Serenade and the Song of the Flea, taunting Faust with lulling sweetness on the banks of the Elbe, yet also disclosing the sadness of the fallen spirit. Thomas Moser sings gravely and reflectively as he is first discovered on the plains of Hungary, and rises nobly to the challenge of the Invocation to Nature, but is almost at his finest in the many recitative passages as he twists and turns in Mephistopheles's grasp. Susan Graham does not match these two superb performances but sings her two arias simply and well. This version sets Nagano among the outstanding Berlioz conductors of the day.

L'enfance du Christ, Op 25

Jean Rigby mez John Aler, Peter Evans tens Gerald Finley, Robert Poulton bars Alastair Miles, Gwynne Howell basses; St Paul's Cathedral Choir; Corydon Singers and Orchestra / Matthew Best
Hyperion ② CDA66991/2 (101 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1994 ●

Best treats L'enfance du Christ as overtly operatic, not so much by cast movements or varied microphone placings as by his pacing of the action and by encouraging his artists to throw themselves wholeheartedly into the emotions of the story. He gets off to a tremendous start with a superb reading by a black-voiced Alastair Miles as a Herod haunted by his dream and startled into belligerent wakefulness by the arrival of Polydorus. Later, there is desperate urgency in the appeals for shelter by Joseph (an otherwise gently lyrical Gerald Finley), harshly rebuffed by the chorus. And, throughout, there are spatial perspectives – the soldiers' patrol advancing (from practically inaudible pizzicatos) to centre stage and going off again; and a beautifully hushed and atmospheric faraway 'Amen' at the end. Balance in general is excellent, a notable passage being the duet in the tender scene at the manger. The clear enunciation (in very good French) of nearly everyone is a plus point. The chorus's response to the mood and meaning of words is always alert and sensitive, matched by the nuanced orchestral playing. The scurrying of the Ishmaelite family to help, played really pianissimo, is vividly graphic; and their home entertainment on two flutes and a harp, which can mark a drop in the interest, here has great charm. But overall it is Best's pacing which makes this recording distinctive. This recording stands comparison well with its much-praised predecessors.

L'enfance du Christ[a]. Tristia, Op 18 – Méditation religieuse; La mort d'Ophélie. Sara la baigneuse, Op 11. La mort de Cléopâtre
Elsie Morison, Anne Pashley sops Sir Peter Pears, Edgar Fleet tens John Cameron bar
John Frost, Joseph Rouleau basses
St Anthony Singers; [a]Goldsbrough Orchestra; English Chamber Orchestra / Sir Colin Davis
Double Decca ② 443 461-2DF2 (142 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded [a]1960 and 1967 ●●

Despite advances in recording since 1960, highly commended performances by other conductors of L'enfance du Christ, and another by Sir Colin Davis himself 16 years later, many Berliozians still retain a special affection for his original version, now 40 years old. There is an electric excitement in the scene of Herod and the soothsayers, the Goldsbrough Orchestra (shortly to be reborn as the English Chamber Orchestra) responding alertly, under Davis's guidance, to the drama of the situation; and even before that, a sense of veiled mystery in the Roman soldiers' nocturnal rounds. But he was also fortunate in his cast: Peter Pears as a most expressive narrator, adapting his tone to each aspect of the story, Elsie Morison with her light soprano, perfectly suggesting Mary's youthful purity and innocence, John Cameron as a solicitous Joseph, and Joseph Rouleau skilfully changing his timbre to double as the tormented Herod and the kindly Ishmaelite father.

One or two reservations remain: the duet between Mary and Joseph in Part 1 is not well balanced, the baritone swamping the soprano; and choral intonation is not always as exact as we have come to expect. But overall this is a fine reading. Criticism must be made, however, of the fact that no texts are provided for any of the works here.

La mort de Cléopâtre has had some distinguished interpreters, including Dame Janet Baker and Yvonne Minton, but Anne Pashley has a fine sense of the dramatic, and is superbly backed up by Davis and the orchestra.

L'enfance du Christ, Op 25[a]. Sara la baigneuse, Op 11[b]. Mélodies, 'Irlande', Op 2 – No 2, Hélène[b]; No 4, La belle voyageuse[c]; No 6, Chant sacré[d]
Quartetto e coro dei maggi[e]
[a]Susan Graham, [c]Susanne Mentzer mezzos
[ad]John Mark Ainsley, [a]Gordon Getz tens
[a]François Le Roux bar [a]Philip Cokorinos, [a]Andrew Wentzel, [a]Marc Belleau basses
Montreal Symphony [abde]Chorus and Orchestra / Charles Dutoit
Decca ② 458 915-2DH2 (120 minutes: DDD)
Texts and translations included Ⓕ
Recorded [a]1995 and 1996 ●

Sir Colin Davis in both his recordings (Philips, 1976 and L'Oiseau-Lyre – now Decca, 1960) takes a more direct view of L'enfance du Christ. Though in no way lacking in warmth, his readings are a shade more austere, a very valid view in a devotional work in which Berlioz regularly relies on understatement, rare for him. Dutoit, with his warm approach, gives extra bite to the drama in passages of recitative, and generally his speeds are a shade faster.

Most striking of all is the contrast between the different approaches in the most celebrated passage, the 'Shepherds' Farewell'. At one extreme is Sir John Gardiner on Erato (1987) – his phrasing carefully moulded and expansive – and Davis who is almost as slow; at the other is Jean-Claude Casadesus on Naxos (1996), who almost turns the 3/8 Allegretto into a dance. He has justification in the metronome marking (dotted crotchet = 50), which Dutoit comes near to matching, too, adopting a flowing speed that remains devotional.

Dutoit's expressive warmth is most notable in the ensembles with the Virgin Mary and Joseph which, with the subtlest control of dynamic shading – from the chorus and soloists – are ravishingly beautiful. Susan Graham is superb as Mary, giving a performance no less heartfelt than Dame Janet Baker's for Davis on Philips, but lighter; while François Le Roux is a clear, idiomatic Joseph.

The sound is spectacularly fine, beautifully balanced, achieving admirable clarity in a warmly atmospheric acoustic. The Montreal players excel themselves; the woodwind is fresh and biting, the brass ripe and rounded, the strings full and warm. The off-stage effects are beautifully done, too. Among the other soloists, Philip Cokorinos as Herod may not have a very distinctive baritone, and is a little gruff, but he conveys the king's changing emotions vividly. Yet no one quite matches the masterly characterisation of José van Dam on the Gardiner set.

Though it is up against strong competition, this set is still highly recommendable; in addition to the warmth and bite of the reading, the digital sound is sumptuous.

Grande messe des morts, Op 5

Grande messe des morts, Op 5[a]. Te Deum, Op 22[b]
[a]Ronald Dowd, [b]Franco Tagliavini tens [b]Nicolas Kynaston org Wandsworth School Boys' Choir; London Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Sir Colin Davis
Philips 50 Great Recordings ② 464 689-2PM2 Ⓜ
(144 minutes: ADD). Texts and translations included
Recorded 1969 ●●

The similarities between these two great choral works – the monumental style and blend of austerity and brilliance – make them an ideal coupling. Both are tremendous sonic showpieces, and although Sir Colin Davis's Berlioz cycle dates back over 30 years, the performances remain among the front runners.

The key is Davis's ability to concentrate on the inner meaning of the music, rather than its outward effects. In the Grande messe des morts, conductors as various as Maazel, Levine and Ozawa have failed to see any more than generalised beauty and grandeur, but Davis is always alive to the specific emotion of the moment, whether it is the pleading of the 'Quaerens me' or the angular pain of the 'Lacrymosa'. His chorus is stretched, especially in the underweight tenor section (Berlioz prescribes 60 tenors, adding helpfully that the numbers may be doubled or tripled if space permits) and Ronald Dowd is not entirely comfortable in the solo part of the 'Sanctus'. But in all other respects this is a high-quality performance of vision and imagination.

The splendid Te Deum is given a performance of comparable virtues, and Philips' natural sound stands up well to recent competition.

Grande messe des morts 🄷
Richard Lewis ten Royal Philharmonic Chorus and Orchestra / Sir Thomas Beecham
BBC Music Legends mono BBCL4011-2
(78 minutes: ADD). Text and translation included Ⓜ
Recorded live in 1959 ●

Almost 60 years to the day since his first Berlioz performance, Beecham conducted the Grande messe des morts in the Albert Hall. Though the Dies irae thunders out tremendously, and the 'Lachrymosa' has a wonderful snap on the off-beat chords, it is the quieter movements that characterize what is, after all, a Requiem Mass. Beecham's response to them is with a lifetime's devotion to one of the composers who had been closest to his heart. The 'Quid sum miser' has an enchanting clarity; the long, hushed end of the 'Offertoire', as Berlioz lingers over the gently alternating notes that suffuse the invention, is finely judged; the Sanctus is eloquently sung by Lewis and the splendid chorus; the return of the opening 'Te decet hymnus', near the close of the whole work, is sublime. Such things are not achieved without the attention to detail with which Beecham used to complain people did not credit him. How wrong. His orchestral parts were always covered with powerful blue pencil marks and the signature 'TB', so that it was impossible to mistake intentions which players would then shape for him in rehearsal. Here, the detail is exquisite. Occasionally he takes his own view, not Berlioz's, about phrasing; and the orchestra contains not a whiff of an ophicleide. No matter. This is a recording of a great occasion – full in recording, scarcely bothered by audience noise – but also of a marvellous performance.

Grande messe des morts[a]. Veni creator. Tantum ergo. Messe solennelle – Resurrexit[b]
Bortnyansky/Berlioz Pater Noster. Adoremus
[a]John Mark Ainsley ten Montreal Symphony Chorus and [ab]Orchestra / Charles Dutoit
Decca ② 458 921-2DH2 (110 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1997 ●

The massive and gloriously resonant Montreal forces are here clearly defined: the sessions were not at the now-legendary venue of the church of St Eustache but at St Jerome, a venue just as sympathetic. If the quality of sound is what strikes home first, the interpretation, too, offers a powerful alternative to the fine versions by Davis, Levine and Previn. As in Les Troyens, Dutoit favours speeds generally a degree or two more flowing than those rival versions. The Montreal choral sound, too, both here and throughout, is more beautifully integrated than with Davis or Levine; it's a question of ensemble as well as of recording balance, as the recording gives unrivalled weight in the climaxes. Even so, the sound and the performance in the Previn version are fine.

Where the singing of the Montreal Symphony Chorus does not quite match that of the classic Davis version, or of the Previn, is in attack: the performance is often a degree more relaxed, less bitingly dramatic. You could say that Dutoit's is above all a comforting performance rather than a disturbing one, and at flowing, urgent speeds it is one which is held strongly together both in structure and argument. There is also the question of the tenor soloist in the Sanctus. It goes without saying that John Mark Ainsley sings with great sensitivity, but the refined, very English sound will not please everyone, and the recording brings out a pronounced vibrato.

When it comes to a final recommendation for the Grande messe des morts, the classic Davis has unique claims: a revelatory performance, even after more than 30 years, but with an ideal coupling in the Symphonie funèbre et triomphale. The Previn also has a very strong claim with its superb performance and recording, now offered as a bargain two-disc package in EMI's Double Forte series, with the very generous coupling of Previn's strongly symphonic account of the Symphonie fantastique. Yet Dutoit will for many be a first choice, above all for the sound, and certainly it goes to the top of the list of digital versions.

Messe solennelle

Messe solennelle (also includes revised version of Resurrexit) 🄿
Donna Brown sop Jean-Luc Viala ten
Gilles Cachemaille bar
Monteverdi Choir; Orchestre Révolutionnaire et Romantique / Sir John Eliot Gardiner
Philips 464 688-2PM (61 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included. Recorded live in 1993 Ⓜ ●●

The reappearance of Berlioz's lost Mass of 1824 is the most exciting musical discovery of modern times. To an incredulous meeting of the New Berlioz Edition in 1992 the General Editor, Hugh Macdonald, announced that a Belgian choirmaster, Frans Moors, had made contact with news of an improbable find in an Antwerp organ loft. A few days later, Prof Macdonald reported back from Antwerp that this was indeed the Messe solennelle which Berlioz alleged that he had burnt after a couple of performances. Gardiner with his Monteverdi Choir and Orchestre Révolutionnaire et Romantique gave performances in Bremen, Vienna, Madrid, Rome and Westminster Cathedral. This is a live recording of that last, thrilling occasion.

Why did Berlioz abandon the work? Only the Resurrexit was retained, though it was rewritten: both versions are included here. Some of it, but not much, is dull: the Offertory and Sanctus sit rather stolidly with the rest. He was unfair on what he denounced in an angry scribble on the MS as an 'execrable' fugue. Some is disconcertingly awkward, and Gardiner tells in the notes to this record of his and the singers' and players' confusion – until they all came together and suddenly the music made sense. The best of the work is superb: among this one may count the Incarnatus, the O Salutaris and the lovely Agnus Dei. The latter was too good to lose, and survives in another form in the Te Deum. So do other ideas: it was at first disconcerting to hear the chorus singing 'Laudamus te. Benedicimus te' to the Carnival music from Benvenuto Cellini, more so than to hear the slow movement of the Symphonie fantastique in the beautiful Gratias.

Once these and other associations are overcome, the work coheres remarkably well. Yet perhaps it did not do so well enough for Berlioz, and perhaps he was dissatisfied with the conjunction of some rather academic music with ideas that were too original, indeed too beautiful, to make a satisfying whole. Who knows whether he might have been made to think twice about abandoning the work had he heard a performance such as this? In any case, this is a recording of a great musical event, not to be missed.

Les nuits d'été, Op 7

Berlioz Les nuits d'été[a]
Ravel Shéhérazade[a] Debussy Trois chansons de Bilitis[b] Poulenc Banalities[b] – Chansons d'Orkenise; Hôtel[c]. La courte paille[b] – Le carafon; La reine de coeur[c]. Chansons villageoises[b] – Les gars qui vont à la fête. Deux poèmes de Louis Aragon[b]
Régine Crespin sop [b]John Wustman pf
[a]Suisse Romande Orchestra / Ernest Ansermet
Decca Legends 460 973-2DM (68 minutes: ADD).
Texts and translations included. Ⓜ
Items marked [a] recorded 1963, [bc]1967 ○○○

Crespin's Nuits dété has always been the interpretation by which others have been assessed and, listening to it again, there is no reason to challenge the verdict. In terms of idiomatic and natural French, languorous tone and understanding of the poetry's and the music's meaning, it stands above all other versions without any question. Even Dame Janet Baker's appreciable reading (now available at bargain price on HMV Classics; also on BBC Legends) sounds a trifle affected in its vocal grammar besides Crespin's, particularly as regards the determinedly bright, jolly tone employed by the British artist in the first and last songs, whose joyous moods Crespin encompasses without resort to contrivance. Crespin's tempos are also ideally chosen.

The only drawback to her version is the sometimes slack accompanying of Ansermet, not that Barbirolli is ideal in that respect. Crespin's Shéhérazade is even more in a class of its own than her account of the Berlioz too. As soon as she launches seductively into 'Asie' we know that singer and music are perfectly matched, and the last two songs are even better. As if this were not enough, we have Crespin's Chansons de Bilitis from a later recital, a performance that wonderfully suggests the distant lassitude of poem and music, and a group of Poulenc songs from the same 1969 record of which the sad, elegiac 'C' (Deux poèmes) is the plum. Anyone who thinks that some of Crespin's successors fully understand how to interpret mélodies must hear this record.

Les nuits d'été. Herminie
Mireille Delunsch sop Brigitte Balleys mez
Orchestre des Champs-Elysées, Paris / Philippe Herreweghe
Harmonia Mundi HMC90 1522 (54 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1994 ○○

It is not fanciful to hear decided pre-echoes in Herminie of Cassandra's fateful, searing music (quite apart from the very obvious dry-run for the Symphonie fantastique's main motif). This extraordinary work of 1828, almost as arresting as its near-contemporary Cléopâtre, receives a grand rendering from Mireille Delunsch, who sings it in a compact, direct manner. Her tone is narrow and focused, her French diction clear. Herreweghe and his orchestra adopt a lean sound, surely close to that of Berlioz's time. Delunsch enters into the inner agony of the distraught, frustrated Herminie with a will. All in all, her interpretation is absorbing from start to finish. The recording imparts a slight glare to her tone as it does to that of Balleys in the much more familiar Nuits d'été, but that is hardly enough to detract from what is an idiomatic, unfussy reading. Her voice does not luxuriate in the more sensual moments of the cycle as does Régine Crespin's in her famous version (reviewed below) but it has a clarity of profile and a definition of phrase and, where strength of feeling is called for, Balleys provides it, as in 'Au cimetière' and 'Absence'. This makes a sensible pairing with the cantata. What may also influence your choice is, again, Herreweghe's lean, well-pointed support which often emphasizes, rightly, the striking originality of Berlioz's scoring.

Les nuits d'été. Benvenuto Cellini – Tra la la ... Mais qu'ai-je donc?. Les Troyens – Je vais mourir ... Adieu, fière cité. Béatrice et Bénédict – Dieu! Que vien-je d'entendre? ... Il m'en souvient. La damnation de Faust – D'amour l'ardente flamme
Susan Graham mez Royal Opera House Orchestra, Covent Garden / John Nelson
Sony Classical SK62730 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1996-97 ●●

It would be hard to imagine a more inspiriting and rewarding display of Berlioz singing than this from a singer who has the composer's style in her voice and heart. Graham manages to explore and deliver the soul of each of her chosen pieces, her voice – firm yet vibrant, clear yet warm – responding interpretatively and technically to the appreciable demands placed on it. In Les nuits d'été, she faces the greatest challenge from revered favourites and meets it head on, catching in almost every respect the varied moods of each song. Her French pronunciation is excellent and she uses the language to evoke the atmosphere of each song without a hint of exaggeration.

The noble dignity of her account of Dido's farewell, in particular at the recollection of the love duet, is deeply moving, and Béatrice's equivocal thoughts about her lover are another triumph. The fleeter, lighter side of Graham's art is caught in the rapturous cabaletta to Béatrice's aria and in Ascanio's excitable aria from Benvenuto Cellini, both dispatched securely. Nelson and the LSO provide idiomatic support, and the recording catches the full colour of the singer's performances.

Berlioz Les nuits d'été, Op 7[a]
Chausson Poème de l'amour et de la mer, Op 19[b] Schoenberg Gurrelieder – Song of the Wood Dove[c]
Dame Janet Baker mez [a]London Philharmonic Orchestra / Carlo Maria Giulini; [bc]London Symphony Orchestra / [b]Evgeny Svetlanov, [c]Norman del Mar
BBC Legends/IMG Artists BBCL4077-2 (75 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Notes but no texts
Recorded live in [a]1975, [b]1975, [c]1963 ●

These three absorbing interpretations are a very welcome addition to the growing discography of Dame Janet in live performances, where the frisson of a 'real' occasion adds an extra immediacy to her readings. Dame Janet recorded Nuits d'étés some 10 years earlier with Barbirolli, when speeds were on the slow side. Here they are even more deliberate, possibly the longest 'Le spectre de la rose' on disc. In other hands that might prove terminally debilitating. But here the extra time allows the singer to bring an even deeper sense of mystery and longing to the four middle songs. Has 'Absence' ever sounded so sad and eloquent? Again, her ability to control a wide range of dynamic effects is astonishing. Giulini and the LPO could not be more supportive.

All the recordings are a tribute to the BBC's recording expertise, giving more presence to the voice than is often the case today. Apart from one disfiguring cough in the Berlioz, the presence of an audience is hardly intrusive.

Les nuits d'été. La mort de Cléopâtre. Zaïde, Op 19 No 1. La captive, Op 12. La belle voyageuse, Op 2 No 5
Véronique Gens sop Lyon National Opera Orchestra / Louis Langrée
Virgin Classics 545422-2 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, texts and translations included
Recorded 2000 ●

Berlioz specifically asked for a variety of singers for his orchestral version of Nuits d'été; yet – apart from a Colin Davis version (Philips) – record companies seem to prefer, for several obvious reasons, a single soloist. In consequence few provide complete satisfaction. This latest of many has two advantages. It is sung by a native French artist and it avoids the excessive weight of several noted readings in the catalogue. Indeed Gens' interpretation in its simple, uncomplicated way, most closely resembles that of Suzanne Danco (Decca – nla), a soprano with similar attributes.

Her fresh yet plaintive tone is perfectly apt for the first and last songs, the most airy ones, and in its unassuming manner often catches the longing and lost love expressed in the reflective pieces. What is missing in such a slight soprano is the ability to cope with emotional overtones of such a key moment as 'J'arrive au paradis' in 'Spectre de la rose', where her tone sometimes comes under undue pressure, or to encompass all the sorrow of 'Sur les lagunes'. In that respect, de los Angeles' glorious, more pointed reading (see below), is to be preferred; every word is savoured and projected, with Munch a superb conductor. Here, the orchestral part is rather underplayed yet, over all, this version has its own justification in a true, natural identification with the cycle's melos. Gens again favours a less subjective approach in Cleopatra's Death. If you compare Gens with the similarly voiced Anne Pashely (on Davis's mid-price Decca set, reviewed under L'enfance du Christ), it is the older artist who goes to the heart of the matter in conveying Cleopatra's desperation and death. Baker is still better at projecting the heroic-cum-tragic ethos of this still-amazing piece. Gens is at her appreciable best in the three separate songs that complete her programme, where her soft-grained, limpid timbre and feeling for line are of the essence.

Additional recommendation
Les nuits d'été Ⓗ
Couplings: Symphonie fantastique. Roméo et Juliette – Queen Mab Scherzo. Overtures – Benvenuto Cellini; Béatrice et Bénédict. Le carnaval romain. Le corsaire. Les Troyens – Chasse royale et orage.
de los Angeles sop Boston SO / Munch
RCA Red Seal Artistes et Répertoires ②
74321 84587-2 (129 minutes: ADD: 9/56, 10/61, Ⓜ

10/62 and 2/63) ○○

De los Angeles' Nuits d'été still remains a benchmark by which all others are judged; she has all the vocal range and variety of expression needed for these songs. It's a shame, though, that no stereo tapes exist for these 1955 sessions. The performances of the overtures are electric.

Songs

Mélodies, Op 19 – No 2, Les champs; No 6, Le Chasseur danois. Mélodies, Op 13 – No 1, Le matin; No 2, Petit oiseau, chant de paysan; No 4, Le Jeune pâtre breton[c]; No 5, Le Chant des Bretons. Mélodies, 'Irlande', Op 2 – Le coucher du soleil; Chant guerrier[b]; La belle voyageuse; Chanson à boire[b]; Chant sacré[a]; L'origine de la harpe; Adieu Bessy; Elégie en prose. Roméo et Juliette, Op 17 – Premiers transports[d]

Jérôme Corréas bass-bar Arthur Schoonderwoerd pf with [a]Claire Brua, [a]Marie-Bénénedicte Souquet sops [b]Alain Gabriel, [a]Jean-Francois Novelli, [a]Jean-Francois Lombard tens [a]Vincent Deliau bar [c]Claude Maury hn [d]Christophe Coin vc

Alpha ALPHA024 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included. Recorded c2002

It is surprising that Berlioz's songs are not better known. Anyone who thinks Les nuits d'été constitutes a summary of his vocal production need only listen to this disc to be disabused. Jérôme Corréas has so far tended to specialise in Baroque music and his dark, warm bass-baritone is surprisingly flexible in its articulation, with an especially tender mezza voce. Berlioz's roots are not generally thought to extend further back than Gluck, but Corréas's well-focused tone and shapely phrasing strike me as ideal for this music. Certainly Berlioz's vocal lines, asymmetrical and often plain weird, have little to do with Viennese Classicism. Corréas embraces the asymmetry, but is ingenious in finding some logic in the composer's most outlandish effusions, and (oh joy!) you can hear every word. Arthur Schoonderwoerd draws wonderful sounds from an 1836 Pleyel and in a song like Elégie en prose you can sense Duparc in the making. The other supporting artists are all excellent – a particularl joy is Christophe Coin's cello playing in the marvellous 'Premiers transports'. The spacious church acoustic, with up to a three-second echo, is not ideal, but then traffic-free venues in Paris are hard to find.

Roméo et Juliette, Op 17

Daniela Barcellona mez Kenneth Tarver ten Orlin Anastassov bass

London Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Sir Colin Davis 🏆

LSO Live LSO0003CD (99 minutes: DDD). Ⓢ

Recorded live in January 2000 ○○

This recording of Berlioz's masterpiece builds in important ways on what Sir Colin has revealed to us in his two previous versions, both for Philips, and preserves what by any reckoning was an electrifying event at the Barbican. The recording was edited from two separate concerts, so ironing out irritating flaws of the moment, while offering the extra dramatic thrust of a live performance. That is most strikingly illustrated in the concluding chorus, a passage that has often been felt to let the rest of the work down, but which here provides an incandescent climax, silencing any doubts. That said, the differences between this live recording and Davis's two studio ones are less a question of interpretation than of recording balance and quality. Davis's view of the work has remained fundamentally unchanged, though his speeds at the Barbican are marginally broader until the concluding sections from Juliet's funeral onwards, which now flow more easily. The live recording may not match in opulence either the 1993 one with the Vienna Philharmonic or the 1968 one with the LSO, for the Barbican acoustic is drier. Yet the refinement of the sound this time, with orchestra and chorus set at a slight distance, brings pianissimos of breathtaking delicacy, focused in fine detail. Not only the Love scene but the choral recitatives gain greatly from that, as does the lovely passage before the Love scene where the Capulets return home after the party. The three young soloists are first-rate, characterising strongly. It will be a pity if having this on the LSO Live label, with its limited availability, reduces its circulation, yet everyone will appreciate the benefit of getting such a fine modern recording at so reasonable a price.

Roméo et Juliette

Olga Borodina mez Thomas Moser ten Alastair Miles bass

Bavarian Radio Chorus; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Colin Davis

Philips ② 442 134-2PH2 (96 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ

Text and translation included. Recorded 1993 ◉

Davis's return to Berlioz's highly demanding dramatic symphony is more than welcome (he first recorded it in 1968, also for Philips). He has not substantially rethought what was by some way the finest recorded performance, but he has lived through the music again and been allowed by the recording to clarify what was before in places obscure. But the gains are also musically more positive. Thomas Moser sings the vocal version of 'Queen Mab' with a verve and wit that make it all sound easy, which it is not. Olga Borodina is excellent in the 'Strophes', phrasing with a long but internally detailed line which is essentially Berliozian, and adding just the right throb of vibrato when he lovingly asks for it at the word 'Shakespeare'.

Alastair Miles has more difficulty with the problematic role of Friar Laurence, and his French is less secure than that of the others, but this cantata finale, never the strongest part of the work, stands up well and he leads it firmly, supported by the excellent chorus. Davis himself makes of this as good a case as possible for a reconciliatory conclusion to a whole symphonic experience, one whose variety as well as quasi-symphonic cohesion he understands better than any other conductor.

Roméo et Juliette
Catherine Robbin mez Jean-Paul Fouchécourt ten
Gilles Cachemaille bar
Monteverdi Choir; Orchestre Révolutionnaire et Romantique / Sir John Eliot Gardiner
Philips ② 454 454-2PH2 (136 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Includes earlier variants
Recorded 1995 ●

If not exactly a 'variorum' edition, Gardiner's is one that adds to the standard version much of the discarded music that has been rescued. Track programming will allow listeners to chart their preferred course through the work, 'standard' or so-called 'original' or Gardiner's own mixture of the two. Briefly, the main differences are as follows. Berlioz expanded the original Prologue so as to bring in more glimpses of music later to be heard and the revised 'Queen Mab' Scherzo has a more strongly composed ending. This Second Prologue seems not to have been orchestrated, and it is, here, by Oliver Knussen with a quick Berliozian ear. The finale had the most alterations; they are mostly concerned with shortening Friar Laurence's sermon which is all the better for it. This often maligned finale is more than justified in Gardiner's performance.

Gilles Cachemaille's voice is a little light for Père Laurence but he sings it intelligently with an affecting ruefulness as well as firmness. The 'Strophes' are attractively sung by Catherine Robbin, a light contralto such as Berlioz would have known. Jean-Paul Fouchécourt throws off the difficult Queen Mab Scherzetto with the panache he might bring to a comic opera aria. Robbin is probably using more vibrato than singers of the day would have done. The question of how much vibrato would have been used by a Paris orchestra of the time is arguable; Gardiner is almost certainly right to discourage it. Yet he also appears to discourage portamento, which was coming in as an expressive device. It may partly account for him pressing the music rather hard in consequence, where Davis allows the great rapturous phrases to unfold more naturally. Gardiner also presses the 'Queen Mab' Scherzo hard, whereas Davis floats the phrases on the light, speeding tempo. But he gives 'Romeo in the Tomb of the Capulets' a brilliantly eloquent account and his reading of the Ball is vigorous and exuberant, even if it does lack the whiff of foreboding which Davis scents in it. No listener with a care for Berlioz will want to be without Gardiner's remarkable set. Sir Colin's recordings are more devoted to the inward emotions, and touch more eloquently on the tragedy of young love destined never to flourish, but never to fade. There is sufficient room for both views of a wonderful work.

Te Deum

Te Deum, Op 22
Roberto Alagna ten Marie-Claire Alain org
European Union and Maîtrise d'Antony Childrens Choirs; Orchestre de Paris Chorus; Orchestre de Paris / John Nelson
Virgin Classics 545449-2 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●

The Berlioz Te Deum has been relatively neglected on disc in comparison with his other major works. This latest version has John Nelson as an incisive, understanding conductor of Berlioz, revelling in the weight of choral sound, balancing his forces beautifully. He is helped here by fuller, more detailed digital sound than on previous versions.

The organ sound may be less transparent than it might be, but the authentic French timbre of the Cavaillé-Coll organ of the Madeleine in Paris blends beautifully in the ensemble, and Marie-Claire Alain, as one might expect, is the most idiomatic soloist, making her non-French rivals seem rather square by comparison. It makes for luxury casting, too, to have Roberto Alagna as an imaginative, idiomatic tenor soloist in the prayer, 'Te ergo quaesumus', warmly persuasive and full of temperament.

An additional plus-point for the new issue, even in relation to Sir Colin Davis's now classic version for Philips (see below), is not only the fuller, more open recorded sound but the interesting bonus provided. The two extra instrumental movements included here were written by Berlioz expressly for performances celebrating victory, both with military overtones. On CD one can easily leave either of them out, yet Berlioz, even at his most populist, never fails to grab the listener's attention.

Additional recommendation
Te Deum
Coupling: Grande messe des morts
Dowd, Tagliavini tens Kynaston org Wandsworth School Boys' Choir; London Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / C Davis
Philips 50 Great Recordings ② 464 689-2PM2 Ⓜ
(144 minutes: ADD: recorded 1969) ●●

A classic recording and an ideal coupling: these performances remain among the front-runners, though the chorus sounds rather stretched at times. Philips' natural sound quality stands up well (reviewed above under Grande messe).

Opera arias

Béatrice et Bénédict – Ah! je vais l'aimer Benvenuto Cellini – Une heure encore…La gloire était ma seule idole; Seul pour lutter…Sur les monts les plus sauvages La damnation de Faust – Merci, doux crépuscule; Grands dieux…Ange adoré dont la céleste image[a]; Nature immense Lélio – L'onde frémit, l'onde s'agite[b]; O mon bonheur, ma vie L'enfance du Christ – Les pélerins étant venus[c] Faust – Sérénade de Méphistophélès[b] Roméo et

Juliette – Bientôt de Roméo…Mab, la messagère[d]. Rouget de Lisle La Marseillaise (arr Berlioz)[cde] Les Troyens – Du peuple et des soldats; O blonde Cérès; Inutiles regrets…Ah quand viendra l'instant.
Roberto Alagna ten [a]Angela Gheorghiu sop [b]Gérard Depardieu spkr [c]Maitrise de Paris; [d]Les Eléments Chamber Choir; [e]French Army Chorus; Royal Opera House Orchestra, Covent Garden / Bertrand de Billy
EMI 557433-2 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded c2002

No other tenor of the past, let alone present, would dare quite as much as Alagna has done here. Perhaps Nicolai Gedda has come nearest to it but there are items here that he never attempted. From the more distant past, Georges Thill, whom Alagna singing in French often calls to mind, might have managed something like it in the more amenable recording circumstances of today.

Alagna, always at his best singing in French, is here at his most appealing in solos commonly assigned to light, lyrical tenors; these include solos from L'enfance de Christ, Béatrice et Bénédict, and Roméo et Juliette, the charming if inconsequential pieces from Lélio, and Iopas's poetic song from Les Troyens. To all of them he brings a deft traversal of the notes, nicely alternating plangency with smiling tone as a piece requires.

The heavier roles, calling for a touch of metal in the tone, also fare well. Alagna evokes the wonder and romantic ardour of Faust's solos, and in the duet with Marguérite, where he is joined by Angela Gheorghiu (as appealing as ever), he literally scales the heights – the two high C sharps, for instance – with consummate ease and none of the loss in quality that sometimes affects him in Italian roles.

The only reservation concerns the occasionally hesitant support of Bertrand de Billy and the ROH Orchestra, rather backwardly recorded. That should not be enough to prevent anyone going for this heady display of Alagna's art.

Béatrice et Bénédict

Béatrice et Bénédict
Susan Graham sop Béatrice; Jean-Luc Viala ten Bénédict; Sylvia McNair sop Héro;
Catherine Robbin mez Ursule; Gilles Cachemaille bar Claudio; Gabriel Bacquier bar Somarone;
Vincent Le Texier bass Don Pedro; Philippe Magnant spkr Léonato
Lyon Opera Chorus and Orchestra / John Nelson
Erato MusiFrance ② 2292-45773-2
(111 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation Ⓕ
included. Recorded 1991 ●

We have to note that the title is not a French version of Much Ado about Nothing, but that it takes the two principal characters of Shakespeare's play and constructs an opera around them. The comedy centres on the trick which is played upon the protagonists by their friends, producing love out of apparent antipathy. Much of the charm lies in the more incidental matters of choruses, dances, the magical 'Nocturne' duet for Béatrice and Héro, and the curious addition of the character Somarone, a music-master who rehearses the choir in one of his own compositions. There is also a good deal of spoken dialogue. Perhaps surprisingly, the extra dialogue is a point in its favour, for it is done very effectively by good French actors and it makes for a cohesive, Shakespearian entertainment. John Nelson secures a well-pointed performance of the score, and with excellent playing by the Lyon Orchestra. Susan Graham and Jean-Luc Viala are attractively vivid and nimble in style, and Sylvia McNair makes a lovely impression in Héro's big solo. The veteran Gabriel Bacquier plays the music-master with genuine panache and without overmuch clownage. There is good work by the supporting cast and the chorus and the recording is finely produced.

Les Troyens

Ben Heppner ten Enée; Michelle DeYoung mez Didon; Petra Lang mez Cassandre; Sara Mingardo mez Anna; Peter Mattei bar Chorèbe; Stephen Milling bass Narbal; Kenneth Tarver ten Iopas; Toby Spence ten Hylas; Orlin Annastassov bass Ghost of Hector; Tigran Martirossian bass Panthée; Isabelle Cals mez Ascagne; Alan Ewing bass Priam; Guang Yang mez Hécube; Andrew Greenan bass First sentry; Roderick Earle bass Second sentry; Bülent Bezdüz ten Hélénus; Leigh Melrose bass A Trojan soldier/Mercure; Mark Stone bar A Greek Chieftain; London Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Sir Colin Davis 🏵
LSO Live ④ LSO0010 (240 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded live in 2000 ●●

Colin Davis's 1969 recording remains a landmark event, the first time this grand opera of Meyerbeerian length, spectacular éclat and Wagnerian artistic ambition had found its way complete onto LP. It effectively changed views about Berlioz the opera composer and orchestral genius and has for many remained the yardstick by which all later performances have been judged. Although studio recorded, it was based on the Covent Garden casting of the day – Jon Vickers' heroic Enée and Josephine Veasey's voluptuous Didon – with a couple of Frenchmen to boost the ranks of lesser Trojans and Carthaginians.

The tantalising glimpses of Régine Crespin's Cassandre and Didon (which she recorded in a potted version of the opera for French EMI, nla) belong to a now lost tradition which none of the singing on the new LSO disc quite emulates – with the possible exception, that is, of the delightful young French mezzo Isabelle Cals as Ascagne. Part for part, however, the LSO have assembled a cast which challenges without comprehensively surpassing that of the earlier Davis recording. Some of the comprimario singers are without doubt their predecessors' superiors: the handsome-voiced Peter Mattei is a nobler-toned, more youthful and romantic-sounding Chorèbe in his fraught interview with his 'vierge adorée', Cassandre; Sara Mingardo's sumptuous contralto is luxury casting for Didon's sister beside the admirable but plain Heather Begg. And as the Carthaginian court poet, Iopas, Kenneth Tarver's tone catches the microphone just that bit more sweetly than Ian Partridge's.

Any account of Les Troyens, however, stands or falls by the casting of the three central characters – Cassandre, Enée and Didon – and this the LSO has done with exceptional results. Michelle DeYoung was originally assigned Cassandre, but was 'promoted' to Didon when Olga Borodina fell ill. Her replacement as Cassandre, the German dramatic mezzo Petra Lang, was a revelation at the Barbican, a passionate prophetess, thrilling in her imprecations against the Greeks and heroic in her suicide as Troy is consumed in flames at the close of Act 2. Her French has a slightly 'thick' Germanic flavour, but she makes every word tell and she has the grand rhetorical manner Berlioz learned from Gluck and Cherubini to the manner born.

It's hard to imagine today – vocally at least – a more musical, more romantic, more impetuous Enée than Ben Heppner who brings real stylish distinction and heroic bravura to bear. Michelle DeYoung's Didon is not quite so successful. Her big, bright-toned voice is less warm than Veasey's and she has a tendency to 'yowl' on climactic notes. She doesn't really convey Didon's regal bearing either: her imperiousness is that of a bossy housekeeper rather than a great founding Queen. That said, she rises to a magnificent 'Adieu, fier cité' and works herself into a Medea-like rage when she threatens to serve a dismembered Ascagne as her perjured lover's dinner.

What really makes this issue indispensable is Davis's conducting of an LSO on incandescent form. The 'world's greatest Berlioz conductor' seems to become ever more convinced of the greatness of this astonishing score and revels, with greater conviction than ever, in its magical orchestral effects and its grand theatrical rhetoric. For Davis and his orchestra – and the splendid immediacy of the live recording – this account of Les Troyens is first choice at any price. This set is a must-buy.

Les Troyens
Françoise Pollet sop Dido; Gary Lakes ten Aeneas; Deborah Voigt sop Cassandra; Gino Quilico bar Corebus; Hélène Perraguin mez Anna; Jean-Philippe Courtis bass Narbal; Michel Philippe bass Pantheus; Catherine Dubosc sop Ascanius; Jean-Luc Maurette ten Iopas; René Shirrer bar Priam's ghost, First Soldier; Claudine Carlson mez Hecuba; John Mark Ainsley ten Hylas; Marc Belleau bass Hector's ghost, Second Soldier, Greek Captain; Gregory Cross ten Sinon; Michel Beuachemin bass Mercury; Montreal Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Charles Dutoit
Decca ④ 443 693-2DH4 (238 minutes: DDD)
Notes, text and translation included Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ◉◉

Davis's first Les Troyens remained unchallenged for a quarter of a century. Then came Dutoit and the Montreal Symphony Orchestra, who have established themselves as second to none in the French repertory. Add to that a largely French-speaking cast, on balance even more sensitive and tonally more beautiful than for Davis's 1969 account, and the strengths of this set become clear.

Interpretatively, the contrasts between Dutoit and Davis are quickly established at the very start. Dutoit launches in at high voltage, more volatile than Davis, conveying exuberance consistently preferring faster speeds. The advantage of Dutoit's faster speeds comes not just in thrilling Allegros, but in flowing Andantes. So Cassandra's first solo is more persuasively moulded at a flowing speed, with Deborah Voigt far warmer than Berit Lindholm for Davis, both in her beauty of tone and in her espressivo phrasing. In 'La prise de Troie' such a moment as the clash of arms within the Trojan horse comes over more dramatically with Dutoit thanks to his timing, and there is more mystery before the arrival of Hector's ghost at the beginning of Act 2.

The role of Cassandra's lover, Corebus, is taken by Gino Quilico, in rich, firm voice. As Aeneas Gary Lakes is an old hand in this role. His big advantage over Jon Vickers, most of all in the great love scene with Dido in Act 3, is that he shades his voice far more subtly. Though the role of Dido very often goes to a mezzo, here Decca firmly opts for a soprano, Françoise Pollet. Very much attuned to the idiom, she sings consistently with full, even tone, so that, matching Dutoit's expressiveness and the richness of the Montreal sound, she brings out the feminine sensuousness of the role more than a mezzo normally would.

Throughout the opera Dutoit's degree of rhythmic freedom intensifies the controlled frenzy behind much of the most dramatic writing, and Dido's hysteria is most tellingly conveyed. There is barely a weak link in the rest of the huge cast. As for the chorus, though on balance the Covent Garden Chorus for Davis sings with even crisper ensemble, the passionate commitment of the Montreal Chorus matches the fire of Dutoit's reading. This is a thrilling set, confidently recorded, which will have you marvelling at the electric vitality of Berlioz's inspiration.

Additional recommendation
Les Troyens
Veasey Dido Vickers Aeneas Lindholm Cassandra Glossop Corebus
Wandsworth School Boys' Choir; Chorus and Orchestra of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden / C Davis

Philips ④ 416 432-2PH4 (241 minutes: ADD: recorded 1969) Ⓕ ●●

A classic recording, but the new LSO Live set will be first choice (reviewed above).

Les Troyens 🄷

Ferrer Didon, Cassandre; Giraudeau Enée; Cambon Chorèbe, Narba BBC Theatre Chorus; Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Beecham

Malibran-Music mono ③ CDRG162 Ⓕ

(226 minutes: ADD: broadcast, 1947) ●●●

One of the most important documents ever to appear from previously unavailable archives. Beecham is at least Davis's peer here. An arresting, inspiriting performance, which has the benefit of a superb French cast.

Lord Gerald Berners

British 1883-1950

GROVE English composer, writer and painter Lord Berners was essentially self-taught. He was honorary attaché in Rome (1911-19), where he came to know Stravinsky and Casella. In 1919 he succeeded to the barony, and thereafter was an eccentric English gentleman. His early works are mostly small and ironical (chiefly songs and piano pieces), close to Les Six; later he wrote ballets, including The Triumph of Neptune (1926), Luna Park (1930) and A Wedding Bouquet (1936).

The Triumph of Neptune

The Triumph of Neptune. L'uomo dai baffi. Valses bourgeoises. Polka (both orch Lane)

English Northern Philharmonia, Royal Ballet Sinfonia / David Lloyd-Jones

Marco Polo 8 223711 (69 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ

Recorded 1996

A biography of Berners appeared in 1998 (Chatto & Windus). Unfortunately the emphasis on his eccentricity caused several uninformed reviewers to regard that as the main thing rather than his music – a problem Satie understood. The present release is the complete version of Berners's first ballet, The Triumph of Neptune, so it breaks new ground and unlike the Suite (Beecham recorded it twice – his second version is on Sony), where the numbers were reordered, it allows us to follow the original sequence of dances. The Triumph of Neptune is certainly Berners' best-known orchestral work, and the Suite scintillates with the infectious enjoyment of all his theatre scores. It is well worth having the full version now, even if some of the scoring sounds heavy and the orchestral playing is not always as clean as it should be.

L'uomo dai baffi ('The man with a moustache') was a ballet for puppets put on in Rome, where Berners lived, in 1918. It looks as if his friend and colleague, Alfredo Casella, may have scored five of Berners's early piano pieces for chamber group and so Philip Lane has added the remaining two. This makes a convincing set and brings these established documents of avant-garde piano music into another medium. Lane has also orchestrated the only one of Berners's three sets of piano duets he didn't score himself – the enchanting Valses bourgeoises of 1919 – and a solo piece, the Polka. It is a joy to hear these old favourites in full orchestral colour and Lane has done an excellent job. These performances with the Royal Ballet Sinfonia are some of the most lively on the CD.

Songs • Solo piano works

Polka. Le poisson d'or. Dispute entre le papillon et le crapaud. Trois petites marches funèbres. Fragments psychologiques. March. The expulsion from Paradise. Valse. Lieder Album[a]. Trois chansons[a]. Three English Songs[a]. Dialogue between Tom Filuter and his man by Ned the Dog Stealer[a]. Three Songs[a]. Red Roses and Red Noses[a]. Come on Algernon[a]

[a]Ian Partridge ten Len Vorster pf

Marco Polo 8 225159 (52 minutes: DDD)

Texts and translations included Ⓕ

Recorded 1998

The minuscule, dejected, lovelorn Le poisson d'or, based on Lord Berners' own poem, has a distant Debussian inheritance, while the Trois petites marches and Fragments psychologiques are Satie-esque, and not just for their bizarre titles. Yet they, too, have a distinct avant-garde precocity, and 'Un soupir' (the third of the Fragments) brings a pensive dolour all its own. Berners' sense of fun erupts in the simulated German Lieder Album (the seriousness underpinned with a twinkle), and the French Trois chansons are naturally idiomatic, with 'La fiancée du timbalier' engagingly light-hearted. The English songs are most winning. Tom Filuter's dialogue changes mood chimerically, and the Three Songs of 1921 are like a rediscovery of the English folksong idiom, while the sentimental Red Roses and Red Noses has an endearingly flowing lyrical line. It is followed by the irrepressible Come on Algernon, about the insatiable Daisy, who always 'asked for more!', a perfect music-hall number, written for the film Champagne Charlie. It makes a delightful pay-off to end the recital.

Ian Partridge obviously relishes all of the stylistic changes like a vocal chameleon, while Len Vorster backs him up splendidly and is completely at home in the solo piano music. Berners' vignettes ought to be featured more often in recital programmes.

Le carrosse du Saint-Sacrement

Le carrosse du Saint-Sacrement[a]. Fanfare[b]

Caprice péruvien[c]

[a]Ian Caddy bass Viceroy; [a]Alexander Oliver ten Martinez; [a]John Winfield ten Balthasar; [a]Cynthia

Buchan mez La Périchole; [a]Thomas Lawlor bar Thomas d'Esquivel; [a]Anthony Smith bass Bishop of Lima; [a]BBC Scottish Symphony Orchestra / Nicholas Cleobury; [b]Royal Ballet Sinfonia / Gavin Sutherland; [c]RTE Sinfonietta / David Lloyd-Jones
Marco Polo 8 225155 (79 minutes: DDD)
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded [a]1983, [c]1995 and [b]1999 Ⓕ

With Berners' biography now in its second edition it was high time to add Berners' one-act opera to the catalogue, neglected from its 1924 Paris première under Ansermet until the BBC Radio 3 revival in 1983, which is issued here for the first time.

The libretto is adapted from a short story by Mérimée, also used in Offenbach's La Périchole. Berners' attractive score has his fingerprints such as the rhythms of his cynical 'Funeral March for a Rich Aunt' and Spanish effects, daringly close to Chabrier (track 6), to suit the Peruvian setting. The leading lady, La Périchole, is a young actress carrying on with the jealous, gout-ridden Viceroy. Their extended duet in Scene 4 develops as a fascinating alliance of scoundrels. At the end of it, she prises the Viceroy's brand-new coach out of him so that she can parade in it to the cathedral and eclipse her rivals in Lima. After a spectacular ride, including a collision, she upstages everyone by giving the carriage to the church to take the sacrament to the dying.

Chris de Souza's excellent radio production used a translation by Adam Pollock of the French libretto. The diction of all the characters is clear: everyone is well cast, especially Cynthia Buchan and Ian Caddy. The Caprice péruvien is a later compilation based on music from the opera. Both orchestras are adequate, decently recorded, but above all Le carrosse is an enchanting discovery in British comic opera.

Leonard Bernstein American 1918-1990

GROVE Bernstein studied at Harvard and the Curtis Institute and was a protégé of Koussevitzky. In 1944 he made his reputation as a conductor when he stepped in when Bruno Walter was ill; thereafter he was associated particularly with the Israel PO (from 1947), the Boston SO and the New York PO (musical director, 1958-69), soon achieving an international reputation, conducting in Vienna and at La Scala. During his tenure the New York PO flourished as never before. A gifted pianist, he often performed simultaneously as soloist and conductor. At the same time, he pursued a career as a composer, cutting across the boundaries between high and popular culture in his mixing of Mahler and Broadway, Copland and Bach. His theatre works are mostly in the Broadway manner: they include the ballet Fancy Free (1944) and the musicals Candide (1956) and West Side Story (1957). His more ambitious works, many of them couched in a richly chromatic, intense post-Mahlerian idiom, often have a religious inspiration, for example the 'Jeremiah' Symphony with mezzo (1942), 'Kaddish', with soloists and choirs (1963) and the theatre piece Mass (1971).

Fancy Free

Candide – Overture. West Side Story – Symphonic Dances. On the Waterfront – Symphonic Suite. Fancy Free
New York Philharmonic Orchestra / Leonard Bernstein
Sony Classical Bernstein Century SMK63085 Ⓜ
(69 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1960-63 OO

These performances have long been considered definitive. All but Fancy Free were taped in New York's Manhattan Center in the early 1960s, a problematic venue in which the original sound engineers sought to reconcile the close-miking of individual sections and sometimes individual players with a substantial reverberation period. The results have a synthetic, larger-than-life quality which suits most of the music here. The exception is the Overture to Candide, a more driven sort of reading, the brashness of Broadway insufficiently tempered by the rapid figurations of Rossini, the academicism of Brahms, the joie de vivre of Offenbach: subtler details tend to disappear into a fog of resonance. In the Symphonic Dances from West Side Story, the players eschew the customary shouts in the 'Mambo' but it is doubtful whether there will ever be a more idiomatic reading of what was then essentially 'new music'. The score, by no means a straightforward 'greatest hits' selection, had only recently been unveiled, with Lukas Foss conducting, at a gala concert intended to raise funds for the New York Philharmonic pension fund. Here certainly was the 'aura of show business' which so irked Harold Schonberg, the influential music critic of the New York Times: Bernstein's own recording from March 6th has the quality of an unanswerable rejoinder. On the Waterfront is if anything even more intense, its lyrical core dispatched with an overwhelming ardour. Last up is what is almost the best of all possible Fancy Frees. It was originally sung in inimitable style by Billie Holiday.

Symphony No 2, 'The Age of Anxiety'

Bernstein Symphony No 2, 'The Age of Anxiety'
Bolcom Piano Concerto
Marc-André Hamelin pf
Ulster Orchestra / Dimitry Sitkovetsky
Hyperion CDA67170 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000

After Hamelin's fantastic virtuosity in the outrageously difficult Godowsky Studies on Chopin's Etudes (for which he won the Gramophone Instrumental Award 2000) these two works for piano and orchestra are – for him – mere bagatelles. But this is an impressive release since it contains the most convincing account of Bernstein's Symphony No 2 (1949) in recent years, benefiting from a richer sound than Kahane under Litton.

The whole piece is Bernstein's obsessive response to Auden's poem The Age of Anxiety, published the year before, about four characters struggling to sort themselves out in New York City. Even though Auden apparently disliked it, you can increasingly hear Bernstein's Symphony as saturated with the poem, its ideas and atmosphere. Often programmatic, it represents a particularly original approach to piano and orchestra and is personal in countless ways – the gentleness of the soft opening and its mystical descending scale, the precisely engineered variations, memorable tunes, a splendid jazzy Scherzo and so on. Hamelin and the Ulster Orchestra in fine form under Sitkovetsky deliver a well-paced and cogent performance right up to the deliberately inflated, optimistic ending.

Bolcom is one of the most idiosyncratic American composers of the next generation. His 1976 Piano Concerto draws widely on various types of popular music, which he has always performed so superbly. The Concerto was written in memory of Bolcom's teacher, Milhaud, who would have loved it. The opening movement is captivatingly serene until the blue notes get out of hand; the slow movement is more stable and serious; but the finale comes over as a riotous celebration of Americana. Unfortunately Bolcom intended it to be ironic as a kind of anti-bicentennial tribute. But tunes like these have a habit of occupying centre stage on their own terms. Hamelin is again utterly scrupulous and idiomatic and delivers all the musical styles with supreme confidence – nobody could have mixed them up like Bolcom.

Chichester Psalms

Chichester Psalms^{a}. Symphony No 1, 'Jeremiah'^{b}
Symphony No 2, 'The Age of Anxiety'^{c}
^{b}Christa Ludwig sop ^{c}Lukas Foss pf
^{a}Vienna Jeunesse Choir; ^{abc}Israel Philharmonic Orchestra / Leonard Bernstein
DG The Originals 457 757-2 (ADD) Ⓜ
Texts included. Recorded 1977

The psalms concerned here are equally part of Jewish and Christian tradition. If elsewhere Bernstein the prophet may sometimes have been the enemy of Bernstein the composer, then he is no longer here. The burning intensity of the music here finds its natural voice – it's also a marvellously rewarding one. The soloists – piano, soprano, boy treble, speaker – could hardly be bettered; the choral singing is strong; and the recording is of the very best, keeping the diverse forces in excellent balance. In the end only music is the truly universal language; it is one that Bernstein speaks very movingly.

The two symphonies form a very useful and equally well-played coupling. Highly recommended, particularly at this price.

Bernstein Chichester Psalms Barber Agnus Dei, Op 11 Copland In the Beginning. Four Motets – Help us, O Lord; Have mercy on us, O my Lord; Sing ye praises to our King
Dominic Martelli treb Catherine Denley mez
Rachel Masters hp Gary Kettel perc
Thomas Trotter org
Corydon Singers / Matthew Best
Hyperion CDA66219 (54 minutes). Texts included Ⓕ
Recorded 1986

Half of this programme is devoted to unaccompanied choral music by Copland: In the Beginning, a striking 15-minute 'Creation' for mixed four-part chorus and solo mezzo (which is eloquently executed by Catherine Denley) written in 1947, and three of four short motets he composed in 1921, while studying with Nadia Boulanger in Paris. The performance of the Chichester Psalms recorded here uses Bernstein's own reduced (but very effective) instrumentation of organ, harp and percussion, but follows the composer's New York precedent in employing a mixed chorus – although the illusion of a cathedral choir is persuasively conveyed. It is very impressive.

The singing of the Corydon Singers under Matthew Best is very fine, and the vivid recording, which gives the voices a pleasant bloom while avoiding the resonance of King's College Chapel, reproduces the instrumental accompaniment, notably the percussion, with electrifying impact.

Best's soloist is Dominic Martelli, and very sweetly he sings too. The disc is completed by Barber's setting of the Agnus Dei from 1967 and is an arrangement of the famous Adagio for Strings which made his name when Toscanini performed it in New York in 1938.

This is an imaginative and enterprising programme, extremely well sung and vividly recorded.

Candide (1988 final version)

Awards 1992

Jerry Hadley ten Candide; June Anderson sop Cunegonde; Adolph Green ten Dr Pangloss, Martin; Christa Ludwig mez Old lady; Nicolai Gedda ten Governor, Vanderdendur, Ragotski; Della Jones mez Paquette; Kurt Ollmann bar Maximilian, Captain, Jesuit father; Neil Jenkins ten Merchant, Inquisitor, Prince Charles Edward; Richard Suart bass Junkman, Inquisitor, King Hermann Augustus; John Treleaven ten Alchemist, Inquisitor, Sultan Achmet, Crook; Lindsay Benson bar Doctor, Inquisitor, King Stanislaus; Clive Bayley bar Bear-Keeper, Inquisitor, Tsar Ivan
London Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Leonard Bernstein
DG ② 429 734-2GH2 (112 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes and text included. Recorded 1989 ○○○

Here it is – all of it – musical comedy, grand opera, operetta, satire, melodrama, all rolled into one. We can thank John Mauceri for much of the restoration work: his 1988 Scottish Opera production was the spur for this recording and prompted exhaustive reappraisal. Numbers like 'We Are Women', 'Martin's Laughing Song' and 'Nothing More Than This' have rarely been heard, if at all. The last mentioned, Candide's 'aria of disillusionment', is one of the enduring glories of the score, reinstated where Bernstein always wanted it (but where no producer would have it), near the very end of the show. Bernstein called it his 'Puccini aria', and that it is – bittersweet, long-breathed, supported, enriched and ennobled by its inspiring string counterpoint. And this is but one of many forgotten gems.

It was an inspiration on someone's part (probably Bernstein's) to persuade the great and versatile Christa Ludwig and Nicolai Gedda (in his sixties and still hurling out top Bs) to fill the principal character roles. To say they do so ripely is to do them scant justice. Bernstein's old sparring partner Adolph Green braves the tongue-twisting and many-hatted Dr Pangloss with his own highly individual form of Sprechstimme, Jerry Hadley sings the title role most beautifully, con amore, and June Anderson has all the notes, and more, for the faithless, air-headed Cunegonde. It is just a pity that someone didn't tell her that discretion is the better part of comedy. 'Glitter and Be Gay' is much funnier for being played straighter, odd as it may sound. Otherwise, the supporting roles are all well taken and the London Symphony Chorus has a field-day in each of its collective guises.

Having waited so long to commit every last note (or thereabouts) of his cherished score to disc, there are moments here where Bernstein seems almost reluctant to move on. His tempos are measured, to say the least, the score fleshier now in every respect: even that raciest of Overtures has now acquired a more deliberate gait, a more opulent tone. But Bernstein would be Bernstein, and there are moments where one is more than grateful for his indulgence: the grandiose chorales, the panoramic orchestra-scapes (sumptuously recorded), and of course, that thrilling finale – the best of all possible Bernstein anthems at the slowest of all possible speeds – and why not (prepare to hold your breath at the choral a cappella). You are unlikely to be disappointed by this disc.

West Side Story

Dame Kiri Te Kanawa sop Maria (Nina Bernstein); José Carreras ten Tony (Alexander Bernstein); Tatiana Troyanos mez Anita; Kurt Ollmann bar Riff; Marilyn Horne mez Off-stage voice; composite chorus and orchestra from 'on and off' Broadway / Leonard Bernstein
DG 457 199-2GH (77 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Notes and texts included. Recorded 1984 ●●

If the job of a 'crossover' record is to shatter preconceptions on both sides of any musical fence, then this is the greatest ever. Not all the aficionados of Broadway musicals are going to warm to de facto operatic treatment of West Side Story: not all opera-lovers or devotees of Bernstein as star-conductor are going to rate West Side Story as an equivalent to opera. But any listener who keeps any sort of open mind, forgetting the constriction of barriers, must recognise this historic disc as superb entertainment and great music-making on every level, with an emotional impact closely akin to that of a Puccini opera. That of course is the doing of Leonard Bernstein as conductor as well as composer. It is astonishing that before this recording he had never conducted his most famous work.

Dame Kiri Te Kanawa may not be a soprano one would cast as Maria on stage, yet the beauty of the voice, its combination of richness, delicacy and purity, brings out the musical strengths of Bernstein's inspiration. Similarly, with José Carreras as Tony, it is self-evident to point out how such a voice brings out the pure beauty of the big melodies like 'Maria' or 'Tonight', but even a sharp number like his first solo, 'Something's coming', with floated pianissimos and subtly-graded crescendos allied to sharp rhythms, makes it more clearly a question-mark song, full of expectation, more than just a point number. Marilyn Horne is in glorious voice, while Tatiana Troyanos will surprise you as Anita with the way she could switch her naturally beautiful operatic voice into a New York throaty snarl. Troyanos, it appears, was brought up in exactly the area of the West Side, where the story is supposed to be set, which makes her natural affinity with the idiom less surprising. Kurt Ollmann, American too, as Riff equally finds a very confident balance between the traditions of opera and those of the musical. Diction may not always be so clear as with less rich-toned singers, but Carreras manages a very passable American accent and Dame Kiri a creditable Spanish-American one. The speed with which the piece moves is astounding, not just as superb entertainment but as a Shakespearean tragedy modernised and intensified.

West Side Story
Tinuke Olafimihan Maria; Paul Manuel Tony; Caroline O'Connor Anita; Sally Burgess Off-stage voice; Nicholas Warnford Riff; Julie Paton Rosalia; Elinor Stephenson Consuela; Nicole Carty Francisca; Kieran Daniels Action; Mark Michaels Diesel; Adrian Sarple Baby John; Adrian Edmeads A-rab; Garry Stevens Snowboy; Nick Ferranti Bernardo Chorus and National Symphony Orchestra / John Owen Edwards
TER ② CDTER2 1197 (101 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1993

This recording of West Side Story is something of an achievement. The set starts with the major advantage of being inspired by a production at the Haymarket, Leicester, so that many of the cast are really inside their roles. They have youth on their side, too. Paul Manuel from that company may not have a large voice, but his sympathetic portrayal of Tony, both in his solos and duets with Maria, makes one feel that he identifies totally with the part. Moreover, the way in which he can float a high note, as at the end of the alternative film version of 'Something's Coming' puts him on a par with Carreras (for Bernstein). His Maria, Tinuke Olafimihan, is a gem. Her ability to interact with him and express the laughter and the tragedy of the heroine is very real. At the heart of the 'Somewhere' ballet, Sally Burgess voices the lovers' plea for peace with a magnificent rendition of its famous soaring tune. Nicholas Warnford as leader of the Jets gives no less than his rival in the tricky 'Cool' sequence and Jet song. John Owen Edwards directs Bernstein's score as if he believes in every note. He has imparted to his players the very pulse that sets this music ticking.

Wonderful Town

Kim Criswell sop Ruth; Audra McDonald sop Eileen; Thomas Hampson bar Baker; Brent Barrett sngr Wreck; Rodney Gilfry bar Guide, First Editor, Frank; Carl Daymond bar Second Editor, Chick Clark; Timothy Robinson ten Lonigan; Michael Dore bass First Man, Cadet, Third Cop, Villager; Lynton Atkinson ten Second Man, Second Cop; Simone Sauphanor sngr First Girl; Melanie Marshall mez Second Girl; Kimberly Cobb sngr Violet; Robert Fardell sngr First Cop
London Voices; Birmingham Contemporary Music Group / Sir Simon Rattle
EMI 556753-2 (67 minutes: DDD). ℗
Notes and text included. Recorded 1996-98 OO

The Birmingham Contemporary Music Group, with key brass and sax personnel bumped in from the West End, play the Overture with great attitude, trumpets with the throttle full out and a bevy of saxes licking everyone into shape. Check out the Original Cast album (on Sony) and you'll find it's faster, tighter – not much, but enough to sound like NYC in the fast lane; crude and sassy with plenty of grime in the mix. Accept the fact that Rattle's is a pristine Wonderful Town, temporarily divorced from its smart book (Joseph Fields and Jerome Chodorov), out of context, and, to some extent, out of its element, and you'll have a good time. No one in the Original Broadway Cast can come within spitting distance of the vocal talent assembled here. Kim Criswell's Ruth has to live with Rosalind Russell's keys – in the bass-baritone range. Where Russell had about three notes in her voice – all dubious – Criswell has them all but doesn't have too much occasion to use them. So she works the lyric of 'One Hundred Easy Ways' a little harder than Russell – a piranha to Russell's shark. Audra McDonald as Sister Eileen uses every part of her versatile voice, wrapping it round a lyric like the two are inseparable, and sings 'A Little Bit in Love' with such contentment that it's as if she's giving herself a big, well-deserved hug. It's a gorgeous voice and the microphone loves her. It loves Hampson, too, and though he will never quite erradicate the 'formality' from his delivery he's rarely sounded quite so unassuming as here imagining his 'Quiet Girl'.

Of the big set-pieces, 'Conversation Piece' sounds as if it could have been lifted from a performance of the show. When the village kids get in on the action that's quite a stretch for Simon Halsey's London Voices. Now and again you catch their English choral tradition, but not long enough for it to get in the way. 'Conga!' sounds sufficiently inebriated and they sound right at home on 'Christopher Street'. You get slightly more Wonderful Town for your money with Rattle (a couple of reprises for a start). Don Walker's feisty orchestrations get more of an airing with the addition of 'Conquering New York', a dance number which demonstrates how ready Lenny was to raid his bottom drawer by reusing Prelude, Fugue and Riffs.

Franz Adolf Berwald

Swedish 1796-1868

GROVE Swedish composer and violinist Berwald is the most individual and commanding musical personality Sweden has produced. He was the son of CFG Berwald (1740-1825), a violinist of German birth who studied with F. Benda and played in the Stockholm court orchestra. Franz was a violinist or violist in the orchestra (1812-28) and probably studied composition with its conductor, JBE Dupuy. He disowned all his early works, which in their bold modulations show Spohr's influence, except a Serenade for tenor and six instruments (1825) and the fine Septet (?1828). He cherished operatic ambitions but failed to stir much interest in any of his works except Estrella de Soria (1841, performed 1862); The Queen of Golconda was not staged until 1968. In fact he was never properly recognized in his own country.

He made his greatest contribution to the repertory in his orchestral compositions of the 1840s, above all the four symphonies: the Sinfonie singulière (1845) is the most original, but all share vigorous freshness, formal originality (he sometimes used cyclic forms) and warm harmony and textures, especially in slow movements. His chamber works (two piano quintets, four piano trios and two string quartets), which occupied his main attention from 1849 to 1859, are often Mendelssohnian in style and show real command of form and idiom. Berwald pursued several business interests (he ran an orthopedic institute, a glassworks and a sawmill) and was active as a polemical writer on social issues from 1856. Although he was made professor of composition at the Swedish Royal Academy in 1867, the discovery of his work was a 20th-century phenomenon. His brother August (1798-1869) was also a violinist and composer, and a granddaughter, Astrid, a leading Swedish pianist.

Symphonies

Symphonies – No 1 in G minor, 'Sinfonie sérieuse'; No 2 in D, 'Sinfonie capricieuse'; No 3 in C, 'Sinfonie singulière'; No 4 in E flat. Konzertstück for Bassoon and Orchestra
Christian Davidsson bn Malmö Symphony Orchestra / Sixten Ehrling
BIS ② CD795/6 (131 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●

As one would expect, given Sixten Ehrling's excellent account of the Singulière and the E flat Symphonies with the LSO for Decca way back in the late 1960s and his no less impressive 1970 Swedish Radio version of the Sérieuse, the performances are echt-Berwald. Ehrling gives us plenty of space without ever lingering too lovingly. Even apart from the tempo giusto, one feels rather more comfortable with Ehrling's handling of phrasing and balance. He is very attentive to dynamic markings and sometimes, as at the beginning of the Sinfonie singulière, pianissimo becomes pianopiano-pianissimo! The recording reproduces these dynamic extremes flawlessly.

The Malmö Concert Hall where this set was made has a good acoustic and the recordings are generally excellent, though there seems to be more back-to-front perspective and air around the players in the Singulière and E flat Symphonies than in the Sérieuse. On the whole, the recording is truthful and vivid, and the soloist in the Konzertstück is excellently balanced. In short, Ehrling and his fine players bring us closer to the spirit of this music than do any of the current rivals.

Chamber works

Piano Trio No 2 in F minor. Quartet for Piano and Wind in E flat. Grand Septet in B flat
Gaudier Ensemble (Richard Hosford cl Robin O'Neill bn Jonathan Williams hn Marieke Blankestijn vn Iris Juda va Christoph Marks vc Stephen Williams db Susan Tomes pf)
Hyperion CDA66834 (67 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

The Septet is innovative and anticipates the Sinfonie singulière, in enfolding the Scherzo into the body of the slow movement, and its invention is delightfully fresh. The Gaudier Ensemble brings elegance and finesse not only to the Septet but also to its companions. The early E flat Quartet for piano and wind of 1819 is more conventional in its formal layout and is musically less interesting, but there are also touches of that intelligence and wit that illumine all Berwald's music and the piece shines in the Gaudier's hands.

The much later F minor Piano Trio of 1851 is more substantial and an unqualified delight. The writing is full of original touches and rhythmic vitality. Its placid surface is disturbed by all sorts of characteristic flourishes: in the theme of the slow movement there is one of the sudden and unexpected modulations for which Berwald's contemporaries were always berating him. Susan Tomes handles the demanding piano part with exemplary skill and taste. It is all hugely enjoyable and well recorded too.

Heinrich Biber Bohemian 1644-1704

Biber is important for his works for the violin, of which he was a virtuoso. In the mid-1660s he entered the service of the Prince-Bishop of Olomouc who maintained an excellent Kapelle at his Kromeríž castle. By 1670 Biber had moved to the Salzburg court Kapelle, becoming Kapellmeister in 1684. His formidable violin technique is best seen in the eight Sonatae violino solo with continuo (1681), where brilliant passage-work (reaching 6th and 7th positions) and multiple stopping abound in the preludes, variations and elaborate finales. Most of the Mystery (or Rosary) Sonatas (c1676, for violin and bass) require scordatura tuning: by linking the open strings to the key the sonority and polyphonic possibilities of the violin were increased. The unaccompanied Passacaglia here, built on 65 repetitions of the descending tetrachord, is the outstanding work of its type before Bach. Besides other violin works (which include a Battalia, with strings and continuo), Biber composed sacred music (in a cappella style as well as large-scale concertato works for solo and ripieno voices), 15 school dramas, three operas (only Chi la dura la vince, 1687, survives) and much instrumental ensemble music (often for unusual combinations including brass). Especially notable are the Requiem in F minor, the Missa Sancti Henrici (1701), the 32-part Vesperae (1693), the motet Laetatus sum (1676), and the Sonata S Polycarpi for eight trumpets and timpani. Biber may have composed the 53-part Missa salisburgensis (1628) formerly attributed to Benevoli.

Balletti

Arias a 4 in A. Ballettae a 4 violettae. Balletti a 6 in C. Balletti lamentabili a 4 in E minor. Harmonia Romana. Trombet undt musicalischer Taffeldienst
Ars Antiqua Austria / Gunar Letzbor vn
Symphonia SY95143 (75 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

The Baroque palace of Kremsier was the summer residence of Prince-Bishop Karl Liechtenstein-Kastelkorn of Olmütz. He was an ardent music lover and during his rule, which lasted from 1664 to 1695, the palace library acquired what is now recognized as a precious collection of manuscripts. This programme features some of the ensemble music by Biber from the Kremsier source, though the authenticity of the Harmonia Romana anthology, some of whose dances are on the disc, has not been established. Never mind, the sequence put together by violinist and director, Gunar

Letzbor, is entertaining and very well executed. Most of it is for strings but there are contributions from variously sized recorders, too, as well as some splendidly gruff, earthy and inebriate interjections from bass, Michael Oman, as the Nightwatchman.

Letzbor has built his programme around an idea of a Carnival Feast at the Bishop's court. It goes something like this: the Bishop enters to a fanfare – dance music greets the guests – a nightwatchman passes by – table music during dinner – dancing – the nightwatchman passes by once more, this time drunk – peasant dancing – midnight, the end of Carnival and the beginning of Lent. The revelry is concluded by the 12 strokes of midnight sounded on what sounds like a school bell. The notion comes off well, for Letzbor's scheme allows for a degree of musical contrast, both of sound and, above all, of mood. Biber's dances are enchanting for the fullness of their character and for their rhythmic bite, and Ars Antiqua bring them to life with vigour, imagination and style. In short, the group offers us well over an hour of first-class entertainment in which only the Bishop's festive board and the contents of his cellar are not shared with us. The disc is superbly recorded, too.

Battalia a 10 in D

Biber Battalia a 10 in D[c]. Passacaglia in C minor[a]. 🄿
Sonata violino solo representativa in A[c]. Harmonia artificiosa – Partita in C minor[c] Locke Canon 4 in 2[c]. The Tempest[c] Zelenka Fanfare in D[b]
[a]Luca Pianca lte [b]Innsbruck Trumpet Consort;
[c]Il Giardino Armonico / Giovanni Antonini rec
Teldec 3984-21464-2 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●●

Biber's Battalia has arguably become the most celebrated programmatic suite of the 17th century with its easy Bohemian juxtaposition of poignant airs and almost choreographic stage music. Too often we hear each implicit detail exaggerated to death; here, Il Giardino Armonico conveys each movement within the bounds of courtly decorum. The group's leader, Enrico Onofri, provides a memorable and effective gimmick in the March as he walks from right to left and disappears into the distance. His playing in the Sonata violono solo representativa is impressive and acutely characterised: the Cuckoo is positively charming, the Frog leaps in a spontaneous counterpoint of improvised special effects and the Hen and the Cock fly by the seats of their pants with a stirring full-throttled sound and thrilling technical precision. Such qualities are also apparent in the remarkable Harmonia artificiosa of 1696. Composed for two violas d'amore, this is a beguiling work. Il Giardino Armonico generate a ringing, almost orchestral palette – darkened by a tenor chalumeau – upon which float these soft-grained viole. Less agreeable is the Allemande which is fussily handled and never quite allowed to bed down into its natural harmonic rhythm; the 'Aria variata' that ends the suite has reflective sobriety nonchalantly sacrificed for Mediterranean effervescence. This is both the strength and weakness of Il Giardino in northern and central European repertoire, exemplified in Locke's music for The Tempest, from which a majestic orchestral suite can be wrought. The musical ideas are impressive, but too often miscast with ill-suited outbursts imposed on such temperate dances. Overall though, this is a dynamic and distinctive programme with some brilliant performances.

Violin Sonatas

Eight Sonatas for Violin and Continuo 🄿
(1681). Sonata violino solo representativa in A. Sonata, 'La Pastorella'.
Passacaglia for Solo Lute. Mystery Sonatas – Passacaglia in G minor
Romanesca (Andrew Manze vn Nigel North lte/theorbo John Toll hpd/org)
Harmonia Mundi ② HMX290 7344/45 Ⓜ
(127 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1993-94 ●●●

While the more famous Mystery Sonatas have quickly found friends, the 1681 set is still largely unknown. Yet what is immediately noticeable from this première recording of the sonatas is that Biber is not only a legendary virtuoso, probably never bettered in the 17th or 18th centuries, but one of the most inventive composers of his age: bold and exciting, certainly but also elusive, mercurial and mysterious. The majority of the works comprise preludes, arias and variations of an unregulated nature: improvisatory preludes over naked pedals and lucid arias juxtaposing with eccentric rhetorical conceits are mixed up in an unpredictable phantasm of contrast, and yet at its best it all adds up to a unified structure of considerable potency. Andrew Manze is the protagonist par excellence for music which requires a considered response to complement the adventurous spirit of the virtuoso. In short, this is masterful playing in which Manze has the confidence not to overcharacterize Biber's volatile temperament. Hence the preludes are sweet and restrained, yet there is also a held-back, almost smouldering quality, which is skilfully pitched against the free-wheeling energy of the fast music.

Eight Sonatas for Violin and Continuo – Nos 3, 4, 6-7
Sonata No 81 in A. Sonata No 84 in E
John Holloway vn Aloysia Assenbaum org
Lars Ulrik Mortensen hpd
ECM New Series 472 084-2 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●●●

Virtuosic, experimental, meditative, Biber was a man who seems to have been able to say whatever he liked through the medium of his instrument, and Holloway has contributed as much as anyone to modern-day recognition of his status as one of the greatest of all violinist-composers.

In his notes he draws attention to the difference in character between the sonatas in normal tuning and those in which Biber asks for scordatura or altered tunings, citing the latter (Nos 4 and 6 from the published set) as 'more intimate, more personal'. But actually this is the side which comes across most strongly in these performances anyway, at the expense of the extrovert maybe, but with no shortage of effective musical moments nevertheless; the point halfway through the Sixth Sonata when the violin re-emerges retuned and with a veiled new sound is managed with ghostly beauty.

With the violin resonating pleasingly through the many double and triple-stoppings, and Holloway's bowing demonstrating a delicious lightness and freedom, these fundamentally inward, tonally aware performances also seem somehow to have more of the smell of the 17th century about them than their current rivals (including Andrew Manze, reviewed above),which push the violin's sound out a bit more. A respectfully resonant recording is a help here, as is the gentle but effectively unfussy continuo support of harpsichord and organ.

Anyone who already has the Manze need have no qualms about adding this one to their collection.

Awards 2002

Violin Sonatas – Nos 2, 3, 5, 7 🅿
Nisi Dominus. Passacaglia[a]
Sonnerie (Monica Huggett vn/dir Emilia Benjamin va da gamba Gary Cooper hpd/org Elizabeth Kenny theo/gtr); [a]Thomas Guthrie bass
ASV Gaudeamus CD GAU 203 Ⓕ
(65 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1999 and 2000 ●●

Monica Huggett's arrival at these marvels of the 17th-century violin repertoire has the authority of a player to the manner born. Huggett has a strong but fluent technique, and produces from her violin a sweet sound at all times, rarely forcing the tone into stridency (as Manze does, for instance in the clashing dissonances of the Variation of Sonata No 5). Rather, her navigation of what Charles Burney, writing in the 1770s, called the 'most difficult and most fanciful music of any I have seen of the period' is characterised, not by Manze's energetic interpretative gestures, but by her own rather aristocratic brand of easy poise and balance, proving that these sonatas can work as pure music, without the need for urgent drama. It is an alternative view of Biber from that of the fiery virtuoso (though virtuosity is certainly needed to achieve it), and rather a seductive one it is, too. Those who find Andrew Manze's fantasies a little over the top may well prefer Huggett's gentler readings; lovers of Biber's music will relish them both.

Sonatae tam aris quam aulis servientes
Rare Fruits Council / Manfredo Kraemer vn
Auvidis Astrée E8630 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

A more radiant and gratifyingly robust collection of Baroque instrumental works would be hard to imagine. These 12 sonatas (which broadly translate as 'sonatas suitable for altar or court') juxtapose pieces for a rich five- or six-part string palette – pursuing an exhilarating, intensely-wrought and unpredictable musical rhetoric – with quasi-concerted and swaggering trumpets. Unlike some of the other printed collections, in which boxes of tricks can sometimes over-prevail, this one comprises highly compelling and accessible music: the satisfying textural surety and tunefulness of Sonata IV is a case in point and so too is the noble ecclesiastical alla breve conclusion to Sonata VI (marvellously shaped here).

The secret for performers is to let the antiquated contrapuntal dance-infused music ring, to allow it to unfold as if each contrasted section meant something greater than its mere existence. The emotive, almost physical impact of Biber in his best colours is lavishly exuded in the Rare Fruits Council's strongly projected account. It takes a glowing, colourful and uncomplicated approach, espousing a textural breadth and rhythmic thrust underpinned by a deep violone (8ft bass), theorbo and harp. The playing is often dazzling here – the trumpet sound is peerless, round and coppery – and the total concept unfussy (though this occasionally applies to tuning also).

Awards 1991

Mystery Sonatas 🅿
John Holloway vn Davitt Moroney org/hpd Tragicomedia (Stephen Stubbs lte/chitarrone Erin Headley va da gamba/ lirone Andrew Lawrence-King hp/regal)
Virgin Classics Veritas ②
562062-2 (131 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1989 ●●●

Biber was among the most talented musicians of the late 17th century. He was a renowned violinist and his compositions, above all for the violin, are technically advanced and strikingly individual. The 15 Mystery Sonatas with their additional Passacaglia for unaccompanied violin were written in about 1678 and dedicated to Biber's employer, the Archbishop of Salzburg. Each Sonata is inspired by a section of the Rosary devotion of the Catholic Church which offered a system of meditation on 15 Mysteries from the lives of Jesus and His mother. The music is not, strictly speaking, programmatic though often vividly illustrative of events which took place in the life of Christ.

All but two of the 16 pieces require scordatura or retuning of the violin strings; in this way Biber not only facilitated some of the fingerings but also achieved sounds otherwise unavailable to him. The Sonatas are disposed into three groups of five: Joyful, Sorrowful and Glorious Mysteries whose contrasting states are affectingly evoked in music ranging from a spirit reflecting South German Baroque exuberance to one of profound contemplation. John Holloway plays with imaginative sensibility and he is supported by a first-rate continuo group whose instruments include Baroque lute, chitarrone, viola da gamba, a 15-string lirone, double harp and regal.

Litaniae de Sancto Josepho

Biber Litaniae de Sancto Josepho. Sonata Sancti Polycarpi. Fidicinium sacro-profanum – Sonata XI 🅿
Bertali Sonata a 13. Sonata Sancti Placidi
Muffat Missa in labore requies
Cantus Cölln; Concerto Palatino / Konrad Junghänel
Harmonia Mundi HMC90 1667 (69 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Texts and translations included.Recorded 1998

The mainstays here are two substantial works probably composed for special feasts in the luxurious recesses of Salzburg Cathedral during the 1670s and 1680s. Both are rarities to the catalogue. Biber's Litaniae de Sancto Josepho were written in 1677 for the founding of the Fraternity of St Joseph, a well-heeled group of local worthies, by all accounts. Textural imagination is built around contrasted solo and tutti vocal dispositions emboldened by trumpet obbligatos. Cantus Cölln and the pre-eminent cornett and sackbutters, Concerto Palatino, are plainly in their element, blazing a thrilling trail of dynamic declamation, yet the seamless shaping in the solo litany, 'present at Nativity and servant of Christ', provides the essential lyrical contrast to extended and full-throttled opulence.

Muffat's 24-part Mass of multiphonic strings, cornetts, trombones and trumpets perhaps hangs less convincingly, both as a work and in performance. The Mass was long thought to have been written by another (it is Muffat's only surviving vocal work) but the 'Et incarnatus' has the hallmark of the composer's control of harmonic direction and tightly wrought inner-part writing. The 'Crucifixus' is really extraordinary, almost Viennese at the end of the next century (Haydn actually owned the autograph for a while). As with so much 17th-century innovation, one wishes that it went on for a little longer. Once again, the performances here want for little. The fragrant instrumental pieces relieve the danger of homogeneous overkill and leave the listener relishing the next irresistible mosaic.

Missa Bruxellensis

Missa Bruxellensis 🅿
La Capella Reial de Catalunya; Le Concert des Nations / Jordi Savall
Alia Vox AV9808 (52 minutes: DDD). Text included Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●●

Modern technology and expert engineering allow us to bask in Biber's magnificent-sounding and spaciously conceived masses, complete with all the glistening attention to detail, the visceral tutti impact and the delicate textural contrasts which constitute some of Baroque music's most opulent expressions of earthly potency. Salzburg Cathedral provided exceptional acoustical possibilities. Biber, in his Missa Bruxellensis, could satisfy the potentate by adorning the unique status of Salzburg as the court with everything. The problem, however, with Missa Bruxellensis – so called since it was discovered in Brussels – is that it appears to serve its purpose more as a professional job than as a vehicle for extended inspiration. Even so, a world première recording of a monumental work by a major composer is not to be sniffed at, especially when directed by Jordi Savall. He lets Biber's score roll out unassumingly; even if at the expense of fine tuning and exacting ensemble, the final sections of the Credo are immensely stylish, and the 'Miserere' from the Gloria has the dignity of a spontaneous event rather than a contrived vignette. The recorded sound has a mixed success, taken from sessions held in the original location; there is a natural sense of the cathedral acoustic, though not, happily, at the expense of immediacy in the solo sections. Less satisfactory are the strident upper frequencies, in particular the solo sopranos. Gripes aside, this will delight collectors who relish fortress-like recordings.

Gilles Binchois French c1400-1460

GROVE Binchois was one of the three leading musical figures of the first half of the 15th century (with Dufay and Dunstable). Organist at Ste Waudru, Mons, from 1419, he was granted permission to move to Lille in 1423 and apparently entered the service of William Pole, Earl of Suffolk, soon after. Later in the 1420s he joined the Burgundian court chapel where he was much honoured and appointed a secretary to the court (c1437). He held prebends in Bruges, Mons, Cassel and Soignies, where he finally retired; there he was appointed provost of the collegiate church of St Vincent (1452), though he continued to receive a pension from the Burgundian court.

Although Binchois name was mentioned in contemporary literature only alongside Dufay's, his works had a more independent reputation and, though less widely circulated than Dufay's, were very popular. Six of his songs survive in keyboard arrangements; tenor lines of two or three were used to make basse danses, and numerous compositions from the mid- and late 15th century, including three mass cycles (Ockeghem's Missa 'De plus en plus', Bedyngham's Missa 'Dueil angoisseux' and the anonymous mass-motet cycle 'Esclave puist il devenir'), were based on his works. The fact that many of his compositions survive in only one source, and that most of those were compiled in southern Europe, far from the Burgundian court, suggests that much of his work may be lost or survive only anonymously. His songs, mostly rondeaux, remain within the conventions of refined courtly tradition. They are nearly all for a single-texted upper voice supported by an untexted tenor in longer notes a fifth lower in range and a contratenor in the same range or a little lower. They are characterized by effortless, graceful melodies, uncomplicated rhythms and carefully balanced phrases. His sacred music tends to be more conservative. No complete mass cycle by him has survived, though some of the mass movements can be paired on the basis of similarity. He wrote only one isorhythmic motet, and many of his smaller sacred works are purely functional.

Songs

Triste plaisir et douleureuse joie. Amours merchi de restout mon pooir. Je me recommande humblement. En regardant vostre tres doulx maintiens. Se la belle n'a le voloir. Je vous salue. Adieu mes tres belles amours. De plus en plus. Lune tres belles. Les tres doulx yeux. Amoureux suy et me vient toute joye. Adieu, adieu, mon joieulx souvenir. Jamais tant. Adieu, m'amour et ma maistresse. Dueil angoisseus. Pour prison ne pour maladie.
Filles à marier
Ensemble Gilles Binchois / Dominique Vellard ten
Virgin Classics Veritas 545285-2 Ⓕ
(60 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included
Recorded 1996-97 ●

Binchois's songs have rarely appeared in any quantity on CD, yet the booklet-notes to this timely offering set out an objective case for considering Binchois a more significant song composer than his more famous contemporary, Dufay. If one turns to the music, the reasons for Dufay's greater popularity are equally obvious: Binchois's songs yield their secrets more slowly, and operate within a more limited expressive ambit. They demand repeated listening, whereas Dufay's songs tend to make their impact at first hearing. Thus it is all the more important for recordings of Binchois's music to bear repeated listening as well. This one certainly fulfils that requirement, and there is sufficient variety of scoring to sustain interest from song to song. Perhaps the crux of interpreting Binchois is whether to match his fabled restraint in performance, or to coax the songs' expressivity to the surface. Dominique Vellard seems to prefer the former approach, which relies for its effectiveness on the innate vocal qualities of his singers. For the most part, they respond admirably. The special artistry of Lena Susanne Norin is a cause for celebration; Anne-Marie Lablaude's contributions are lighter in tone, but graceful and supple, yet you do wonder whether a more impassioned delivery of the text might not be appropriate – particularly in Dueil angoisseus, surely one of the finest poems set to music in the 15th century. And it continues to be puzzling that certain stanzas are shorn of their text to allow for instrumental participation.

The Binchois discography makes up in quality for what it lacks in quantity, and notwithstanding these reservations, this disc sits comfortably in a distinguished niche of the repertory.

Sir Harrison Birtwistle British 1934

GROVE Birtwistle studied at the Royal Manchester College of Music (1952-55), where Davies and Goehr were fellow students, interesting themselves in contemporary and medieval music. He then worked as a clarinettist and schoolteacher for brief periods; in 1975 he was appointed music director at the National Theatre. His works suggest comparison with Stravinsky in their ritual form and style, and sometimes with Varèse in the violence of their imagery (as in the opera Punch and Judy, 1968, a savage enactment of pre-social behaviour). In the 1970s, however, he began to work musical blocks into long, gradual processes of change (The Triumph of Time for orchestra, 1972), then to develop networks of interconnected pulsings beneath such processes (Silbury Air for small orchestra, 1977; agm for voices and orchestral groups, 1979). His biggest work of this period was the opera The Mask of Orpheus (1973-83, performed 1986), a multi-layered treatment of the myth.

Harrison's Clocks

Joanna MacGregor pf
SoundCircus SC004 (26 minutes: DDD). Ⓜ
Recorded 1998

Even if Harrison Birtwistle was not knowingly named after John Harrison, the 18th-century clockmaker discussed in Dava Sobel's recent best-seller Longitude, his recurrent concern with musical mechanisms whose 'ticking' regularity is the perfect foil for other, much less predictable elements, makes him the ideal composer to celebrate the pioneer of navigational chronometers. The recurring patterns which dominate the first of these five pieces (composed in 1998) are deceptive in that they create a relatively mild-mannered, even static effect, with contrast confined to brief episodes marking the movement's main formal divisions. But if this leads you to expect a sequence of neo-classical toccatas, the explosive fragmentation of the second piece will soon disabuse you, and in the hair-raisingly intense third movement the implacable power of the composer's invention takes the breath away. Joanna MacGregor meets the demands with interest, bringing the music vividly to life, and the recording is excellent. Indispensable.

The Mask of Orpheus

Awards 1998

Jon Garrison ten Orpheus: Man; Peter Bronder ten Orpheus: Myth, Hades; Jean Rigby mez Euridice: Woman; Anne-Marie Owens mez Euridice: Myth, Persephone; Alan Opie bar Aristaeus: Man; Omar Ebrahim bar Aristaeus: Myth, Charon; Marie Angel sop Aristeus: Oracle of the Dead, Hecate; Arwel Huw Morgan bar Caller; Stephen Allen ten Priest, First Judge;

Nicholas Folwell bar Priest, Second Judge; Stephen Richardson bass Priest, Third Judge; Juliet Booth sop Woman, First Fury; Philippa Dames-Longworth sop Woman, Second Fury; Elizabeth McCormack mez Woman, Third Fury; Ian Dearden sound diffusion
BBC Singers; BBC Symphony Orchestra / Sir Andrew Davis, Martyn Brabbins
NMC NMCD050 (three discs: 162 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Notes and text included. Recorded 1996 ●●●

Birtwistle's opera is about the Orpheus myth, but the familiar story has been fragmented. Each of the principal characters is represented by two singers and a (silent) dancer, and much of what happens is not directly described in the libretto. Without following the libretto you will not be able to follow all of what is being sung; at times very little (the text is sometimes broken up; some passages, including much of Act 3, are sung in an invented language). Rituals are often at their most powerful when they appeal to the imagination rather than to reason, and here the sense of ritual is awesomely powerful. It is an extraordinarily patterned opera, with many varied repetitions, all meticulously labelled ('First Structure of Decision', 'Second Time Shift' and so on) in the score. The ritual repetitions, the elaborate patternings and allegorical structures make their own effect. In the boldest of these, the 17 'arches' over which Orpheus passes in his quest for Euridice in Act 2, Birtwistle aids comprehension by quite extensive use of speech. But the music says far more than the sometimes enigmatic words, and the ceremonial retelling of the whole story in Act 3, would perhaps have less impact if the words of the song verses were comprehensible. Birtwistle communicates his refracted but gripping myth with, above all, orchestral colour: an orchestra of wind, percussion and plucked instruments (plus tape, sampler and a small chorus) used with vivid mastery. The sheer sound of this opera is quite haunting and moving. The Mask of Orpheus is a masterpiece, and this performance is fully worthy of it. There are no weak links at all in the extremely fine cast. Although it is unfair to single out any singer for special mention, Jon Garrison's portrayal of Orpheus the Man is outstanding. The recording, direct and pungent but by no means lacking in atmosphere, leaves nothing to be desired.

Pulse Shadows

Pulse Shadows
Claron McFadden sop Arditti Quartet (Irvine Arditti, Graeme Jennings vns Dov Scheindlin va Rohan de Saram vc); Nash Ensemble / Reinbert de Leeuw Ⓕ
Teldec 3984-26867-2
(64 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1999 ●●

From Schoenberg's Pierrot lunaire to Boulez's Le marteau sans maître and Kurtág's Messages of the late RV Troussova, modernist composers have used the medium of voice with mixed instrumental ensemble for their most allusive and personal utterances. Birtwistle's Pulse Shadows (1991-96) belongs in this exalted company. While not easy listening, it deals with some of the most elemental and profound topics in contemporary culture, and this long-awaited recording rises to the score's many challenges, both technically and interpretatively.

Pulse Shadows is subtitled 'Meditations on Paul Celan', acknowledging the poet-author of the texts for the nine vocal movements, and also indicating that the nine movements for string quartet with which the vocal movements are interleaved reflect on – shadow – the emotions that setting Celan (mainly in Michael Hamburger's English translations) created in the composer. Celan's poems are oblique rituals, meditations on the state of human consciousness after the Holocaust, and Birtwistle's music links that quality with the kind of innately melancholic, stoical, intensely humane spirit that informs most of his finest works.

Claron McFadden proves herself the most mellifluous singer of this music. Together with the precision and empathy of the Arditti Quartet and Reinbert de Leeuw, not to mention the admirable recorded sound, this is a disc to live with, and be haunted by, for years to come.

Punch and Judy

Stephen Roberts bar Punch; Jan DeGaetani mez Judy, Fortune-teller; Phyllis Bryn-Julson sop Pretty Polly, Witch; Philip Langridge ten Lawyer; David Wilson-Johnson bar Choregos, Jack Ketch; John Tomlinson bass Doctor
London Sinfonietta / David Atherton
Etcetera ② KTC2014 (103 minutes: ADD Ⓕ
Notes and text included. Recorded 1980 ●●●

Punch and Judy was composed in the mid 1960s, and since this recording first appeared on Decca we have had the remarkable 1984 Opera Factory production of the work, directed by David Freeman, seen on stage and television. As Punch, Stephen Roberts is less consistently menacing and 'over the top' in vocal demeanour than Opera Factory's Omar Ebrahim. But Roberts remains a very satisfying interpreter of a part which is far from uniformly aggressive in character and in which a kind of crazy vulnerability offsets the ritual violence. In fact the general excellence of the singers on this set is impressive, with a spectacular contribution from Phyllis Bryn-Julson.

In the light of Birtwistle's finest later works (especially the opera The Mask of Orpheus), Punch and Judy can seem relatively anonymous in style, at least in those places which offer the kind of brittle, fragmented textures found in many composers at that time. Yet these are only moments, and as a whole the opera loses none of its powerful and sustained impact when compared with Birtwistle's more mature compositions. If anything, its startling primitivisms stand out more vividly, while its not inconsiderable moments of reflection and lyricism acquire an enhanced poignancy. The performance gains immeasurably from the alert control of David Atherton and the superlative musicianship of the London Sinfonietta. The analogue recording may lack depth, but it is as clear and immediate as this throat-grabbing music demands.

The Woman and the Hare

The Woman and The Hare[a]. Nine Settings of Lorine Niedecker[b]. Duets for Storab[c].
An Interrupted Endless Melody[d].
Entr'actes and Sappho Fragments[e]
[abe]Claron McFadden sop [a]Julia Watson spkr
Nash Ensemble ([ace]Philippa Davies, [ac]Helen Keen fls [a]Richard Hosford cl [de]Gareth Hulse ob [e]Skaila Kanga hp Ian Brown [d] pf/[a]cels [ae]Simon Limbrick perc [ae]Marianne Thorsen, [a]Elizabeth Wexler vns [ae]Lawrence Power va [ab]Paul Watkins vc)
/ [ae]Martyn Brabbins
Black Box BBM1046 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes and texts included. Recorded c2001

The Woman and the Hare (1999) shares its sound world with such close contemporaries as Pulse Shadows, The Last Supper and (near the end, in particular) with Birtwistle's music for the 2002 Royal National Theatre production of The Bacchae. The composer's genius for moving swiftly and imperceptibly between austerity and warmth is evident in both works, his characteristically fragmentary forms generating more than enough expressive continuity to ensure a powerful dramatic charge. This is equally true of the recent settings for soprano and cello of Lorine Niedecker, whose aphoristic poems about the threats and rituals of interactions between nature and humanity might have been written expressly for Birtwistle.

The vocal compositions gain greatly from the assured direction of Martyn Brabbins and the effortless yet characterful singing of Claron McFadden. Birtwistle's decision to divide David Harsent's text for The Woman and the Hare between a narrator and a singer, coupled with some particularly graphic instrumental writing, make this one of his most unambiguously theatrical concert pieces, and this account emphasises the claustrophobic aura of Harsent's text. The cumulative impact of the whole is remarkable, with a visceral thrust that complements the more withdrawn lyricism of the Sappho Fragments and the Niedecker settings.

The instrumental works, Duets for Storab and An Interrupted Endless Melody are performed with the Nash Ensemble's special flair, and the sound, throughout, has admirable presence. Both compositions are already available on a valuable Deux-Elles release from the Galliard Ensemble, but the two discs complement each other well enough to make both essential purchases.

Georges Bizet

French 1838-1875

GROVE Bizet was trained by his parents, who were musical, and admitted to the Paris Conservatoire just before his tenth birthday. There he studied counter-point with Zimmerman and Gounod and composition with Halévy, and under Marmontel's tuition he became a brilliant pianist. Bizet's exceptional powers as a composer are already apparent in the products of his Conservatoire years, notably the Symphony in C, a work of precocious genius dating from 1855 (but not performed until 1935). In 1857 Bizet shared with Lecocq a prize offered by Offenbach for a setting of the one-act operetta Le Docteur Miracle; later that year he set out for Italy as holder of the coveted Prix de Rome.

During his three years in Rome Bizet began or projected many compositions; only four survive, including the opera buffa, Don Procopio (not performed until 1906). Shortly after his return to Paris, in September 1861, his mother died; the composer consoled himself with his parents maid, by whom he had a son in June 1862. He rejected teaching at the Conservatoire and the temptation to become a concert pianist, and completed his obligations under the terms of the Prix de Rome. The last of these, a one-act opéra comique, La guzla de l'emir, was rehearsed at the Opéra-Comique in 1863 but withdrawn when the Théâtre-Lyrique director, who had been offered 100 000 francs to produce annually an opera by a Prix de Rome winner who had not had a work staged, invited Bizet to compose Les pêcheurs de perles .

Bizet completed it in four months. It was produced in September 1863, but met with a generally cool reception: an uneven work, with stiff characterization, it is notable for the skilful scoring of its exotic numbers. In the ensuing years Bizet earned a living arranging other composers' music and giving piano lessons. Not until December 1867 was another opera staged - La jolie fille de Perth, which shows a surer dramatic mastery than Les pêcheurs. It received a good press but had only 18 performances.

1868 was a year of crisis for Bizet, with more abortive works, attacks of quinsy and a re-examination of his religious stance; and his attitude to music grew deeper. In June 1869 he married Geneviève, daughter of his former teacher, Halévy, and the next year they suffered the privations caused by the Franco-Prussian war (Bizet enlisted in the National Guard). Bizet found little time for sustained composition, but in 1871 he produced the delightful suite for piano duet, Jeux d'enfants (some of it scored for orchestra as the Petite Suite), and he worked on a one-act opera, Djamileh. Both the opera and Daudet's play L'arlésienne, for which Bizet wrote incidental music, failed when produced in 1872, but in neither case did this have anything to do with the music.

Bizet was convinced that in Djamileh he had found his true path, one which he followed in composing his operatic masterpiece, Carmen. Here Bizet reaches new levels in the depiction of atmosphere and character. The characterization of José, his gradual decline from a simple soldier's peasant honesty through insurbordination, desertion and smuggling to murder is masterly; the colour and vitality of Carmen herself are remarkable, involving the use of the harmonic, rhythmic instrumental procedures of Spanish dance music, to which also the fate-laden augmented 2nds of the Carmen motif may owe their origin. The music of Micaela and Escamillo may be less original, but the charm of the former and the coarseness of the latter are intentional attributes of the characters. The opera is the supreme achievement of Bizet and of opéra comique, a genre it has transformed in that Bizet extended it to embrace passionate emotion and a tragic end, purging it of artificial elements and embuing it with a vivid expression of the torments inflicted by sexual passion and jealousy. The work, however, was condemned for its 'obscene' libretto, and the music was criticized as erudite, obscure, colourless, undistinguished and unromantic. Only after Bizet's death was its true stature appreciated, and then at first only in the revised version by Guiraud in which recitatives replace the original spoken dialogue (it is only recently that the original version has been revived). The reception of Carmen left Bizet acutely depressed; he fell victim to another attack of quinsy and, in June 1875, to the two heart attacks from which he died.

Symphony in C

Symphony in C[a]. L'Arlésienne[b] – Suites Nos 1 and 2 🄷

[a]French National Radio Symphony Orchestra; [b]Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Thomas Beecham

EMI 747794-2 (65 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ

Recorded 1956-59. ●●

In Beecham's hands the Symphony in C is made to sound wonderfully songful and although the French orchestral playing is less than ideally polished, the joie de vivre of Beecham's performance is irresistible. What makes this disc doubly desirable are the marvellous RPO wind solos (and, of course, the haunting strings in the Adagietto) in L'Arlésienne. The performances of these two suites stand head and shoulders above present CD competition, their loving finesse mixes evocative magic (the 'Intermezzo' of No 2) with wonderful rhythmic vivacity (the closing 'Farandole'). The refurbishing of the recordings is remarkably successful, especially L'Arlésienne.

Carmen

Carmen

Angela Gheorghiu sop Carmen; Roberto Alagna ten Don José; Inva Mula sop Micaëla; Thomas Hampson bar Escamillo; Elizabeth Vidal sop Frasquita; Isabelle Cals sop Mercédès; Nicolas Rivenq ten Dancaïre; Yann Beuron ten Remendado; Ludovic Tézier bar Moralès; Nicolas Cavallier bass Zuniga; Toulouse Children's Choir; Les Eléments; Toulouse Capitole Orchestra / Michel Plasson

EMI ③ 557434-2 (157 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ

Notes, libretto and translation included

Recorded c2002

Michel Plasson draws some very fine playing indeed from the Toulouse orchestra, and his choice of speeds seems just right, never resorting to extreme effects. The one moment when things get a bit sluggish is in the Card scene, but he is, perhaps rightly, more concerned with letting Gheorghiu have as much breathing space as she needs; the chest tone she uses for the cries of 'La mort!' is amazingly forceful. Her portrayal has little of the easy sensuality of such celebrated interpreters as Grace Bumbry or Teresa Berganza. But Gheorghiu and Roberto Alagna have obviously worked very hard to achieve some fine moments, a beautifully soft ending to 'Là-bas, dans la montagne', and an almost visible change of mood towards the end of the Séguedille, as Carmen begins to work her charms. Gheorghiu cannot help sounding rather imperious at times, and there is no exchange of remarks at the moment when she throws the flower.

Alagna has done nothing better recently: he is really inside the character, and portrays the man's descent into degradation. There is little sense of him pushing the tone – as in his Manrico – although his voice is much lighter than many other famous Don Josés. This is all in his favour, though, for moments such as the beautifully realised ending to 'Parle-moi de ma mère'.

Other roles are well taken: Thomas Hampson presents Escamillo as a very jovial sort of fellow, Inva Mula as Micaëla is better in the Act 1 duet than she is in her aria. The sound is uncomplicated, though Carmen's castanets (some very classy playing) seem to be coming from quite a distance away from her.

With dozens of Carmens available on disc, it's impossible to recommend only one. This will be a pleasure for the many admirers of Plasson, Gheorghiu and Alagna. Once you get to the final duet in this 21st-century Carmen, you should find yourself completely gripped – by Alagna, who, while sounding distraught, still manages to produce some lovely tone, and by Gheorghiu, who, though she may never sing the role on stage, is a remarkably dramatic lady-in-distress for the microphone.

Carmen 🄷

Victoria de los Angeles sop Carmen; Nicolai Gedda ten Don José; Janine Micheau sop Micaëla; Ernst Blanc bar Escamillo; Denise Monteil sop Frasquita; Marcelle Croisier mez Mercédès; Monique Linval sop Mercédès; Jean-Christoph Benoit bar Dancaïre; Michel Hamel ten Remendado; Bernard Plantey bass Moralès; Xavier Depraz bass Zuniga; Les Petits Chanteurs de Versailles; French National Radio Choir and Symphony Orchestra / Sir Thomas Beecham

EMI Great Recordings of the Century

③ 567357-2 (162 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ

Recorded 1958/59 ●●●

This classic Beecham set stands the test of time, sparkling, swaggering and seducing in a way that is uniquely Beecham's. It now comes in the EMI Great Recordings of the Century series, with brightened, freshened and clarified sound. As Richard Osborne points out in his brilliant, informative note, there were serious problems at the sessions – a second series was organised 15 months after the first (hence the two Mercédès) – but you would never realise there had been difficulties, either from the performance or the firmly focused, spacious recording in which the atmospheric off-stage effects are vividly caught.

What is so individual is the way that Beecham points rhythms to captivate the ear, as well as his persuasive moulding of phrases. Witness the sensuous way he coaxes the string phrase leading into the second half of the Don José/Micaëla duet in Act 2, 'Parle-moi de ma mère!' (disc 1, track 9, 3'47"). In those qualities Beecham is matched by Victoria de los Angeles in the title-role.

Osborne reveals that Beecham's original choice of heroine was the Swedish mezzo Kerstin Meyer. After all, de los Angeles – Mimì in Beecham's Bohème recording – is hardly an obvious candidate for such a fire-eating role. But there is far more to Carmen than is conveyed in that conventional approach, and de los Angeles instantly establishes her as a seductive, provocative character with wickedly sparkling eyes. In her opening solo, the Habanera, her delicious downward portamento on 'Je t'aime' is irresistible. The Carmen quality which de los Angeles does not have in her regular armoury, though, is a snarl. Instead she consistently uses her golden tone to tantalise and provoke, as in the magically sultry moment leading into 'Là-bas dans la montagne' in her Act 2 duet with José just after the Flower song (disc 2, track 13). At that point Beecham, too, subtly pressing the music forward, is a fellow magician. Then at the very end, in Act 4, de los Angeles does finally muster a snarl in the culminating phrase 'laisse-moi passer' ('Well stab me then, or let me pass').

In a way, Nicolai Gedda's portrait of Don José is just as remarkable. He was at his peak, and sings not just with refinement and imagination but with deep passion, leading one on in the widest expressive range in the Flower song. Janine Micheau makes a bright, clear Micaëla, very French in tone, and Ernst Blanc, if not the most characterful Escamillo, makes the bullfighter a forthright, heroic character, singing with firm, clear tone. The rest of the cast, all French, make an excellent team, as is clear in ensembles: the sparkling account of the Act 2 Quintet or the opening of the Card scene, or the swaggering march ensemble as the smugglers depart in Act 3 (disc 3, track 6). A magic set now made all the more enticing in this mid-price reissue.

Carmen
Teresa Berganza sop Carmen; Plácido Domingo ten Don José; Ileana Cotrubas sop Micaëla; Sherrill Milnes bar Escamillo; Yvonne Kenny sop Frasquita; Alicia Nafé mez Mercédès; Robert Lloyd bass Zuniga; Stuart Harling bar Moralès; Gordon Sandison bar Dancaïre; Geoffrey Pogson ten Remendado Ambrosian Singers; London Symphony Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
DG ③ 419 636-2GH3 (157 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1977 ◉◉

This notable recording followed immediately on from the famous Faggioni production at the 1977 Edinburgh Festival, a staging finely observed enough still to remain with those who were there. In it Berganza declared her aim of rescuing the role from bad traditions and from its insults to Spanish womanhood. Her reading was restrained, haughty, but no less attractive and haunting for that. She developed the character, as she does on the recording, from carefree gypsy to tragic woman and, in doing so, is scrupulous in her obedience to Bizet's notes, rhythms and dynamics. Nothing is exaggerated yet nothing is left out in this sensuous but never overtly sensual portrayal, bewitchingly sung. Maybe you don't feel the full engagement of her emotions in her entanglement with José, but better a slight reticence than overacting. Migenes, on the Maazel set, is more immediately seductive, and occasionally more varied in tonal colouring, but Berganza is the more subtle artist. She works in keen rapport with Abbado, who brings clarity of texture, Mediterranean fire and intense concentration to the score.

You may find more elegance, more Gallic wit in, say, Beecham's famous EMI set, but only Maazel of other conductors comes near Abbado's emphasis on close-knit ensemble and histrionic strength – and both their sets come as the result of experience of 'real' performances. Domingo benefits here, as on the Maazel in the same way, being more involved in affairs. Like his Carmen, he sometimes lacks variety of colour in his singing, but its sheer musicality and, in the last two acts, power, count for much. Sherrill Milnes is at once virile and fatuous as Escamillo should be. Cotrubas makes a vulnerable, touching Micaëla. The dialogue is heavily foreshortened compared to rival sets. Abbado chooses some of the questionable Oeser alternatives, but – apart from the one in the finale – they are not disturbing. The recording is first-rate.

Carmen
Julia Migenes mez Carmen; Plácido Domingo ten Don José; Faith Esham sop Micaëla; Ruggero Raimondi bass Escamillo; Lilian Watson sop Frasquita; Susan Daniel mez Mercédès; Jean-Philippe Lafont bar Dancäire; Gérard Garino ten Remendado; François Le Roux bar Moralès; John Paul Bogart bass Zuniga
French Radio Chorus; French Radio Children's Chorus; French National Orchestra / Lorin Maazel
Erato ③ 2292-45207-2 (151 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1992 ◉◉

Too many recordings of Carmen have blown up the work to proportions beyond its author's intentions but here Maazel adopts a brisk, lightweight approach that seems to come close to what Bizet wanted. Similarly Julia Migenes approaches the title part in an immediate, vivid way, exuding the gipsy's allure and suggesting Carmen's fierce temper and smouldering eroticism; she develops the character intelligently into the fatalistic person of the card scene and finale. Her singing isn't conventionally smooth but it's compelling throughout. Plácido Domingo has made Don José very much his own, and here he sings with unstinting involvement and finesse. Ruggero Raimondi is a macho Toreador though Faith Esham is a somewhat pallid Micaëla.

Les pêcheurs de perles

Barbara Hendricks sop Leïla; John Aler ten Nadir; Gino Quilico bar Zurga; Jean-Philippe Courtis bass Nourabad
Toulouse Capitole Chorus and Orchestra / Michel Plasson
EMI ② 749837-2 (127 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1989 ●

Let a tenor and a baritone signify that they are willing to oblige with a duet, and the cry will go up for The Pearl Fishers. It's highly unlikely that many of the company present will know what the duet is about – it recalls the past, proclaims eternal friendship and nearly ends up in a quarrel – but the melody and the sound of two fine voices blending in its harmonies will be quite sufficient. In fact there is much more to the opera than the duet; and the EMI recording goes further than previous versions in giving a complete account of a score remarkable for its unity as well as for the attractiveness of individual numbers. It is a lyrical opera, and the voices need to be young and graceful. Barbara Hendricks and John Aler fulfil those requirements, she with a light, silvery timbre, he with a high tenor admirably suited to the tessitura of his solos. The third main character, the baritone whose role is central to the drama, assumes his rightful place here: Gino Quilico brings true distinction to the part, and his aria in Act 3 is one of the highlights. Though Plasson's direction at first is rather square, the performance grows in responsiveness. It is a pity the accompanying notes are not stronger in textual detail, for the full score given here stimulates interest in its history. One of the changes made in the original score of 1863 concerns the celebrated duet itself, the first version of which is given in an appendix. It ends in a style that one would swear owed much to the 'friendship' duet in Verdi's Don Carlos – except that Bizet came first.

Additional recommendation
Les pêcheurs de perles
Cotrubas Leïla Vanzo Nadir
Paris Opera Orch / Prêtre
Classics for Pleasure CD-CFP4721 Ⓑ
(104 minutes: ADD: 10/91)

Worth hearing for Cotrubas's Leïla. Alain Vanzo's voice had lost some of its bloom by the late '70s when this was made and Prêtre's conducting is somewhat lacking in magic.

Sir Arthur Bliss

British 1891-1975

GROVE Bliss Studied with Wood at Cambridge and served in the army in France. Immediately after World War I he made a mark with works using nonsense texts and brittle Les Six-style irony (Rout, 1920), but successive orchestral works (A Colour Symphony, 1922; Introduction and Allegro, 1926; Music for Strings, 1935) established him as Elgar's successor. His three ballets (Checkmate, 1937 ; Miracle in the Gorbals, 1944 ; Adam Zero, 1946), a notable score for the film Things to Come (1935) and his opera The Olympians (1949) express his feelings for high drama and atmosphere. Among his other works are concertos for piano (1938), violin (1955) and cello (1970), songs, chamber and piano music, and choral works (notably the choral symphony Morning Heroes, 1930). In 1953 he was appointed Master of the Queen's Music.

Cello Concerto, T120

Cello Concerto, T120. Music for Strings, T54. Two Studies, T16
Tim Hugh vc English Northern Philharmonia / David Lloyd-Jones
Naxos 8 553383 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1995 ●

This is a first-rate performance of Bliss's Cello Concerto from Tim Hugh, stylishly and sympathetically partnered by David Lloyd-Jones and the English Northern Philharmonia. The work is a delightful creation, ideally proportioned, impeccably crafted and full of the most beguiling invention. Hugh plays with commanding assurance, great beauty of tone and rapt commitment, and the accompaniment is sprightly and sensitive to match. What makes this release indispensable to all Bliss admirers is the inclusion of the Two Studies. These date from 1921 and were believed lost until they turned up in the composer's papers after his death in 1975. The first is a memorably chaste, coolly serene affair, scored with delicious poise, whereas the second is an energetic, good-humoured and occasionally face-pulling romp. That just leaves the tremendous Music for Strings, and here, alas, is where reservations have to be raised. This superb score displays and demands a formidable technical facility and Bliss's exhilaratingly well-judged writing would surely test any string section. It would be idle to pretend that the hard-working strings of the English Northern Philharmonia are ideally secure protagonists. Lloyd-Jones's clear-headed, expressive interpretation serves the work well but in the finale's crucial introductory bars do you feel that his approach is oddly perfunctory. The Cello Concerto and the Two Studies alone though, will probably be enticement enough for many listeners. The recorded sound is excitingly realistic.

Checkmate – Suite

Bliss Checkmate – Suite
Lambert Horoscope – Suite
Walton Façade – Suites Nos 1 and 2
English Northern Sinfonia / David Lloyd-Jones
Hyperion Helios CDH55099 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1990

What a joy to welcome on CD, a major British ballet score (comparable in appeal to Walton's Façade with which, happily, it is coupled). Constant Lambert's Horoscope is a highly individual score that is somehow very English. It is played here with striking freshness and expansiveness. Lloyd-Jones responds to Bliss's lyricism very warmly. What makes this disc particularly enticing is the inclusion of the two Façade suites, welcome away from the spoken poems. This is music that in a witty performance can make one smile and even chuckle. So it is here, especially the 'Tango Pasodoble' with a delicious lilt for 'I do like to be beside the seaside' contrasting with its Offenbachian gusto, the 'Swiss Yodelling Song' with its droll Rossini quotation and refined mock-melancholy, and the irresistibly humorous 'Polka' that just manages not to be vulgar. All are ideally paced and the solo wind playing a delight. The recording is near perfect.

A Colour Symphony

A Colour Symphony. Adam Zero
English Northern Philharmonia / David Lloyd-Jones
Naxos 8 553460 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1995 oo

David Lloyd-Jones's exciting and idiomatic account of A Colour Symphony proves easily more than a match for all current competition, including the composer's own 1955 recording so spectacularly transferred by Dutton Laboratories. Speeds are judged to perfection – nicely flowing for the first and third movements, not too hectic for the flashing Scherzo – and countless details in Bliss's stunning orchestral canvas are most deftly attended to. Phrasing is sensitive and affectionate, solo work is consistently excellent (the slow movement's delicate woodwind arabesques are exquisitely voiced), and tuttis open out superbly in what is technically the finest recording to date from Naxos (magnificently keen-voiced horns throughout). Whereas A Colour Symphony was inspired by the heraldic associations of four different colours (one for each movement), the theme of Adam Zero is the inexorable life-cycle of humankind. In its entirety, this 1946 ballet score does admittedly have its occasional longueurs, but for the most part Bliss's invention is of high quality. Certainly, the vivid exuberance and theatrical swagger of numbers like 'Dance of Spring' and 'Dance of Summer' have strong appeal. Equally, the limpid beauty of both the 'Love Dance' and the hieratic 'Bridal Ceremony' which immediately ensues is not easily banished, while the darkly insistent 'Dance with Death' distils a gentle poignancy which is most haunting.

Chamber Works

Piano Quartet in A minor, T6[a]. Viola Sonata[a]. Oboe Quintet, T44[b]
Maggini Quartet (Laurence Jackson, David Angel vns Martin Outram va Michal Kaznowski vc) with [a]Peter Donohoe pf [b]Nicholas Daniel ob
Naxos 8 555931 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ

The Maggini Quartet and Peter Donohoe give a commanding performance of the Piano Quartet, locating an underlying toughness of argument and urgency of expression in both outer movements to make one regret all the more forcefully the budding composer's decision to withdraw the piece following his demobilisation in 1919.

Otherwise unrepresented in the domestic catalogue, the Viola Sonata was written in 1933 for Lionel Tertis. If Bliss's inspiration lacks the distinctive melodic profile and organic mastery of, say, Walton's Viola Concerto of four years previously, the work as a whole is still worth getting to know. The Maggini's violist, Martin Outram, makes commendably light of the solo part's at times hair-raising demands and Donohoe offers exemplary support.

But the jewel in this anthology is the Oboe Quintet that Bliss composed in 1927 for Leon Goossens. Elegance and resourcefulness are the watchwords in the first two movements, whose bitter-sweet lyricism forms an effective contrast with the exuberant festivities of the finale. Nicholas Daniel and the Maggini give a spry, ideally proportioned reading, more intrepid in its expressive range than than that of Gordon Hunt and the Tale Quartet. Production-values throughout are of a high order. Very warmly recommended.

String Quartets – No 1 in B flat; in A (1915). Conversations[a]
[a]Nicholas Daniel ob/cora [a]Michael Cox fl/afl
Maggini Quartet (Laurence Jackson, David Angel vns Martin Outram va Michal Kaznowski vc)
Naxos 8 557108 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded c2001

The earliest work here, the String Quartet in A major, was completed around 1914. It's a fresh-faced, skilfully wrought essay, tinged with English modal pastoralism and an occasional dash of Ravel, and much admired by Lady Elgar (in a letter to Bliss, who was on active service in France, she wrote of the music's 'eager life and exhilarating energy and hope'). In 1919, Bliss withdrew the Quartet, travelling to Paris where he fell under the spell of the chic radicalism of Les Six. While in the French capital, he composed Conversations, a wittily mischievous, at times strikingly memorable suite in five pithy movements.

However, it's the First Quartet proper which yields the most enduring rewards. Cast in four movements and full of high-class invention, this is a shrewdly argued piece which strikes an enormously pleasing balance between captivating poise, formidable economy of thought and fervent expression. As with the masterly Music for Strings of 1935, Bliss's command and understanding of the forces at his disposal are complete, and the work as whole shows the composer at his consummate, intelligent best. The Maggini Quartet deserve the heartiest plaudits for their cogent and assured championship of this music; if anything, their account of the B flat Quartet surpasses that of the Delmé in its clean-limbed authority and scrupulous commitment to the cause.

For Conversations, Nicholas Daniel and Michael Cox join in the fun with exemplary spirit and character. The sound is vivid and true. This is, quite simply, another irresistible bargain from the Maggini Quartet and Naxos.

A Knot of Riddles

Two American Poems[ag]. Seven American Poems[cg]. Angels of the Mind[ag]. The Ballads of the Four Seasons[ag]. A Knot of Riddles[chi]. Two Love Songs[cg]. Two Nursery Rhymes[aef]. Three Romantic Songs[bg]. Three Songs[bg]. Four Songs[adf]. At the Window[bg]. Auvergnat[bg]. A Child's Prayer[ag]. Elegiac Sonnet[bhi]. The Fallow Deer at the Lonely House[bg]. The Hammers[bg]. Rich or Poor[cg]. Simples[bg]. Three Jolly Gentlemen[ag]. 'Tis time, I think, by Wenlock Town[bg]. The Tramps[cg]. When I was one-and-twenty[cg]. The Tempest[bcg] – The Storm; Overture and Act 1, Scene 1

[a]Geraldine McGreevy sop [b]Toby Spence ten [c]Henry Herford bar [d]Leo Phillips vn [e]Michael Collins cl [f]John Lenehan pf [g]Kathron Sturrock pf [h]Nash Ensemble / [i]Martyn Brabbins

Hyperion ② CDA67188/9 (123 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1998 ●

Nearly all of Sir Arthur Bliss's songs are here (only a few orchestral ones are omitted) but they are of uneven quality and are presented in almost random order, with no sense given of Bliss's development as a songwriter. It was a mistake to include the Two Love Songs, which are in fact the vocal movements of Bliss's beautiful Serenade for baritone and orchestra. Kathron Sturrock, throughout a wonderfully musical and responsive accompanist, does her best to make Bliss's piano reductions seem pianistic; but despite her they just sound clumpy. The finest songs here are mostly on the second disc. Kathleen Raine's poems drew the best from the composer – simple eloquence, bold, shining gestures and memorable images including a fine nocturne: they are masterly, and would alone make investigating this pair of discs worthwhile. Geraldine McGreevy sings them simply, purely and very movingly, as she does the progression from lyric charm to bare strength of The Ballads of the Four Seasons. Also on CD2 is The Tempest; this vivid storm scene is all that survives of some 1921 incidental music to Shakespeare's play, set with striking originality for two voices, trumpet, trombone and five percussion players. Things of such quality are rarer on CD1, though the Three Songs to poems by W H Davies are all strong, Bliss's setting of When I was one-and-twenty has a blithe insouciance, and several of the other sets contain pleasing discoveries, like the elegantly witty 'A Bookworm' from A Knot of Riddles or the charming 'Christmas Carol' that opens Four Songs. McGreevy is the best of the singers, but both Herford and Spence are committed advocates. The best of these songs (about half) are of a quality to make their present neglect seem inexplicable.

Ernest Bloch

Swiss/American 1880-1959

GROVE Bloch studied with Dalcroze in Geneva, in Brussels (1897-99) and with Knorr in Frankfurt (1900). In 1916 he went to the USA, thereafter spending most of his time there (he took citizenship in 1924). He also taught at Cleveland (1920-25), San Francisco (1925-30) and Berkeley (1940-52). His early works are eclectic: the opera Macbeth (1910) draws on Strauss, Musorgsky and Debussy. Then came a period of concern mostly with Jewish subjects (Schelomo for cello and orchestra, 1916), followed by a vigorous neo-classicism (Piano Quintet No 1, 1923; Concerto grosso No 1 for strings and piano, 1925). He returned to epic compositions in the 1930s with the Sacred Service (Avodath hakodesh, 1933) and the Violin Concerto (1937). His last works represent a summation of his career and lean towards a less subjective style.

America

America. Concerto grosso No 1
Patricia Michaelian pf Seattle Symphony Chorale and Orchestra / Gerard Schwarz
Delos DE3135 (61 minutes: DDD). Text included Ⓕ
Recorded 1993

Ernest Bloch's 'Epic Rhapsody for Orchestra', America, is a warming musical flight across the history of the United States, and uses the anthem of the same name as a leitmotif that helps bind English, American Indian and Jewish-style themes into a homogeneous, accessible whole. There are three variegated movements, each a dramatic tone-poem reflecting such universal ideas as 'Struggle and Hardships' or 'Hours of Joy – Hours of Sorrow' (the second movement's subtitle), with the third visiting the world of jazz and culminating in a full-throated choral celebration of the anthem. However, Bloch's 'programme' is fairly specific. America might be best described as a great film score that never was, a highly emotive thanksgiving from a man who had only recently arrived in his new home, with tender references to such favourites as John Brown's Body and Dixie. There are also veiled references to other of Bloch's works, including Schelomo and Concerto grosso that Schwarz programmes as America's coupling. Demon-stration standard sound.

Symphony in C sharp minor

Symphony in C sharp minor. Schelomo
Torleif Thedéen vc Malmö Symphony Orchestra / Lev Markiz Ⓕ
BIS CD576 (78 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1990-92

Bloch's early symphony is an endearing and at times impressive showcase for a young composer (he was 23) endowed by nature and nurture with all the gifts save individuality (though there are hints in the later movements that that too is on the way). He can write impressively strong, expansive melodies, develop them with real ingenuity and build them into monumental climaxes. Climax-building, indeed, is what young Bloch seems most interested in at this stage; that and a love for all the rich contrasts of colour and texture that a big orchestra can provide. He is so adept at pulling out still more stops when you thought there could hardly be any left that one is scarcely ever made impatient by the occasional feeling that this or that movement could have ended two or three minutes earlier.

It's a pleasure, too, to listen for fulfilled echoes of that youthful exuberance in the mature 'biblical rhapsody' Schelomo. Just as Lev Markiz adroitly avoids any impression of overpadded grossness in the symphony, so he and his fine soloist find more than richly embroidered oriental voluptuousness in this portrait of King Solomon; there is gravity and even poignancy to the music as well, and Thedéen's subtle variety of tone colour provides shadow and delicacy as well as richness. The recording is excellent.

Violin Sonatas / Cello Suites

Violin Sonatas – No 1; No 2, 'Poème mystique'. Suite hébraïque. Abodah. Melody
Miriam Kramer vn Simon Over pf
Naxos 8 554460 (75 minutes: DDD). Ⓢ
Recorded 1998. ●

Baal Shem^a. From Jewish Life^a. Méditation hébraïque^a. Solo Cello Suites Nos 1-3
Peter Bruns vc ^{a}Roglit Ishay pf
Opus 111 OPS30-232 (67 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1999

Bloch's unaccompanied Cello Suites are late works that, while taking an obvious cue from Bach, still have plenty to say. The First Suite (1956) opens with a 'Prelude' before progressing to a lively Allegro which, in terms of style, isn't too far removed from the racy 'folkisms' of Kodály's solo Sonata. The typically Blochian slow movement calls for simultaneous bowed and pizzicato playing, and the work closes with an appealing 'Gigue'. Both the First Suite and contemporaneous Second were dedicated to the distinguished Canadian cellist Zara Nelsova. No 2 is more chromatic than the First, Bloch widening his expressive vocabulary (the second movement is especially dramatic) and making greater technical demands on his soloist. The German cellist Peter Bruns takes everything in his stride and his grainy, nicely modulated tone helps focus the music's manifold rhythms and colours. Bach hovers nearest the Third Suite (1957), whereas memories of Schelomo are most pronounced in the Méditation hébraïque. While Bruns isn't quite in Piatigorsky's league for quietly stated eloquence in the opening 'Prayer' from Bloch's suite From Jewish Life, he plays beautifully and makes a cogent case for the cello version of Baal Shem's 'Nigun'.

Miriam Kramer's programme might usefully serve as a sort of 'Bloch starter-pack', with the delightful Suite hébraïque as its tuneful opener. 'Rapsodie', the Suite's first movement, harbours a noble melody reminiscent of top-drawer Max Bruch and Kramer's performance of it could hardly be more heartfelt. Both violin sonatas are given extremely good performances, that of the Second particularly fine especially in the ecstatic, double-stopped statements of the central theme. The combination of Kramer's musicianship and Naxos's price will be irresistible to most repertory explorers.

John Blow British 1649-1708

GROVE Blow was trained as a Chapel Royal chorister and then worked as organist of Westminster Abbey, 1668-79. In 1674 he both became a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal and succeeded Pelham Humfrey as Master of the Children; from 1676 he was also an organist there. Henry Purcell served an apprenticeship under him and many others were influenced by his teaching. The 1680s and 1690s were his most productive years as a composer. While still active at the Chapel Royal (where he was named official composer in 1700), he was Almoner and Master of the Choristers at St Paul's Cathedral in 1687-1703, and in 1695 he returned to Westminster Abbey as organist, succeeding Purcell.

Blow was the most important figure in the school of musicians surrounding Purcell and a composer of marked individuality. His music uses a wide range of idioms and reflects his interest in structure. Foremost in his sacred output are c100 anthems, mostly verse anthems (some with instrumental movements); the powerful coronation work God spake sometime in visions (1685) combines features of both types. Blow also wrote several services and Latin sacred works. Most of his odes were written for court occasions; among the others are works for St Cecilia's Day such as Begin the song (1684). The highly original and poignant miniature opera Venus and Adonis (1685), also for the court, was his only dramatic work. A well-known part of his output was his secular vocal music, comprising c90 solo songs and several duets, catches etc; the Ode on the Death of Mr Henry Purcell (1696), a duet with instruments, is notable for its expressiveness. Blow's instrumental works include organ voluntaries and some 70 harpsichord pieces.

Vocal Works

Blow Sonata in A. Ground in G minor. P
Fugue in G minor. Suite in G. Ground in C minor.
An Ode on the Death of Mr Henry Purcell^{ab}
Purcell Birthday Ode, Z331 – Sweetness of Nature^{ab}. Here let my life^{a}. Oedipus – Music for a while^{a}. St Cecilia's Day Ode, Z328 – In vain the am'rous flute
^{a}Gérard Lesne, ^{b}Steve Dugardin countertens
La Canzona (Pierre Hamon, Sébastien Marq recs
Elisabeth Joyé clav Philippe Pierlot va da gamba
Vincent Dumestre theorbo)
Virgin Veritas 545342-2 (64 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Texts and translations included ●

The teacher who has even one pupil who becomes even more distinguished than himself is fortunate; in Purcell, Blow had one such. And when that pupil's death precedes his own he has cause for genuine grief, as Blow did. One of Purcell's songs, here alternated with instrumental pieces by Blow, contains the line 'Nor let my homely death embroider'd be with scutcheon or with elegy', but it is one with which Blow and others could not concur. In a programmatic tour de force Blow's profoundly beautiful vocal tribute to Purcell comes at the end. Few countertenors are as finely matched in artistry and vocal quality as Lesne and Dugardin who, in both the solo songs and duets, wring every drop of emotion from the texts with sincerity, technically effortless messa di voce and admirably clear diction. In Blow's Ode on the death of Mr Henry Purcell, the risk that the recorders may cover the singers is avoided here. The instrumental support faithfully shadows every vocal nuance throughout. Much of Blow's instrumental music was unpublished in his time and has remained unrecorded – some first-time pieces here. Where violins were originally specified, as in the A major Trio Sonata, in this recording they are replaced by recorders, and the harpsichord Suite in G minor is a modern compilation from various sources. Altogether this album is pure, unalloyed delight.

God spake sometime in visions. How doth the city sit solitary. The Lord is my shepherd. God is our hope and strength. I beheld and lo! a great multitude. Turn thee unto me, O Lord. Blessed is the man. Lift up your heads. O Lord I have sinned. O give thanks unto the Lord. O Lord, thou hast searched me out. Cry aloud and spare not. Lord, who shall dwell in thy tabernacle. I said in the cutting off of my days P
Robin Blaze counterten Joseph Cornwell, William Kendall tens Stephen Varcoe, Stephen Alder bars
Winchester Cathedral Choir / David Hill;
The Parley of Instruments / Peter Holman
Hyperion ② CDA67031/2 (116 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1995

In choosing a range of Blow's best and most representative anthems, Peter Holman and David Hill have had quite a task on their hands: Blow was even more prolific than Purcell in this domain. They have sensibly cast their critical eyes over those works written in the 'golden' age of Charles II, several of whose reputations go before them. The dignity and sobriety of the fine coronation anthem God spake sometime in visions is a joy to behold, and it is given a grand and spacious reading here. David Hill, ever the choral director to sustain and shape a line, is peerless in the opening paragraph. Here, as in other distinguished works like I beheld and lo!, the success of these performances is determined by deft recognition of the structural strengths and solecisms of Blow's music. He is helped by a pleasing integration between soloists, choir and instruments. Blow's particular attraction is a disarming tunefulness and an idiomatic simplicity of expression. O Lord I have sinned has a distinctive Purcellian flavour with its chromatic inflexions and unpredictable contrapuntal movement, yet it fails to plumb the depths as in the similar type of piece which became something of a Purcell speciality. Indeed, for all Blow's quality there are several works here that just miss the mark despite their distinctive place in English Restoration musical life. Nevertheless, this is without doubt an important addition to the English Orpheus series.

Blow I was glad when they said unto me
Boyce Lord, thou hast been our refuge
Handel Utrecht Te Deum and Jubilate, HWV278-79
Julia Gooding, Sophie Daneman sops Edward Burrowes, Timothy Burtt, Alastair Cook trebs
Robin Blaze, Ashley Stafford altos Rogers Covey-Crump, Mark Le Brocq tens Andrew Dale Forbes bass
St Paul's Cathedral Choir; The Parley of Instruments / John Scott
Hyperion CDA67009 (74 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1997

Anyone who has tried to listen to music in St Paul's Cathedral might be forgiven for hesitating before buying a recording made there: however, by some magic the Hyperion engineers have succeeded in producing a recording that is a model of clear sound, even in the fullest tuttis, while at the same time capturing something of the cathedral ambience. This CD happily celebrates the tercentenary, which fell in 1997, of the official opening of the cathedral, offering three of the finest pieces written for performance there. The Blow anthem was written for the opening event and also to give thanks for the Peace of Ryswick. It is an attractive work, including a countertenor duet, exquisitely done here by Robin Blaze and Ashley Stafford, and a tenor solo sung fluently and with much refined detail by Rogers Covey-Crump, supported by a pair of obbligato trumpets. The Boyce anthem was written in 1755 for the Festival for the Sons of the Clergy, still held annually at St Paul's; again, there is distinguished solo singing from Covey-Crump in the expressive 'Yea, like as a father pitieth his own children', and from Blaze in 'The eyes of all wait upon thee'; but perhaps the most appealing number is the trio sung here, in very accomplished style, by three of the boys. And there are rousing choral Hallelujahs to end with.

However, the main item is Handel's Te Deum and Jubilate for the Peace of Utrecht, given at St Paul's in 1713 and Handel's first serious venture into Anglican church music. It is a colourful piece, full of original ideas, and it is done here under John Scott, the incumbent St Paul's organist, with great vitality, breadth, excellent discipline and clear verbal articulation. Sopranos are used for the solos here, with Julia Gooding and Sophie Daneman singing with delicacy, and the other soloists, plus the bass Andrew Dale Forbes, shine again. A disc worthy of its subject.

Venus and Adonis

Rosemary Joshua sop Venus; Gerald Finley bar Adonis; Robin Blaze counterten Cupid, Second Grace; Maria Cristina Kiehr sop Shepherdess, First Grace; Christopher Josey counterten Huntsman, First Shepherd; John Bowen ten Second Shepherd; Jonathan Brown bass Third Shepherd, Third Grace Clare College Choir, Cambridge; Orchestra of the Age of Enlightenment / René Jacobs P

Harmonia Mundi HMX290 1684 Ⓜ

(51 minutes: DDD). Texts included. Recorded 1998 ●

Historically in the shadow of Purcell's Dido, Venus and Adonis is fast becoming a recognized masterpiece of small-scale baroque drama. Blow draws considerable inspiration from French chamber opera both in matters of constitution and balance, though Venus and Adonis is still a distinctly English work with its poised, understated dialogue and an emotional denouement where Adonis's death from the tusks of a boar is touchingly tender in its measured, if demonstrative grief; the effect is not far removed from Dido's lament, though Purcell's tragic vein is ultimately untouchable. There are, however, some superb examples of indigenous word-setting and declamatory arioso which put Blow in the Purcell bracket in several instances, not least in Cupid's forthright scene-setting, sung with increasing assurance by Robin Blaze.

Indeed, René Jacobs surrounds himself with many fine singers here, all of whom he marshals in lively and responsive performances. Rosemary Joshua is an irresistable Venus, who wastes not a word either in colourful representation or vocal suppleness, and Gerald Finlay's reflective longing accords with Jacobs's elegant and full-flavoured direction. There is a nobility in the initial exchanges between the protagonists which is elevated by a doleful shimmer of recorders, which augurs much in its funereal symbolism. These responsive instrumental interjections from the OAE are even more effective in 'Hark, hark the rural music sounds'. This admirable recording puts the work on another footing entirely.

Luigi Boccherini

Italian 1743-1805

GROVE The son of a cello or double bass player, Boccherini made his public début as a cellist at 13. After studying in Rome, he worked intermittently at the Viennese court, 1757-64. In 1760 he began to catalogue his compositions (though excluding cello sonatas, vocal music and certain other works). In 1764-66 he worked in Lucca, where he composed vocal music and in 1765 reputedly arranged the first string quartet performances in public. On tour with the violinist Filippo Manfredi in Paris, 1767-68, he had his six string quartets op.1 and six string trios Op 2 published. In 1769 the duo arrived in Madrid, where Boccherini became composer and performer to the Infante Don Luis. Up to the time of Luis death in 1785 he composed chamber music for his court, notably string quintets for two violins, viola and two cellos. From 1786, as chamber composer to Prince (later King) Friedrich Wilhelm of Prussia, he sent string quartets to the Prussian court, though probably never went there.

The chief representative of Latin instrumental music during the Viennese Classical period, Boccherini was especially prolific in chamber music: he wrote well over 120 string quintets, nearly 100 string quartets and over 100 other chamber works. At first he used a standard Italian idiom, but with unusually ornate melodies and frequent high cello writing. Later, reflecting his isolated position, his style became more personal, with delicate detail, syncopated rhythms and rich textures; he sometimes used cyclic forms. The orchestral music includes several virtuoso cello concertos and over 20 symphonies; the vocal works include an opera, two oratorios and a Stabat mater (1781).

Cello Concertos

Cello Concertos – No 4 in C, G477; No 6 in D, G479; No 7 in G, G480; No 8 in C, G481

Tim Hugh vc Scottish Chamber Orchestra /

Anthony Halstead Ⓢ
Naxos 8 553571 (74 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1995 ●

This is a winner of a disc, the first of a series covering all 12 of Boccherini's cello concertos, beautifully performed on modern instruments but with concern for period practice and superbly recorded. Though each concerto has its individual delights the formula in all four works is similar, with strong, foursquare first movements, slow movements that sound rather Handelian and galloping finales in triple time. One minor snag is a confusion over numbering. Naxos calls its first selection of works Nos 1-4, whereas in Gramophone and on the Gramophone Database the new numbering above is used.

Many collectors will be concerned about the Boccherini Cello Concerto beloved of generations in Grützmacher's corrupt edition. Many years ago Jacqueline du Pré was questioned about choosing it for her recording: she promptly justified herself, saying, 'But the slow movement is so lovely.' She was quite right, as her classic recording makes clear, but that movement was transferred from another work, in fact No 7 in G, one of the four works here. Tim Hugh's dedicated account of this lovely G minor movement is a high spot of this issue, with rapt, hushed playing not just from the soloist but also from the excellent Scottish Chamber Orchestra under Anthony Halstead. Hugh offers substantial cadenzas not just in the first movements of each work, but in slow movements and finales too, though none is as extended as the almost two minute meditation in the G minor slow movement. Halstead, as a period specialist and a horn virtuoso as well as a conductor, matches his soloist in the dedication of these performances, clarifying textures and encouraging Hugh to choose speeds on the fast side, with easily flowing slow movements and outer movements which test the soloist's virtuosity to the very limit, without sounding breathless. Not just for those who know only the old Grützmacher concerto, all this will be a delightful discovery.

Cello Concertos – No 3 in D, G476; No 7 in G, G480; No 9 in B flat, G482. Concert aria – Se d'un amor tiranno, G557 🅿
Marta Almajano sop Limoges Baroque Ensemble / Christophe Coin vc
Astrée Naïve E8517 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993

Christophe Coin throws off in the deftest fashion the typical Boccherinian filigree figuration, the little ornamental flourishes perfectly placed and timed, the numerous stratospheric excursions above the treble stave sweet-toned and delicate. And with it he shows a command of Boccherini's style, affectionately graceful, sometimes with a faintly quizzical air. The tone of Coin's instrument is light and translucent, and with this small orchestra the sound in the solos, which are anyway lightly accompanied, is particularly sweet: in the first movement of G482 (the concerto known from the Grützmacher version) the unassuming handling of the virtuoso writing has a special kind of charm and the rather grander manner called for in the D major work G476 is also very happily caught, not without a hint of the romantic at times, for Coin is no austere stylist. The aria that completes his disc is a large-scale duet for cello, in its full concerto manner, and soprano; the lines are full of eloquent appoggiaturas and there is some beguiling duetting for the voice and the instrument. Marta Almajano has a big, clear top register and plenty of drama to her singing.

Simply Baroque 🅿
Boccherini Cello Concertos – No 5 in D, G478; No 7 in G, G480 Bach Cantatas: No 22, Jesus nahm zu sich die Zwölfe: Choral – Ertöt' uns durch dein' Güte; No 136, Erforsche mich, Gott, und erfahre mein Herz: Choral – Dein Blut, der edle Saft; No 147, Herz und Mund und Tat und Leben: Choral – Jesu bleibet meine Freude; No 163, Nur jedem das Seine: Aria – Lass mein Herz die Münze sein; No 167, Ihr Menschen, rühmet Gottes Liebe: Choral – Sei Lob und Preis mit Ehren. St Matthew Passion, BWV244 – Erbarme dich. Orgel-Büchlein – Ich ruf' zu dir, BWV639. Schübler Chorales – Kommst du nun, Jesu, von Himmel herunter, BWV650. Orchestral Suite No 3 in D, BWV1068 – Air (all arr Koopman)
Yo-Yo Ma vc Amsterdam Baroque Orchestra / Ton Koopman hpd/org
Sony Classical SK60680 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●

This appealing compilation is extremely imaginative: nine movements from Bach sensitively arranged for cello and chamber orchestra, plus an attractive pair of Boccherini cello concertos. Yo-Yo Ma's Stradivarius was altered for the occasion by luthier Charles Beare, and Ma uses a Baroque bow. As superior 'light' listening goes, it is difficult to think of a happier 70 minutes' worth. It also provides an ideal 'soft-option' introduction to the sound of period instruments. The St Matthew Passion's 'Erbarme dich' becomes a cleverly worked duet for violin and cello, always flowing and discreet, aided by responsive strings and a tactile lute continuo. Ton Koopman's harpsichord brushes Jesu Joy of Man's Desiring into action with a flourish, answered by a mellifluous mix of solo cello, strings and winds. Bassoon and cello join forces for a swaggering 'Lass mein Herz die Münze sein', before the brief chorale 'Dein Blut, der edle Saft'. Last comes the inevitable 'Air' from the Third Orchestral Suite, tellingly arranged (as a duet for cellos) and superbly played. In fact, Koopman's 'second' cello – his lead cellist Jaap ter Linden – is every bit as eloquent as the star act.

Listening to the two Boccherini works on this marvellous CD reminds you again of Ma's uncanny technical facility, at once elegant and unselfconsciously virtuosic. Ton Koopman provides the cadenzas and the performances are pure delight.

Symphonies

Symphonies, Op 37 – No 1 in C, G515; No 3 in D minor, G517; No 4 in A, G518 🅿
Academia Montis Regalis / Luigi Mangiocavallo
Opus 111 OPS30-168 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●●

'Sinfonie a grande orchestra', says Boccherini's own catalogue, in description of his Op 37, a set of four symphonies written in 1786-87 (only the three recorded here survive). Here they are played by a rather piccola orchestra yet the performance is brilliant and effective, with its very light and translucent textures conveying the detail with remarkable clarity. All the music sparkles with life – specially effective movements are the finale of the C major, with its curiously fragmented textures, and the Andante of the A major, one of Boccherini's loveliest orchestral slow movements, with the gentle and graceful melancholy of its oboe theme. There are attractive minuets here too – listen to the exquisitely played bassoon solo in the Trio of the D minor work or the oddly ambiguous rhythms in the C major. The conductor paces the music well and brings plenty of spirit and vivacity to the quick movements. In general this is an outstanding disc.

String Quintets

String Quintets, Op 25 – No 1 in D minor, G295; No 4 in C, G298; No 6 in A minor, G300. 🅿
String Quintet, Op 11 No 5 – Minuet
Europa Galante (Fabio Biondi, Enrico Casazza vns Ernesto Braucher va Maurizio Naddeo, Antonio Fantinuoli vcs)
Virgin Veritas 545421-2 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●●●

The frustration of those who seek to identify Boccherini's works by their opus numbers may end in their being taken into care by sympathetic men in white coats. The first three of the six string sextets listed in his own catalogue as Op 25 were first published as Op 36, No 4, as Op 47 No 9, and No 6 as Op 47 No 5. The six of his Op 11, from the Fifth of which the 'amputated' and very famous Minuet is taken, appeared as Op 13 and his own Op 13 became Op 20.

Thank goodness for Gérard, here also the annotator, by whom be guided when in any doubt! Given that Boccherini wrote 100 string quintets it is not surprising that none of the three from Op 25 on this disc has any other listed recording. These three quintets serve as a persuasive introduction to his music, full of melodic invention, harmony that knows when and for how long to remain static or flowing, or ready to spring surprises, great variety of form, and a kaleidoscope of sounds that could have been imagined only by an accomplished and venturesome virtuoso – which Boccherini was of the cello.

If the music itself is persuasive it becomes irresistible in these performances on period instruments (or copies thereof) at slightly lower pitch than today's standard, wielded by players of the highest calibre and sensitivity. The Font family quartet with whom Boccherini played at the Madrid court of Don Luis must have revelled in these quintets; in these recordings we come as close to sharing that experience as it is possible to get. An absolute must.

String Quintets – in E, G275; in F minor, G348; in G minor, G351
Richard Lester vc Vanbrugh Quartet (Gregory Ellis, Keith Pascoe vns Simon Aspell va Christopher Marwood vc)
Hyperion CDA67287 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

With more than 100 Boccherini cello quintets to choose from, the problem for anyone wanting to make recordings is which to choose. The E major G275 (formerly Op 13 No 5) makes an obvious first choice, when the third movement is the music universally associated with the very name of Boccherini, his Minuet. It is particularly refreshing in the Vanbrugh performance to hear it set in context against the work's other three movements, with their approach, light and crisp, paying obvious tribute to period practice in the choice of tempo – far faster than one usually associates with 'Boccherini's Minuet'.

The format of a string quintet with two cellos instead of two violas was very much Boccherini's special genre. Himself a cellist, it allowed him to free at least one of the cellos from following the bass line, so as to soar lyrically. To have this fascinating music vividly recorded in such fine performances, both polished and refreshing, with Richard Lester a perfect partner for the prize-winning Vanbrugh Quartet, makes an ideal sampler disc.

String Quartets

String Quartets, Op 32 –
No 3 in D, G203; No 4 in C, G204;
No 5 in G minor, G205; No 6 in A, G206
Quartetto Borciani
(Fulvio Luciani, Elena Ponzoni vns
Roberto Tarenzi va Claudia Ravetto vc)
Naxos 8 555043 (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ

Boccherini was a little less indulgent in his string quartets than in his string quintets, which are more numerous: here he could not allow so many fanciful flights for the cello into the upper reaches of the treble clef, nor could he create textures of quite such luxuriance. But the range of invention in these four works, composed in his compositional prime in 1780, is extraordinarily wide. The gem of this group is the A major work, with its graceful 6/8 opening, its pathetic, chromatic Andantino lentarello, its haunting little minuet with its echoing open E strings, and its brilliant and ebullient finale. This was recorded many, many years ago by the Carmirelli Quartet (for Decca), whose Boccherini style was a model. The present group, the Quartetto Borciani, probably play it more perfectly in a sense, but the magic isn't quite so well captured. Named after the leader of the much admired Quartetto Italiano, this group play in a manner close to their model, with passion, intensity and accuracy, and their soft playing is wonderfully smooth and controlled, with a fine, veiled sound. In the quick movements they are a little sharper, more incisive in articulation than sometimes seems ideal for this music (they use modern instruments), but certainly the result is enormously spirited. This is very fine quartet playing and immensely endearing music; one can hardly ask for more.

Cello Sonatas

Cello Sonatas – No 2 in C minor, G2b[b]; No 4 in A, G4[a]; No 10 in E flat, G10[a]; No 17 in C, G17[a]; No 23 in B flat, G565[b]
Richard Lester vc [a]David Watkin vc continuo
[b]Chi-Chi Nwanoku db
Hyperion CDA66719 (67 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●

Richard Lester's slightly impetuous playing of these sonatas seems to capture very happily their character: their somewhat wayward invention, their sense of being formalised versions of a cellist's improvisations. Yet beneath it is a strong rhythm and a very sure compositional technique. The music is very high-lying: the cellist has prolonged spells in high thumb positions with quite rapid passagework, and these Lester executes with great brilliance and crispness. The opening movement of the C major Sonata is a particularly fine piece, with its pensive moments and its sudden flights of fancy; there is an eloquent central Largo and a dashing, witty finale. Lester's bowing is vigorous, his tone warm and sharply defined with very little vibrato.

Usually these sonatas are accompanied by a keyboard but here the practice of using another string instrument is preferred. In two sonatas a double-bass is used: the effect is a bit gruff, with something of a chasm between top and bottom when the cello is in its upper reaches. The two cellos are much more persuasive, especially when the second is as supportively played as it is here.

Harpsichord Sonatas, G25-30

Six Sonatas for Harpsichord with Violin, G25-30 🅿
Jacques Ogg hpd Emilio Moreno vn
Glossa GCD920306 (77 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●

Boccherini originally wrote these six sonatas for violin and fortepiano but eventually published them, with modifications, for violin and harpsichord. This may have been for commercial reasons, since he was at that time (1768) in Paris where the harpsichord was still in greater favour – though their dedicatee, Mme Brillan de Jouy, was a talented player of both keyboard instruments. The freedom of the writing in the violin parts confirms that her partner, André Noël Pagin, was no less gifted. They remain his only works for this instrumental combination. These are not sonatas in the fully 'classical' sense – thematic material often reappears in different keys but is not significantly developed, and two of the six have only two movements.

These sonatas are beautifully played and recorded with an intimacy suggestive of that of the salons in which they were performed in their own time. For the most part the music is lightly pleasing but in the Adagio of G25 and the Largo of G26 it digs more deeply. The warm sound of Jacques Ogg's harpsichord (by Adlam Burnett, after Blanchet) and the lower pitch to which the instruments are tuned, make it a sympathetic partner to Emilio Moreno's violin (Antonio Gagliano, Naples, *c*1760). This is a most desirable disc and, moreover, the only available recording of these sonatas.

Stabat mater, G532

Boccherini Stabat mater, G532 (1800 vers)[a]
Astorga Stabat mater[b]
Susan Gritton, [a]Sarah Fox sops Susan Bickley mez
Paul Agnew ten [b]Peter Harvey bass
[b]The King's Consort Choir; The King's Consort / Robert King
Hyperion CDA67108 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1998 ●

These settings of the same text by two Italian composers (more exactly, Sicilian in the case of Astorga), who spent much of their lives in Spain, vary from each other both by the different groupings of the lines into movements and by the stylistic changes that had taken place in music in the course of the at least half century that separates them. Astorga's earlier setting has a good deal more contrapuntal writing, especially in three of its four choruses, as well as some diversity of style: more ornate in the double duet 'Quis est homo' and, in particular, the extremely florid, almost operatic, final 'Amen', but gently pathetic in the instrumental introduction and the soprano solo 'Sancta mater'. Intensity of feeling is heard in the duet stanza voicing the desire to weep with the distraught Mary, and the chorus sings expressively throughout, though 'Virgo virginum praeclara' sounds altogether too cheerful, and in the initial chorus the tenor line obtrudes rather edgily. Boccherini's is by far the more remarkable and beautiful setting. Originally written in 1781 for solo soprano, it was expanded in 1800 for three solo voices: fears that this could lead to a more 'symphonic' sound are dispelled by King's use of only seven instrumentalists. Robert King has a fine team of vocalists who on the whole blend well, an important consideration since only four of the 11 sections of the work are single-voice settings. The anguished melancholy of the opening and the grave serenity of the ending enclose a finely planned diversity of treatments, from the intense 'Quae moerebat' or the lyrical 'Fac ut portem' (both admirably sung by Sarah Fox) to the vigorous 'Tui nati' or the vehemently passionate 'Fac me plagis vulnerari' (for all three singers). The performance is accomplished and polished, but the recording venue tends to amplify singers' higher notes out of proportion.

Arrigo Boito Italian 1842-1918

GROVE Boito is best remembered for his one completed opera, Mefistofele, and for his collaborations with Verdi. He studied composition and aesthetics at the Milan Conservatory, then travelled, meeting Verdi in Paris. In Milan from 1862, and associated with the Scapigliatura, a radical literary movement, he wrote ironic poetry and erudite criticism decrying the state of Italian art. Although the first version of the five-act Mefistofele had a catastrophic première under his own direction in 1868, with revisions the work triumphed at Bologna, Venice and, in 1881, La Scala. It was through the efforts of the publisher Giulio Ricordi in 1879 that a successful Shakespearean collaboration, and what was to be a deepening friendship, began between Verdi and Boito. The librettos for Otello (1887) and Falstaff (1893), the second even more polished than the first, are remarkable for their fidelity to Shakespeare, sense of proportion, wit and vividness. His other well-known librettos include those for La Gioconda (set by Ponchielli,1876) and for the 1881 revision of Verdi's Simon Boccanegra. In the 1890s Verdi encouraged Boito to complete his own second opera, Nerone, but he never did, lacking the confidence and musical proficiency to realize his ambitions (the work was performed in an edited version in 1924). As a music critic in the 1860s, he praised Mendelssohn and Meyerbeer and treated Verdi with respect; later he was less than enthusiastic about Wagner and showed antipathy for Richard Strauss.

Mefistofele

Cesare Siepi bass Mefistofele; Mario del Monaco ten Faust; Renata Tebaldi sop Margherita; Floriana Cavalli sop Elena; Lucia Danieli mez Marta, Pantalis; Piero De Palma ten Wagner, Nereo Chorus and Orchestra of the Santa Cecilia Academy / Tullio Serafin H

Decca Grand Opera ② 440 054-2DMO2 Ⓜ

(141 minutes: ADD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1958 ●

This recording has in Siepi a real Italian bass with a fine sense of line and a genuine enjoyment of Boito's words. Phrases that are often merely snarled are here truly sung, and Siepi's is the only devil to suggest in the quartet that he is trying to seduce Martha, and that he will very probably succeed. There is incisiveness and grain there, too, to add menace to his suavity. Tebaldi gives one of the best accounts of 'L'altra notte' on record, strongly sung and very touching in its suggestion of grieving guilt. Del Monaco sings 'Dai campi, dai prati' without the slightest acknowledgement of its poetry, but the splendour of the sound and his instinctive feeling for legato have their own allure, and they give nobility to his finely phrased 'Giunto sul passo estremo'. The recording doesn't allow Serafin to make a sonic spectacular of the outer scenes, but his care for Boito's often rather old-fashioned cantabile, his quirky rhythms and orchestral colours is scrupulous throughout.

Alexander Borodin Russian 1833-1887

GROVE As a youth Borodin developed parallel interests in music and chemistry, teaching himself the cello and qualifying in medicine (1856); throughout his life music was subordinated to his research and his activities as a lecturer (from 1862) at the Medico-Surgical Academy in St Petersburg. His predilection for the music of Mendelssohn and Schumann, together with his acquaintance with Musorgsky, Cui, Rimsky-Korsakov, Liszt and above all Balakirev gave shape to his compositional efforts. It was mainly through Balakirev's influence that he turned towards Russian nationalism, using Russian folksong in his music; he was one of 'The Five', the group eager to create a distinctive nationalist school.

Borodin's earliest completed works include the First Symphony in E flat (1867), showing a freshness and assurance that brought immediate acclaim, and No 2 in B minor (1876) which, though longer in the making, is one of the boldest and most colourful symphonies of the century, in the Russian context a mature, symphonic counterpart to Glinka's Ruslan and Lyudmila. The piece contributing most to his early fame, however, especially in western Europe, was the short orchestral 'musical picture' On the Steppes of Central Asia (1880; dedicated to Liszt). Among the important chamber pieces, including those works which give the lie most clearly to charges of inspired dilettantism still sometimes brought against him, are the early Piano Quintet in C minor (1862) – already showing the supple lyricism, smooth texture, neat design and heartfelt elegiac quality of his most characteristic music – and the two string quartets, the second famous for its beautiful Nocturne, with their craftsmanship and latent muscularity. His most substantial achievement was undoubtedly the opera Prince Igor (written over the period 1869-87; completed and partly orchestrated by Rimsky-Korsakov and Glazunov). Despite its protracted creation and weak, disjointed libretto (Borodin's own), it contains abundant musical richness in its individual arias, in its powerfully Russian atmosphere and its fine choral scenes crowned by the barbaric splendour of the Polovtsian Dances.

Symphonies

Symphonies – No 1 in E flat; No 2 in B minor; No 3 in A minor. Prince Igor – Overture; Dance of the Polovtsian Maidens; Polovtsian Dances. String Quartet No 2 in D – Notturno (orch N Tcherepnin). In the Steppes of Central Asia. Petite Suite (orch Glazunov)
Torgny Sporsén bass Gothenburg Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Neeme Järvi
DG ② 435 757-2GH2 (148 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1989-91 ●

While it is possible to imagine performances of even greater power and finesse in this strangely unfashionable repertoire, Järvi's Borodin set is arguably the best in recent years. We get not just the symphonies but a rich supplement of orchestral works, including even the Petite Suite as arranged by Glazunov.

Järvi plays the First Symphony for all its worth, with DG's big, resonant sound boosting the work's symphonic credentials. The unfinished Third is also tougher and more dramatic than usual, no mere pastoral reverie in Järvi's interventionist view. The Second Symphony is rather different, suitably epic and yet unusually long-drawn and thoughtful. Thus, the Scherzo is bubbling but sensibly articulate, while the Andante is daringly broad with a superbly sensitive horn solo.

Nikolay Tcherepnin's orchestration of the famous Notturno will astonish those familiar with the chaste original: Tcherepnin transforms it into an exotic Scriabin-like tableau, almost as remote from Borodin as its kitschy Kismet mutation. The more recognizable Steppes are negotiated with ample eloquence and the Prince Igor excerpts include a brief contribution from the great Khan himself, reminding us of the music's original operatic context.

Additional recommendation

Symphony No 2[a]

Coupling: Symphony No 3 (unfinished)[b]. Prince Igor – Overture; Polovtsian Dances[c]
[a]London Symphony Orchestra / Martinon [b]Suisse Romande Orchestra / Ansermet [c]LSO / Solti Decca Eloquence 467 482-2 (66 minutes: ADD; Ⓑ
recorded 1961-66) ●

Martinon draws a thrilling performance from the LSO, an orchestra on top form. Solti's contributions are equalling thrilling – what playing!

String Quartet No 2 in A

Borodin String Quartet No 2[a]
Shostakovich String Quartet No 8 in C minor, Op 110[a]
Tchaikovsky String Quartet No 1 in D, Op 11[b]
[a]Borodin Quartet (Rostislav Dubinsky, Jaroslav Alexandrov vns Dmitri Shebalin va Valentin Berlinsk, vc); [b]Gabrieli Quartet (Kenneth Sillito, Brendan O'Reilly vns Ian Jewel va Keith Harvey vc)
Decca 425 541-2DM (76 minutes: ADD). Ⓜ
Recorded [a]1962 and [b]1976 ●

A slightly curious compilation (two Russian performances from 1962, one English from 1976) but attractive and very good value. The Borodin Quartet plays its eponymous composer's affectionate tribute to his wife with a charming demureness shading the ardour, and in the sharply characterized finale manages even to hint that Shostakovich will be the next composer on the programme. He is, and its reading of his Eighth Quartet is nobly expressive as well as exhaustingly virtuoso. As a tiny bonus for Shostakovich scholars there is even an interesting variant reading towards the end of the third movement. If you have not heard the Gabrieli's Tchaikovsky before, you will probably like it a great deal: properly chamber-scale, in colour as well as tone of voice, and nice underlining of the lyricism even in Tchaikovsky's most exuberant pages. The recordings still sound very well.

Prince Igor

Mikhail Kit bar Igor; Galina Gorchakova sop Yaroslavna; Gegam Grigorian ten Vladimir; Vladimir Ognovenko bass Prince Galitzky; Bulat Minjelkiev bass Khan Kontchak; Olga Borodina mez Kontchakovna; Nikolai Gassiev ten Ovlour; Georgy Selezniev bass Skula; Konstantin Pluzhnikov ten Eroshka; Evgenia Perlasova mez Nurse; Tatyana Novikova sop Polovtsian Maiden; Kirov Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Valery Gergiev
Philips ③ 442 537-2PH3 (209 minutes: DDD).
Notes, text and translation included. Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●

Prince Igor, even after 18 years of work, remained unfinished at Borodin's death in 1887, and it was finally completed by Rimsky-Korsakov and Glazunov. Borodin's main problem with Prince Igor was the daunting task of turning what was principally an undramatic subject into a convincing stage work. In many ways he never really succeeded in this and the end result comes over more as a series of epic scenes rather than a musical drama.

Despite this, however, one is left with an impression of a rounded whole, and it contains some of Borodin's most poignant and moving music, rich in oriental imagery and full of vitality. Curious things happen long before the official surprises of this vitally fresh Prince Igor, not least in the Overture, where Gergiev takes the horn's beautiful melody at a very slow pace. Gergiev is anxious to prepare us for the weighty events which follow and his particular point with the theme is to relate it to its place in the opera as the heart of Igor's great aria. There, in league with the bass-baritonal timbre of Gergiev's prince, Mikhail Kit, it solemnly underlines the fact that this is an aria of potency frustrated, sung by a hero who spends most of the opera in captivity; and that is further emphasized by a second aria which no listener will ever have heard before. It is the most significant of the passages discovered among Borodin's papers, rejected by Rimsky-Korsakov in his otherwise sensitive tribute to Borodin's memory but specially orchestrated for this recording by Yuri Faliek.

The other problem with the Prince Igor we already know is the way that Act 3 rather weakly follows its much more imposing Polovtsian predecessor. Gergiev obviates both that, and the problem of too much time initially spent in Igor's home town of Putivl, by referring to a structural outline of Borodin's dating from 1883 which proposes alternating the Russian and Polovtsian acts. In the theatre, we might still want the famous Polovtsian divertissement as a centrepiece; but on the recording the new order works splendidly, not least because Gergiev is at his fluent best in the scenes of Galitzky's dissipation and Yaroslavna's despair, now making up the opera's Second Act. While Borodina executes Kontchakovna's seductive chromaticisms with astonishing breath control and focus of tone, Bulat Minjelkiev's Kontchak is a little too free and easy, at least next to Ognovenko's perfectly gauged Galitzky, a rogue who needs the extra rebellion music of the more recent version to show more threatening colours. There's just the right degree of relaxation, too, about his drunken supporters Skula and Eroshka. It takes two Russian character-singers to make sense of this pair – 'with our wine and our cunning we will never die in Russia', they tell us truthfully – and their comical capitulation on Igor's return wins respect for Borodin's daring happy-end transition here.

It's beautifully paced by Pluzhnikov, Selezniev and their conductor, and crowned by a choral cry of joy which brings a marvellous rush of tearful adrenalin. That leaves us with Gorchakova, so touching in Yaroslavna's first aria but not always projecting the text very vividly and clearly not at her best in the big scena of the last act. Still, in terms of long-term vision, orchestral detail and strength of ensemble, Gergiev is ahead of the competition.

Dmitry Bortnyansky

Ukrainian 1751-1825

GROVE Bortnyansky studied in Italy from 1769; his first operas were given there, 1776-78. Returning to Russia in 1779, he became Kapellmeister at the St Petersburg court and in 1796 director. His many Russian sacred pieces (later edited by Tchaikovsky) are notable for their Italianate lyricism and skilful counterpoint. He also wrote operas, cantatas and instrumental pieces, notably a Sinfonia concertante (1790).

Sacred Concertos

Sacred Concertos – No 17, How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts!; No 18, It is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord; No 19, The Lord said unto my Lord: sit thou at my right hand; No 20, In thee, O Lord, do I put my trust; No 21, He that dwelleth in the secret place of the most high; No 22, The Lord is my light and my salvation; No 23, Blessed is the people that know the joyful sound

Russian State Symphonic Cappella / Valéry Polyansky

Chandos CHAN9840 (66 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ

Texts and translations included. Recorded 1989-90 ●

Bortnyansky has been mostly ignored in the West until quite recently. Tchaikovsky's disparaging comments on editing his sacred concertos also show he was not universally appreciated in his native Russia, but he has never lost his place in the repertoire of the Russian Orthodox Church and, as this series shows, these works are finely crafted pieces with an endless variety of invention.

This is Volume 3, and it contains some real gems. Concerto No 19 is a locus classicus of Bortnyansky's considerable lyrical power, though he also employs his neo-Baroque fugal writing to impressive effect, but No 20 is even more convincing, each movement containing a sub-structure characterised by different musical moods. Tchaikovsky complained that the concertos used 'stagey or even operatic' techniques, and that is quite true, but it is done, as one may hear in No 22, with consummate elegance. The Russian State Symphonic Cappella understand this music, in all its manifestations, completely, responding to its subtlest nuances.

Sacred Concertos for Double Choir – No 1, I will praise thee; No 2, Praise ye the Lord; No 3, Come and behold the works of God; No 4, Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord?; No 5, The heavens declare the glory of God; No 6, What God is greater?; No 7, Glory to God in the highest; No 8, Ye people, sing a song; No 9, Praise ye the Lord; No 10, My heart is fortified

Russian State Symphonic Cappella / Valeri Polyansky

Chandos CHAN9922 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Notes, texts and translations included

Recorded c2001

The Russian State Symphonic Cappella under the energetic direction of Polyansky continue their traversal of Bortnyansky's monumental production of sacred concertos with an entire disc devoted to those for double choir. As always, Bortnyansky delights in the contrasting of textures and dynamics in a spontaneous way that very frequently recalls a composer such as Handel. The joyous antiphonal writing to be found in many of the works on this recording reinforce this impression, and the style is meat and drink to Polyansky's singers.

The feeling of cohesion in the Seventh, for example (Glory to God in the highest), is achieved, in spite of the colourful contrasts that characterise the work, completely naturally and convincingly. While grand quasi-operatic moments such as the first movement of the Fifth and the often Bachian writing characteristic of, for example, the Eighth, are given suitably splendid and powerful renditions, the more reflective passages – which are far more abundant in the works in double-choir format than one might suppose – are also sung with tremendous sensitivity, and a vital feeling of sheer vocal strength underlying those pianissimos, as one may hear beautifully demonstrated in the Ninth.

Without a doubt this is another triumph in a series that has definitively rehabilitated the much-maligned Bortnyansky in Western eyes.

Rutland Boughton British 1878-1960

GROVE Boughton studied briefly at the RCM but was mostly self-taught. While teaching in Birmingham (1905-11) he developed his ideas on the basis of Wagner and William Morris socialism, and put them into practice at his Glastonbury festivals (1914-27), where several of his operas were first produced, including The Immortal Hour (1914); this had immense success when staged in London in 1922. After the collapse of the Glastonbury venture he retired to farm, write and compose, and in 1945 completed his Arthurian cycle of five operas, in which Wagnerianism gives way to a simpler folk-song manner.

The Immortal Hour

Roderick Kennedy bass Dalua; Anne Dawson sop Etain; David Wilson-Johnson bar Eochaidh; Maldwyn Davies ten Midir Geoffrey Mitchell Choir; English Chamber Orchestra / Alan G Melville
Hyperion ② CDD22040 (125 minutes: DDD). Ⓜ
Notes and text included. Recorded 1983

The Immortal Hour is part of theatrical folklore: in London in the early 1920s it ran, unprecedentedly, for 216 consecutive performances and, shortly afterwards, for a further 160 at the first of several revivals; within a decade it had been played a thousand times. Many in those audiences returned repeatedly, fascinated by the other-worldly mystery of the plot (it concerns the love of a mortal king, Eochaidh, for the faery princess Etain and the destruction of their happiness by her nostalgic longing for the Land of the Ever Young) and by the gentle, lyrical simplicity of its music. In the bleak aftermath of 1918, with civil war in Ireland, political instability at home and the names of Hitler, Mussolini and Stalin emerging from obscurity into the headlines, what blessed escapism this blend of Celtic myth and folk-tinged pentatonic sweetness must have been. Boughton's score still has the power to evoke that world, immediately and effortlessly.

It is quiet, sweet music, muted in colour and softly plaintive, and whenever the plot demands more than this the opera sags. Midir, the visitant from the Land of the Ever Young who lures Etain away from the mortal world, really needs music of dangerously heady, Dionysiac incandescence, but Boughton's vocabulary can run to nothing more transported than the prettily lilting Faery Song and to some pages of folksy lyricism with a few showy high notes. No less seriously the music has little dramatic grip. Despite all this, and the consequent evocation of a mythology that is at times a lot closer to Never-Never-Land than to Tir-na-n'Og, The Immortal Hour does have a quality, difficult to define, that is genuinely alluring. It is there in the touching purity of Etain's music (and how movingly Anne Dawson sings the role). It is there in the moments of true darkness that the music achieves: Dalua, the tormented Lord of Shadow conjures up something of the sombre shudder of the supernatural world. The performance could hardly speak more eloquently for the opera. Alan G Melville allows the music to emerge from and retreat into shadowy silences, all the principal singers are accomplished and the superb chorus has been placed so as to evoke a sense of space.

Lili Boulanger French 1893-1918

GROVE Boulanger studied at the Paris Conservatoire and won the Prix de Rome. Her composing life was short but productive: most important are her psalm settings and other large-scale choral works in a strong, subtle style.

Psalms

Psalms – 24[b]; 129[d]; 130, 'Du fond de l'abîme'[abd]. Pour les funérailles d'un soldat[cd]. D'un soir triste. D'un matin du printemps. Vieille prière bouddhique[bd]
[a]Sonia de Beaufort mez [b]Martial Defontaine ten [c]Vincent le Texier bar [d]Namur Symphonic Chorus; Luxembourg Philharmonic Orchestra / Mark Stringer
Timpani 1C1046 (67 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1998 Ⓕ ●

The name of the remarkable teacher and conductor Nadia Boulanger is famous throughout the musical world, but her sister Lili (six years younger), phenomenally gifted – she was the first woman to win the Premier Prix de Rome (while Nadia had attained only a Second Prix) – showed promise of at least equal distinction. Always of delicate health, her death at the age of 24 was a tragedy for music. Apart from works written in her early teens, which she later destroyed, her composing career lasted a mere seven years; but the quality of these compositions is arresting.

Except for parts of D'un matin du printemps (originally for violin and piano, and orchestrated only two months before her death), a grave, even sombre air permeates her works, which are heavily tinged with modal thinking. Her idiom is strong, with a bold harmonic sense and an individual feeling for scoring (her stirring Psalm 24, for example, has the unusual combination of brass, timpani, harp and organ with the male voices): the beatific ending of Psalm 129 is heart-easing after the earlier harshness of 'Hard as they have harried me, they have not overcome me' (words significantly applicable to her own determined spirit). Her choral works are comparable to the best of Roussel or Honegger, but her Psalm 130 (dedicated to her father's memory), with its exotic scale and chromaticisms, has more affinity with Bloch and is, without much doubt, a masterpiece. A disc not to be missed.

Faust et Hélène

D'un matin du printemps. D'un soir triste. Faust et Hélène[a]. Psalm 24[b]. Psalm 130, 'Du fond de l'abîme'[c]
[a]Lynne Dawson sop [c]Ann Murray mez [a]Bonaventura Bottone, [bc]Neil MacKenzie tens [a]Jason Howard bar [bc]City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra Chorus; BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Yan Pascal Tortelier
Chandos CHAN9745 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1999 ●●●

This disc largely duplicates Mark Stringer's programme on the Timpani label mentioned above (inevitably, since in her mere 24 years of life Lili's output was limited). The performances here are first-class, and splendidly recorded too. The eloquent sombreness of D'un soir triste tugs at the heart, D'un matin du printemps is deliciously airy and optimistic, Psalm 24 is given tremendous attack by orchestra and chorus and the powerful Psalm 130 is presented as the masterly, heartfelt work it is. The major work here, though, is the 30-minute cantata Faust et Hélène in its first recording. No wonder that it won the 1913 Premier Prix de Rome: the jury must have been thunderstruck by the maturity of this entry from a 19-year-old. It blends lyricism of striking beauty, rapturous fervour, emotional anguish and tense drama with, for a young composer, an astonishing sureness of touch in overall structure, freshness of invention, technical brilliance and imaginative scoring. It seems to have inspired the present performers, among whom it is almost invidious to praise Bonaventura Bottone.

Pierre Boulez

French 1925

Boulez studied with Messiaen at the Paris Conservatoire (1942-45) and privately with Andrée Vaurabourg and René Leibowitz, inheriting Messiaen's concern with rhythm, non-developing forms and extra-European music along with the Schoenberg tradition of Leibowitz. The clash of the two influences lies behind such intense, disruptive works as his first two piano sonatas (1946, 1948) and Livre pour quatuor for string quartet (1949). The violence of his early music also suited that of René Char's poetry in the cantatas Le visage nuptial (1946) and Le soleil des eaux (1948), though through this highly charged style he was working towards an objective serial control of rhythm, loudness and tone colour that was achieved in the Structures for two pianos (1952). At this time he came to know Stockhausen, with whom he became a leader of the European avant garde, teaching at Darmstadt (1955-67) and elsewhere, and creating one of the key postwar works in his Le marteau sans maître (1954). Once more to poems by Char, the work is for contralto with alto flute, viola, guitar and percussion: a typical ensemble of middle-range instruments with an emphasis on struck and plucked sounds. The filtering of Boulez's earlier manner through his 'tonal serialism' produces a work of feverish speed, unrest and elegance.

In the mid-1950s Boulez extended his activities to conducting. He had been Barrault's musical director since 1946 and in 1954 under Barrault's aegis he set up a concert series, the Domaine Musical, to provide a platform for new music. By the mid-1960s he was appearing widely as a conductor, becoming chief conductor of the BBC SO (1971-74) and the New York PO (1971-78). Meanwhile his creative output declined. Under the influence of Mallarmé he had embarked on three big aleatory works after Le marteau, but of these the Third Piano Sonata (1957) remains a fragment and Pli selon pli for soprano and orchestra (1962) has been repeatedly revised; only a second book of Structures for two pianos (1961) has been definitively finished. Other works, notably Eclat/Multiples for tuned percussion ensemble and orchestra, also remain in progress, as if the open-endedness of Boulez's proliferating musical world had committed him to incompleteness. Only the severe memorial Rituel for orchestra (1975) has escaped that fate.

Since the mid-1970s Boulez has concentrated on his work as director of the Institut de Recherche et Coordination Acoustique/Musique, a computer studio in Paris where his main work has been Répons for orchestra and digital equipment.

...explosante-fixe...

12 Notations[a]. Structures pour deux pianos, Livre 2[b]. ...explosante-fix ...[c]
[c]Sophie Cherrier, [c]Emmanuelle Ophèle, [c]Pierre-André Valade fls [ab]Pierre-Laurent Aimard, [b]Florent Boffard pfs Ensemble InterContemporain, Paris / Pierre Boulez
DG 445 833-2GH (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993-94

Though he may well disapprove of the designation, in ...explosante-fixe... Pierre Boulez has written one of the great flute concertos of the 20th or any other century. At nearly 37 minutes it is also probably the longest, and the expansiveness of the score gives the lie to all those tales about Boulez's reluctance to compose. He has never lacked for ideas: he has just been unusually fastidious in his concern to do those ideas full justice. This is music of prodigious inventiveness – and if you believe Boulez incapable of lyricism, try ...explosante-fixe... from as early as 1'50". Its primary concern is with the possibility of enhancing natural sound by electronic means. There are no sound effects, no funny noises, but a subtle enrichment of pitch and tone colour as the principal flute and its two satellites interact with ensemble and electronics in music that moves absorbingly between turbulence and poetic reflection in Boulez's uniquely personal way. This is a brilliantly engineered recording. No less engaging are Notations and Structures, Livre 2, the former revealing the very early Boulez's debts to Debussy, Stravinsky and Bartók, the latter displaying the full, formidable power of his still-youthful originality. For both books of Structures one still has to turn to the pioneering recording by the Kontarsky brothers on Wergo, but Livre 2 can well stand alone, and here Pierre-Laurent Aimard and Florent Boffard provide a finely characterised reading, as gripping in explosiveness as in restraint. Superb.

Répons

Répons. Dialogue de l'ombre double[a]
[a]Alain Damiens cl Frédérique Cambreling hp Vincent Bauer vib Daniel Ciampolini, Michel Cerutti perc Dimitri Vassilakis, Florent Boffard pfs Ensemble InterContemporain / Pierre Boulez
DG 20/21 457 605-2GH (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●

In 1981, Répons was hailed as a breakthrough in the integration of instruments and electronics in a dynamic sound continuum. It is thus not only groundbreaking but also supremely relevant as a model of what it was possible to do creatively with sound in the late 20th century. The version here is the third, from 1984 although further expansions are always possible. A 24-piece ensemble is enclosed by the audience, who are in turn surrounded by six instrumental soloists, a physical immersion in sound startlingly conveyed here by the spatialisateur computer programme. Only the soloists are electronically transformed, and these 'real time' processes make the musical textures as sensuous as they are complex. Within this convincing overall trajectory, two sections – track 5, with the piano accumulating layers of sound at a relentless rate, and track 10, where the soloists' spiralling resonances carry their own expressive current – are as satisfying musically as anything Boulez has achieved. Dialogue de l'ombre double introduces a theatrical dimension, the clarinet's electronic double gradually becoming more mobile and more 'real' than the actual soloist.

Rituel in memoriam Bruno Maderna

Rituel in memoriam Bruno Maderna[a]. Eclat/Multiples[b]
[a]BBC Symphony Orchestra, [b]Ensemble Intercontemporain / Pierre Boulez
Sony Classical SMK45839 (52 minutes: ADD/DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1976-82

Whatever is involved in the 20-bit technology used by Sony Classical to enhance the original CBS recordings of these works, the result is a very immediate and clear sound-picture. The sound does justice to a disc that can be recommended without reservation: magisterial performances by fine musicians of two masterworks by a leading contemporary composer. Boulez's casting off of post-Debussian refinements in Eclat/Multiples is enormously invigorating, and there is little of the stately, Messiaen-like processional writing that dominates Rituel. Here, two very different facets of Boulez's musical personality come into mutually illuminating confrontation, and this recording is frustrating only to the extent that the work itself remains unfinished. Maybe what is most radical about Boulez is that Western music's traditional concern with preparing and achieving a definitive ending has ceased to be necessary. In which case, of course, the conclusiveness with which Rituel draws to a close could represent a concession to convention that he now regrets. In its CD transfer Rituel seems more than ever in thrall to the chiming, clattering percussion spread through the orchestra, which shepherds the various instrumental groups like so many anxious guardians. The source of Rituel lies in Boulez's tribute to Stravinsky, and the music – a massive public act of mourning, not a private expression of grief – is in some respects more appropriate as a memorial for the great Russian than for the genial Maderna. Solemn, hieratic, carved from blocks of harmonic marble by a master musical sculptor, Rituel is a fitting homage for a composer who learned to keep his emotions under strict control.

Sur Incises

Awards 2001

D'un Anthèmes 2[a]. Messagesquisse[b]
Sur Incises[c]
[a]Hae-Sun Kang vn [ab]Jean-Guihen Queyras vc [a]Andrew Gerzso elec [bc]Ensemble InterContemporain / Pierre Boulez
DG 20/21 463 475-2GH Ⓕ
(66 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1999 ●●●

Combine three pianos and three harps with a range of metal percussion, and the result is like a magically enhanced keyboard, intensely resonant, but with the kind of incisive, cutting edge to the sound suggested by the title Sur Incises. Incises was a piano piece on which Boulez based this work, composed between 1996 and 1998. It's divided into two substantial movements or – as Boulez ironically titles them – 'Moments', implying that the immediate event and context matter more than the way events and contexts combine to create large-scale forms. Yet there's unambiguous evidence of larger-scale shaping in the way the second 'Moment' offers a wider range of more broadly characterised material than the first, and it builds to a stunning climax in which boiling cascades of sound erupt volcanically, before the cooling and calming process through which Sur Incises ends.

For all its richness, the range of tone colours in Sur Incises is narrower than in those later works which involve electroacoustics, and this dimension is represented here by the relatively small-scale Anthèmes 2. This supremely well-performed disc is completed by the short 'sketched message' for seven cellos which Boulez wrote to celebrate Paul Sacher's 70th birthday in 1976. The music brilliantly characterises those oppositions between refinement and ferocity which form the essence of Boulez's distinctive style. An outstanding disc.

Piano Sonatas

Piano Sonatas Nos 1-3
Idil Biret pf Ⓢ
Naxos 8 553353 (64 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1995 ●

It sometimes seems as if Boulez has spent a lifetime paying the penalty for having found composition so easy as a young man. The first two piano sonatas, works of his early twenties, are formidably assured in technique and tremendously rich in ideas. Those sections of the Third Sonata released for performance sound cold and tentative by comparison. Or is it that the Third Sonata's much more extreme rejection of tradition is itself a triumph, an authentic modernity that stands out the more prominently for its individualism? Such thoughts are inspired by Idil Biret's absorbing disc. In the first movement of the First Sonata the broader picture proves to be well fleshed-out, the argument kept on the move, the young composer's impatience and arrogance palpable in Biret's steely touch and the rather dry but never merely harsh recorded sound.

The Second Sonata is no less confidently played. The power of the Second Sonata suggests why such experiments as No 3 represents could never be a last word for Boulez. This disc is not the first to bring us the three sonatas together, but Biret's musical persuasiveness, and the up-to-date sound, earn it a strong recommendation.

Pli selon pli

Awards 1983

Phyllis Bryn-Julson sop
BBC Symphony Orchestra / Pierre Boulez
Ultima 8573-84248-2 Ⓑ
(68 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1981 ●●●

Pli selon pli, composed between 1957-62, is one of the great pillars of post-war musical modernism. It is also as exciting in its moment-to-moment shifts of colour and contour, and as compelling in its command of large-scale dramatic design as anything composed since the great years of Schoenberg and Stravinsky. Easy, no: enthralling and rewarding – yes. This is no grand, single-minded work in the great Germanic symphonic tradition, but a sequence of distinct yet balanced responses to aspects of the great symbolist poet Mallarmé. On his second recording of the piece, Boulez is prepared to let the music expand and resonate, the two large orchestral tapestries enclosing three 'Improvisations', smaller-scale vocal movements in which the authority and expressiveness of Phyllis Bryn-Julson is heard to great advantage. The sound is brilliantly wide-ranging and well balanced, and while the contrast between delicacy and almost delirious density embodied in Pli selon pli does take some getting used to, to miss it is to miss one of modern music's most original masterworks. His first version has a special historical status as embodying the composer's view of the work near the time of its actual completion, when forcefulness, and even ferocity, seemed to count for more as foils to the music's moments of relative restraint than the sustained densities so strongly emphasised in the Erato recording.

Pli selon Pli
Christine Schäfer sop Ensemble InterContemporain / Pierre Boulez
DG 20/21 471 344-2GH (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, texts and translations included
Recorded 2000 ●

This is the third recording of Pli selon pli, with the Ensemble InterContemporain expanded to 57 players, fitting the composer's definitive conception of the work as enhanced chamber music. Moreover, this is in effect a first recording, since it incorporates the revisions which Boulez made to the first and fourth movements during the 1980s. The recording was, as Boulez wryly notes, the result of assiduous preparation, with no insecurity or 'panic'. It is indeed a remarkably polished, gravely expressive account, as if Boulez now sees his 'portrait of Mallarmé' more as a ritual homage to the radical 19th-century poet than as a multivalent, urgent, even angry sketch of the kind of intransigent creativity that all too few of Boulez's contemporaries were committing themselves to at the time of the work's genesis (1957-60). But, even without panic, there can be no such thing as a sanitised, lushly comforting Pli selon Pli. The music remains Boulez's most extended engagement with the modernist aesthetic.

The recording is technically immaculate, with the intricate tapestry woven around guitar, mandolin and harps and the labyrinthine interactions between families of flutes, horns and lower strings especially well managed. Christine Schäfer sings serenely and securely, with an admirable poetic presence. Although one can imagine other performances recapturing more of the score's original fire and fury, this is an imposing representation of a work which sums up the composer's vision of art and life in the years before he found his way to a viable electro-acoustic technique and a more stable view of musical structure.

York Bowen British 1884-1961

Bowen studied at the Royal College of Music, London, played the violin and horn and became known as a fine pianist and a productive composer who wrote in a Romantic style and in many forms: as well as numerous chamber works and works for solo piano he also wrote three piano concertos.

String Quartets

String Quartets – No 2 in D minor, Op 41;
No 3 in G, Op 46*b*. Phantasy Quintet, Op 93[a]
[a]Timothy Lines bcl Archaeus Quartet
(Ann Hooley, Bridget Davey vns
Elizabeth Turnbull va Martin Thomas vc)
British Music Society BMS426CD Ⓕ
(70 minutes: DDD). Recorded c2001

Published in 1922 after scooping a Carnegie Trust Award, York Bowen's Second String Quartet proves a most endearing discovery. Brimful of sweet-toothed yet never cloying melodic charm and written with consummate virtuosity for the medium, it's a fluent, poised and readily assimilable creation which merits immediate investigation by anyone with a penchant for, say, Bax or Korngold. Its unpublished successor was probably conceived about the same time and again boasts a wealth of big-hearted, felicitous invention. Both works follow the same Classical ground-plan, comprising two soundly constructed, sonata-form outer movements which frame a tenderly reflective slow movement in straightforward ternary form, and both certainly merit their resuscitation here. A similar technical mastery, harmonic pungency and generously lyrical cast inform Bowen's later Phantasy Quintet for the unusual (indeed unique?) combination of bass clarinet and string quartet, a single-movement essay of considerable imagination and frequently haunting beauty.

The Archaeus Quartet are sterling advocates of all this rewarding material. Timothy Lines, too, contributes most sensitively in the Quintet, and the sound is vivid to match. A stimulating and enjoyable release.

Further listening
Bowen Flute Sonata
Couplings: Arnold Flute Sonata L Berkeley Sonatina Hamilton Spring Days D Matthews Duet Variations Maw Sonatina
Khaner fl Abramovic pf
Avie AV0016 (65 minutes: DDD). Recorded 2002 Ⓕ

Flute recitals don't come much more absorbing. The Bowen Sonata is a real discovery; a strong and characterful piece full of Gallic lyricism, underpinned with ample, and always interesting, keyboard writing. A fascinating programme.

Violin Sonatas

Viola Sonatas – No 1 in C minor; No 2 in F.
Phantasy, Op 54
James Boyd va Bengt Forsberg pf
Dutton Laboratories Epoch CDLX7126 Ⓜ
(72 minutes: DDD). Recorded c2002

A valuable survey of three early Bowen offerings fashioned for that great British violist, Lionel Tertis (1876-1975). Not surprisingly, given Tertis's phenomenal technique and tone-production, each piece here makes exceptional demands. Happily, James Boyd is fully equal to the task. What's more, he forges a marvellously eloquent alliance with Bengt Forsberg, their playing brimful of affectionate understanding while retaining a sense of freshness in discovery.

Both sonatas date from 1905 and were premièred at London's Aeolian Hall by Tertis, with the 21-year-old composer at the piano, in May 1905 and February 1906 respectively. Described by its dedicatee as 'a vivacious and light-hearted work', the First Sonata comprises an expansive and confident Allegro moderato, a songful slow movement in ternary form (whose principal melody hints at Lowell Mason's 1856 hymn-tune for Nearer, my God, to Thee) and an unusually meaty finale, where sheer high spirits win out in the end. Its F major successor follows pretty much the same pattern, though the slow movement now quarries a darker vein of expression, while the concluding Allegro giocoso yields plenty of opportunity for cheeky display. Boasting admirable sound and balance, this is a gem of a disc.

William Boyce British 1711-1779

GROVE Boyce was a St Paul's Cathedral chorister and an organ pupil of Maurice Greene, also studying with Pepusch. From 1734 he held organist's posts in London and from 1736 was a composer to the Chapel Royal, writing anthems and services. His oratorio David's Lamentation over Saul and Jonathan (1736) was followed by his first dramatic works, including a short opera, Peleus and Thetis (by1740), The Secular Masque (1746) and the highly successful pastoral The Chaplet (1749), the first of a series of works for Drury Lane theatre. Increasing deafness hindered him – his last stage work was Heart of Oak (1759) – but his output in other vocal genres continued, and as Master of the King's Musick from 1757 he composed over 40 court odes. Among his few instrumental works are 12 trio sonatas (1747), Eight Symphonys (from ode and opera overtures, 1735-41, published 1760) and Twelve Overtures (1770). Boyce was among the finest and most respected English composers of his time, though his Baroque idiom had become old-fashioned by the end of his life. His music has a fresh vigour, especially evident in fugues, dance movements and expressive vocal writing. The owner of a valuable music library, he gained lasting fame for his Cathedral Music (1760-73), an edition of earlier English services by Orlando Gibbons, Purcell and others.

Eight Symphonys, Op 2

The English Concert / Trevor Pinnock hpd 🅿
Archiv Produktion 419 631-2AH (60 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1986 ◉

William Boyce's eight Symphonys (his own spelling) are not symphonies in the modern sense but a collection, issued for concert use, of overtures he had composed over nearly 20 years for theatre pieces and court odes. They represent English 18th-century music at its unpretentious best, notably in their formal unorthodoxy. The performances are a delight – cleanly articulated, decisive in rhythm, just in tempo. The French overture-like movements that open Nos 6 and 7 are crisp and brilliant; the more Italianate first movements, like those of Nos 2 and 4, have a splendid swing. And the tone of gentle melancholy behind the fine, expansive D minor first movement of No 8 is particularly well caught. Three of the symphonies have middle movements marked Vivace, which often leads conductors into unsuitably quick tempos; but Pinnock obviously knows that, in 18th-century England, Vivace meant a speed not much above Andante, and for once these movements make proper sense: they are lively, to be sure, but not fast. This disc comfortably surpasses any rivals in both style and accomplishment. The sound of the modest-sized band is brightly and truly reproduced.

David's Lamentation

David's Lamentation over Saul and Jonathan 🅿
(Dublin vers[a] and London vers excs[b]).
Ode for St Cecilia's Day[c]
[c]Patrick Burrowes treb William Purefoy, [a]Andrew Watts countertens [ab]Richard Edgar-Wilson ten [c]Michael George bar New College Choir Oxford; Hanover Band / Graham Lea-Cox
ASV Gaudeamus CDGAU208 (80 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999

This third disc in ASV's excellent Boyce series offers a wholly unfamiliar work, indeed one that shows an unfamiliar side of the composer. In David's Lamentation over Saul and Jonathan, written in 1736, when he was 24, Boyce is in elegiac vein. It starts with a sombre G minor overture, using the typical 'lamentation' bass, falling chromatically, and that is followed by a succession of choruses and airs, in sorrowful tone and minor keys, telling the tale of Israel's defeat and the deaths of Saul and Jonathan – and the slaying of the Amalekite. Of course, it is hardly on the emotional or dramatic scale of Handel's oratorio of three years later (of which the action of this work forms an episode), but Boyce's musical language is, on its more modest canvas, telling, and the work is full of moving and affecting ideas.

The version given here, as the main text, incorporates Boyce's revisions for a Dublin performance in 1744 (sensibly, the altered numbers are also included in their original form as an appendix). Boyce in more familiar vein is represented by the Cecilian ode. Graham Lea-Cox, as before, directs this music with authority and obvious affection; the rhythms are sturdy, and the particular flavour of the music of perhaps the greatest English 18th-century composer is happily captured.

He is helped by a capable band, the admirable choir of New College, and an accomplished team of soloists. Michael George is in good voice and gets his best chance in the ode, with his energetic account of 'In war's fierce alarms'; and Richard Edgar-Wilson shows a full, elegant tenor in his airs in the cantata. Of the two high men's voices William Purefoy produces some soft and sweet-toned, uncommonly even singing, and Andrew Watts, higher in tessitura, fine in line, excels in the poignant numbers. Overall, then, a most enjoyable disc.

Peleus and Thetis

Peleus and Thetis. Corydon and Miranda 🅿
Incidental music – Florizel and Perdita; Romeo and Juliet
Julia Gooding, Philippa Hyde sops Robin Blaze counterten Joseph Cornwell ten Andrew Dale Forbes bass Jilly Bond, Jack Edwards spkrs
Opera Restor'd / Peter Holman hpd
Hyperion CDA66935 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1996

Boyce was in his time one of the leading theatre composers. Peleus and Thetis is a short masque, based on a simple story reminiscent of Acis and Galatea, except that here the jealous Jupiter resigns his amorous claims on Thetis on learning that her son would outshine his father (he was of course Achilles). Among the best moments are Peleus's spirited song of defiance, Jupiter's fine, richly contrapuntal one of renunciation and the lovers' duet at the end. Boyce's music has a flavour all its own, and at its best a very appealing one; Peter Holman conducts the piece in lively fashion, and uses singers with a good command of the style. Two of the other items are incidental music to Shakespeare productions. The little amorous competition of Mopsa and Dorcas for The Winter's Tale (in Florizel and Perdita) recall Purcell. It is sung here in something of a brogue, which would probably be more persuasive on stage than on a recording. Then there is a dirge for Romeo and Juliet, a touching, richly harmonised setting of words as Juliet's body is carried across the stage. The 'Pastoral interlude', Corydon and Miranda, in which a shepherd chooses between rival claimants for his love, consists of four airs, mostly in a simple, melodious style, but a final fiery one for the girl who loses, linked by recitative, and a final chorus. It isn't great music, but it is tuneful, in a very English way. All in all, a very agreeable disc.

Joly Braga Santos

Portuguese 1924-1988

GROVE Braga Santos studied with Luis de Freitas Branco, who was a great influence on him, and has worked in Lisbon as a composer, conductor, teacher (at the conservatory) and critic. At the end of the 1950s his music became affected by newer European trends; his works include operas, symphonies and concertos.

Symphonies Nos 1 and 5

Portuguese Symphony Orchestra / Alvaro Cassuto
Marco Polo 8 223879 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

Portugal has never figured large in our musical consciousness in England, and until relatively recently the name of Joly Braga Santos had been all but unrepresented in the catalogue. His output was considerable and the disc suggests that a symphonist of some stature has been overlooked. His First Symphony, created in 1946 at the age of 22 in memory of those fallen in the Second World War, is couched in a largely modal idiom with some kinship to Sibelius and, more particularly, Vaughan Williams, and reveals a gift for structure, highly effective orchestration and for the writing of long, flowing melodic lines. But the Fifth Symphony of 20 years later – of which there was once a Decca LP recording – is a totally different matter. Scored for a huge orchestra including a percussion section of 12 who in the fascinating second movement handle an absolute forest of marimbas, it colourfully reflects the composer's visit to Mozambique and is written in a wilder, completely atonal but not dodecaphonic idiom – though it ends unexpectedly on a chord of F major. The composer's close friend Alvaro Cassuto has moulded the orchestra into a body of international quality. The recorded sound is fantastic, especially in the Fifth's massive, cataclysmic finale.

Symphonies Nos 3 and 6

Symphonies Nos 3 and No 6^{a}
^{a}Ana Ester Neves sop ^{a}São Carlos National Theatre Chorus; Portuguese Symphony Orchestra / Alvaro Cassuto
Marco Polo 8 225087 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1997 ●

Here we have one work from each of Brago Santos's two contrasting compositional periods. Symphony No 3 (written in 1949) is bound together by a number of common motifs: it is a closely reasoned, strikingly scored work of modal tendencies (occasionally bringing Vaughan Williams to mind); the Allegro section of its finale is centred on a brilliant double fugue. A strong, virile symphony whose stature can be ranked with Sibelius – not to be missed! His Sixth (and last) symphony (1972) is in one movement but several sections, and is curiously disparate in character and idiom. For two-thirds of its length it is purely orchestral, aggressively atonal and disjunctive, with numerous angry outbursts; then it suddenly changes tack to a more consonant choral section and a peaceful, entirely tonal movement for soprano, both settings (in the Galician tongue) of poems by the 16th-century Camões. In both works, performance and recording are first-rate.

Johannes Brahms

German 1833-1897

GROVE Brahms studied the piano from the age of seven and theory and composition (with Eduard Marxsen) from 13, gaining experience as an arranger for his father's light orchestra while absorbing the popular alla zingarese style associated with Hungarian folk music. In 1853, on a tour with the Hungarian violinist Reményi, he met Joseph Joachim and Liszt; Joachim, who became a lifelong friend, encouraged him to meet Schumann. Brahms's artistic kinship with Robert Schumann and his profound romantic passion (later mellowing to veneration) for Clara Schumann, 14 years his elder, never left him. After a time in Düsseldorf he worked in Detmold, settling in Hamburg in 1859 to direct a women's chorus. Though well known as a pianist he had trouble finding recognition as a composer, largely owing to his outspoken opposition – borne out in his D minor Piano Concerto Op 15 – to the aesthetic principles of Liszt and the New German School. But his hopes for an official conducting post in Hamburg (never fulfilled) were strengthened by growing appreciation of his creative efforts, especially the two orchestral serenades, the Handel Variations for piano and the early piano quartets. He finally won a position of influence in 1863-64, as director of the Vienna Singakademie, concentrating on historical and modern à cappella works. Around this time he met Wagner, but their opposed stances precluded anything like friendship. Besides giving concerts of his own music, he made tours throughout northern and central Europe and began teaching the piano. He settled permanently in Vienna in 1868.

Brahms's urge to hold an official position (connected in his mind with notions of social respectability) was again met by a brief conductorship – in 1872-73 of the Vienna Gesellschaftskonzerte – but the practical demands of the job conflicted with his even more intense longing to compose. Both the German Requiem (first complete performance, 1869) and the Variations on the St Antony Chorale (1873) were rapturously acclaimed, bringing international renown and financial security. Honours from home and abroad stimulated a spate of masterpieces, including the First (1876) and Second (1877) Symphonies, the Violin Concerto (1878), the songs of Opp 69-72 and the C major Trio. In 1881 Hans von Bülow became a valued colleague and supporter, 'lending' Brahms the fine Meiningen court orchestra to rehearse his new works, notably the Fourth Symphony (1885). At Bad Ischl, his favourite summer resort, he composed a series of important chamber works. By 1890 he had resolved to stop composing but nevertheless produced in 1891-94 some of his best instrumental pieces, inspired by the clarinettist Richard Mühlfeld. Soon after Clara's death in 1896 he died from cancer, aged 63, and was buried in Vienna.

Fundamentally reserved, logical and studious, Brahms was fond of taut forms in his music, though he used genre distinctions loosely. In the piano music, for example, which chronologically encircles his vocal output, the dividing lines between ballade and rhapsody, and capriccio and intermezzo, are vague; such terms refer more to expressive character than to musical form. As in other media, his most important development technique in the piano music is variation, whether used independently (simple melodic alteration and thematic cross-reference) or to create a large integrated cycle in which successive variations contain their own thematic transformation (as in the Handel Variations).

If producing chamber works without piano caused him difficulty, these pieces contain some of his most ingenious music, including the Clarinet Quintet and the three string quartets. Of the other chamber music, the eloquent pair of string sextets, the serious C minor Piano Quartet Op 60 (known to be autobiographical), the richly imaginative Piano Quintet and the fluent Clarinet Trio Op 114 are noteworthy. The confidence to finish and present his First Symphony took Brahms 15 years for worries over not only his orchestral technique but the work's strongly Classical lines at a time when programmatic symphonies were becoming fashionable; his closely worked score led him to be hailed as Beethoven's true heir. In all four symphonies he is entirely personal in his choice of material, structural manipulation of themes and warm but lucid scoring. All four move from a weighty opening movement through loosely connected inner movements to a monumental finale. Here again his use of strict form, for example the ground bass scheme in the finale of the Fouth Symphony, is not only discreet but astonishingly effective. Among the concertos, the four-movement Second Piano Concerto in B flat – on a grandly symphonic scale, demanding both physically and intellectually – and the Violin Concerto (dedicated to Joachim and lyrical as well as brilliant) are important, as is the nobly rhetorical Double Concerto.

Brahms's greatest vocal work, and a work central to his career, is the German Requiem (1868), combining mixed chorus, solo voices and full orchestra in a deeply felt, non-denominational statement of faith. More Romantic are the Schicksalslied and the Alto Rhapsody. Between these large choral works and the many a cappella ones showing his informed appreciation of Renaissance and Baroque polyphony (he was a diligent collector, scholar and editor of old music) stand the justly popular Zigeunerlieder (in modified gypsy style) and the ländler -like Liebeslieder waltzes with piano accompaniment. His best-loved songs include, besides the narrative Magelone cycle and the sublime Vier ernste Gesänge, Mainacht, Feldeinsamkeit and Immer leiser wird mein Schlummer.

Violin Concerto in D, Op 77

Violin Concerto
Violin Sonata No 3 in D minor, Op 108
Maxim Vengerov vn
Chicago Symphony Orchestra /
Daniel Barenboim pf
Teldec 0630-17144-2 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded live in 1997-98 ●●

Until this recording, Maxim Vengerov's success had rested largely on the Russian romantic and 20th-century repertory, but here he tackles one of the most formidable war-horses of the central repertory, and emerges equally triumphant. It is a live recording, and it has the feel of one in its tension, the sense of immediate, spontaneous expression, the magnetism, the excitement. It is a performance of extremes, just as felicitous in bravura as in lyrical purity, with wide tonal contrasts. It adds to the feeling of freshness and new discovery that Vengerov uses a formidable cadenza he has written himself. In the slow movement he is light and flexibly songful, with rubato sounding completely natural, and the finale, taken fast, has a joyful swagger, with a little agogic hesitation before the accented chord each time in the third phrase of the theme, which underlines its folk-like quality. The coupling is an inspired one too, with Barenboim in a double role, freely spontaneous. As for Vengerov, he brings out the mystery in the sonata, as well as the power. The recording of both works is clear and full, with the violin not unduly spotlit.

Brahms Violin Concerto
Schumann Violin Concerto in D minor, Op posth
Joshua Bell vn
Cleveland Orchestra / Christoph von Dohnányi
Decca 444 811-2DH (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●

Bell's first entry in the Brahms instantly reveals the soloist's love of bravura display, his gift for turning a phrase individually in a way that catches the ear, always sounding spontaneous, never self-conscious. Regularly one registers moments of new magic, not least when, in the most delicate half-tones, pianissimos seem to convey an inner communion, after which the impact of bravura fortissimos is all the more dramatic. He rounds off the movement with his own big cadenza and a magically hushed link into the coda, rapt and intense. The slow movement, sweet and songful, gains too from Bell's love of playing really softly, not least in stratospheric registers. In the finale the vein of fantasy is less apparent. Next to others this can seem a little plain. Dohnányi and the Cleveland Orchestra provide weighty and sympathetic support and the generous Schumann coupling in another commanding performance adds to the attractions of the disc. There too Dohnányi and the Cleveland Orchestra add to the weight and dramatic impact of a performance that defies the old idea of this as an impossibly flawed piece, with Bell bringing out charm as well as power. The central slow movement has a rapt intensity rarely matched, and the dance-rhythms of the finale have fantasy as well as jauntiness and jollity, with Bell again revelling in the bravura writing. The recording is full-bodied and well balanced.

Brahms Violin Concerto
Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto in D, Op 35
Jascha Heifetz vn
Chicago Symphony Orchestra / Fritz Reiner
RCA Victor Living Stereo 09026 61495-2 Ⓜ
(64 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1955 and 1957 ●

This combination appears unbeatable. You may think that Reiner starts the opening tutti at an extraordinarily quick speed – until you remember that he is going to accompany no less a virtuoso than Heifetz, so he is merely taking it to match his soloist's performance. You will like this if you think that this concerto is too often played in the kind of 'autumnal' manner often attributed to Brahms's compositions but which really should not apply to many of them. With Heifetz it is played with respect but without any kind of reverent hushed awe. The slow movement is lovely and the finale is a winner, the playing of an exuberant young man, yet Heifetz was over 50 when he made this record. Reiner conducts the fast movement with a fiery rhythmic impetus that incandescently matches the exhilarating, yet unforced bravura of his great soloist. It is confident throughout – and just listen to his real staccato, a rare thing from violinists.

The RCA recording comes up extraordinarily well – although the soloist is balanced forwardly, he is naturally focused and the Chicago acoustic ensures a convincing concert-hall balance. If anything, the remastering of the Tchaikovsky is even more remarkable, considering that originally Heifetz was apparently placed right up against the microphone. One soon adapts to the closeness when the fiddle-playing is so peerless; and Heifetz colours Tchaikovsky's melodies ravishingly.

Additional recommendation
Violin Concerto[a]
Coupling: Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto in D, Op 35
Oistrakh vn [a]London Philharmonic Orchestra / Sargent; [b]Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Del Mar
BBC Legends / IMG Artists mono BBCL4102-2 (74 minutes: ADD). Recorded live in [b]1960, [a]1961 Ⓕ

Fiddle buffs will need no prompting. Oistrakh gives it buckets of empathy and plays with exceedingly warm tone. His muscle-ripping first entry, where he pulls on the tempo so as to maximise a feeling of power, has colossal impact. The Tchaikovsky is a feisty and dangerous performance, with Del Mar whipping up an accelerating storm.

Violin Concerto / Double Concerto, Op 102

Violin Concerto[a]
Double Concerto in A minor, Op 102
Gil Shaham vn Jian Wang vc Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
DG Ⓟ 469 529-2GH (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
[a]Recorded live at the Philharmonie, Berlin in May 2000

Modern digital recordings of this generous coupling are rare, Kremer and Clemens Hagen on Teldec being the most notable one (reviewed below). Now comes Gil Shaham in a live recording of the Violin Concerto which in its urgency and sense of drama is one of the most impressive for a long time, coupled with a comparably strong and warm reading of the Double Concerto. Even in the opening tutti of the Violin Concerto Abbado establishes the incisiveness which is a mark of the whole performance. The tempo is a shade brisker than has become common, markedly so than that set by Haitink in the Szeryng version, and Shaham's first entry is comparably dramatic, bringing out the total contrast when he relaxes into the soloist's first lyrical statement of the main theme, a magical moment of transition. It is a reading marked by high contrasts not just of dynamic but of mood, all set within relatively consistent speeds.

Shaham crowns his performance with a brilliant account of the finale, a daringly fast Allegro which consistently brings out the second marking, giocoso, underlining the impulsive folk-dance element with a hint of wildness, in which he finds a perfect ally in Abbado.

There are similar qualities in this performance of the Double Concerto, which, though not recorded live, has similar tensions and sense of spontaneity simulating a live experience. Jian Wang's big opening solo is expansive, though not as much as Hagen's on the Teldec disc. Shaham and Abbado bring power as well as expressiveness, establishing this far more firmly as a first-movement Allegro. As for the slow movement, that brings the most extreme contrast between Shaham/Wang and Kremer/Hagen, with the latter taking almost two minutes less in a cool, almost perfunctory account. Altogether this is an outstanding issue and a clear recommendation.

Violin Concerto
Double Concerto in A minor, Op 102
Gidon Kremer vn Clemens Hagen vc

Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra / Nikolaus Harnoncourt
Teldec 0630-13137-2 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded live in 1996-97 ●●

A radical rethink of two great concertos and as good a justification as any for repertoire duplication. These captivating performances illustrate Harnoncourt's habitual fondness for tapered phrase-shaping and pin-sharp articulation. Kremer's first entry in the Violin Concerto is bold and forceful, and yet listen to his sensitive handling of the triplets at 4'43" or his knowing interpretation of Brahms's prescribed piano lusingando at 14'50" and the degree of his perception soon registers. He plays a startlingly original 1903 cadenza by Enescu and takes a swift view of the Andante, albeit one that is both lissom and flexible. The finale, on the other hand, suggests the impulsive gaiety of a Hungarian dance (the charming 'hiccup' that characterizes the opening theme is fairly typical), with fast speeds and rugged textures. Generally, it is a more daring, less overtly 'virtuoso' Violin Concerto than other versions.

In the Double Concerto Clemens Hagen employs a subtle, variegated tonal palette and Harnoncourt underlines the concerto's symphonic dimensions (especially in the first movement). The Andante second movement moves on, lasting 6'06", and the effect suggests parallels with the piano Intermezzos. Intimate interludes abound but one senses, above all, great strength of purpose, particularly in the return of the first theme. Harnoncourt, Kremer, Hagen and the orchestra invest both concertos with a wealth of insights, leaving nothing to chance but within a highly spontaneous interpretative framework. Like Harnoncourt's Brahms symphonies, they will usefully supplement – if not always challenge – other fine (perhaps sweeter-toned) recordings. The sound is pleasingly ambient, with precious few coughs or extraneous noises and no applause.

Double Concerto, Op 102

Double Concerto
Piano Quartet No 3 in C minor, Op 60
Isaac Stern vn Yo-Yo Ma vc
Jaime Laredo va Emanuel Ax pf
Chicago Symphony Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
CBS Masterworks MK42387 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1986 ●

The grave, declamatory utterances at the beginning of the Double Concerto tell us much about the nature of what will follow. They can also reveal a great deal about the two soloists who enter in turn with solo cadenzas separated by thematic orchestral material. It is the much younger man, Yo-Yo Ma, who brings out most strongly the noble gravity of the composer's inspiration, while the relatively veteran Isaac Stern is more melodious and spontaneous-sounding. The music's steady but unhurried paragraphs are very well handled by Abbado and the excellent Chicago Symphony Orchestra is responsive and pretty faithfully balanced with the soloists. This is a performance to satisfy rather than to thrill, but satisfy it does. The recording is rich and rather reverberant.

The powerful C minor Piano Quartet is also well played and provides a substantial partner to the Concerto.

Brahms Double Concerto
Schumann Cello Concerto in A minor, Op 129
Ilya Kaler vn Maria Kliegel vc
National Symphony Orchestra of Ireland / Andrew Constantine
Naxos 8 550938 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1994

The Brahms and Schumann concertos make an excellent and apt coupling, here given warmly spontaneous-sounding performances, very well recorded. The violinist, Ilya Kaler, is as clean in attack and intonation as Maria Kliegel. Kliegel in her opening cadenza allows herself full freedom, but any feeling that this is to be an easygoing, small-scale reading is dispelled in the main Allegro, which is clean and fresh, sharp in attack, helped by full-bodied sound. Kaler and Kliegel make the second subject tenderly expressive without having to use exaggerated rubato. Similarly there is no self-indulgence in the soaring main melody of the central Andante, but no lack of warmth or tenderness either. The finale is then unhurried but has dance-rhythms so beautifully sprung and such delicate pointing of phrases that any lack of animal excitement is amply replaced by wit and a sense of fun.

In the Schumann Kliegel takes a spacious, lyrical view of the first movement, using a soft-grained tone at the start with wide vibrato. She then builds up the power of the performance, and with Constantine providing sympathetic accompaniment, the spontaneous expression is most compelling. So, too, is the simple, dedicated playing in the central Langsam, and, as in the Brahms, Kliegel brings witty pointing to the finale, not least in the second subject. The balance of the soloists is good.

Piano Concertos

No 1 in D minor, Op 15; No 2 in B flat, Op 83

Piano Concertos Nos 1 & 2
Lieder, Op 91. Fünf Lieder, Op 105
Stephen Kovacevich pf Ann Murray mez Nobuko Imai va London Philharmonic Orchestra / Wolfgang Sawallisch
EMI Double Forte ② 575655-2 (DDD) Ⓜ
Texts and translations included ●●●
Concerto No 1 won a Gramophone Award in 1993

This is an altogether exceptional account of this leonine, beautiful, but often elusive work. It is one of those profoundly musical performances, thought out in a myriad small details, that at the same time flows freely and spontaneously from the minds and imaginations of musicians for whom the work is no longer a thing to be mastered but an experience to be wonderingly relived. The disc also offers the most imaginative and raptly performed fill-ups imaginable on a Brahms concerto record.

Kovacevich has recorded the Second Concerto before, with Davis and the LSO in 1979 (for Philips), but his account here is cooler and more detached than his earlier reading. This may in part be an impression fostered by the EMI recording which seems thinner-toned and marginally more distant than the Philips. (Always a risk with a pianist whose skills include the ability to play with an extraordinary inner fineness of timbre and dynamic.) But it's also the conducting. There's a touch of coolness about the orchestral playing that you don't get from rival versions. Having said that, Kovacevich plays with great buoyancy, brilliance and charm. It is playing after the manner of Solomon; and it just about works.

Piano Concertos Nos 1 and 2
Seven Piano Pieces, Op 116
Emil Gilels pf
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Eugen Jochum
DG The Originals ② 447 446-2GOR2 Ⓜ
(125 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1972-75 ●●
No 2 also available on DG Panorama ② Ⓜ
469 298-2GP2 (coupled with Symphony No 1, Haydn Variations and Hungarian Dances)

The booklet-notes make reference to the original Gramophone review, in which Gilels and Jochum were praised for 'a rapt songfulness that in no way detracts from Brahms's heroism, and so comes closer to that unique and complex combination of attitudes that for me is Brahms more than any other performances of these concertos I have ever heard, on records or otherwise'. One might add that Jochum and the Berlin Philharmonic make plain sailing where others struggle with choppy cross-currents (admittedly sometimes to Brahms's advantage) and that the recordings don't sound their age. Other interpreters have perhaps probed a little deeper here and there; neither concerto rests content with a single interpretation, the Second especially. As for the Seven Piano Pieces, Gilels viewed the opus as a single piece, a musical novella in several chapters.

Piano Concertos[a] Nos 1 and 2
Scherzo in E flat minor, Op 4. Four Ballades, Op 10.
Eight Pieces, Op 76
Stephen Kovacevich pf
London Symphony Orchestra / Sir Colin Davis
Philips ② 442 109-2PM2 (141 minutes: ADD/DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded [a]1979 and 1983 ●●

This performance of the First is extremely fine. Stephen Kovacevich brings to it a vast amount of eloquence, tenderness and lyrical feeling and he is more poetic and imaginative than most of his rivals. In the slow movement there is much inwardness of feeling, without any attempt either to over- or understate the leonine, combative side of the solo part. Sir Colin Davis and the LSO give him sympathetic support and it is only a pity that although the balance between soloist and orchestra is well judged, the overall sound is opaque. If the recording had been as distinguished as the solo playing, this would have been a truly outstanding reading. But for those who are prepared to make allowances for the sound recording, this No 1 offers huge musical rewards.

However, the Second must be numbered among the very finest, and the recording is far more successful. The performance combines poetic feeling and intellectual strength in no small measure. The first movement unfolds without any false urgency and momentum; it is spacious, autumnal, reflective as well as majestic. The second movement is sparkling and fresh and it is difficult to recall a more beautiful account of the slow movement. In the Più adagio section he is quite magical, and in the bars that precede this, he is rapt and poetic without going over the top. There is wit, delicacy and poetry in the finale, too. As with the First Concerto, Davis provides impeccable support throughout and the unnamed cellist in the slow movement plays with both tenderness and nobility.

Brahms Piano Concerto No 1[a] H
Franck Symphonic Variations[b] Litolff Concerto symphonique No 4 in D minor, Op 102 – Scherzo[b]
Sir Clifford Curzon pf
[a]London Symphony Orchestra / George Szell;
[b]London Philharmonic Orchestra /
Sir Adrian Boult
Decca Legends 466 376-2DM (74 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded [a]1962, [b]1955 ●●

It is debatable as to whether there is any other recording of the D minor Concerto that so instantly takes fire and which burns thereafter with so pure and steady a flame. To all outward appearances, Curzon and Szell were an oddly contrasted couple; yet they worked wonderfully well together, in Mozart and here in Brahms. The 1962 recording still comes up phenomenally well, despite some occasional muzzling of the orchestra's bass texturing. A merciful muzzling, you might think, given the frequency with which Szell detects and detonates the small arsenal of explosive devices Brahms has hidden in the undergrowth. We obviously don't lack great recordings of this concerto but this 1962 Decca version remains as collectable as any. As for the fill-ups, the Franck is beginning to sound its age technically but the performance is charming. As for the Litolff, it's a gem of a performance, well recorded.

Brahms Piano Concerto No 1[a] H
Mozart Piano Concerto No 23 in A, K488[b]
Sir Clifford Curzon pf
National Symphony Orchestra / [a]Enrique Jordá,

ᵇBoyd Neel
Dutton Laboratories Essential Archive mono Ⓑ
CDEA5507 (72 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1945

Since Sir Clifford Curzon's recorded output is a slim volume of finely crafted work, there is nothing here that is not germane. The Brahms gets prime billing on the CD cover which initially may not seem like a good idea. Jordá's conducting is sensitive and sure-footed but workmanlike rather than inspired, the playing of the Orchestra marvellous in places but not 100 per cent reliable. Yet, for all that, you will find yourself listening spellbound to Curzon's playing. This is the Curzon who, aged 39, was only emerging into the full light of an international career after a long apprenticeship with such teachers as Artur Schnabel and Nadia Boulanger. Indeed, it is that very emergent quality which gives his performance a freshness and shy-voiced eloquence that sets the young Brahms vividly and appealingly before us.

It is the Mozart, though, which ravishes sense. This is a performance of rare lucidity and grace which has about it all the clarity and radiance of a revealed truth. It is also marvellously well accompanied. Boyd Neel was a master of clear texturing and balanced tempos. This isn't the Boyd Neel Orchestra itself, but it sounds like it. No doubt it contained many old friends. At the time there were stern things said about surface noise and extraneous whines on the original 78s of the Brahms. Dutton's flawless transfers suggest that Mike Dutton is either a miracle-worker or has had access to better copies. The Mozart seems to have been in pretty good sound from the very start. Happily so, since, in the last resort, the recording of the Brahms is a period relic. The Mozart, by contrast, is timeless. Which is why this is to be treasured as well as enjoyed.

Piano Concerto No 2. Four Ballades, Op 10
Emil Gilels pf
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Eugen Jochum
DG Classikon 439 466-2GCL (77 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1972 ●●
No 2 also available on DG Panorama Ⓜ②
469 298-2GP2 (coupled with Symphony No 1, Haydn Variations and Hungarian Dances; see also Concertos Nos 1 and 2 on DG Originals reviewed above)

This has excitement, breadth of vision, warmth and humanity in perfect balance. Gilels and Jochum bring such warmth and humanity to the score as well as a magisterial authority that they carry all before them. But Gilels can also be tender and delicate as well, as the slow movement and finale shows: the prevailing calm of the slow movement is exquisite and the Berlin solo cello contributes a good deal to its effect, while much of the playing in the finale is of the utmost delicacy. This is a great bargain and if you have not acquired Gilels's Second already, it is a 'must', whatever other versions you may already have. The digital remastering for CD has been entirely beneficial. The overall sound is fresher, the bass resonance very slightly modulated, but the rich Brahmsian textures remain satisfyingly full and the piano timbre is focused and natural. Moreover, we have extra bounty in Gilels's Ballades, again with good sound quality.

Piano Concerto No 2
Maurizio Pollini pf
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
DG 453 505-2GH (49 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1995 ●

Pollini's and Abbado's Second is among the most formidably single-minded on record. This does not mean a chilling exclusivity, one that, humanly speaking, omits too much in its quest for a crystalline perfection. On the contrary, the sense is of a granitic reading stripped of all surplus gesture, preening mannerism or overt display, intent only on the unveiling of a musical or moral truth. Again, this is hardly the sort of performance which allows you to savour this or that pianistic luxury, and there will be listeners who, more in love with pianism than with great music-making, will turn away.

Their opening at once suggests a promise of the epic journey to come and in that moment when, as Tovey once put it, 'the air seems full of whispering and the beating of mighty wings' their performance achieves a rare sense of transcendence, of an inspiration above and beyond the printed page. It is doubtful whether many artists have achieved such sublimity in the Andante where they combine, most notably in the Più adagio, to create an astonishing sense of 'the still centre of the turning world' (Tovey again). This recording is a memento of a grand occasion that stunned its audience – there is never a sneeze or sniffle – into submission. Here, surely, is a performance above the vagaries of changing taste and fashion.

21 Hungarian Dances

Stuttgart Radio Symphony Orchestra / Georges Prêtre
Forlane UCD16770 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

Georges Prêtre has been honorary guest conductor of the Stuttgart Radio Symphony Orchestra since 1995 and he brings a touch of Gallic flamboyance to these delightful, variously orchestrated dances. The playing is mostly spirited and responsive, and the recording pleasantly blended save that the brass are sometimes a mite recessed. The First Hungarian Dance is bouncy and keenly accented; the Fourth features a novel 'question-and-answer' effect between the two halves of the principal melody; the Fifth is more elegant than rustic; the 10th pleasingly vivacious; the 14th broad and bold (almost like a majestic fragment from one of Brahms's larger orchestral works); the 16th warmly impassioned (with some of the best string-playing on the disc) and the 20th employs some telling rubato. There is also a 'CD-ROM/extra multimedia' rehearsal and concert track – six minutes' worth – for use with your PC. An enjoyable disc.

Serenades

Brahms Serenade No 1 in D, Op 11
Stenhammar Serenade in F, Op 31
Royal Stockholm Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Andrew Davis
Finlandia 3984-25327-2 (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998

It is a lovely idea to pair these two delightful works, though most collectors who fancy Brahms's First Serenade will probably also want the Second. Yet the pairing with Stenhammar suggests many interesting points of contrast, not least a questing inventiveness that recalls Sweden's other estimable early symphonist, Franz Berwald. The very opening has a breezy, extrovert quality that recalls early Nielsen, but thereafter the twists and turns in Stenhammar's writing are more reminiscent of Sibelius, even Strauss or Reger. The waltz-like 'Canzonetta' is quietly melancholic, and the Scherzo is impishly playful (save for a sombre second episode that initially sounds like Deep River). The 'Notturno' fourth movement has the sort of absorbing fairy-tale atmosphere that recalls the glittering masterpieces of Rimsky's school. Stenhammar's original design incorporated six rather than five movements, but Davis makes as strong a case as anyone for the revision. He offers a lean, keen-edged reading that keeps squarely to the plot; the playing is expressive and energetic, and the recording captures it well.

The Brahms is an altogether more relaxed piece and is here given a fresh, unmannered reading, vigorous in the opening Allegro molto, bouncy in the closing Rondo and with plenty of light and shade between. Rather than make points merely for the sake of it, Davis keeps to a workable interpretative mean and has his players perform as if in a chamber ensemble. Again, the sound is unexceptional but pleasing.

Complete Symphonies

Staatskapelle Dresden / Kurt Sanderling 🏵
RCA Victor Classical Navigator ③ 74321 30367-2 (197 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1971-72
Also available separately: 74321 21285-2: No 1. Tragic Overture, Op 81. 74321 17894-2: Nos 2 and 3. 74321 24206-2: No 4. Haydn Variations, Op 56a Ⓑ
●●

Kurt Sanderling has recorded the Brahms symphonies twice (his first set, with the Berlin Symphony Orchestra, is available on Capriccio), but what started out as solid, patient and well built broadened significantly, and in doing so stressed the epic element that was always implicit in the first recordings: the first movement of the later First Symphony is slower than its predecessor by over two minutes. Sanderling's great strength is in the way he handles Brahms's choppy, obdurate string writing, whether in the First Symphony's strutting first movement Allegro or the opening Allegro non troppo of the Fourth. Tempos are consistently held firm, the lyrical passages allowed their due only within a solid structural frame (the Third Symphony's middle movement, for example) and first-movement repeats omitted. As ever, it's the Third Symphony that underlines specific interpretative differences between conductors – the first movement especially, a vigorous Allegro con brio that, for some reason or other, defeats even the greatest maestros. Sanderling takes a majestic, even marmoreal option that seems misguided: the gestures are grand, certainly, but the music remains rooted to earth. And if ever a piece said 'come fly with me', it is the first movement of Brahms's Third Symphony.

In short, Sanderling is sturdy, intelligently phrased, warmly played, fairly well recorded (the strings are a little grainy) and supplemented by equally well-considered accounts of the Haydn Variations and Tragic Overture.

Symphonies Nos 1-4. Variations on a Theme by Haydn. Tragic Overture, Op 81. Academic Festival Overture, Op 80. Hungarian Dances – No 1 in G minor; No 3 in F; No 10 in F. Serenades – No 1 in D, Op 11; No 2 in A, Op 16
Concertgebouw Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Philips Bernard Haitink Symphony Edition ④
442 068-2PB4 (291 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1970-80 ●

Concertgebouw standards at the time of Haitink's survey (1970-80) left little to be desired. Perhaps the clarinets don't always overcome reservations about their tone and intonation with the sensitivity of their phrasing; but the horns invariably do, and more often than not Brahms's favourite instrument is a source of joy in these recordings, blazing gloriously at appropriate moments (especially in the Fourth Symphony), or opening up and sustaining huge vistas in the 'dawn' of the First's finale. As to the strings, Haitink's insistence on firmly defined (though never over-emphatic) rhythms from the bass-lines up is altogether exceptional; there are countless examples, but most memorable of all is the cellos' and basses' ostinato that sees the Second Symphony's finale in the home straight. What an articulate, integrated Brahms sound this is, too; a case of conductor and engineers easily achieving their aims working in a familiar acoustic. The only movement you may initially find overly sober is the first of the Third Symphony, taken very broadly, though it is determined and imposing, and the launching of the coda is stupendously powerful. All in all, there is no better way of getting to know Brahms's orchestral works on a budget.

Symphonies Nos 1-4. Variations on a Theme by Haydn. Academic Festival Overture. Tragic Overture
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Nikolaus Harnoncourt
Teldec ③ 0630-13136-2 (214 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1996-97 ●●

Any fears that Nikolaus Harnoncourt's Brahms will be quirky, provocative or abrasive can be dispelled. There are interpretative novelties (freshly considered articulation and clarified counterpoint) and the Berlin strings project a smooth, curvaceous profile. Harnoncourt makes a beeline for the brass, and the horns in particular. The live recordings have remarkable presence and are mostly cough-free.

The First Symphony's opening Un poco sostenuto seems a trifle soft-grained but the pounding basses from bar 25 are beautifully caught and the first-movement Allegro is both powerful and broadly paced. The Andante sostenuto slow movement is both limpid and conversational, with trance-like dialogue between oboe and clarinet and sparing use of vibrato among the strings.

Harnoncourt makes real chamber music of the third movement, though he drives the trio section to a fierce climax, and the finale's first accelerating pizzicatos are truly stringendo poco a poco – the excitement certainly mounts, but only gradually.

The Second Symphony's first movement is relatively restrained. Harnoncourt's strategy is to deliver a sombre exposition and a toughened development. Again, the slow movement is fluid and intimate, with some tender string playing. The third movement's rustling trio is disarmingly delicate and the finale, tightly held, keenly inflected and heavily accented: the coda threatens to break free and the effect is thrilling.

First impressions of the Third suggest a marginal drop in intensity, yet the first movement's peroration is so powerful that one retrospectively suspects that everything prior to it was mere preparation. The middle movements work well but the rough-hewn, flexibly phrased finale really 'makes' the performance.

Like the Third, the Fourth opens with less import than some of its older rivals, yet the development intensifies perceptibly, the recapitulation's hushed piano dolce opening bars are held on the edge of a breath and the coda is recklessly headstrong. The slow movement has some heartfelt moments, the top-gear Scherzo is quite exhilarating and the finale, forged with the noble inevitability of a Baroque passacaglia. Ultimately, Harnoncourt delivers a fine and tragic Fourth.

Harnoncourt's Brahms is the perfect antidote to predictability and interpretative complacency.

Symphonies Nos 1-4
South West German Radio Symphony Orchestra / Sergiu Celibidache
DG ③ 459 635-2GH3 (166 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Includes bonus disc of rehearsal of Symphony No 4
Recorded live in 1974-76 ●

Most performances conducted by Sergiu Celibidache (or Celi as he was popularly known) harbour at least one incomparable 'Celi moment', and this set includes plenty. He could galvanise, mesmerise, enrapture and insinuate even the most bizarre interpretative ideas into your consciousness. As a musical magician, he was peerless; but as an exponent of the Classics, he constantly courted controversy. He abandoned the recording studio soon after the war, and it is only thanks to his son and family that the flood of pirate Celi CDs can at last be challenged by superior authorised alternatives. This particular set is better played and better produced than anything before it. The recorded balance is excellent. Textures are transparent (the woodwinds especially), instrumental perspectives are unusually true and the incredible force of fully scored passages is never compromised.

The First Symphony is awe-inspiring. The coda is broad, but it never drags and the slow movement is a minor miracle. It is another one of those moments, but there are more in store, notably in the finale, where slowly interweaving violin desks achieve a perfect diminuendo. Another occurs around the famous horn episode, where horns answer each other with incredible power. The celebrated string melody is leisurely and serene, but the tempo soon picks up and the rest of the movement is pure joy. All in all, this must be counted among the most imposing Brahms Firsts currently available.

Celi frequently alters Brahms's written dynamics. For example, near the beginning of the Second Symphony, where the strings take the lead, the horns remain much in evidence. The slow movement builds to an epic climax at 8'47" where full winds and brass declaim above a slow-moving tide of first-violin semiquavers, and the finale's accelerating coda is immensely exciting. Indeed, the whole score enjoys an unusually cogent interpretation.

By contrast, parts of the Third Symphony sound decidedly odd, yet there are some wonderful moments: the quieter episodes in the central development, the fire of the string playing in the recapitulation and the delicate balance of forces elsewhere. The Third's principal 'Celi moment' happens at 7'46" into the second movement, at the point where the strings draw a broad expressive arch, played here with the greatest intensity and mesmerising control. The finale receives a relatively straightforward reading, again with some first-rate string playing. But, viewed as a whole, this is not a Brahms Third to live with.

For the Fourth Symphony, in addition to the complete performance, we are treated to a full rehearsal of the opening Allegro non troppo where a fully 'fired-up' Celi takes the greatest pains over matters of rhythm and articulation. The slow, sweet centre of the movement is addressed in almost mystical terms, far more effectively in concert than in the rehearsal. Cumulatively, the Fourth Symphony is taut, intimate, transparent and rich in incident, and only sometimes deprived of the 'long' view. Remarkable, inspiring, exasperating – Celibidache was all of these, and more. And if the overall approach was sometimes excessively interventionist, you learn so much from listening that eccentricities soon cease to register. These discs enshrine the work of a man who obviously loved every note of Brahms's symphonies and was not afraid to express it.

Symphonies – Nos 1-4. Tragic Overture, Op 81.
Variations on a Theme by Haydn, 'St Antoni
Chorale', Op 56*a*
Philharmonia Orchestra / Arturo Toscanini
Testament mono ③ SBT3167 (200 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1952 ●●

The concerts recorded here preserve the two legendary occasions in the autumn of 1952 when in a Brahms cycle at the Royal Festival Hall Toscanini conducted the Philharmonia Orchestra, then only six years old but already the front runner among London orchestras. The recording itself, now legendary, has generated pirated versions, but never before has the original made by EMI, under the supervision of Walter Legge, been officially released. Testament's remastering is a revelation. This new set brings the clearest of demonstrations that the RCA recordings of Toscanini and the NBC Symphony Orchestra made during the last years of his life (including his Brahms cycle of the very same 12-month period) give only an imperfect picture of a conductor who at the time, and for a generation or so previously, was almost universally counted the greatest in the world. That reputation has been eroded over the years, but this issue may help to put the record straight.

Take for example the quite different NBC version of No 3 that he recorded in New York barely a month after this performance: as Alan Sanders says in his note, a 'rhythmically staid recording which entirely lacked the lyricism and eloquence of the Philharmonia performance'. His description points to the marked contrasts, not only in No 3 but in all four symphonies. Whereas the New York performances, resonant and superbly drilled, have a hardness and rigidity, with the dynamic contrasts ironed out, thus eliminating pianissimos (partly a question of recording balance), the Philharmonia's consistently bring a moulding of phrase and subtlety of rubato which bears out the regular Toscanini instructions to 'Sing!'. And in contrast with most Toscanini recordings, the hushed playing is magical. The New York players, by comparison, seem to have forgotten how to respond to the finer subtleties of this notorious taskmaster among conductors. The extra flexibility of the Philharmonia performances over the NBC has an interesting effect on tempo too. Whereas in No 1 the NBC speeds of 1951 are faster, not just than those of the Philharmonia but of the 1941 NBC performance, in the other three symphonies the Philharmonia timings tend to be a degree quicker, notably in No 3, where for example the Andante flows far better.

Walter Legge fought hard to get these live recordings officially released – now we can understand why.

Brahms Symphonies Nos 1[a] and 2-4[b] H
Variations on a Theme by Haydn[a]. Hungarian
Dances[a] – No 1 in G minor; No 3 in F; No 10 in F
Beethoven Overtures – Coriolan, Op 62[a];
Leonore No 2, Op 72[b]
[a]Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra; [b]Berlin
Philharmonic Orchestra / Wilhelm Furtwängler
EMI Références mono ③ CHS5 65513-2 Ⓜ
(219 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1948-56 ●●

These are extraordinary performances, the Third and Fourth Symphonies especially. In the Fourth it is almost as though Furtwängler, to a Berlin audience in 1948, were saying 'You still don't believe that this symphony is an appalling tragedy? Listen!' It is desperately serious from the very beginning: austere, big-phrased, with sober grace amidst the intensity, but also suspense, troubled anxiety. The coda is wildly turbulent, and ends in blackness. The slow movement begins in an unearthly hush, soon giving way to expressive warmth, but the rejoinder of the strings is unutterably poignant: the movement is a mourning procession, relieved only by vain defiance. And the Scherzo, which Brahms marked giocoso? More like grim determination. The finale is baleful, the strings returning to their intense eloquence, the chorale subdued and prayer-like, the fierce conflict terribly urgent, ending in bleak despair.

You might find the Third Symphony even more disturbing. Furtwängler notices all the music's hushed shadows; he explores them, lingers in them, and on emerging you realize that the Andante's serenity is not untroubled, that clouds are often apt to fall across the music's warm colours. The finale has a funereal tread, the noble string theme is determined, not relaxed or exuberant; there is a feverish quality that leaves the coda hushed.

In the First Symphony there is a palpable sense of Brahms confronting the shade of Beethoven. The theme of the finale is not radiant at its first appearance: after an almost distraught slow movement and a strangely unstable Scherzo (the whole symphony takes up where the first movement of Beethoven's Ninth left off, not its fourth) that theme will have to struggle for its victory. And thus, Furtwängler seems to say, the forest horns at the outset of the Second Symphony, the huge energy of its first movement, the intense, impulsive romanticism of its Adagio; hence the exuberant robustness of the finale: Brahms has earned this romantic richness by what he achieved in the First Symphony. Subjective? Of course, and anyone who objects to interpretations so subjective that they can rule out alternative views may dislike them very much indeed. But if one of a conductor's functions is to reveal the composer's intentions, another is to convince you that those intentions matter. Furtwängler's Third has the power to make you question whether it is as ripely autumnal as most seem to think; his Fourth could keep you awake at night; all four symphonies have a visionary urgency that can sweep you along with it.

They are all live recordings, with some audience noise; the strings are a bit acid at times, the climaxes occasionally dense, but you would probably gladly put up with far worse for performances as toweringly eloquent as these.

Additional recommendation
Complete Symphonies
Couplings: Violin Concerto[a]. Alto Rhapsody[b]. Hungarian Dances
[a]Hasson vn; [b]Greevy mez [a]LPO; Hallé Orchestra / Loughran
Classics for Pleasure ④ 575753-2 (4 hours 39 minutes: ADD). Recorded mid 1970s Ⓑ

Loughran's cycle had a very loyal following on LP. How does it sound some 25 years on? Pretty good. He understands how to build a Brahms symphony not only towards its climax but from its bass-line and his choice of tempo rarely falters. And No 2 is a sheer delight. Add a glorious Alto Rhapsody and a cultivated performance of the Concerto and you've a real bargain.

Symphony No 1

Brahms Symphony No 1
Schumann Symphony No 1 in B flat, Op 38, 'Spring'
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
DG The Originals 447 408-2GOR Ⓜ
76 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1964 and 1971

The first of Karajan's three Berlin Brahms cycles was, by general consent, his finest for DG. As to which was Karajan's finest 'phase' in general, only time will tell. Few would deny that this Brahms C minor Symphony has a 'halcyon days' feel. It is certainly present in the first two movements, the drive established in the main Allegro of the first (no repeat) allowing Karajan to relax for the second theme without loss of purpose. The second movement, ideally mobile, evolves freely and seamlessly, with masterfully graded wide dynamic contrasts felt rather than fashioned. Here, as elsewhere, this orchestra's tone production is even, rich and rounded. So far, so good. In the third movement, bar-by-bar dynamic contrasts are smoothed out, with the route to the Trio's climax taken as one very gradual crescendo. The finale's 'daybreak' is broad and awe-inspiring (with horn pitching that may be deemed not quite true). Karajan here has gauged tempo, dynamics and accentuation so the strings can articulate without strain; all very impressive, but his Allegro's progress is thus relatively short on attack, energy and the ability to fly.

The more you hear Karajan's Schumann First Symphony, the more convinced you may be that it is spring cultivated and monitored under laboratory conditions. The most unsettling of those conditions is an 'effect' common to a number of his 1970s DG Berlin recordings, namely, for a fairly closely balanced orchestra (particularly the strings, which are not entirely glare-free), as dynamic levels drop, to walk off several paces into a glowing Berlin sunset. The 'effect' also exaggerates the conductor's own contrasts, neither exactly redolent of the vitality and freshness of spring: the resolutely robust and measured delivery of the rustic forte, and the carefully crafted confection of his dolce piano.

Symphony No 1. Gesang der Parzen, Op 89
Berlin Radio Chorus; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
DG 431 790-2GH (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1990

Abbado's tempos are generally broad: his first movement boldly emphatic but he never stints on affection, and few would find fault with his warm, lyrical handling of the beautiful Andante, 'sostenuto', indeed! He ventures between the score's little nooks and crannies, highlighting small details without impeding the music's flow or weakening the performance's structure. When the finale breaks from Più andante to Allegro non troppo, ma con brio, Abbado really goes for the burn, very much as Furtwängler did before him. It's a truly inspired reading, grand but never grandiose; appreciative of Brahms's thick-set orchestration, but never stodgy. The fill-up is of enormous import, and opens with one of the composer's most inspired musical gestures: a bold, burgeoning Maestoso, anticipating the words 'The gods should be feared/by the human race ...'. Gesang der Parzen is a setting of a particularly unsettling poem by Goethe, one that warns how the uplifted have particular reason to fear the gods, those who 'turn their beneficent eyes away from whole races.' Abbado surely sensed the terrible truth of that prophecy, and his reading of Op 89 breathes a deeply disquieting air.

Brahms Symphony No 1 Ⓗ
Wagner Siegfried Idyll. Siegfried – Siegfried's horn-call
Dennis Brain hn
Philharmonia Orchestra / Guido Cantelli
Testament mono SBT1012 (62 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1947-53 ●

Cantelli conducts an interpretation which is free of any idiosyncrasy. Yet there is an extraordinary electricity in his conducting, a sense of concentration and conviction which lifts the performance into one of the greatest ever set down on record. The fiery young Italian makes the vintage Philharmonia play in an inspired fashion, and the 1953 mono recording is very acceptable. A slightly edgy string sound betrays the 1951 origin of the Siegfried Idyll recording, but the performance has a tenderness, warmth and eloquence which has never been surpassed. Dennis Brain's exuberant horn-call completes a very desirable Testament disc.

Symphonies Nos 2 and 3

Symphony No 2. Academic Festival Overture
New York Philharmonic Orchestra / Kurt Masur
Teldec 9031-77291-2 (50 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1992

Masur brings affection to the symphony. In the first movement he maintains a strong sense of line, and paces the music more objectively than Haitink. The structure is clearer, but there's also an unforced lyricism. The Adagio has a natural ebb and flow, and Masur makes the listener aware of the music's shape and argument very clearly. After a neatly pointed Allegretto the finale is given a beautifully balanced, strongly argued reading which eschews superficial excitement, but satisfies through the feeling of a symphonic argument brought to a logical conclusion. To sum up, Haitink caresses the music with more subjective warmth than Masur, whose reading by no means lacks affection, but is more architectural and objective. The New York Philharmonic responds to Masur with highly sensitive, very accomplished playing, and Teldec's attractively warm but clearly recorded disc is completed by a genial, uplifting Academic Festival Overture.

Symphony No 2. Alto Rhapsody, Op 53
Marjana Lipovšek contr Ernst Senff Choir; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
DG 427 643-2GH (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1988 ●

These sessions took place before the BPO elected Abbado as its Chief Conductor, but the orchestra responds to him with unmistakable enthusiasm. The BPO's sound under Abbado is different from the Karajan sound. It still has a wonderful depth and sonority, but whereas Karajan encouraged a homogeneous, ultra-refined quality Abbado persuades the orchestra to play with more separated, slightly lighter textures and greater translucency.

In the symphony's first movement Abbado opts for a good, spacious middle-of-the-road tempo, and lets the music unfold easily and lyrically, but with affectionate care. The music-making is quite unidiosyncratic and direct, but develops genuine fire and passion at climaxes. In the second movement the basic tempo is even a little on the slow side, but there is still an appealing lightness and a quiet, glowing quality in the orchestral sound. Abbado gently but firmly persuades the music on, maintaining an adroit balance between warmth of expression and clarity. The third movement has good balance and clarity, too, and if the middle section lacks its customary eager quality there is still plenty of vitality in the movement overall. The finale feels ever so slightly tame, and the climax doesn't quite have its usual impact. But in general it's a most satisfying performance of the symphony, very well recorded, adorned by Lipovšek's singing in the Alto Rhapsody. This has good tone and good sense – perhaps a slightly dry-eyed quality too – and Abbado's characterful conducting is impressive.

Symphony No 3. Tragic Overture, Op 81
Schicksalslied, Op 54
Ernst-Senff Choir; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Claudio Abbado
DG 429 765-2GH (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1989

This disc is gloriously programmed for straight-through listening. It gets off to a cracking start with an urgently impassioned Tragic Overture in which the credentials of the Berlin Philharmonic to make a richly idiomatic, Brahmsian sound are substantially reaffirmed. A wide-eyed, breathtaking account of the Schicksalslied ('Song of Destiny') follows to provide sound contrast before the wonders of the Third Symphony are freshly explored. This is a reading of the Symphony to be savoured; it is underpinned throughout by a rhythmic vitality which binds the four movements together with a forward thrust, making the end inevitable right from the opening bars. Even in the moments of repose and, especially, the warmly-felt Andante, Abbado never lets the music forget its ultimate goal. Despite this, there are many moments of wonderful solo and orchestral playing along the way in which there is time to delight, and Abbado seems to bring out that affable, Bohemian-woods, Dvořák-like element in Brahms's music to a peculiar degree in this performance. The Symphony is recorded with a particular richness and some may find the heady waltz of the third movement done too lushly, emphasized by Abbado's lingering tempo. Nevertheless, this is splendid stuff, and not to be missed.

Symphonies Nos 1a and 3b 🄷
[a]London Symphony Orchestra / Hermann Abendroth; [b]Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Clemens Krauss
Biddulph WHL052 (75 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded [a]1928, [b]1930

Symphonies Nos 2[a] and 3[b] 🄷
[a]New York Symphony Orchestra / Walter Damrosch; [b]London Symphony Orchestra / Hermann Abendroth
Biddulph WHL053 (79 minutes: ADD)
Recorded [a]1928, [b]1927 Ⓜ

Thank heavens for such independent labels as Biddulph and others like it, for were it not for their sterling efforts, valuable performances such as these would be lost. Much as we prize the Brahms of Furtwängler, Toscanini, Klemperer and Walter, anyone with active critical faculties – and the ability to listen 'through' old sound – is likely to enjoy Krauss, Abendroth or Damrosch virtually as much. All three conductors reflect a performing style that might well have been recognized by the composer himself. Flexibility is a constant attribute, though the three orchestras featured produce very different pooled sonorities. A good many of Abendroth's post-war East German recordings have latterly found their way on to CD, but most collectors will have first encountered the conductor through these Brahms 78s with the LSO. The original sound quality – although generally well balanced – is cramped and mono-dimensional, but the transfers make the best of a difficult job.

The First Symphony opens magisterially. The main body of the first movement is pliable but energetic, whereas the Andante sostenuto second movement flows nicely and the finale generates considerable visceral excitement. Abendroth leans on the initial upbeat of the big string tune then pushes forwards. Occasionally the tempo seems too fast, but the effect of Abendroth's approach is rugged and impulsive. The LSO's strings are more expressive than its rather acid woodwinds, the cellos being especially fine. As in the First Symphony, wide tempo fluctuations are conspicuous but convincing, save perhaps in the Passacaglia where the flow is sometimes impeded. Most of Brahms's dynamics are faithfully observed and Abendroth's treatment of the interrelationship of the movements perceptive.

Clemens Krauss was even more celebrated as an opera conductor than Abendroth, and his symphonic records are few and far between. This Vienna Philharmonic account of the Third is distinguished by taut string playing, glorious contributions from the horn section and an unselfconscious approach to rubato. You could easily imagine that anyone who learned the Andante from this recording will have found all subsequent versions pallid and unconvincing. Krauss's handling of the opening bars – where violas, cellos and basses answer woodwinds and horns – suggests the intimacy of chamber music. Rarely has the writing breathed more naturally, or the underlying sentiment been more precisely gauged. Although some of the finale's faster passages are a little uncoordinated, the driving force of Krauss's approach marks a telling contrast with the symphony's reflective coda.

Among Walter Damrosch's many claims to musical fame are the first American performances of Brahms's Third and Fourth Symphonies, and his New York recording of the Second is in some respects the most interesting of the set. The second subject is very broadly paced, but the highlight of the performance is the Adagio non troppo slow movement, a minutely observed reading full of tender incident. On the debit side, violins tend to lack body at anything above mezzo-forte and some will question the finale's very fast speeds (especially later on in the movement). But viewed as a whole, Damrosch's Brahms Two is both lyrical and lively, a quietly individual reading that repays close scrutiny. With fine transfers and expert annotation, these CDs provide an invaluable historical supplement to existing recommendations. You may not always agree with what you hear, and yet all four performances should significantly extend your knowledge of these fine works.

Symphonies Nos 2 and 3
Columbia Symphony Orchestra / Bruno Walter
Sony Classical Bruno Walter Edition SMK64471 Ⓜ
(75 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1960 ●

Bruno Walter (1876-1962) was, quite simply, a lovely man, gentle and kind beyond the ordinary. He was always a fine interpreter of Brahms's music, which seemed so suited to his temperament, for Brahms, too, was also a deeply human person. Whatever Walter's conception of the work as a whole, song-themes are always allowed to open out with glorious effect. There is something almost pianistic about Walter's subtle flexibility of tempo: this, one imagines, is how Brahms might have envisaged it as he played through these works on the piano.

Phrasing, too, has a marvellous feeling of controlled freedom about it: dynamics may rise and fall considerably during a short phrase, and yet Walter's shaping of longer lines is always masterly. The whole second group of the Second Symphony is like one huge, evolving tune with one point of climax and one final resolution. Perhaps there could be more tautness and inner tension in some of the allegros, but the generosity and sensitivity of Walter's readings more than compensate: emphasis is upon the lyrical continuity of the music – Brahms the Schubertian rather than Brahms the Beethovenian – and it is none the worse for that. The recordings have come up marvellously in their digital remastering, gaining clarity and depth. Unfortunately the treble frequencies still sound harsh but that's the problem with technology – it has a habit of revealing the naked truth!

Symphonies Nos 2^{a} and 4^{b} Ⓗ
Concertgebouw Orchestra / Willem Mengelberg
Teldec mono 0927-42662-2 (77 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded ^{b}1938, ^{a}1940

No performance of Brahms's Second Symphony can be fairly accused of being too beautiful or too robust, certainly not this one which in terms of the sheer splendour of orchestral sound is both beautiful and robust. (It is pretty exciting, too. Mengelberg does not hang about.) For the tragic Fourth Symphony, additional virtues are needed and here it is possible to think that an expert presentation of the musical facts is all Mengelberg is willing to offer us.

Bryan Crimp's transfers are warm and vivid. A certain amount of residual surface noise persists but the ear soon adjusts – drawn to the stunning interplay of orchestral sonority and the matchless Concertgebouw acoustic which the Telefunken engineers really knew and understood. Cleaned up, this is a Rembrandt among Brahms Seconds. The Rijksmuseum should be sent a copy forthwith.

Brahms Symphony No 2 in D, Op 73^a Ⓗ
Beethoven Symphony No 2 in D, Op 36^b
Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Thomas Beecham
BBC Legends/IMG Artists mono BBCL4099-2 Ⓕ
(70 minutes: ADD). Recorded live at ^bBBC Studios, Maida Vale, London in 1956, ^aUsher Hall, Edinburgh in 1956 ●

Beecham was no Brahmsian but he loved the Second Symphony and was for the best part of half a century one of its most persuasive interpreters. In 1936 he made a much admired recording with the newly founded LPO. Reviewing Beecham's stereo remake in The Gramophone in June 1960, William Mann recalled: 'I grew up with his 78 set and remember it with keen pleasure. It was light and sunny and full of charm, though perfectly strong; some people probably thought it a reading that lacked nobility.'

The remake, recorded in 1958-59, was not as well liked as the 78rpm original. This live 1956 Edinburgh Festival performance is superior in almost every respect to that laboriously assembled studio version. According to the booklet note, Beecham's performance left the festival audience flabbergasted, walking on air.

In the studio, the rip-roaring conclusion did seem contrived but here it electrifies sense. If there is a whiff of the circus about the Edinburgh performance – Beecham audibly urging his players on like a shiny-hatted ringmaster, the final chord sounding defiantly on even as it drowns in a sea of applause – it is largely to do with the fact that the performance is live. The actual reading is exemplary: a thrilling denouement thrillingly realised.

As for the earlier movements, here Beecham's reading is everything William Mann remembered it as being – sunny and full of charm but also, by 1956, wise and wondering, too. The mono sound is first-rate.

The Beethoven is less interesting, though this Maida Vale broadcast is every bit as vital as the generally well-respected EMI studio recording which Beecham and the RPO made that same winter. Buy it for the Brahms.

Symphony No 4

Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Carlos Kleiber
DG The Originals 457 706-2GOR (40 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1981 ●●

Carlos Kleiber's charismatic 1981 Vienna recording – a classic of sorts and still sounding exceptionally well – continues to stand its ground. From the beginning, Kleiber keeps the speed fairly steady. In the first movement's coda, he scores over many of his rivals with prominent horns and a particularly exciting conclusion. He opens the second movement in a rather perfunctory manner, but the Vienna cellos make a beautiful sound in the piano dolce second subject. In the Scherzo, Kleiber pulls back for the two accented notes that dominate the first theme, an interesting gesture that lends the music an appropriately swaggering gait. This, arguably, is his finest movement – also from 4'48", where he keeps the timpani's triplets crystal-clear, then pushes his horns very much to the fore. Overall, Kleiber in the Fourth is the knight with shining breast-plate, bold, handsome, outgoing, relatively straightforward and (this will court controversy) perhaps just a little superficial.

String Sextets

No 1 in B flat, Op 18; No 2 in G, Op 36

String Sextets Nos 1 and 2
Raphael Ensemble (James Clark, Elizabeth Wexler vns Sally Beamish, Roger Tapping vas Andrea Hess, Rhydian Shaxson vcs)
Hyperion CDA66276 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1988 ●●

Completed after the First Piano Concerto, but still comparatively early works, the Sextets are typified by lush textures, ardent emotion, and wonderfully memorable melodic lines. The first is the warmer, more heart-on-the-sleeve piece, balancing with complete naturalness a splendidly lyrical first movement, an urgent, dark set of intricate variations, a lively rustic dance of a Scherzo, and a placidly flowing finale. The Second Sextet inhabits at first a more mysterious world of half-shadows, occasionally rent by glorious moments of sunlight. The finale, however, casts off doubt and ends with affirmation. Both works are very susceptible to differing modes of interpretation, and the Raphael Ensemble has established distinctive views of each, allowing the richness of the texture its head without obscuring the lines, and selecting characteristically distinct tone qualities to typify the two works. The recording is clear and analytic without robbing the sound of its warmth and depth. An impressive recording début for this ensemble.

String Sextet No 1. Piano Trio No 1 in B, Op 8^a 🄷
^aPablo Casals, Madeline Foley vcs ^aIsaac Stern, Alexander Schneider vns Milton Katims, Milton Thomas vas ^aDame Myra Hess pf
Sony Classical Casals Edition mono SMK58994 Ⓜ
(77 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1952 ●

Casals is, of course, the lynch-pin. A charismatic presence, he embraces each work with the passion of a devoted horticulturist tending his most precious flowers. Being a proud humanitarian, Casals had long refused to step foot in Franco's Spain, and it was Alexander Schneider who coaxed him from self-imposed retirement for a series of music festivals in the French town of Prades – hence these recordings. This is a majestic, big-boned account of the early B flat Trio and a sublime version of the sun-soaked B flat Sextet, one of the glories of the Casals Edition. If you need a prime sampling of the Casals manner at its most inspired, then try the Sextet's second movement and note his sullen, ghostly tone at 8'32" – like some ancient bard relaying a solemn but wise message.

Additional recommendation

Brahms String Sextets
Coupling: Theme and Variations in D minor (arr from String Sextet, Op 18 – slow movement)[b]
Stern, Lin vns Laredo, Tree vas Ma, Robinson vcs
[b]Ax pf
Sony Classical ② SM2K 87275 (90 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1992

A delectable coupling by a stellar line-up. The sense of teamwork throughout is palpable, the artists audibly revelling in Brahms's vision.

Clarinet Quintet in B minor, Op 115

Clarinet Quintet. Clarinet Trio in A minor, Op 114
Thea King cl Karina Georgian vc
Clifford Benson pf
Gabrieli Quartet (Kenneth Sillito, Brendan O'Reilly vns Ian Jewel va Keith Harvey vc)
Hyperion CDA66107 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1983 ●

These players' tempo in the Clarinet Quintet is more leisurely than most of their rivals. In the faster flanking movements of the trio, a stronger forward drive might not have come amiss. On the other hand, the group allows itself time to savour every bar to the full. The first thing that strikes you about both these performances is the warmth of heart underlying them. You will respond easily to their quality of good-natured, unforced civility. The ensemble is excellent, with the clarinet very much one of the team, never assuming the role of soloist in a quasi-chamber concerto. Thea King's phrasing is unfailingly perceptive and stylish, and her undemonstrative, wise artistry in both works is most appealing. In the Trio, the sumptuous-sounding cello is impressive, which at times makes you feel that Brahms could just as well have called the work a cello trio. This is a disc which will bear frequent repetition. Playing such as this, committed and serious, yet at the same time relaxed and spontaneous, is not easy to contrive in the recording studio, and Hyperion has done well to capture these interpretations on the wing. The sound is very good indeed, mellow and natural.

Clarinet Quintet
String Quartet No 2 in A minor, Op 51 No 2
Karl Leister cl Leipzig Quartet (Andreas Seidel, Tilman Büning vns Ivo Bauer va Matthias Moosdorf vc)
Dabringhaus und Grimm MDG307 0719-2 Ⓕ
(71 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1996

One of the most attractive qualities of this version of a well-loved quintet is the skill with which the artists, abetted by the record producer, have integrated the clarinet into the string textures. Having listened more creatively than any other composer to Mozart's example, Brahms allows the clarinet to become part of the tone colour in the string ensemble; and he has also followed the implications, as not all his interpreters seem to understand. Here, the little falling third theme, one of his lifelong obsessions, moves in and out of the musical texture with wonderful subtlety, so that the return of the opening figure at the very end needs no special emphasis but is a natural conclusion. Leister is an artist of long skill and experience, and also of great musical intelligence; the qualities tell. They also mean that there is no need to confer upon the performance anything approaching the sentimentality which can afflict it, in the name of 'nostalgia' as the old composer looks affectionately back on his life's work. This is quite a robust performance, clearly appreciated by the enthusiastic young string quartet, who give a suitably matching account of the Op 51 work. There are, of course, any number of performances of the quintet, but this is unique.

Clarinet Quintet. Trio for Horn, Violin and Piano in E flat, Op 40 🄷
Reginald Kell cl Aubrey Brain hn Rudolf Serkin pf
Busch Quartet (Adolf Busch, Gosta Andreasson vns Karl Doktor va Hermann Busch vc)
Pearl mono GEM0007 (63 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1938 and 1933 ●●

Also available on Testament mono SBT1001 Ⓕ
(65 minutes: AAD) ●●

There is no need, at this remove of time, for further praise to be lavished on these performances. This account of the Horn Trio remains at, or very near, the top of any list of recorded rivals. HMV's recording of this somewhat idiosyncratic combination of instruments survives well and has been cleanly, honestly transferred. However, the performance of the Clarinet Quintet will give you even deeper pleasure. Where nowadays do we hear playing of such emotional range, such probing intensity? Here the Busch Quartet and Reginald Kell out-sing and out-search most rivals in the work's autumnal aspect but also make everything seem alive and doubly intense with their fierce and intense response to the music's wild mood-swings. It helps to have a clarinettist who can coo like a dove and exult like a gipsy; but, in the end, the performance's genius rests in the players' profound and unflinching identification with Brahms's shifting moods.

Brahms Clarinet Quintet in B minor, Op 115
Mozart Clarinet Quintet in A, K581
David Shifrin cl Emerson Quartet (Philip Setzer, Eugene Drucker, vns Lawrence Dutton va David Finckel vc)

DG 459 641-2GH (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996-97

David Shifrin and the Emerson play both works easily, sweetly and leaning affectionately where the melody line calls for an extra spot of emphasis. Here, flexibility and precision form a helpful alliance. In Mozart's first movement (played with its repeat intact), the strings tense effectively for the development and the recapitulation is nicely inflected. The Menuetto opens with a real spring to the rhythm; the viola is notably supple at 2'50" into the Andante con variazione and the seemingly endless phrase that precedes the final return of the opening theme can rarely have been more beautifully played on disc. The Brahms is similarly sensitive, with the strings dipping considerately as the clarinet makes his first entry. Everything ebbs and flows; there are numerous varieties of dynamic shading, and the onset of the first movement's development could hardly be gentler. Note, too, the intimately shared string lines at the beginning of the Adagio and how, a little later on (ie at 2'48"), Shifrin sings his sullen reference back to the Quintet's opening theme. The gypsy interludes are more reflective than fiery, in keeping with the tempered melancholy of the performance as a whole. The last two movements are sonorous and colourful, the sound consistently fine.

Additional recommendation
Brahms Clarinet Quintet
Coupling: Mozart Clarinet Quintet in A, K581
Leister cl Berlin Soloists
Warner Apex 0927-43502-2 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded c1989

Karl Leister gives most beautifully easy, charming, relaxed performances of both works, and the recordings are pleasantly fresh and immediate.

Piano Quintet in F minor, Op 34

Maurizio Pollini pf Quartetto Italiano
(Paolo Borciani, Elisa Pegreffi vns Dino Asciolla va Franco Rossi vc)
DG 419 673-2GH (43 minutes: AAD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1979 ●●●

Most Brahms enthusiasts would agree that the Piano Quintet is his most exciting chamber work, and when it is supported by a quite unusually exciting performance it really does carry all before it. In this recording you will find an exceptional degree of inspiration in the music and the playing. If you'll forgive the cliché, Pollini will sweep you off your feet. Pollini is very much in the driving seat; he dominates this Piano Quintet, at times perhaps a little more than he should, but this does give it a special quality. This is partly due to the rather variable balance which quite often makes the piano sound close and the strings a long way off. When Pollini is letting fly you cannot always hear the lower strings; too often you feel that he is a soloist, the strings the accompaniment. The slow movement is marvellous. But most of it sounds like a piano solo because it is written that way (and how beautifully Pollini plays it).

The admirable Quartetto Italiano contributes to the full, notably in the Scherzo which receives the most exuberant and thrilling performance imaginable. But all four movements have an almost mesmeric tension, a positively creative musicality; your attention is gripped. The sound is splendidly rounded and full, especially the piano tone.

Brahms Piano Quintet
Schubert Piano Quintet in A, D667, 'Trout'
Sir Clifford Curzon pf Amadeus Quartet (Norbert Brainin, Siegmund Nissel vns Peter Schidlof va Martin Lovett vc); James Edward Merrett db
BBC Legends ② BBCL4009-2 (82 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded live in 1974 and 1971 ●●

If you put this set on at the end of a long day you will feel as if a new day has begun. Such is the power of great music-making...and these performances are indeed 'great'. Granted, the 1971 recording of the Schubert sounds marginally better than the 1974 Brahms, but the visceral excitement generated by the Brahms Quintet has to be heard to be believed. It would be fairly easy to imagine a tidier performance, but not one that is more spontaneous or inspired. Sir Clifford Curzon's grand vision registers within a few bars of the opening movement and heats to near-boiling point by the start of the recapitulation. The emotional temperature rises even higher for the second movement.

The distinction of the performance resides in the co-operation of all five players, which reaches unprecedented heights in the finale. No wonder the audience explodes: it is doubtful that anyone present has heard a finer performance since. The Trout's repeated exposition is even more exciting than its first statement, and there is some gentle tempo acceleration during the development. True, the strings make a fractionally late entrance at the beginning of the Andante, but the vitality of the Scherzo would be hard to beat, while the Theme and Variations features notable playing from Lovett. There's an amusing spot of premature congratulation when applause momentarily breaks in at the end of the Allegro giusto's exposition, but it soon withers to silence for a joyous finale. Here the recording rather favours the strings, but better that than have the piano drown everyone else out. Wonderful stuff, all of it.

Piano Quintet. Horn Trio in E flat, Op 40
Nash Ensemble (Marcia Crayford, Elizabeth Layton vns Roger Chase va Christopher van Kampen vc Frank Lloyd hn Ian Brown pf) Ⓜ
CRD CRD3489 (73 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1991

It would be hard to imagine more amiable performances of these two strongly characterised works. The Nash Ensemble's comfortable approach is intense as well as warm, plainly derived from long experience performing this music in concert. The speeds in both works are markedly slower than on other versions, and the ensemble is a degree less polished, but in their expressive warmth they are just as magnetic, with a sense of continuity that the higher-powered readings do not always convey. The Romanticism of the Nash approach comes out particularly strongly in the opening Andante of the Horn Trio, with the horn soloist, Frank Lloyd, producing an exceptionally rich, braying tone, reminiscent of Dennis Brain. After relaxed accounts of the first three movements the galloping finale is given with great panache. Thanks partly to the CRD recording, the Nash performances sound satisfyingly beefy, almost orchestral, though some may find the full-bodied sound a degree too reverberant, with the piano rather in front of the strings. The disc can be strongly recommended, particularly as this is the only available coupling of these two works.

String Quintets

No 1 in F, Op 88; No 2 in G, Op 111

String Quintets Nos 1 and 2
Gérard Caussé va Hagen Quartet (Lukas Hagen, Rainer Schmidt vns Veronika Hagen va Clemens Hagen vc)
DG 453 420-2GH (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●

The affirmative Allegro that launches the Second String Quintet on its course is exhilarating and the recording by the augmented Hagen Quartet greets the air like an unexpected sunbeam. This particular recording combines clarity and substance; nothing is left to chance and the end result is notably colourful, both in tone and in feeling. The First Quintet is crisply pointed, with crystalline textures, a pleasantly laid-back account of the first movement's lovely second set and a finely tensed development section. Furthermore, the heavily contrapuntal finale is played with great precision and rhythmic élan. Both performances include first-movement exposition repeats and both represent the Hagens' 'stylistic grid' at its most convincing, with vividly attenuated dynamics, occasional volatility, a consistent sense of line, impressive internal clarity, equal distribution of voices and a remarkable degree of concentration. Very well recorded.

Piano Quartets

No 1 in G minor, Op 25; No 2 in A, Op 26; No 3 in C minor, Op 60

Awards 1991

Isaac Stern vn Jaime Laredo va Yo-Yo Ma vc Emanuel Ax pf
Sony Classical ② S2K45846 Ⓕ
(128 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1986-89 ●●●

The piano quartets belong to the middle of Brahms's life. They have all the power and lyricism that we associate with his music; but alongside a wealth of melodic and harmonic invention there are some shadows: all we know of Brahms's life suggests that he was never a happy man. Even if this is reflected in the music, and especially the C minor Quartet, all is kept in proportion and there is no overt soul-bearing. These quartets are big pieces which often employ a grand manner, though less so in No 2 than the others. For this reason, the present performances with their exuberant sweep are particularly telling, and although no detail is missed the players offer an overall strength. Top soloists in their own right, they combine their individual gifts with the ability to play as a well-integrated team. The recording is close but not overwhelmingly so.

Piano Quartet No 1. Four Ballades, Op 10
Emil Gilels pf members of the Amadeus Quartet (Norbert Brainin vn Peter Schidlof va Martin Lovett vc)
DG The Originals 447 407-2GOR Ⓜ
(65 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1970 and 1975 ●

This is an outstanding performance of Brahms's G minor Piano Quartet, unforgettable for its spontaneity and uninhibited Romantic warmth and verve. The booklet reminds us that this 1971 recording made history since 'a contract between an artist from the Soviet Union and a Western label was a sensational event in cultural diplomacy'. Reproduced with respect for the sound quality of its time, the playing has a glowing strength and intensity throughout. Only in the first movement's opulent textures does the keyboard occasionally dominate.

From Emil Gilels we're also given a maturely unhurried, essentially 'inward' recording of Brahms's four youthful Ballades. All in all, this is a bargain set and comes thoroughly recommended.

String Quartets

No 1 in C minor, Op 51 No 1; No 2 in A minor, Op 51; No 3 in B flat, Op 67

Alban Berg Quartet (Günter Pichler, Gerhard Schulz vns Thomas Kakuska va Valentin Erben vc)
EMI ② 754829-2 (102 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1991 ●

Whereas the C minor and B flat major Quartets were recorded at sessions in a Swiss church, the A minor Quartet is a live concert performance, as applause confirms. All three works emerge not only with technical fluency and finish but also with quite exceptional immediacy and vividness. The first and last movements of No 1 spring at you with all the drama Brahms invariably drew from C minor. Yet the music's cajoling lyricism is very lovingly cherished too.

The players' wide dynamic range is faithfully reproduced right down to the most intimate confidence – and of course the ensuing Romanze, very tenderly and delicately interwoven, brings still stronger proof of their awareness of the eloquence of pianissimo in all its variations of colour and character.

In the B flat Quartet (No 3), which shares the first disc, they at once capture its carefree rustic verve with their bold dynamic contrasts and relish of the composer's rhythmic teasing. For the Andante's confident F major song Pichler finds a glowing fervour. The A minor Quartet, recorded at St Petersburg's Palais Yusopov, monopolizes the second disc – some might think a little extravagantly since the playing time is only just 35 minutes.

Tonal production is no less clear and true, even if just a shade less vibrant and lustrous than in that resonant Swiss church. Or maybe this impression can be attributed to the players, in their desire to convey the work's retreat into a more elusive, wistful world that they evoke with effortless fluency, fluidity and grace.

In sum, a strongly recommended issue for anyone wanting a keen-edged reminder of this composer's warm and vulnerable romantic heart.

String Quartets Nos 1 and 2
Cleveland Quartet (William Preucil, Peter Salaff vns James Dunham va Paul Katz vc)
Telarc CD80346 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993

Though the Cleveland Quartet has changed both its leader and viola player in recent years, all the old tonal opulence is still very much there. So is all the old fire, and equally, the determination to wring the last drop of expression from even the most intimate confession. In short, you would be unlikely to meet a more overtly romantic composer than the Brahms you meet here. In the C minor Quartet's Romanze some might in fact prefer the very mellow but more emotionally reticent Borodin Quartet, or the Alban Berg with their ethereally withdrawn pianissimo. In the bolder flanking movements it is as compulsive as the highly-strung, impressionable Alban Berg while often finding a broader, suaver, melodic sweep. The venue was its favoured Mechanics Hall at Worcester, Massachusetts, a warmly reverberant building – as the sheer fullness of the sound makes plain.

Clarinet Trio in A minor, Op 114

Brahms Clarinet Trio in A minor, Op 114
Frühling Clarinet Trio in A minor, Op 40
Schumann Märchenerzählungen, Op 132.
Kinderszenen, Op 15 – Träumerei (arr Hough)
Michael Collins cl Steven Isserlis vc
Stephen Hough pf
RCA Red Seal 09026 63504-2 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998

Here is a conversation between kindred spirits for whom musical phrasing and mellifluous tone production are evident priorities. Even when playing quietly, Stephen Hough exhibits an acute sense of tonal colour: try from 2'23" into Brahms's finale, where he posits the main idea and his colleagues respond with like minds. Hough's transcription of Schumann's 'Träumerei' might appear an old-fashioned appendage to an otherwise enterprising programme. And yet the musical result – where Michael Collins holds the main melody line until near the end of the piece, when Steven Isserlis takes over just for a couple of bars – is utterly captivating.

Schumann's four Märchenerzählungen – performed here with a cello in place of the original viola – combine forcefulness with a certain fragility. For example, the Lebhaft und sehr markiert second movement opens emphatically, then skips off in heady abandon before settling to a mood where the two elements – dark resolution and aerial fantasy – combine.

The third major work in this well-planned Romantic programme is by Lvov-born Carl Frühling (1868-1937), a gifted composer who, according to Isserlis, partnered celebrated artists of the day and died in poverty. Many of Frühling's works still await discovery (literally, as no one knows their precise whereabouts) but the Trio here is full of lovely things. Yes, it is eclectic, but anyone with an ear for Chausson, Korngold, Godowsky or Kreisler will love it. The finale is an ideal sampling point, especially 5'25" where Isserlis bows a wistful motive and Hough responds with music that momentarily edges towards Liszt's 'Vallée d'Obermann'.

A highly imaginative programme characterised above all by fine balancing – musically, interpretatively and technically.

Brahms Clarinet Trio in A minor, Op 114 🄷
Holbrooke Clarinet Quintet No 1 in G, Op 27 No 1
Weber Clarinet Concertino in E flat, J109
Reginald Kell cl Anthony Pini vc Louis Kentner pf
Willoughby Quartet (Louis Willoughby, Kenneth Skeaping vns Aubrey Appleton va Vivian Joseph vc); orchestra / Walter Goehr
Testament mono SBT1002 (54 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1941

In the rapturous love-duet between clarinet and cello in the Adagio of the Clarinet Trio, Reginald Kell's tonal warmth and beauty seem more than ever appropriate. Elsewhere in this work, though, despite his liquid sound and finesse of dynamics he is all but outshone by the eloquent lyricism and passion of that superb player Anthony Pini. Together with Kentner's understanding collaboration, never over-assertive but always supportive, an admirably cohesive team is formed, alive to Brahms's interplay of interest and changes of mood.

Kell is the star of the Quintet by Josef Holbrooke which has fallen into total neglect, and frankly the present diffuse work (concocted out of previous compositions) will not prompt much revaluation of his status. Nevertheless, it offers great opportunities for cantabile clarinet playing in the central Canzonet and for fluent virtuosity in the finale, and Kell excels in both.

Not unexpectedly the Weber Concertino, every clarinettist's party-piece, finds Kell displaying, besides an easy technical brilliance, beauty of tone, a charming sense of phrase and sensitive dynamic nuances. Goehr's orchestral accompaniment is clean and fully alert.

Piano Trios

No 1 in B, Op 8; No 2 in C, Op 87;
No 3 in C minor, Op 101

Piano Trios Nos 1-3. Horn Trio in E flat, Op 40
Clarinet Trio in A minor, Op 114
Richard Hosford cl Stephen Stirling hn Florestan Trio (Anthony Marwood vn Richard Lester vc Susan Tomes pf)
Hyperion ② CDA67251/2 (137 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●

Aided by an especially clear, vivid, yet spacious recording, the Florestan Trio and their two colleagues allow us to hear far more of this music than usual – the elaborate decoration of Op 114's Adagio, or the sinister detail of the more delicate passages in Op 8's Scherzo. Much of the credit for this goes to Susan Tomes; her playing is an object-lesson in sensitivity and in matching the other voices. Balance and blend are a special feature of these performances. Anthony Marwood and Richard Lester match their sounds perfectly for the lovely duet passages in the slow movements of Op 8 and Op 101. What is less expected, and less usual, is the matching of violin and horn, cello and clarinet. But perhaps the single outstanding feature of all the performances is the way the music is shaped. It's not only that the phrases are projected clearly and expressively – the approach moves outwards to encompass the music's larger paragraphs and, indeed, whole movements. These are very desirable recordings, then. Pires, Dumay and Wang (DG) offer big-toned performances on the grand scale of Opp 8 and 87, splendidly recorded. It's not easy to choose between them and the wholehearted, but more intimate approach of the Florestan.

Piano Trios Nos 1 and 2
Augustin Dumay vn Jian Wang vc
Maria João Pires pf Ⓕ
DG 447 055-2GH (67 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1995 ●

In the Chinese cellist Jian Wang, the duo of Augustin Dumay and Maria João Pires have found themselves a true soul mate as this, their first disc of piano trios together, engagingly shows. The B major Trio doesn't quite topple the Chungs' recording, still at the very top of the list; but it comes pretty near it. The Scherzo's trio, likewise, pulls back to form a slow, soupy centrepiece. Here the rubato is a little mannered, lacking perhaps the instinctive lilt of other versions. Everything, though, can be traded in for the sheer wonder of this Adagio. As slow as any on disc, it reveals the real empathy between Dumay and Wang in moments of great beauty where the Milstein legacy in Dumay's playing is wonderfully apparent. For the C major Trio, Dumay, Pires and Wang offer a generally broad, spacious performance, and a suppleness of repartee in the slow movement's variations which matches their fluency of invention. The Scherzo's niggling is as compact and securely balanced as any, before the players glide, then stride, into the bright sunlight of the Trio.

Cello Sonatas

No 1 in E minor, Op 38; No 2 in F, Op 99

Heinrich Schiff vc Gerhard Oppitz pf
Philips 456 402-2PH (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●●

Brahms's cello sonatas make for an ideal coupling, and not merely because there are only two of them. The differences between them are significant, both in terms of tone and character – the First being fairly mellow and soft-spoken, the Second full of bold contrasts. Oppitz is already well known for some excellent Brahms recordings, primarily the solo works, and his subtlety follows through in this recording. Schiff and Oppitz enjoy a warm, intimate acoustic (at Reinstadl, Neumarkt in Germany) that suits the fastidiously articulated profile of their performances. In the Second Sonata's Allegro vivace first movement their handling of the eerie F sharp minor development is particularly fine, and Schiff's vibrant pizzicatos near the start of the Adagio affettuoso create precisely the sort of sound world that Brahms must have envisaged. Schiff and Oppitz are also enjoyable in the First Sonata's elegant Allegretto quasi Menuetto and in the way they slowly edge into the third movement of the Second Sonata. This coupling is a delight; comely music-making much enhanced by a fine balance of head and heart.

Cello Sonatas Nos 1 and 2
Mstislav Rostropovich vc Rudolf Serkin pf
DG 410 510-2GH (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1982 ●

Our younger generation of cello soloists seems to favour a tone production which balances a refined upper range with a middle and lower register that is strong and well focused, rather than expansively rich and resonant. Readers will not need to be told that Rostropovich's solo image is definitely not of this ilk: his musical personality is in every sense larger than life and in this magnificent coupling of the cello sonatas, in partnership with Rudolf Serkin, the very forward balance of the recording exaggerates this impression in the most vivid way. By comparison the piano image – to the right of and behind the cello – is more reticent in timbre and seldom matches Rostropovich's rich flood of sound, which is not, of course, to suggest that Serkin fails to project the music, merely that the microphone placing makes Rostropovich very much the dominating artist. This passionately warm-hearted and ripely Brahmsian music-making almost overwhelms the listener in its sheer impact. But with playing of this calibre, with both artists wonderfully attuned to each other's responses, every nuance tells and Brahms's bold melodic lines soar out from the speakers to capture the imagination, and provide an enthralling musical experience in each and every work.

Violin Sonatas

No 1 in G, Op 78; No 2 in A, Op 100;
No 3 in D minor, Op 108

Itzhak Perlman vn Vladimir Ashkenazy pf
EMI Great Recordings of the Century
566893-2 Ⓜ
(70 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1983 ●●

If anyone doubts that these three sonatas represent Brahms at his most blissfully lyrical, then this is an essential set to hear. The trouble-free happiness of these mellow inspirations, all written after the main body of Brahms's orchestral music had been completed, comes over richly and seductively in these fine performances. In their sureness and flawless confidence, they carry you along cocooned in rich sound. Perlman consistently produces rich, full-bodied tone, an excellent illustration being the way that he evokes a happy, trouble-free mood in the melody which opens the second movement Adagio of No 3. The obverse of this is that with such consistent richness and warmth, the three sonatas come to sound more alike than they usually do, or maybe should, a point which comes out the more from playing them in sequence. It is true that Perlman does quite often play softly, but for some tastes he is placed too close to the microphone, and the actual dynamic level stays rather high, however gently he is playing. This is not to say that with sharp imagination and with superbly clean articulation from the pianist, these performances lack range of expression, and one thinks especially of the rhythmic pointing, which gives a Hungarian or a Slavonic tang to such passages as the first contrasting episode in the 'raindrop' finale of No 1 or the contrasting Vivace passages in the second movement of No 2, where the last pizzicato reprise is made totally delectable. These performances are both distinctive and authoritative. The recording is bright, with a good sense of atmosphere to give bite to the piano tone without diminishing the warmth of Perlman's violin.

Violin Sonatas Nos 1-3
Pamela Frank vn Peter Serkin pf
Decca 455 643-2DH (69 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●

Pamela Frank's free-spirited, lean, lightly bowed and subtly variegated tone production is thoroughly eventful and thought-provoking. Both she and Peter Serkin make a nutritious meal out of the First Sonata's opening Vivace ma non troppo, supple and low-key but action-packed, with Serkin's quiet trills meaningfully mirroring Frank's shuddering double-stopped arpeggios. The Adagio is delicate, limpid and sensitively set up by Serkin; note, too, Frank's meticulously graded chords and her chaste playing of the finale's opening theme. The first page of the Second Sonata finds her adapting her lean but strong tone to the music's mellower sound world, with Serkin offering her colourfully pedalled support. True, Serkin's pedalling sometimes registers on the recording as mechanical action, but you soon get used to it. In the Third Sonata, the balance of power shifts from Frank to Serkin. But there is delicacy aplenty, too – not least in the Scherzo. The Adagio is very slow, effectively so for most of its duration though some might feel that the more flowing tempo chosen by some of Frank's best rivals is more appropriate. The recordings are intimate and realistic. Of modern digital, single-disc recordings of this repertoire, this is one of the best.

Violin Sonatas Nos 1-3
Augustin Dumay vn Maria João Pires pf
DG 435 800-2GH (72 minutes: DDD). Ⓕ
Recorded 1991 ●

Of the numerous recordings of the violin sonatas available, Dumay and Pires easily deserve to be considered amongst the best, for their playing is consistently mature, stylistically homogeneous and, above all, refined. They never waste a note of the music, and yet it is always allowed to unfurl naturally. A reflective eloquence at the opening of the G major Sonata sets the mood for the entire CD. Pires contributes many lovely delicate touches and there is great breadth to her phrasing when this is required. The first movement of the A major work may be slightly slack in its cohesiveness, but in the Andante tranquillo that follows one realizes that the duo sees Brahms above all else as a lyrical dreamer. Only in the D minor Sonata does one feel the darkly intense aspect of the composer's character and here the Presto agitato finale is everything it should be in terms of tempo and storminess. The recorded sound is pleasant on the ear, without being ideal. The piano tone is a bit muffled and wanting in colour; this is especially apparent when the two instruments are playing together. But overall this is a release of considerable distinction.

Solo piano works

Piano Sonatas – No 1 in C, Op 1; No 2 in F sharp minor, Op 2; No 3 in F minor, Op 5[b]
Variations on a Theme by Paganini, Op 35[b]. Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Handel, Op 24[b]. Four Ballades, Op 10[b]. Variations on a Theme by Schumann, Op 9. Variations on an Original Theme, Op 21 No 1. Variations on a Hungarian Song, Op 21 No 2. Waltzes, Op 39. Two Rhapsodies, Op 79[b]. Scherzo in E flat minor, Op 4. Piano Pieces – Op 76; Op 116; Op 117; Op 118[b]; Op 119. Hungarian Dances[a]
Julius Katchen, [a]Jean-Pierre Marty pfs
Decca London ⑥ 455 247-2LC6 Ⓑ
(388 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1962-66 ●●
Items marked [b] are also available on
Double Decca ② 452 338-2DF2 Ⓑ

The American pianist Julius Katchen made his name in the early 1950s and died in 1969, but although one thinks of him as a distinguished figure from the last generation, it is salutary to realize that he would probably be performing today if his career had not ended when he was only 42. Even so, his legacy of recordings reminds us of his gifts and the breadth of his repertory, and the present Brahms cycle has distinction. It begins with an account of the Paganini Variations that gives ample proof of his assured technique: the playing tells us at once that the challenging variations in sixths (Nos 1 and 2 in Book 1) held no terrors for him, and the athleticism here is matched by a fluency in the leggiero writing of the variation that follows. In general, though, he makes one more aware of a keyboard virtuoso in this work, rather than a poet; there are other performances which balance these two qualities more finely. Tempos tend to rapidity, too, and the piano sound tends to have a hardish brilliance. However, he does bring a gentler quality to the three other sets of variations here, not least in his freer use of rubato and tonal nuance, as witness (say) the serene Variations Nos 11-12 in the big Handel set, where the recording from three years earlier is easier on the ear. Here, as elsewhere, there is a little tape hiss, but not enough to distract.

Poetry is to be found in good measure in Katchen's playing of the Four Ballades, Op 10. These pieces belie the composer's youth in their deep introspection, though the pianist takes a brisk view of the Andante con moto tempo in No 4. The 16 Waltzes of Op 39 are attractive too in their crispness and charm, and the early Scherzo in E flat minor has the right dour vigour. The three sonatas are also impressive in their strong, energetic interpretative grasp, though one could wish that the first-movement repeat of No 1 had been observed. Also, slow movements could have a still more inward quality to convey that brooding self-communion which is so characteristic of this composer (though that of Sonata No 3 in F minor is pretty near it). But the great F minor Sonata is spacious and thoughtful as well as leonine, and this is a noble performance, well recorded in 1966.

The shorter pieces are finely done also. Katchen is in his element in the Two Rhapsodies of Op 79, balancing the stormy and lyrical qualities to perfection. The Fantasias, Op 116, are not so well recorded (the sound is a bit muffled). However, the playing is masterly, with tragedy, twilight mystery and storm and stress fully playing their part and giving a golden glow to such pieces as the lovely E major Intermezzo which is No 6 of the set and the A major Intermezzo, Op 118 No 2. Possibly more sensuous gipsy charm could be found in, say, the B minor Capriccio of Op 76, but it is very attractive playing and the playful C major Intermezzo in Op 119 is delightful, as is the tender lullaby that begins Op 117.

Only the first 10 of the 21 Hungarian Dances exist in the composer's own (very difficult) version for piano solo, and in the others, written for piano duet, Katchen is joined by Jean-Pierre Marty; there's plenty of fire here and much to enjoy. Altogether, this Brahms set is a fine memorial to Katchen and a worthy issue.

Two Rhapsodies, Op 79. Three Intermezzos, Op 117. Six Piano Pieces, Op 118. Four Piano Pieces, Op 119
Radu Lupu pf
Decca 417 599-2DH (71 mins: ADD). Rec 1970s Ⓕ

Here are 71 minutes of the finest Brahms piano music, played by one of the outstanding Brahms exponents of our day. What is most treasurable about it is the quiet rapture of some of the most quintessentially Brahmsian moments; for example, the way Lupu sleepwalks into the last section of Op 117 No 3 and the revelation in Op 118 No 2 that the inversion of the theme is even more beautiful than its original statement. The Op 79 Rhapsodies are perhaps a fraction less memorable. Decca's recording sounds a little bottom-heavy, in the manner of certain Ashkenazy records of this vintage, and in the heavier textures of the Rhapsodies Lupu compounds the problem by reinforcing the bass with octaves and even fifths. Still, this remains as fine a selection of Brahms's piano works as you are likely to find on one disc.

Variations and Fugue on a theme by Handel, Op 24. Variations on a theme by Paganini, Op 35[a]. Eight Piano Pieces, Op 76[b]. Two Rhapsodies, Op 79[b]. Fantasias, Op 116. Three Intermezzos, Op 117. Six Piano Pieces, Op 118. Four Piano Pieces, Op 119.
[a]Adam Harasiewicz, Stephen Kovacevich, [b]Dinorah Varsi pfs
Philips Duo 442 589-2PM2 (157 minutes: ADD/DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1969-85

Despite strong competition, in Opp 116, 117 and 119 Kovacevich is first choice. He finds the intimacy of the Intermezzos without self-conscious search and in the stormier Capriccios and Rhapsodies blends enormous verve with rock-like stability and strength. These are performances that go right to the composer's innermost, secretive heart. In Op 118 Kovacevich finds a melting tenderness for No 2, a lovely textural lightness for No 4 with its mystical Trio, and the gracious liquidity for No 5. The desolate opening and closing sections of No 6 in their turn are beautifully phrased and deeply moving. In the Paganini Variations Adam Harasiewicz doesn't quite send the temperature soaring but his accuracy of detail at certain more hair-raising moments such as Nos 6 and 7 of Book Two must not be underestimated. Recommended.

Brahms Piano Sonata No 3 🄷
Liszt La leggierezza, S144 No 2a. Années de pèlerinage, Première Année, S160, 'Suisse' – Au bord d'une source[a]. Hungarian Rhapsody No 15 in A minor, S244[b] Schumann Carnaval, Op 9
Solomon pf
Testament mono SBT1084 (79 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1952; item marked [a] recorded 1930, [b]1932 OO

Solomon's 1952 recordings of Schumann's Carnaval and the Brahms Sonata in F minor are essential for the desert island, so this well-produced compilation, generously filled out with Liszt, recommends itself. If you've heard tell of Solomon's reputation but don't know his work, or perhaps know only his Beethoven, snap it up. The sound has come up astonishingly well, also in the Liszt pieces which were made in 1930 and 1932. Solomon's performance of 'Au bord d'une source' is a match for Liszt's poetic inspiration, as few recordings of it are. Technical address and refinement on this level constitute a small miracle.

---

16 Waltzes, Op 39. 10 Hungarian Dances
Idil Biret pf
Naxos 8 550355 (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1992

Both the Waltzes and the Hungarian Dances are extremely demanding in their two-hand form, and in the latter collection one could often believe that the 20 fingers of two duettists must be involved, so many notes are being played in all registers (for an example, try No 8 in A minor). However, the technical problems hold no terrors for this pianist and her performances are convincing and attractive. What more need be said about this playing of music in which Brahms portrayed, in turn, sophisticated Vienna and untamed Hungary? Well, not a great deal. The quicker Waltzes have plenty of vivacity, and the slower ones are lyrical in an aptly Viennese manner. Tempos, textures, phrasing, rubato and pedalling are well managed and the playing has a very convincing blend of subtlety and simplicity. She treats these 16 pieces as a sequence, as Brahms's key structure allows, and leaves relatively little gap between them. The Hungarian Dances have a darkly surging Magyar energy and sound that are very pleasing: indeed, Biret seems totally at home in this music. The recording is a bit larger than life, but perfectly acceptable.

Motets

Two Motets, Op 74. Fest- und Gedenksprüche, Op 109. Three Motets, Op 110. Missa Canonica. Two Motets, Op 29
RIAS Chamber Choir, Berlin / Marcus Creed
Harmonia Mundi HMC90 1591 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1994-95

These are wonderful pieces, which, hearing, you would suppose to be all heart, looking at, you think must be all brain, and in fact are compounded of both, the one feeding upon and stimulating the other. In no other area of his work is Brahms quite so conscious of his heritage. Writing in the midday of Romanticism, he finds the great formal, contrapuntal tradition not a weight upon him but a refreshment. He draws upon Schütz as upon Bach, and from the Italian polyphonists and masters of the double choir as well as from his own German background. The innocent ear would never suspect the mathematical intricacies, the sheer musical logic, and yet it tells, even without conscious recognition: one senses the workmanship, and the emotion which would in any case go out to greet such strong, vivid word-setting is immeasurably enhanced. A striking example is provided by the three movements, all that survive, from the Missa Canonica. The Sanctus is set in deeply reverential mood and, like the flowing triple-time Benedictus, betrays nothing of its origin as an academic exercise. The Agnus Dei is overtly polyphonic, yet that too gives way to a gently lyrical mode, in the 'Dona nobis pacem'. They were published in 1984 and this is their first recording. The motets, of course, have been recorded many times and very well too, yet, on balance, no more satisfyingly than they are here. The RIAS Chamber Choir produces a fine quality of homogeneous tone and, under Marcus Creed, shows itself fully responsive to both words and music. This disc carries a strong recommendation, especially for its inclusion of the surviving Missa Canonica fragments.

Gesänge

Gesänge – Op 17; Op 42; Op 104. Sieben Lieder, Op 62. Deutsche Volkslieder, WoO33 – In stiller Nacht
Stefan Jezierski, Manfred Klier hns [a]Marie-Pierre Langlamet hp
RIAS Chamber Choir, Berlin / Marcus Creed
Harmonia Mundi HMC90 1592 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1995-96

The RIAS Chamber Choir's blend of voices is impeccable and the tone-quality perfectly lovely. They are sensitive to word and phrase, responding all as one to their conductor's shading and shaping. Their performances give pleasure enough for one to ask nothing further. The sheer beauty of sound preserves the gentle, romantic qualities of the music faithfully; and there is never any question of dullness, for text and music are both lovingly tendered. The pieces themselves always have more to them than one at first thinks, and the sureness of Brahms's feeling for choral sound impresses immediately. All are unaccompanied save Op 17, where the harp and horns bring a delightful enrichment. This is quiet, late-night listening, of the kind that helps to ease the day into retrospective contentment.

Liebeslieder

Brahms Liebeslieder, Op 52
Rossini Soirées musicales – La promessa; La partenza; La regata veneziana; La pesca
Tchaikovsky Duets, Op 46 – No 1, Evening; No 3, Tears; No 4, In the garden; No 6, Dawn
Heather Harper sop Dame Janet Baker mez
Sir Peter Pears ten Thomas Hemsley bar
Claudio Arrau, Benjamin Britten pfs
BBC Music Legends/IMG Artists Britten the Performer BBCB8001-2 (62 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1968-71 ●●

Another archive treasure mined from the catacombs of Broadcasting House comes blinking into the sunlight. A reminder, on this occasion, of the old Aldeburgh where the concert hall became a drawing-room peopled with genius and we, the far-flung radio audience, eavesdropped for a precious hour or so in the privacy of our own homes. The programme is odd, but a joy. First, Brahms's Liebeslieder with Claudio Arrau, no less, partnering Britten at the keyboard. It had not been planned as such; cancellations had caused the hosts to shuffle the musical house guests. The result is a performance of great strength and spontaneity, the two pianists – the engine-room of this thoroughly 'instrumental' work – playing with a singleness and singularity of spirit that takes the breath away. Brahms occasionally allows solo voices to shine. Here the tones of Baker and Pears shine characteristically through. In the end, though, it is (as it should be) the power and charm of the whole ensemble that provides the pleasure.

The Tchaikovsky songs, four of the six duets, Op 46, he wrote for his niece, Tatyana Davïdova, are sung in English and are thus as accessible as 'Come into the garden, Maud'. Heather Harper and Dame Janet Baker, accompanied by Britten, sing them grandly, without inhibition, but it is the piano writing that tends to catch the imagination. Finally, there is Rossini, four of Les soirées musicales. Should the singing be quite so declamatory? Perhaps not, until one realizes just how grand and funny something like the performance of 'La partenza' really is; Baker imperiously parodying the heroic style, Britten's playing of the 22-second postlude a model of enigmatic humour. At one level, this, and the performance of 'La regata veneziana' which concludes the programme, are high parody. It is in the mordant postlude to 'La partenza', however, that we have 'Essence de Rossini', distilled to a recipe of the composer's own making by Britten himself in another of those acts of musical empathy which made him one of the wonders of the musical world.

Liebeslieder, Op 52. Neue Liebeslieder, Op 65. Three Quartets, Op 64
Edith Mathis sop Brigitte Fassbaender mez Peter Schreier ten Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar
Karl Engel, Wolfgang Sawallisch pfs
DG 423 133-2GH (55 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1982 Ⓕ ●

These delightful works will be eagerly snapped up by lovers of these seemingly simple but, in fact, quite complex settings for one, two or four voices. The performances are thoroughly idiomatic, both as regards the singers and pianists, with full value given to the words and their meaning. It is not merely a question of fine singing, which with this quartet one may more or less take for granted: the subtlety and charm of the interpretations makes what can all too often be a dreary sequence of three-four numbers into a poetic response to the nature of the waltz. There is an intelligent give-and-take between the soloists, so that voices move in and out of the limelight, as the skilful recording allows, and an extra dimension of the music is disclosed here that is too often obscured. The immediate sound is here a great advantage. This is a very worthwhile and welcome reissue of a most attractive individual record.

Lieder

Brahms Lieder – Op 32; Op 72; Op 94
Liszt Tre Sonetti di Petrarca, S270. Die Loreley, S273. O lieb, so lang du lieben kannst, S298. Es muss ein Wunderbares sein, S314
Thomas Quasthoff bar Justus Zeyen pf
DG 463 183-2GH (80 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1999 Ⓕ ●

Quasthoff treats Brahms's Op 32 as a quasi-cycle, where most singers cherry-pick Wie rafft ich mich auf in der Nacht ('Up I jumped in the night'), Du sprichst, dass ich mich täuschte ('You said I was mistaken') and the ecstatic Wie bist du, meine Königin ('My queen, you are so wondrous'). The nine songs that comprise the set are linked thematically: lost love and quintessentially German Romantic Todessehnsucht ('longing for death') loom large in the emotional foreground. If this means a lack of variety, Quasthoff minimises the effect with the poetry of his singing and deeply considered inflexion of the German language. His voice, a pure lyric baritone with darker accents, is not dissimilar to that of Fischer-Dieskau's – and the older singer is an obvious interpretative model – although its upper register sounds more robust, so that in a turbulent song such as Wehe, so willst du mich wieder ('Alas, would you enclose me, restraining fetters?') he doesn't hector as Fischer-Dieskau tends to.

Apart from Quasthoff's virtues, the disc's main attraction is his partnership with Justus Zeyen, who has transposed the first (tenor) version of Liszt's Petrarch Sonnets into the keys of the second (baritone) version for Quasthoff. But it is his exquisite playing which enhances the desirability of this disc: his twinkling arpeggios depicting the 'Melodischer Wandel der Sterne' ('Melodious movement of the stars') in Wie rafft ich or his subtle mood-painting in Liszt's justly celebrated Die Loreley. Unlike Fischer-Dieskau and Barenboim in their Brahms edition, Quasthoff does not disdain to sing the fourth song of Op 94, Sapphische Ode, usually reserved for female singers. Many will prefer Fischer-Dieskau and Barenboim in this music, but Quasthoff's and Zeyen's rapt account of Wie bist du, meine Königin is treasurable: the singer exhales the repeated exclamations of 'Wonnevoll' ('Rapturous') with intoxicating exaltation, the pianist underlining the sentiment with playing of rare sensitivity.

Zigeunerlieder, Op 103 – Nos 1-7 and 11. Dort in den Weiden, Op 97 No 4. Vergebliches Ständchen, Op 84 No 4. Die Mainacht, Op 43 No 2. Ach, wende diesen Blick, Op 57 No 4. O kühler Wald, Op 72 No 3. Von ewiger Liebe, Op 43 No 1. Junge Lieder I, Op 63 No 5. Wie rafft' ich mich auf in der Nacht, Op 32 No 1. Unbewegte laue Luft, Op 57 No 8. Heimweh II, Op 63 No 8. Mädchenlied, Op 107 No 5. Ständchen, Op 106 No 1. Sonntag, Op 47 No 3. Wiegenlied, Op 49 No 4. Zwei Gesänge, Op 91[a]
Anne Sofie von Otter mez Bengt Forsberg pf
[a]Nils-Erik Sparf va
DG 429 727-2GH (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1989 ●

Many of the Lieder here are but meagrely represented in current catalogues, so that this recital is all the more welcome, particularly in view of the perceptive musicality of both singer and pianist. They show a fine free (but unanimous!) flexibility in the Zigeunerlieder, with a dashing 'Brauner Bursche' and 'Röslein dreie' and a passionate 'Rote Abendwolken'; but there is also lightness, happy in 'Wisst ihr, wann mein Kindchen', troubled in 'Lieber Gott, du weisst'; and von Otter's coolly tender tone in 'Kommt dir manchmal in den Sinn' touches the heart. Also deeply moving are the profound yearning and the loving but anxious lullaby in the two songs with viola obbligato (most sensitively played). Elsewhere, connoisseurs of vocal technique will admire von Otter's command of colour and legato line in the gravity of O kühler Wald, the stillness of Die Mainacht and the intensity of Von ewiger Liebe, and her lovely mezza voce in the Wiegenlied and the partly repressed fervour of Unbewegte laue Luft; but to any listener her remarkable control, her responsiveness to words and, not least, the sheer beauty of her voice make this a most rewarding disc, aided as she is by Forsberg's characterful playing.

Neun Gesänge, Op 69. Vier Gesänge, Op 70. Fünf Gesänge, Op 71. Fünf Gesänge, Op 72
Juliane Banse sop Andreas Schmidt bar
Helmut Deutsch pf
CPO CPO999 446-2 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Texts and translations included. Recorded late 1990s

Of all the leading composers of Lieder, Brahms suffers more than any other through neglect, with so little of his output in the field ever appearing on recital programmes. There is some reason for this, given that his contribution to the genre is uneven, as you can judge listening to the uninspired settings of minor poets comprising Op 69. But just when you think the composer might have been on auto-pilot in his songs of the mid-1870s, along come the four pieces of Op 70 to make one revise that opinion. The impressionistic 'Lerchengesang', the reflective 'Serenade' and the better-known 'Abendregen', all show the composer in his most imaginative mode, alive to words and their inner meaning. The inspiration is more intermittent in Opp 71 and 72, but the better of the songs here – the Hölty 'Minnelied' and Bretano 'O kühler Wald' – rank with the finest in Brahms's output.

Both Banse and Schmidt are at their appreciable best as regards voice and interpretation, Banse always inside her readings, Schmidt producing tone that is consistently warm and appealing. She alternates convincingly between passion and lighter emotions. He is particularly well suited by the whole of Op 72, giving a nicely ebullient account of 'Unüberwindlich', a Goethe setting that ends the programme. Deutsch is fully up to the exigent demands of the piano parts, often almost like solos in themselves. The recording is admirable.

---

49 Deutsche Volkslieder, WoO33 – Ach, englische Schäferin; Ach Gott, wie weh tut Scheiden; All' mein' Gedanken; Da unten im Tale; Dort in den Weiden steht ein Haus; Du mein einzig Licht; Erlaube mir, fein's Mädchen, Es Ging ein Maidlein zarte; Es reit' ein Herr und auch sein Knecht; Es ritt ein Ritter; Es steht ein' Lind'; Es war ein Markgraf über'm Rhein; Es wohnet ein Fiedler; Feinsliebchen, du sollst mir nicht barfuss geh'n; Gar lieblich hat sich gesellet; Gunhilde lebt' gar stille und fromm; Ich stand auf hohem Berge; Ich weiss mir'n Maidlein hübsch und fein; In stiller Nacht, zur ersten Wacht; Jungfräulein, soll ich mit euch geh'n; Mein Mädel hat einen Rosenmund; Mir ist ein schön's braun's Maidelein; Sagt mir, O schönste Schäf'rin mein; Die Sonne scheint nicht mehr: Wach' auf mein' in Herzensschöne; Schönster Schatz, mein Engel; Soll sich der Mond nicht heller scheinen; Wie komm'ich denn zur Tür herein?
Stephan Genz bar Roger Vignoles pf
Teldec 3984-23700-2 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1998 ●●

This is another outright winner from Genz and Vignoles. Even in the pieces calling for two voices, Genz is not really outdone: his variation in timbre subtly differentiates in each case between two characters, and the unity of purpose predicated by one singer's voice has its own validity. In any case, Genz's absolute and innate gift for natural and spontaneous interpretation is reason enough to recommend this issue. The late William Mann, in examining the sources of these pieces, showed that many weren't folk-songs at all but 19th-century inventions, some by Brahms himself, but the innocent ear would find it hard to discern which was authentic and which contemporaneous with the composer, such is Brahms's wonderful gift for writing in folk mode, as in 'Erlaube mir, fein's Mädchen'. This is one of the most winning pieces here, enhanced by the artless simplicity and charm of Genz's singing. His attractively straightforward approach is just as welcome in many other songs such as 'Es steht ein' Lind' and 'Ach, englische Schäferin'. With Vignoles nimble and characterful at the piano, and a perfect recording, this is a must-buy unless you insist on the (almost) complete set available from EMI.

Ein deutsches Requiem, Op 45

Elisabeth Schwarzkopf sop Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar Philharmonia Chorus and Orchestra / Otto Klemperer
EMI Great Recordings of the Century 566903-2 (69 minutes: ADD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1961 Ⓜ ●●●

Brahm's German Requiem, a work of great concentration and spiritual intensity, is rather surprisingly, the creation of a man barely 30 years old. Klemperer's reading of this mighty work has long been famous: rugged, at times surprisingly fleet and with a juggernaut power. The superb Philharmonia is joined by its excellent chorus and two magnificent soloists – Schwarzkopf offering comfort in an endless stream of pure tone and the superb solo contribution from Fischer-Dieskau, still unequalled, taking us closer to the work's emotional, theological and musical sources than any other. Digital remastering has not entirely eliminated tape noise, but the engineers appear to have encountered few problems with the original tapes. A uniquely revealing account of the work.

Ein deutsches Requiem 🅿
Charlotte Margiono sop Rodney Gilfry bar
Monteverdi Choir; Orchestre Révolutionnaire et Romantique / Sir John Eliot Gardiner
Philips 432 140-2PH (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1990 ●●

Gardiner's performance is notable for its intensity and fervour and for the superb singing of his choir: splendidly firm and secure attacks and phrasing, always with fine tonal quality, meticulous attention to dynamic nuances, and alertness to verbal meaning and nuance. The solo baritone is a real find: an admirably focused voice with cleanly projected words and sensitive tonal gradations: if the soprano, pure-voiced and consoling, seems slightly less distinguished, it may be that she is set a trifle too far from the microphone. Pains have been taken to bring out contrapuntal strands with clarity, in both the chorus and the orchestra; and here the employment of period instruments and of selective string vibrato makes a significant contribution. In the past Gardiner has been accused of minimizing the spiritual quality of religious works; but not in this outstanding performance.

Ein deutsches Requiem
Harolyn Blackwell sop David Wilson-Johnson bar
London Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / André Previn
LSO Live LSO0005CD (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Text and translation included. Recorded 2000

A version of the German Requiem, fresh and concentrated, to confound even more strikingly than usual the jaundiced strictures notoriously piled on it by Bernard Shaw. With incandescent singing from the London Symphony Chorus, finely shaded over the widest dynamic range, this performance emphasises the drama of the piece in high contrasts. Any idea of longueurs in these seven movements could not be more completely dispelled. Brahms's markings may be predominantly measured, but Previn, by choosing flowing tempos, never for a moment lets them sag as they so easily can.

Previn has long shown what a fine Brahmsian he is, not least in this taxing work (his superb 1986 Teldec recording was a revelation). What the timings reveal here is that, however dedicated the performance is, Previn's speeds are markedly faster than most. The overall timing is over 10 minutes less than two fine rival versions from Karajan (DG, 1964 and 1983) and almost as much less than Abbado (DG – live, 1992).

Nor is there any hint of haste, just dramatic intensity to devotional ends. So the entry of the chorus in the setting of the Beatitudes in the first movement, 'Selig sind' ('Blessed are they that mourn'), is as extreme as I have ever heard it, yet when the following setting of Psalm 126 erupts on the word 'Freude', Joy, the fortissimo is thrilling in its bite. Just as bitingly dramatic are the climaxes in the second movement on the words 'Denn alles Fleisch es ist wie Gras' ('For all flesh is as the grass'), with the crescendos on the repeated timpani beats superbly caught, adding a frisson of excitement to the fearful message. Then on the words 'Aber des Herrn Wort' ('But the Word of the Lord'), leading to a vigorous fugato, the suddenness of the forte attack has you sitting up. Equally, the vision of the Last Trump in the sixth movement could not be more dramatic. In every way this performance has you registering the words with new intensity.

The impact of the chorus is all the greater when the recording gives the impression of a relatively compact group – perhaps more a question of the Barbican acoustic rather than actual size. In pianissimos it almost feels like a chamber group, but the fortissimos bite home far more tellingly than in recordings where the chorus is set in a more reverberant acoustic.

The soloists are equally responsive. David Wilson-Johnson's tone is not perhaps very beautiful, but the plaintive quality and his feeling for the words make it a most compelling performance, and Harolyn Blackwell in 'Ihr habt nun Traurigkeit' conveys in the sweetness of her tone a tender vulnerability. Altogether an outstanding, fresh and revealing version of a much-recorded work, at bargain price.

Havergal Brian British 1876-1972

GROVE

Largely self-taught, Brian won success at the beginning of the century as a composer of large-scale choral and orchestral pieces, but then was forgotten until a revival of interest began in the 1950s. Meanwhile, without prospect of performance, he had continued to write big works, including an opera The Tigers (1916-30), the 'Gothic' Symphony with soloists, choirs and brass bands (1927) and the four-hour concert opera Prometheus Unbound (1944). In his last years he became most productive, writing 27 symphonies after the age of 70, his heavy Romantic style growing more compact and elliptical.

Symphony No 1 in D minor, 'Gothic'

Eva Jenisová sop Dagmar Pecková contr Vladimir Dolezal ten Peter Mikulás bass Slovak Philharmonic Choir; Slovak National Theatre Opera Chorus; Slovak Folk Ensemble Chorus; Lucnica Chorus; Bratislava Chamber Choir; Bratislava Children's Choir; Youth Echo Choir; Czechoslovak Radio Symphony Orchestra, Bratislava; Slovak Philharmonic Orchestra / Ondrej Lenard

Marco Polo ② 8 223280/1 (111 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Text and translation included. Recorded 1989

The Gothic (1927) is legendary for its length, for its everything-but-the-kitchen-sink scoring and for having been left unperformed for decades. The tiny handful of hearings since its belated première have not wholly dispelled that image; indeed they have fuelled dismissal of Brian as an incompetent visionary, a self-taught composer whose reach far exceeded his grasp and who, creating in a vacuum of non-performance was unable to check his impractical imaginings with his ear. Admiration for Brian's boldness and inventive daring was mingled with exasperation that his teeming textures and wildly complex proliferations seemed self-defeating, that at his most exultant or would-be mystical the plethora of lines and instrumental colours simply congealed into a grey opacity. And there was the sheer barnstorming quality of the piece, too: the piling of climax upon climax, especially in the gigantic setting of the Te Deum which forms the Symphony's Part 2 (Part 1, for orchestra alone, is almost conventionally scored; it is Part 2 that requires triple chorus, soloists, four brass bands and practically everything else you can think of. But in a performance as good as this one, the real reasons for the Symphony's long neglect soon become apparent. The choral writing is almost unbelievably difficult, but with choral singing as splendidly prepared as that of the seven choirs assembled here, the remarkable precision of Brian's ear is unarguably demonstrated. In a sympathetic performance the huge choral climaxes are not simply repetitive; they chart the successive emotions of the text, from jubilance, through panic dread, to a moving expression of trust, humble and chastened. Hence the title.

Yes, it is a fine performance, fine enough to dispose of two other possible reservations about the piece: that it is simply too long, and in any case falls apart in the middle. The performance, indeed, has one of the Symphony's own characteristics: it is sure enough and strong enough for the occasional slack page and the evident fact that Brian was learning his mastery as he went along (the first movement is less assured than the others) to matter hardly at all. And how hugely the Slovak singers, to say nothing of the virtuoso first trumpet and splendid brass section, enjoy this not wholly unaccustomed idiom. A towering achievement; recorded, a touch of acidity aside, with fine clarity and spaciousness.

Symphony No 2 in E minor

Symphony No 2. Festival Fanfare

Moscow Symphony Orchestra / Tony Rowe

Marco Polo 8 223790 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Recorded 1996

Built over a resourcefully deployed group of ostinato figures and upon the pounding of three sets of timpani and two pianos, the Scherzo of Brian's Second Symphony rises to a climax of extraordinary ferocity dominated by bellowing, stereophonically-placed horns. He wanted 16 of them; here he gets eight, and the effect is very nearly as overwhelming as he had planned. This is followed by a 20-minute slow finale, constructed from a sequence of sombre and striking phrases: a grandiose and epic funeral march in effect, but incorporating within it moments of noble, Sibelius-like darkness, a superb central lament for richly sonorous strings and, after a vast, triple climax, an epilogue of frozen poignancy. It is a movement that would convince even those most dubious of Brian's gifts that he was a composer touched by genius. If you are less convinced by the first two movements this may be partly due to Brian's habit, characteristic of this stage of his career, of writing extremely dense counterpoint, in which the primacy of a particular theme isn't always immediately obvious on first hearing. You sense, too, that the orchestra and conductor on this disc, so obviously bowled over by and committed to the third and fourth movements, were perplexed by the first and second. Lines that you sense should be presented with real eloquence emerge here rather half-heartedly, squarish of rhythm; once or twice they have difficulty in emerging at all from Brian's luxurious textures. Nor is the recording, which in the symphony is on the dull, flat side, much of a help. But the latter half of this symphony is so superb that it is likely to convince you that the first half is worth persevering with. The ceremonious Fanfare, late Brian and thus terse, non-repetitive but cumulative, provides a further, rousing inducement.

Symphonies Nos 4, 12, 17 and 32

Symphonies Nos 4, 'Das Siegeslied'[a], and 12[b]
[a]Jana Valásková sop [a]Slovak Philharmonic Chorus;
[a]Brno Philharmonic Chorus;
[a]Cantus Choir; [ab]Bratislava Radio Symphony Orchestra / Adrian Leaper
Marco Polo 8 223447 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992 ●
Symphonies Nos 17 and 32. In Memoriam. Festal dance
Ireland National Symphony Orchestra / Adrian Leaper
Marco Polo 8 223481 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992

Havergal Brian's Fourth Symphony, Das Siegeslied ('The Song of Victory'), is a stentorian setting of one of the most bloodthirsty of the Psalms, written (in German) in 1933 by a composer whose close involvement with German music and ideas was central to his imagination. It's easy to read the work as a desperate warning against nationalist arrogance and militarism. But isn't it something even more alarming? The moment at which this question becomes most insistent is the passage in which Brian sets the most repulsive verse of the entire Psalm, 'That thy foot may be dipped in the blood of thine enemies, and the tongue of thy dogs in the same'. Brian harps on the verse, repeating it for close on five minutes, building with weirdly ingenious canons and ostinatos a sinister mantra of exultation in vengeance.

Most of the big moments of the symphony have this disturbing dual quality. Antidotes are there: in a beautiful, phenomenally difficult unaccompanied chorus in the first movement; in the fabulously strange music, almost impassive yet radiantly sensuous, with which the soprano soloist in the second movement responds to one of the symphony's most catastrophic descents from raucousness into the abyss; and in the hugely complex chorale fantasy on a theme very close to Luther's own Ein feste Burg that precedes the finale's culminating sequence of barbarous triumphs. But those triumphs are so savage and so mercilessly piled on that one cannot avoid being relieved when the symphony ends.

How clever, then, of Marco Polo to have twinned it with one of Brian's tersest structures. The 12th Symphony is a work in which he never repeats himself, rigorously excluding all connective tissue, proceeding by statement and counter-statement alone to a single, superbly intransigent movement that says in 11 minutes almost as much as the Fourth seems to say in 50.

On the second of these releases is the sombre, battle-riven 17th – a locus classicus for studying Brian's technique of progress through metamorphosis rather than 'development', and his last work, the 32nd. In this he refused to pay the symphony an autumnal farewell, choosing instead to earn his eloquent coda by strenuous endeavour, through music of Nielsen-like conflict and one of the most haunted of his characteristic funeral marches. Of the couplings, the grandly stated In Memoriam is a three-movement symphony in all but name, fusing Bruckner and the slow march music in Parsifal with scoring of lucid richness. There's no denying that Brian's music is 'difficult', but any lingering suspicion that his neglect led to a crabbed and arcane 'private' language will not withstand a couple of intent hearings of either of these discs. Marco Polo are doing us a great service in providing such assured, decently recorded performances in shrewdly devised couplings that make the process of coming to terms with Havergal Brian as easy as it can be.

Symphonies Nos 11 and 15

Symphonies – No 11[a]; No 15[b]. For Valour[b]. Doctor Merryheart[a]
National Symphony Orchestra of Ireland /
[a]Adrian Leaper, [b]Tony Rowe
Marco Polo 8 223588 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded [a]1993 and [b]1997

Symphony No 11 is in three movements, strangely proportioned: six minutes of noble, slow counterpoint followed by a jovial Scherzo more than twice as long, which incorporates graceful 'slow-movement material' before finally becoming a slow movement. The march-finale, despite being tripartite, lasts barely four minutes. No 15, by contrast, is in a single movement and is developed from a single theme. In fact, the ungainly-looking No 11 feels like a unity, largely because of the use of a couple of brief motto ideas, most obviously to unify the strong contrasts of the central movement, but also in fact linking the seemingly quite unrelated outer ones. No 15 is still more impressive, though its mood is difficult to read. 'Relaxed and extrovert' is the description in Malcolm MacDonald's notes; 'a work of power and tenderness' was how the composer saw it. The regular tread that runs throughout, the audible relatedness of all the ideas despite strange contrasts, give it an enigmatic, at times a sinister quality that is most compelling. Though probably the strongest piece here, the magnificent elegy that opens No 11 will win friends more readily.

The two overtures are very varied, too. For Valour is a huge sonata-form allegro, hints of Elgarian nobilmente punctuating its Straussian exuberance, all three of its main ideas industriously spawning subsidiaries. Doctor Merryheart begins with a similar profusion of themes but then turns into a set of seven overlapping variations in which Brian affectionately but mercilessly parodies Strauss's Don Quixote and Ein Heldenleben. The performances are enthusiastic and accomplished and the recording is rich but clean. A good introduction to Brian's many faces.

Frank Bridge

British 1879-1941

GROVE Bridge studied with Stanford at the RCM (1899-1903) and made a reputation as a chamber musician (a violist) and conductor. His early works, including the orchestral suite The Sea (1911), the symphonic poem Summer (1914) and much chamber music, are close to Bax and Delius, but after World War I he developed rapidly. His Third (1926) and Fourth (1937) Quartets are highly chromatic, reflecting his admiration for Berg, though his music remained distinctively English. Also remarkable is the contrapuntal vigour and energy of his later orchestral works, which include the rhapsody Enter Spring (1927), Oration with solo cello (1930) and Phantasm with solo piano (1931). None of his more adventurous music was much regarded until the 1970s, his fame resting largely on his having been Britten's teacher.

Orchestral Works

The Sea, H100. Summer, H116. Cherry Ripe, H119b. Enter Spring, H174. Lament, H117
Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Charles Groves
EMI British Composers 566855-2 Ⓑ
(60 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1975 ●

An ideal introduction to the music of Frank Bridge, this much-loved programme was always one of the highlights of Sir Charles Groves's Liverpool tenure, and its reappearance is more than welcome. Although a handful of individual performances – most notably Vernon Handley and the Ulster Orchestra in a stunningly engineered account of The Sea (on Chandos) – may have surpassed them in terms of poetic rapture and beguiling finish, Groves's clear-headed, stirringly sympathetic Enter Spring, though at times a little too sturdy on its pins, easily outranks the competition. The transfer is the same as that used for an earlier mid-price EMI Studio offering from 1989, and the finished article sounds as resplendent and full-bodied as ever (with a touch less background hiss than before). Don't miss this reissue.

Bridge The Sea, H100[a]. Enter Spring, H174[b]
Britten The Building of the House, Op 79[c]
Holst Egdon Heath, H172[d].
A Fugal Concerto, H152[e]
[e]Richard Adeney fl [e]Peter Graeme ob [c]East Anglian Choirs; aceEnglish Chamber Orchestra, [b]New Philharmonia Orchestra, [d]London Symphony Orchestra / [abcd]Benjamin Britten, [e]Imogen Holst
BBC Legends/IMG Artists Britten the Performer
[d]mono/stereo BBCB8007-2 (70 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in [d]July 1961, [bc]June 1967, [a]June1971 and [e]June 1969

Britten conducts the music of his beloved mentor and teacher, Frank Bridge, with a heart-warming dedication. From the outset his radiant interpretation of The Sea grips with its pungent elemental force, mastery of the singing line and unforgettably rapt poetic instinct. The supple naturalness of the phrasing is a thing of wonder throughout, nowhere more so than during the strings' ineffably tender reprise of the main theme of 'Moonlight'. Similarly, Britten's faithful conception of Enter Spring possesses a fresh-faced capriciousness, cogent sweep and expressive ardour to make one fall in love all over again with Bridge's exuberant vision. As in The Sea, one senses an acute concern for the grander scheme. And what reserves of poignant tenderness he conjures from his hard-working New Philharmonia strings in the ecstatic central portion. Britten's sparky The Building of the House Overture launches proceedings in dashing fashion. This was only its second performance (the world première having taken place two days earlier), and one readily overlooks the chorus's sharp initial entry in view of the quick-witted tension generated elsewhere. Britten's 1961 Orford Church performance of Holst's Egdon Heath brings with it some occasional insecurity from the LSO, yet his eloquent direction distils exactly the right chill and the interpretation as a whole evinces a compelling dignity, patience and lucidity. Finally Holst's daughter, Imogen, presides over a wonderfully poised and serene account of her father's engaging Fugal Concerto from a June 1969 concert at Blythburgh Church. Recordings of varying vintage have all come up very freshly.

Isabella. Enter Spring. Two Poems for Orchestra. Mid of the Night
BBC National Orchestra of Wales / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9950 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Especially valuable here is the passionate, scrupulously prepared rendering of Isabella, a red-blooded tone-poem very much in the

Liszt/Tchaikovsky mould premièred in October 1907 under Sir Henry Wood. This is an incredibly strong piece (the ravishing oboe melody representing the eponymous heroine will haunt you for days), and Hickox does it absolutely proud. He also extracts every ounce of eloquence from Mid of the Night.

The pleasures continue with the delectably resourceful Two Poems of 1915, the subtle half-lights and penetrating harmonic scope of the first (one of the most raptly poignant evocations of nature in all British music) forming a vivid contrast with the joyous clangour and contrapuntal ingenuity of the succeeding scherzo. As for the exuberant, utterly intoxicating masterpiece that is Enter Spring, Hickox's polished, vigorous and bright-eyed conception leaves perhaps an ever-so-slightly literal, swagger-free impression by the side of Britten's riveting interpretation with the New Philharmonia from the 1967 Aldeburgh Festival.

But all in all this is a very good disc indeed.

String Sextet in E flat, H107

Bridge String Sextet in E flat, H107 Goossens Concertino, Op 47. Phantasy Sextet, Op 37
Academy of St Martin in the Fields Chamber Ensemble (Kenneth Sillito, Malcolm Latchem, Rita Manning, Robert Heard vns Robert Smissen, Stephen Tees vas Stephen Orton, Roger Smith vcs)
Chandos CHAN9472 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

This admirable programme presents three fine chamber offerings, excellently realized. Goossens's high-quality invention and effortless craft are strikingly evident in the Concertino, here performed in its original 1928 guise for string octet and also the elegantly structured Phantasy Sextet of 1923. Scored for three violins, one viola and two cellos, this impressive composition is consistently fertile, tightly knit and confidently conceived for the medium. Bridge's Sextet is laid out for the more traditional line-up comprising pairs of each instrument, and is at once the most ambitious and sumptuous of the composer's early chamber offerings. Perhaps the most striking music can be found in the central Andante con moto, a wistfully lilting threnody which itself frames a brief Scherzo of nervy propulsion. As usual with Bridge, the elegant formal design, captivating lyrical flow and satisfying cogency yield huge pleasure. The playing is splendid, the sound and balance impeccable.

Piano Trio No 2

Phantasy Trio in C minor, H79. Piano Trio No 2, H178. Miniatures – H88: Romance; Intermezzo; H89: Valse russe; Hornpipe
Bernard Roberts Trio (Andrew Roberts vn Nicholas Roberts vc Bernard Roberts pf)
Black Box BBM1028 (57 mins: DDD). Rec 1995 Ⓕ

These are utterly sympathetic, beautifully prepared performances from this fine family group, whose line-up comprises the distinguished pianist Bernard Roberts and his two sons, Andrew and Nicholas. The centrepiece is the Second Piano Trio, a truly magnificent creation that Anthony Payne has justly hailed as 'one of the masterpieces of 20th-century English, indeed European chamber music'. Cast in two interlinked movements, it is a work of searing intensity and astounding individuality, whose November 1929 première provoked a shockingly ignorant and hurtful response from some quarters of the British musical establishment. Compared with the Dartington Trio on a rival Hyperion issue, these dedicated newcomers take a more restrained, less lingering view of this troubled music. Some will crave an altogether more palpable sense of numbing loss in the unnerving Andante molto moderato slow movement than the Bernard Roberts Trio chooses to convey; and the work's towering final climax perhaps lacks that last ounce of cumulative power and epic breadth. No matter, this is a shapely, thoroughly convincing conception all the same.

Winner of the 1907 Cobbett Composition Prize, the Phantasy Trio in C minor inhabits an entirely different world, its elegant arch-shaped form, superior craftsmanship and generous lyrical flow being typical of Bridge's early output. The present group gives a splendidly taut, agreeably unmannered account of this lovely piece, and lavishes similarly deft and affectionate treatment upon four of the nine Miniatures for piano trio published in three sets between 1909 and 1915 (the opening 'Romance' is a particularly touching morsel).

The sound is admirably vivid, though the piano timbre is perhaps just a touch clangorous. In all, a most desirable acquisition.

Cello Sonata in D minor, H125

Cello Sonata. Meditation. Spring Song. Serenade. Berceuse. Scherzo. Elégie. Mélodie. Cradle Song
Britten Cello Sonata in C, Op 65
Øystein Birkeland vc Vebjørn Anvik pf
Simax PSC1160 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

The Norwegian duo of Øystein Birkeland and Vebjørn Anvik lend gloriously unaffected and formidably lucid advocacy to Bridge's masterwork, his Cello Sonata, the strength and nobility of their playing always ideally counterbalanced by tender restraint and songful intimacy. These superbly stylish performers prove no less responsive to the poetic charms of Bridge the miniaturist.

The winsome Serenade of 1903 is a fresh-faced delight here, while the 1902 Scherzo fairly twinkles with humour. How memorably, too, they sustain the long-breathed ardour of both the Elégie (1904) and Mélodie (written in 1911 and dedicated to the cellist Felix Salmond).

Sandwiched between the Bridge Sonata and a sequence of miniatures comes a really fine account of the Cello Sonata that Britten penned for Rostropovich in 1960-61. Here, too, Birkeland and Anvik form an intelligent, scrupulously observant partnership, their playing as thoughtful as it is intense, though not even they can match the extraordinary fluidity that Rostropovich and Britten bring to the work's opening bars on their inspirational première recording for Decca (a true classic of the gramophone – reviewed above).

Among digital contenders, however, this beautifully engineered and sensitively balanced recording is as good as any and more imposing than most. Calum MacDonald contributes the exemplary booklet essay. All told, a very positive recommendation.

Benjamin Britten

British 1913-1976

GROVE Britten studied with Frank Bridge as a boy and in 1930 entered the RCM. In 1934 he heard Wozzeck and planned to study with Berg, but opposition at home stopped him. The next year he began working for the GPO Film Unit, where one of his collaborators was Auden: together they worked on concert works as well, Auden's social criticism being matched by a sharply satirical and virtuoso musical style (orchestral song cycle Our Hunting Fathers, 1936). Stravinsky and Mahler were important influences, but Britten's effortless technique gave his early music a high personal definition, notably shown in orchestral works (Bridge Variations for strings, 1937; Piano Concerto, 1938; Violin Concerto, 1939) and songs (Les illuminations, setting Rimbaud for high voice and strings, 1939).

In 1939 he left England for the USA, with his lifelong companion Peter Pears; there he wrote his first opera, to Auden's libretto (Paul Bunyan, 1941). In 1942 he returned and, partly stimulated by Purcell, began to concentrate on settings of English verse (anthem Rejoice in the Lamb and Serenade for tenor, horn and strings, both 1943). His String Quartet No 2 (1945), with its huge concluding chaconne, also came out of his Purcellian interests, but the major work of this period was Peter Grimes (1945), which signalled a new beginning in English opera. Its central character, the first of many roles written for Pears, struck a new operatic tone: a social outcast, he is fiercely proud and independent, but also deeply insecure, providing opportunities for a lyrical flow that would be free but is not. Britten's gift for characterization was also displayed in the wide range of sharply defined subsidiary roles and in the orchestra's sea music.

However, his next operas were all written for comparatively small resources (The Rape of Lucretia, 1946 ; Albert Herring, 1947; a version of The Beggar's Opera, 1948 ; The Little Sweep, 1949), for the company that became established as the English Opera Group. At the same time he began writing music for the Aldeburgh Festival, which he and Pears founded in 1948 in the Suffolk town where they had settled (cantata St Nicolas, 1948; Lachrymae for viola and piano, 1949). And in this prolific period he also composed large concert works (The Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra, 1946; Spring Symphony with soloists and choir, 1949) and songs.

The pattern of his output was thus set, though not the style, for the operas show an outward urge to ever new subjects: village comedy in Albert Herring, psychological conflict in Billy Budd (1951), historical reconstruction in Gloriana (1953), a tale of ghostly possession in The Turn of the Screw (1954), nocturnal magic in A Midsummer Night's Dream (1960), a struggle between family history and individual responsibility in Owen Wingrave (1971) and, most centrally, obsession with a doomed ideal in Death in Venice (1973), the last three works being intermediate in scale between the chamber format of Herring and The Screw, and the symphonic fullness of Budd and Gloriana, both written for Covent Garden. But nearly all touch in some way on the themes of the individual and society and the violation of innocence. Simultaneous with a widening range of subject matter was a widening musical style, which came to include 12-note elements (Turn of the Screw) and a heterophony that owed as much to oriental music directly as it did to Mahler (cycle of 'church parables', or ritualized small-scale operas: Curlew River, The Burning Fiery Furnace, The Prodigal Son, 1964-68).

Many of these dramatic works were written for the Aldeburgh Festival, as were many of the instrumental and vocal works Britten produced for favoured performers. For Rostropovich he wrote the Cello Symphony (1963) as well as a sonata and three solo suites; for Pears there was the Hardy cycle Winter Words (1953) among many other songs, and also a central part in the War Requiem (1961). His closing masterpiece, however, was a return to the abstract in the String Quartet No 3 (1975).

Britten was appointed a Companion of Honour in 1952, to the Order of Merit in 1965, and was awarded a life peerage in 1976.

Piano Concerto in D, Op 13

Piano Concerto. Violin Concerto, Op 15
Mark Lubotsky vn Sviatoslav Richter pf
English Chamber Orchestra / Benjamin Britten
Decca British Music Collection 473 715-2
(67 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1970 Ⓜ

Just after Britten's performances were released on LP in 1971, the composer admitted with some pride that Sviatoslav Richter had learned his Piano Concerto 'entirely off his own bat', and had revealed a Russianness that was in the score. Britten was attracted to Shostakovich during the late 1930s, when it was written, and the bravado, brittleness and flashy virtuosity of the writing, in the march-like finale most of all, at first caused many to be wary of it, even to think it somehow outside the composer's style. Now we know his music better, it is easier to accept, particularly in this sparkling yet sensitive performance. The Violin Concerto dates from the following year, 1939, and it, too, has its self-conscious virtuosity, but it is its rich nostalgic lyricism which strikes to the heart and the quiet elegiac ending is unforgettable. Compared to Richter in the other work, Mark Lubotsky is not always the master of its hair-raising difficulties, notably in the Scherzo, which has passages of double artificial harmonics that even Heifetz wanted simplified before he would play it (Britten refused), but this is still a lovely account. Fine recordings, made at The Maltings at Snape.

Piano Concerto. Soirées musicales, Op 9. Matinées musicales, Op 24
Ralf Gothóni pf
Helsingborg Symphony Orchestra / Okko Kamu
Ondine ODE825-2 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

A perceptive, at times daring, always thought-provoking account of Britten's Piano Concerto. Indeed, pungent characterization reigns, especially in the two middle movements. Here the 'Waltz' is teased out with sly seduction by Okko Kamu and his excellent Swedish group, yet at the same time the ominous undertones of this music have never been more unnervingly projected. Even more distinctive is Ralf Gothóni's provocatively expansive way with the opening of the 'Impromptu'. Britten's theme here emerges like some ravishingly intimate meditation, its quasi-improvisatory air compellingly conveyed. Yet such is the magnetic concentration of Gothóni's playing that the line never falters, and the rest of the movement is again memorably realized. We are also offered the concerto's original slow movement, a sharply inventive, capricious 'Recitative and Aria' (which Britten withdrew in 1945). No complaints about the fizz and bravura on show in the opening 'Toccata', nor about the finale, whose largamente climax struts forth in superbly grim fashion. Welcome contrast comes with the two Rossini-inspired suites, and Kamu does them both proud. The orchestral playing in Helsingborg has poise, affection and wealth of tender expression in the two most reflective numbers (the 'Canzonetta' from Soirées and 'Nocturne' from Matinées). Ondine's sound throughout is simply first-rate.

Violin Concerto in D minor, Op 15

Britten Violin Concerto Walton Viola Concerto
Maxim Vengerov vn/va London Symphony Orchestra / Mstislav Rostropovich
EMI 557510-2 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002

When artists of the stature of Vengerov and Rostropovich tackle English music it is often a revelation, and here you have some of the most ravishing string-playing ever heard in either of these masterpieces. This is music-making as a love affair. That said, these readings do not always follow convention, let alone metronome markings, and there is at least one choice of tempo which may well have traditionalists spluttering in protest. As one might expect with Rostropovich as conductor, the Britten is the less controversial of the two readings. The soloist's first entry over crisply sprung ostinato repetitions on bassoon and harp is marked dolcissimo, and the sweetness of Vengerov's playing in the high-lying cantilena is nothing short of heavenly. Here and throughout the work the soloist's free expressiveness, his use of rubato, far from sounding forced, reflects a seemingly spontaneous understanding, the creative insight of a major artist, rapt and intense. Rostropovich and the LSO match him in their warm expressiveness.

Throughout, the full-blooded recording not only covers the widest dynamic range, but brings out many inner details in the orchestral writing normally obscured.

That is also true of the Russians' reading of the Walton Viola Concerto, with Vengerov evidently just as much at ease on the larger instrument as on his violin. Yet the timings alone will bear witness to the individuality of the reading. Vengerov is even more expansive than Kennedy or Bashmet, and the wonder is that, with Rostropovich in total sympathy, he sustains the slow tempo with rapt intensity, pure and tender with no hint of soupiness of the kind that mars the Kennedy version. Unconventional as it is, this is a reading that demands to be heard, even if Waltonians won't want it as their only choice.

Violin Concerto[a]. Symphony for Cello and Orchestra, Op 68[b]
[a]Rebecca Hirsch vn [b]Tim Hugh vc BBC Scottish Symphony Orchestra / Takuo Yuasa Ⓢ
Naxos 8 553882 (68 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1997

Rebecca Hirsch follows up her invaluable coupling of the two Rawsthorne violin concertos for Naxos with this no less likeable account of the Britten concerto. Not only does she (for the most part) make light of the solo part's fiendish technical difficulties, her playing evinces a beguiling lyrical beauty that is breathtaking. By the side of both Ida Haendel and Lorraine McAslan, Hirsch perhaps lacks the last ounce of fiery temperament (and there are a handful of tiny misreadings), but generally she is a convincing, characterful advocate.

In the Cello Symphony, Tim Hugh displays a profound musicality, great subtlety of tone and affecting lyrical ardour that puts in mind Steven Isserlis's account with Richard Hickox, though not quite achieving the dark-hued individuality and unremitting logic of that distinguished 1987 production. Nor does it displace dedicatee Rostropovich's blisteringly intense, composer-directed versions of this gritty masterpiece, but Hugh's achievement is considerable and he more than holds his own alongside the formidable roster of current rivals.

Takuo Yuasa draws an eloquent response from his forces. However, at the Violin Concerto's opening Moderato con moto, some leisurely tempos tend to undermine the purposeful thrust of the whole. Sound and balance are generally very good indeed.

Cello Symphony

Britten Cello Symphony Walton Cello Concerto
Julian Lloyd Webber vc
Academy of St Martin in the Fields / Sir Neville Marriner
Philips 454 442-2PH (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ●●

This is an inspired coupling of two works, closely parallel in the careers of their composers, each reflecting the mastery of a great Russian cellist (respectively Rostropovich and Piatigorsky), but which could hardly be more sharply contrasted. Lloyd Webber in an illuminating note makes that very point, and the passionate commitment of his playing in both works confirms his views. Not only is the power of each piece fully laid out, the beauty is presented as never before on disc, helped by sumptuous, beautifully balanced sound.

On any count this is the finest, most formidable disc that Julian Lloyd Webber has yet given us. In the Britten it almost goes without saying that, like his rivals on disc, Lloyd Webber cannot quite command the power and thrust of Rostropovich. That said, Lloyd Webber and Sir Neville Marriner, helped by the far greater dynamic range of the recording, not only convey the extraordinary originality of Britten's scoring in a way beyond any rival, but find an extra warmth. In the Walton, Lloyd Webber is individual and imaginative in his phrasing – he is outstanding in the deeply meditative statement of the theme in the variation finale – and the sumptuousness of the Philips sound makes this exceptionally warm, while the sparky complexity of the central Scherzo is thrillingly clear. This performance confirms this post-war work as vintage Walton, the equal of his pre-war concerto masterpieces for viola and violin. In both pieces Lloyd Webber makes light of the formidable technical difficulties. This project has involved him deeply, and he has been wonderfully well served by his collaborators.

Cello Symphony, Op 68[a]. Sinfonia da Requiem[b].
Cantata misericordium, Op 69[c]
Mstislav Rostropovich vc Sir Peter Pears ten
Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar
[a]English Chamber Orchestra, [b]New Philharmonia Orchestra, [c]London Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Benjamin Britten
Decca London 425 100-2LM (75 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1964 ●●

The Cello Symphony, written in 1963 as part of a series for the great Russian cellist Mstislav Rostropovich, was the first major sonata-form work written since the Sinfonia. The idea of a struggle between soloist and orchestra, implicit in the traditional concerto, has no part here; it is a conversation between the two. Rostropovich plays with a depth of feeling that has never quite been equalled in other recordings and the playing of the English Chamber Orchestra has great bite. The recording, too, is extraordinarily fine for its years.

From the opening drumbeat the Sinfonia employs a sonata form with dramatic power, although the tone is never fierce or savage; it has an implacable tread and momentum. The central movement, 'Dies irae', however, has a real sense of fury, satirical in its biting comment – the flutter-tongued wind writing rattling its defiance. The closing 'Requiem aeternam' is a movement of restrained beauty. The New Philharmonia play superbly. The Cantata misericordium was written in 1962 as a commission from the Red Cross. It takes the story of the Good Samaritan and is scored for tenor and baritone soloists, chorus, string quartet and orchestra. It is a universal plea for charity and receives a powerful reading.

This release is a must for any Britten enthusiast.

Additional recommendation
Cello Symphony[a]
Couplings: Sinfonia da Requiem[b]. Cantata misericordium, Op 69[c].
Rostropovich vc Pears ten Fischer-Dieskau bar
[a]English Chamber Orchestra, [b]New Philharmonia Orchestra, [c]London Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Britten
Decca London 425 100-2LM (75 minutes: ADD: Ⓜ recorded 1964). Texts and translation included ●●

A formidable coupling and a must for any Britten enthusiast: Rostropovich plays with a depth of feeling that has yet to be equalled (reviewed in full under Sinfonia da Requiem).

Double Concerto in B minor

Double Concerto[b]. Young Apollo[a]. Two Portraits[c].
Sinfonietta, Op 1[d]
[b]Gidon Kremer vn [bc]Yuri Bashmet va [a]string quartet (Lyn Fletcher, Dara De Cogan vns Tim Pooley va Peter Worrall vc) [a]Nikolai Lugansky pf Hallé Orchestra / Kent Nagano
Warner Elatus 0927-46718-2 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1998 ●

This release contains three world-première recordings. Most striking is the Double Concerto, the short score of which the gifted 18-year-old completed by the early autumn of 1932. That same summer Britten also produced his 'official' Op 1, the dazzlingly inventive Sinfonietta for 10 instruments. The two works have plenty in common both formally and stylistically. The 'orchestral' version of the Sinfonietta heard here incorporates a full complement of strings as well as a second horn part.

Colin Matthews fashioned a performing edition of the Double Concerto from Britten's helpfully detailed sketches, the piece receiving its première at the 1987 Aldeburgh Festival. While not quite showing the effortless fluency and innovative thematic guile of the Sinfonietta, it remains an astonishing work for one so young, with numerous examples of sparky, head-turning inspiration. Likewise, the Two Portraits make intriguing listening. Composed in August 1930, the first is a 'sketch for strings describing David' (David Layton, a close friend of the 16-year-old Britten at Gresham's School), whose emotional vehemence and harmonic restlessness nod towards Janáček and even Berg.

Nagano directs a set of performances which are beyond praise in their luminous refinement and blistering commitment; all three distinguished soloists are on unimpeachable form. Warners' sound quality is sumptuously realistic to match.

'Frank Bridge' Variations

Variations on a theme of Frank Bridge, Op 10.
The Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra, Op 34.
Four Sea Interludes, Op 33*a*. Passacaglia, Op 33*b*
BBC Symphony Orchestra / Sir Andrew Davis
Warner Apex 8573 89082-2 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1991

The real reason for investing in this bargain reissue is Davis's exceptionally insightful account of the Variations. After a deceptively low-key 'Introduction and Theme', this quickly develops into a reading of striking application and abundant character, plumbing genuine depths in the 'Funeral March' and 'Chant', and conveying an overwhelming sense of pathos towards the close. Of course, no home should be without the composer's uniquely authoritative 1966 account with the ECO on Decca (still unsurpassed and perhaps unsurpassable), but, as 'big-band' contenders go, there is no more perceptive rendering than Davis's.

The couplings include a thoroughly professional, no-frills Young Person's Guide, finely played and with a delectable rhythmic snap in the variation for percussion in particular. What's missing is harder to define: that sense of playfulness, fun even, you hear in, say, Hickox's excellent account for Chandos, which remains the pick of the digital crop, though Britten's own classic LSO recording is also an absolute must. Davis's Four Sea Interludes are agreeable enough in their comparatively breezy, uncomplicated manner, and it's always a pleasure to hear the imposing Passacaglia given with such intensity. Overall, well worth its modest outlay.

Simple Symphony, Op 4

Simple Symphony. Prelude and Fugue, Op 29
Lachrymae, Op 48*a*. Elegy. Variations on a theme of Frank Bridge, Op 10
Lars Anders Tomter va Norwegian Chamber Orchestra / Iona Brown
Virgin Classics 545121-2 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1988-91

The Frank Bridge Variations are finely disciplined, strongly characterized and benefit from sumptuous engineering. The hushed intensity achieved in such variations as the 'Adagio' and 'Chant' recalls Britten's own remarkable interpretation – and there can be no higher praise than that! In the Simple Symphony the infectious 'Playful Pizzicato' could perhaps have been given with a greater sense of fun; elsewhere, though, there can be no complaints about the outer movements (both wonderfully crisp and vital), while the lovely 'Sentimental Sarabande' has surely seldom enjoyed such tenderly expressive advocacy. The Prelude and Fugue is brought off with exhilarating poise and panache, and it is difficult to imagine a more eloquent contribution than that of violist Lars Anders Tomter in the early solo Elegy and haunting, Dowland-inspired Lachrymae. Consistently superior sound and an uncommonly generous playing time add to the considerable attractions of this release.

The Young Person's Guide ..., Op 34

The Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra. Simple Symphony, Op 4[a]. A Spring Symphony, Op 44 – Spring, the sweet spring. Noyes Fludde[b] – Noye, Noye, take thou thy company ... Sir! heare are lions. Serenade for Tenor, Horn and Strings, Op 31 – Nocturne. Folk Songs – The Plough Boy; Early One Morning. Billy Budd – Interlude and Sea Shanties. A Ceremony of Carols, Op 28 – Adam lay i-bounden. A Hymn to the Virgin. War Requiem – Lacrimosa. Peter Grimes – Interlude (Dawn)
Sir Peter Pears ten Barry Tuckwell hn various soloists; choirs, choruses and orchestras, London Symphony Orchestra, [ab]English Chamber Orchestra / Benjamin Britten pf
[b]Norman Del Mar
Decca 436 990-2DWO (74 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1963-68 ●

This reissue includes the composer's own 1963 recording of The Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra with the LSO and his complete 1968 ECO version of the Simple Symphony. The latter is delightfully fresh and is unforgettable for the joyful bounce of the 'Playful Pizzicato', helped by the resonant acoustic of The Maltings, Snape. In The Young Person's Guide, without the now somewhat rather dated text, he adopts quick, demanding tempos, with more spacious ones for the more introspective sections. This is beautiful playing, possessing wit and brilliance, with all kinds of memorable touches. Even if this transfer is a little dry in sonority, this disc is invaluable for these two performances alone. As a bonus we are also offered 10 short excerpts from other major Britten works.

The Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra, Op 34
4 Sea Interludes, Op 33*a*. Suite on English Folk Tunes, 'A time there was...', Op 90. Johnson over Jordan Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9221 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ ●

Britten The Young Person's Guide to the Orchestra, Op 34. Passacaglia, Op 33*b*. 4 Sea Interludes, Op 33*a*. Sinfonia da Requiem, Op 20. Purcell Chaconne for Strings, Z730
London Philharmonic Orchestra / Leonard Slatkin
RCA 09026 61226-2 (68 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1989

Both Slatkin and Hickox turn in strikingly alert, fresh-faced readings of The Young Person's Guide, though the most telling moment in either performance comes in the cello-led Variation G where Hickox coaxes some exquisitely intimate playing from his Bournemouth section. In the giddy final fugue, it is Slatkin's LPO who display marginally greater virtuosity, yet conversely it is Hickox who generates the more palpable cumulative intensity. Ultimately, it is the latter's account that wins the day – his account just generates more sheer fun. But both are first-rate and excitingly well engineered too, with Slatkin's Walthamstow Town Hall production having the edge in terms of detail and bite.

When it comes to the Grimes Interludes, Slatkin and Hickox could hardly view the music more differently. The American concentrates on meticulous refinement, with radiantly airy textures throughout: the results are more coolly detached than we are used to hearing and often strikingly beautiful, but the comparative lack of physical impact in the 'Storm', though entirely consistent with Slatkin's almost balletic approach, will not be to all tastes. Not surprisingly, Hickox's is a more traditional presentation, though that is not to imply any lack of sensitivity or freshness. As the very opening of 'Dawn' reveals, Hickox adopts a more tenderly expressive manner than Slatkin, and there's no gainsaying the greater elemental fury of Hickox's 'Storm'; however, his two middle tableaux are perhaps rather less memorable.

Overall, Slatkin's account remains the more eventful; what's more, the American offers a notable bonus in the shape of a lucid and refined account of the Passacaglia from the same opera.

Brittenites will find much to savour in the remainder of both concerts. Hickox's account of the entertaining confection Johnson over Jordan fully matches the standards of Steuart Bedford's admirable ECO world-première recording from a couple of years back. Even more welcome is the Suite on English Folk Tunes, Britten's final orchestral work, full of the most bracing invention and intensely poignant to boot. The vigour, snap and discipline of this Bournemouth performance are utterly commendable.

So what is left on the RCA set? Well, there's a most eloquent, beautifully poised Purcell Chaconne – Britten's loving realisation can rarely have sounded more beguiling. But the major attraction here is the Sinfonia da Requiem. This could hardly start more promisingly, with fearsome ff timpani blows and balefully growling tuba. Again, what immediately impresses is the focus and sheen of the orchestral playing, but there's a price to pay, perhaps, in the shape of some lack of emotional thrust. It's the 'Dies irae' centrepiece which bears this observation out most clearly: the demons certainly don't scamper quite as malevolently as they do on the composer's own 1964 Decca recording (which still sounds absolutely stunning three decades on).

In sum, two superior, finely engineered additions to the Britten discography.

String Quartets

String Quartets – No 2 in C, Op 36; D (1931); F (1928)
Sorrel Quartet (Gina McCormack, Catherine Yates vns Vicci Wardman va Helen Thatcher vc)
Chandos CHAN9664 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ⊙

The Sorrel Quartet can claim a significant 'first' in its account of the recently resurrected F major Quartet from 1928. At 15, Britten was nothing if not precocious, and although the ideas in this substantial piece offer few hints of his mature style, he was already using the medium to excellent effect. Three years later, in the D major Quartet which has been a repertory item since Britten revised it in 1974, there are signs of a more individual voice; this is an attractive performance, well shaped and effectively characterized. Nevertheless, it is on the interpretation of the Quartet No 2 that the disc must be judged. The Sorrel's naturalness and feeling for line are much in evidence. Tempos for the first movement are broader than most rivals, but they serve an approach which makes a virtue of reticence, and still manages to be quite gripping. It has just about the best sound currently available (with The Maltings, Snape, providing an ideal acoustic), and the otherwise unrecorded F major Quartet adds strength to the recommendation of this noteworthy disc.

String Quartets – No 2 in C, Op 36; No 3, Op 94
Brodsky Quartet (Andrew Haveron, Ian Belton vns Paul Cassidy va Jacqueline Thomas vc)
Challenge Classics CC72099 Ⓕ
(61 minutes: DDD). Recorded c2002

The Brodsky are the Britten team for the new century, and at full price they take advantage of the super-refined Snape Maltings acoustic to offer performances of great intelligence and expressive power. No other recording of No 2 manages to convey the dramatic passion and lyric sweep of Britten's marvellously idiomatic string writing more persuasively than this one does. At two points during the long finale, the inner voices don't sound, to these ears, sufficiently distinct, the presentation of the all-pervading chaconne theme under-articulated. But these are momentary quibbles rather than sustained reservations, and it can certainly be argued that the overall interpretation of the movement benefits from the kind of contrasts which these effects represent.

In general, No 3 unfolds at slightly broader tempi than those chosen by the Maggini (on Naxos), and the episodic recitative that opens the finale seems a shade too expansive for its own good. Otherwise, this is exemplary, with immaculate ensemble and a sense of spontaneous expressive engagement bringing out the full stature of this deeply-felt, valedictory music. A memorable disc, then, and an outstanding Britten cycle.

String Quartet No 3, Op 94. Alla marcia. Quartettino. Simple Symphony, Op 4
Maggini Quartet (Laurence Jackson, David Angel vns Martin Outram va Michal Kaznowski vc)
Naxos 8 554360 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1997

This second volume of the Maggini Quartet's Britten series amply fulfils the promise of the first. As before, the recording, made in St Martin's Church, East Woodhay (near Newbury) favours blend and immediacy: the leading full-price alternative, recorded at Snape by the Sorrel Quartet for Chandos, has a richer atmosphere and a stronger sense of space, but, as interpretations, the Maggini's versions need fear nothing from the current competition. The major work here is the late Third Quartet, a score whose extreme contrasts of mood and texture, ranging from rapt serenity to explosive bitterness, are the more difficult to make convincing for the extraordinary economy of means which the ailing Britten summoned. The Maggini are hard to beat in the conviction they bring to all aspects of what is a notably well-focused, technically polished account. Their choice of basic tempos for the tricky outer movements is ideal, and they relish the elements of parody elsewhere without descending into caricature. This disc also provides the only currently available version of the early but radical Quartettino, and the quartet version of the Simple Symphony.

Solo Cello Suites

No 1, Op 72; No 2, Op 80; No 3, Op 87

Solo Cello Suites Nos 1 and 2. Cello Sonata, Op 65
Mstislav Rostropovich vc Benjamin Britten pf
Decca London 421 859-2LM (68 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1961-69 ●●●

This is a classic recording of the Cello Sonata, with Rostropovich and Britten playing with an authority impossible to surpass, and is here coupled with the unaccompanied First and Second Cello Suites. The suggestive, often biting humour, masks darker feelings. However, Britten manages, just, to keep his devil under control. Rostropovich's and Britten's characterisation in the opening Dialogo is stunning and their subdued humour in the Scherzo-pizzicato also works well. In the Elegia and the final Moto perpetuo, again, no one quite approaches the passion and energy of Rostropovich. This work, like the two Suites, was written for him and he still remains the real heavyweight in all three pieces. Their transfer to CD is remarkably successful; it is difficult to believe that these recordings were made in the 1960s.

Solo Cello Suites Nos 1-3 Jean-Guihen Queyras vc
Harmonia Mundi Les Nouveaux Interprètes
HMN91 1670 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1998 ●

Britten's three Cello Suites have all the strength of musical character to sustain a permanent place in the repertory. Inspired by the personality, and technique, of Mstislav Rostropovich, they are remarkable for the way in which they acknowledge yet at the same time distance themselves from the great precedent of Bach's Cello Suites. The best performers (like Rostropovich himself, though he has never recorded No 3) are equally at ease with the music's Bach-like contrapuntal ingenuity and its lyric intensity, where Britten's own most personal voice is heard. Queyras has such a fine sense of phrase that his slower speeds do not sound unconvincing, and his playing – technically superb – has an impressive consistency of style. The quality of the recording is another plus, with the close focus needed to ensure that all the details tell. The only disappointment came in the final track, with the Russian Prayer for the Dead that ends Suite No 3. Here, of all places, Queyras is simply too fast. Nevertheless, this lapse is not so great as to deprive the disc of a place in this guide.

AMDG

Awards 2001

AMDG. Choral Dances from 'Gloriana'. Chorale after an Old French Carol. Five Flower Songs, Op 47.
A Hymn to the Virgin. Sacred and Profane, Op 91
Polyphony / Stephen Layton
Hyperion CDA67140 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999-2000 ●●●

The programme is delightful and the choir excellent. AMDG presents as formidable a challenge to its singers as any of Britten's compositions for unaccompanied choir. In fact that is sometimes suggested as the reason why, having written it for an expert group in 1939 and realising that its chances of frequent performance were slim, Britten never prepared the work for publication. It's a pity he couldn't have heard Stephen Layton's Polyphony! Even more than the Finzi Singers, their predecessors on record, they have worked it into the system so that they have the sense of it clearly in their mind and can make the word-setting fresh and spontaneous. 'God's Grandeur' (allegro con fuoco) has the fire: the Finzis seem almost cautious by comparison. In 'The Soldier' Polyphony catch the swing of the triplets and dotted notes with more panache and make more of the words. They also bring out the tender lyricism in 'Prayer II' and grasp more decisively the con moto, Vivace and Avanti! markings in 'O Deus, ego amo te'.

In the Five Flower Songs Polyphony have a slight advantage over The Sixteen (Collins – nla) in that theirs is a rather younger tone and their numbers allow them to convey more sense of round-the-table intimacy. In the Choral Dances from 'Gloriana', The Sixteen may well be found preferable on account of the version they use, involving solo tenor and harp. With the straightforward choral version Polyphony improve on the Finzi Singers' performance with crisper rhythms and a clearer acoustic. Sacred and Profane, like AMDG a work for virtuosos, is given with wonderful confidence and imagination. All in all, a wonderful disc.

Additional recommendation

AMDG

Couplings: Hymns – to St Peter, Op 56a; of St Columba; to the Virgin; to St Cecilia, Op 27. Rejoice in the Lamb, Op 30. Choral Dances from 'Gloriana'

Finzi Singers / Spicer with Lumsden org

Chandos CHAN9511 (67 minutes: DDD: 4/97) Ⓕ

Texts included

Very enjoyable performances from this expert choir, successfully directed by Paul Spicer.

An American Overture, Op 27

An American Overture. King Arthur – Suite (arr Hindmarsh). The World of the Spirit (arr Hindmarsh)

Susan Chilcott sop Pamela Helen Stephen mez Martyn Hill ten Stephen Varcoe bar Hannah Gordon, Cormac Rigby spkrs

Britten Singers; BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Richard Hickox

Chandos CHAN9487 (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Text included. Recorded 1995-96

Hickox's performance of the Coplandesque An American Overture has exemplary polish, commitment and dash. The remaining items owe their revival to the efforts of Paul Hindmarsh. Britten wrote his incidental music for a BBC radio dramatisation of the King Arthur legend in 1937. It was the first of his 28 radio commissions and contains much high-quality invention. Hindmarsh has fashioned the 23-year-old composer's inventive inspiration into a terrific four-movement orchestral suite lasting some 25 minutes, which Hickox and the BBC PO devour with audible relish.

The 'radio cantata' The World of the Spirit dates from May 1938. Commissioned by the BBC as a successor to The Company of Heaven (1937), it intersperses sung and spoken texts chosen by R Ellis Roberts. Again, Britten's fertile compositional powers are much in evidence. The work contains a whole string of memorable numbers, from the lilting barcarolle-like treatment of Emily Brontë's 'With wide-embracing love', via the joyful strut and swagger of Part 2's concluding 'The Spirit of the Lord' with its unmistakable echoes of Walton's Belshazzar's Feast, to a strikingly imaginative setting of Gerard Manley Hopkins's God's Grandeur. Framing the 42-minute edifice are two radiant settings of the Whitsuntide plainsong, Veni Creator Spiritus – an idea possibly inspired by a recent encounter with Mahler's Eighth Symphony at the Queen's Hall under Sir Henry Wood. The recording is superbly wide in its range and offers a realistic quality.

A Ceremony of Carols, Op 28

A Ceremony of Carols. Missa brevis in D, Op 63. A Hymn to the Virgin. A Hymn of St Columba, 'Regis regum rectissimi'. Jubilate Deo in E flat. Deus in adjutorum meum

Sioned Williams hp Westminster Cathedral Choir / David Hill with James O'Donnell org Hyperion CDA66220 (49 minutes: DDD). Texts included Ⓕ

Recorded 1986 ●

A Ceremony of Carols sets nine medieval and 16th-century poems between the 'Hodie' of the plainsong Vespers. The sole accompanying instrument is a harp, but given the right acoustic, sensitive attention to the words and fine rhythmic control the piece has a remarkable richness and depth. The Westminster Cathedral Choir performs this work beautifully; diction is immaculate and the acoustic halo surrounding the voices gives a festive glow to the performance. A fascinating Jubilate and A Hymn to the Virgin, whilst lacking the invention and subtlety of A Ceremony, intrigue with some particularly felicitous use of harmony and rhythm. Deus in adjutorum meum employs the choir without accompaniment and has an initial purity that gradually builds up in texture as the psalm (No 70) gathers momentum. The Missa brevis was written for this very choir and George Malcolm's nurturing of a tonal brightness in the choir allowed Britten to use the voices in a more flexible and instrumental manner than usual. The effect is glorious. St Columba founded the monastery on the Scottish island of Iona and Britten's hymn sets his simple and forthright prayer with deceptive simplicity and directness. The choir sings beautifully and the recording is first-rate.

Hymn to St Cecilia, Op 27

Rejoice in the Lamb, Op 30. Te Deum in C. Jubilate Deo in C. Antiphon, Op 56*b*. A Hymn to the Virgin. Festival Te Deum, Op 32. Missa brevis in D, Op 63. Hymn to St Peter, Op 56*a*. A Hymn of St Columba. Prelude and Fugue on a Theme of Vittoria. Hymn to St Cecilia

St John's College Choir, Cambridge / Christopher Robinson with Ian Farrington org Ⓢ

Naxos 8 554791 (74 minutes: DDD)

As with other recent records from St John's, there is a freshness, almost a feeling of adventure and a sense that all this choral discipline is an easy yoke. These are excellent performances, the opening item setting a standard which is to be maintained throughout. Buoyant rhythms, precise accentuations and well-pointed contrasts are features of the singing; and the playing of Ian Farrington in accompaniments that are often difficult and always demanding of maximum alertness, is outstanding. Outstanding, too, is the contribution of the trebles. In tone they preserve the traditional John's sound, without exaggerating its so-called continental element. But what impresses most is the sense of imaginative involvement. It is there, for instance, in the Kyrie of the Missa brevis, and most of all in the 'I cannot grow' section of A Hymn to St Cecilia. To this they bring a distinctive excitement, a wide-eyed, breathlessly playful feeling of childlike wonder. The programme itself is highly attractive. The 'hymns' are fully developed compositions, and the canticles are notably independent of tradition (for instance, a quietly meditative note of praise is struck at the start of both Te Deums). The Missa brevis makes inventive use of its forces; and Rejoice in the Lamb, a masterly expression of the liberal spirit, never ceases to amaze with its evocation of the cat Jeoffry, valiant mouse and staff-struck poet. Recorded sound is not as vivid as the performances, but this remains a very likeable disc.

Serenade, Op 31

Serenade for Tenor, Horn and Strings, Op 31[a] Ⓗ
Folksongs[b] – The Bonny Earl o' Moray; Avenging and Bright; The Last Rose of Summer; Sally in our Alley Walton Façade[c]
[abc]Sir Peter Pears ten/spkr [c]Dame Edith Sitwell spkr [a]Dennis Brain hn [b]Benjamin Britten pf [a]Boyd Neel String Orchestra / Benjamin Britten; [c]English Opera Group Ensemble / Anthony Collins
Decca 468 801-2DM (74 minutes: ADD/DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1953-54 ●●

This disc includes one of the great highlights of the whole Britten discography, that first magical recording of the Serenade, with Pears in fresh, youthful voice and Dennis Brain's marvellous horn obbligatos, creating frisson-making echoes in Tennyson, dark melancholy in Blake, and rippling away exuberantly in Johnson's 'Hymn to Diana'. What playing! The transfer is faithful; but why on earth couldn't Decca have removed the surface rustle, and above all, the clicks? The coupled Walton Façade, however, was a consummate technical and artistic miracle of Decca's mono era. Edith Sitwell and Pears deliver the engagingly preposterous words with bravura insouciance, Collins conducting the English Opera Group Ensemble with matching wit and flair, and even today the 1953 recording sounds almost like stereo.

Serenade[a]. Our Hunting Fathers, Op 8. Folk-song arrangements – Oliver Cromwell; O waly waly
Ian Bostridge ten [a]Marie Luise Neunecker hn Britten Sinfonia / Daniel Harding; [a]Bamberg Symphony Orchestra / Ingo Metzmacher
EMI 556871-2 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996-97 ●

On each hearing, Britten's Serenade still has the power to astonish anew for its amazingly apt setting of the diligently chosen poems and for the dazzling horn part written for Dennis Brain. There is something inevitable and predestined about these pieces, as though they existed for all time, an impression enhanced by this performance. Bostridge is spontaneous and immediate in his responses to text and music. One small reservation concerns a weakness in the lower register in the Keats Sonnet, 'Oh soft embalmer of the still night'. In the horn contribution, Neunecker is as lithe and full-toned as any that has gone before. Metzmacher follows tradition in tempo matters and his players are alive to every nuance of the scoring. This compilation also offers an interesting conspectus of the composer when young and culminates in the early, quirky masterpiece, Our Hunting Fathers, written in 1936 under the influence of Auden and echoes of terrible events in Germany. Ian Bostridge's well-known affinity with the composer's music and his virtue of verbal illumination are amply demonstrated here. The folk-song settings receive pertinent readings, the first plangent, the second skittish, as is appropriate to their texts.

Songs

Harmonia Sacra – Lord! I have sinned; Hymn to God the Father; A Hymn on Divine Musick. This way to the Tomb – Evening; Morning; Night. Night covers up the rigid land. Fish in the unruffled lakes. To lie flat on the back with the knees flexed. A poison tree. When you're feeling like expressing your affection. Not even summer yet. The red cockatoo. Wild with passion. If thou wilt ease thine heart. Cradle song for Eleanor. Birthday song for Erwin. Um Mitternacht. The Holy Sonnets of John Donne, Op 35
Ian Bostridge ten Graham Johnson pf
Hyperion CDA66823 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1995

Bostridge is in the royal line of Britten's tenor interpreters. Indeed his imaginative response to words and music may come closer than any to Pears himself. He is heard here in a veritable cornucopia of by and large unfamiliar and even unknown songs (the Donne cycle apart), mostly from the earliest period of Britten's song-writing career when his inspiration was perhaps at its most free and spontaneous. The three settings from Ronald Duncan's This way to the Tomb nicely match that poet's florid, vocabulary-rich style as Britten was to do again two years later in Lucretia, with 'Night', based on a B minor ground bass, a particularly arresting piece. The Auden settings, roughly contemporaneous with On this Island, all reflect Britten's empathy with the poet at that time. The third, To lie flat on the back, evinces Britten's gift for writing in racy mode, as does When you're feeling like expressing your affection, very much in the style of Cabaret Songs. Much deeper emotions are stirred by the two superb Beddoes settings (Wild with passion and If thou wilt ease thine heart), written when the composer and Pears were on a ship returning home in 1942. The red cockatoo itself is an early setting of Waley to whom Britten returned in Songs from the Chinese.

All these revelatory songs are performed with full understanding and innate beauty by Bostridge and Johnson, who obviously have a close artistic rapport. The Donne Sonnets are as demanding on singer and pianist as anything Britten wrote, hence their previously small representation in the catalogue. Both artists pierce to the core of these electrifying songs, written after, and affected by, Britten's visit to Belsen with Menuhin in 1945 shortly after the war's end. The recording, which catches the immediacy of these riveting performances, complete one's pleasure in this richly satisfying issue.

Britten Four Cabaret Songs. When you're feeling like expressing your affection. On this Island – As it is, plenty. Blues (arr Runswick) – The Spider and the Fly; Blues; The clock on the wall; Boogie-Woogie Porter Paris – Let's do it. Gay Divorce – Night and Day. Leave it to Me – My heart belongs to daddy. Miss Otis Regrets. Nymph Errant – The Physician
Jill Gomez sop Martin Jones pf instrumental ensemble (David Roach cl/sax Graham Ashton tpt Beverley Davison vn Chris Lawrence db John Constable pf Gregory Knowles perc)
Unicorn-Kanchana DKPCD9138 (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1992

Britten's cabaret songs were written for the singing actress Hedli Anderson; there were more than four, but these are the only ones published so far. The texts by Auden are full of the spirit that William Coldstream described, writing of one of Anderson's performances, 'teaching of carefree lucidity and the non-avoidance of banality'. When you're feeling like expressing your affection which is published and performed here for the first time is one of the results of Auden and Britten's work for the GPO in the 1930s. Apart from references to 'any telephone kiosk' and 'Press button A' it would still serve well as an encouragement to make use of the telephone. 'As it is, plenty' from On this Island, being also in the ironic popular-music style, rounds off the group nicely.

Jill Gomez's performances are perfect in every nuance, her beautiful tone, clear diction and just hinted-at irony, never overdoing it, give the songs the exact weight they need. The Cole Porter encores and Daryl Runswick's arrangements of four Blues by Britten complete what is, without doubt, a quite delicious record.

A Spring Symphony, Op 44

A Spring Symphony[a]
Cantata Academica, Op 62[b]
Hymn to St Cecilia, Op 27[c]
Jennifer Vyvyan sop Norma Procter, Helen Watts contrs Sir Peter Pears ten Owen Brannigan bass [a]Emanuel School Boys' Choir; [a]Chorus and Orchestra of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden / Benjamin Britten; London Symphony [bc]Chorus and [c]Orchestra / George Malcolm
Decca London 436 396-2LM (74 minutes: ADD). Ⓜ
Texts and translation included. Recorded 1960-61 ●●

Britten's performance of the Spring Symphony fairly leaps out of one's loudspeakers, and the 1960 sound is as crisp and alive as the performance and the work itself. In the last two pieces George Malcolm's direction is as vivid as Britten's elsewhere. The Cantata Academica (1959) is one of Britten's happiest pieces, bubbling over with warmth, jollity and good fellowship. Indeed the Latin title is only one of mock-solemnity. Try 'Tema seriale con fuga' to hear how this composer could make living music out of the most perniciously academic device of our troubled century. Further high points are Owen Brannigan's marvellously pompous bass aria and the boisterous 'Canone ed ostinato'. The performance of the Hymn to St Cecilia is skilful, idiomatic and touching.

A Spring Symphony[a]. Hymn to St Cecilia. Five Flower Songs, Op 47
Alison Hagley sop Catherine Robbin mez John Mark Ainsley ten [a]Choristers of Salisbury Cathedral; Monteverdi Choir; [a]Philharmonia Orchestra / Sir John Eliot Gardiner
DG 453 433-2GH (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included ●

John Eliot Gardiner directs a memorable and thoroughly invigorating account of Britten's vernal paean. From the start, one registers the exceptional refinement and transparency of his approach, to say nothing of the exciting realism of DG's sound. No praise can be too high for the marvellously nimble and extremely well-focused contribution of the Monteverdi Choir or the Philharmonia's superbly disciplined response throughout. The Choristers of Salisbury Cathedral also emerge with great credit. High-spots abound: the smiling, easy sway of 'Spring, the sweet Spring' (whose bird-call cadenzas are delightfully attended to); an exceptionally perceptive 'Waters above', whose truly pppp diminuendo conclusion leads magically into 'Out on the lawn I lie in bed'; and, of course, the joyous, bank holiday clangour of the finale (splendidly dapper and affirmative on this occasion), with its heart-stopping appearance of 'Sumer is icumen in' – a moment which never fails to send shivers down the spine. Gardiner's soloists are very good, if perhaps not quite a match for the finest. Ainsley stands out for his honeyed tone, and the intelligence of his word-painting always catches the attention, as does the warmth and projection of Alison Hagley's soprano Overall, then, while not displacing the composer's classic recording, Gardiner's version can hold its own against all-comers and should give much pleasure to seasoned Brittenites.

War Requiem, Op 66 / Sinfonia da Requiem

Awards 1992

War Requiem[a]. Sinfonia da Requiem, Op 20. Ballad of Heroes, Op 14[b]
Heather Harper sop [a]Philip Langridge, [b]Martyn Hill tens John Shirley-Quirk bar [a]St Paul's Cathedral Choir; London Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos ② CHAN8983/4 (125 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included ●●●

Britten's War Requiem is the composer's most public statement of his pacifism. The work is cast in six movements and calls for massive forces: full chorus, soprano soloist and full orchestra evoke mourning, supplication and guilty apprehension; boys' voices with chamber organ, the passive calm of a liturgy which points beyond death; tenor and baritone soloists with chamber orchestra, the passionate outcry of the doomed victims of war. The most recent challenger to the composer's classic Decca version offers up-to-date recording, excellently managed to suggest the various perspectives of the vast work, and possibly the most convincing execution of the choral writing to date under the direction of a conductor, Richard Hickox, who is a past master at obtaining the best from a choir in terms of dynamic contrast and vocal emphasis. Add to that his empathy with all that the work has to say and you have a cogent reason for acquiring this version even before you come to the excellent work of the soloists. In her recording swan-song, Harper at last commits to disc a part she created. It is right that her special accents and impeccable shaping of the soprano's contribution have been preserved for posterity.

Shirley-Quirk, always closely associated with the piece, sings the three baritone solos and duets with rugged strength and dedicated intensity. He is matched by Langridge's compelling and insightful reading, with his notes and words more dramatic than Pears's approach. The inclusion of two additional pieces, neither of them short, helps to give this version an added advantage even if the Ballad of Heroes is one of Britten's slighter works.

War Requiem, Op 66
Stefania Woytowicz sop Sir Peter Pears ten Hans Wilbrink bar Wandsworth School Boys' Choir; Melos Ensemble; New Philharmonia Orchestra and Chorus / Carlo Maria Giulini
BBC Legends/IMG Artists BBCL4046-2 (79 minutes: ADD). Texts included. Recorded live in 1969 Ⓜ ●●●

This performance is a revelation. As the authoritative note makes clear, Britten and Giulini had a mutual respect for and an admiration of each other's work. Here they combine to give a performance that is a true Legend, as this BBC series has it. Giulini's reading is as dramatic and viscerally exciting as any rival version. The music leaps from the page new-minted in his histrionically taut hands, the rhythmic tension at times quite astonishing. For instance, the sixth movement, 'Libera me', is simply earth-shattering in its effect, every bar, every word, every instrument sung and played to the hilt – and so it is throughout, with the live occasion added to the peculiar, and in this case peculiarly right, acoustics of the Albert Hall adding its own measure of verité to the inspired occasion.

The performance of the New Philharmonia forces, under the man who was at the time their favourite conductor after Klemperer, is at once technically assured and wholly dedicated. Only perhaps the classic Decca recording comes near equalling it in this respect, and that doesn't quite have the electrifying atmosphere, found on this astonishing occasion. Nor have the Wandsworth Boys' Choir, placed up in the Hall's gallery, been surpassed.

The soloists also seem to realise the special quality of the occasion. Pears surpasses even his own creator's reading on the Decca set, singing with the sustained concentration and vocal acuity that were so much his hallmarks in Britten's music. The soprano Stefania Woytowicz, who at the time made something of a speciality of this work, has very much the vocal timbre of Vishnevskaya, for whom the part was written, and perhaps a shade more sensitivity. She is certainly the best soprano on any version, and Wilbrink comes near being the best baritone. He may not be quite as varied or subtle as Decca's Fischer-Dieskau, nor as confident as Chandos's Shirley-Quirk, but he has a more beautiful voice than either, with a plangency in his tone that is so right for this music.

Most of all it is the sum of the parts that so impresses here, as does the truthfulness of the sound, preferable to that on the Chandos set.

War Requiem
Galina Vishnevskaya sop Sir Peter Pears ten Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar Simon Preston org Bach Choir; Highgate School Choir; Melos Ensemble; London Symphony Orchestra / Benjamin Britten
Decca ② 414 383-2DH2 (132 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Includes previously unreleased rehearsal sequence
Recorded 1963 ●●

Decca has used the most recent digital and Cedar technology to improve the original sound, under the overall supervision of veteran technician James Lock. This is one of the great performances of recording history. As an imaginative bonus, Decca gives us the first issue of a long rehearsal tape made by the producer John Culshaw without Britten's approval.

When Culshaw presented it to the composer on his 50th birthday, Britten was 'appalled', considering it 'an unauthorised invasion of a territory exclusively his own and his performers', as Donald Mitchell relates in the booklet. Now Mitchell believes that we should be allowed 'to assess the tape as a contribution to our knowledge of him [Britten] as a performer and interpreter of his own music and to our understanding of the War Requiem itself.'

Throughout this fascinating document you hear evidence of Britten's vision of his own music, his astonishing ear for timbre and intimate details, above all his wonderful encouragement of all his forces, culminating in his heart-warming words of thanks at the end of the sessions, not to mention his tension-breaking humour and a couple of sharp comments from Vishnevskaya, who is unsurpassed as soprano soloist. The merit of this ground-breaking performance is that it so arrestingly conveys Britten's intentions. We are lucky to have not only Britten's irreplaceable reading refurbished, but also his commentary suggested by the rehearsal sequences.

Additional recommendation
Sinfonia da Requiem^{a}
Coupling: Holst The Planets^{b}
^{b}Ambrosian Singers; ^{b}Philharmonia Orchestra;
^{a}City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Rattle
EMI Encore 575868-2 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded ^{a}1984, ^{b}1980

Rattle's Sinfonia da Requiem is a model of blistering fervour and scrupulous observation, and Rattle need fear little in comparison with any modern rival. EMI's recording is vivid and true. Buy it for the Britten – The Planets is disappointing (although admirably detailed, it lacks something in sheer depth).

Albert Herring

Christopher Gillett ten Albert Herring; Dame Josephine Barstow sop Lady Billows; Felicity Palmer contr Florence Pike; Peter Savidge bar Mr Gedge; Robert Lloyd bass Superintendent Budd; Stuart Kale ten Mr Upfold; Susan Gritton sop Miss Wordsworth; Della Jones mez Mrs Herring; Gerald Finley bar Sid; Ann Taylor mez Nancy; Yvette Bonner sop Emmie; Témimé Bowling sop Cis; Matthew Long treb Harry; Northern Sinfonia / Steuart Bedford 🏵
Naxos ② 8 660107/8 (142 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Libretto available with UK copies only; synopsis in all other countries
Recorded 1996 OO

Vivid as Hickox's traversal of the score for Chandos may be, Bedford's is just that much more alert, crisper. With his long experience of Britten in the theatre, dating back to Death in Venice under the composer's aegis, his timing carries unique authority and, in better sound than the old Decca set can now offer, he even has the edge over the composer's obviously definitive reading. Bedford's players are as much if not more accomplished than Hickox's, and they are caught in a more immediate, less reverberant acoustic.

As for the singers, in almost every case Bedford's are the equal of, or superior to, Hickox's and several surpass Britten's. For instance, Albert was never one of Peter Pears's happiest assumptions; Christopher Gillett makes a more credible mother's boy and does well when he decides to break loose. Where the crucial role of Lady Billows is concerned, Josephine Barstow's commanding performance may not quite be on a par with Sylvia Fisher for Britten, but the difference is small. Susan Gritton gives us a dotty and cleanly sung Miss Wordsworth (Margaret Ritchie, the role's creator must have sounded like this), Robert Lloyd is a simpleton of a Budd (as well sung as any, one need hardly add) and Felicity Palmer makes a wonderfully fussy Florence Pike.

It only remains to laud once again the score's many delights as regards technical mastery and subtle characterisation, and to suggest you hurry off to enjoy a real bargain.

Albert Herring
Peter Pears ten Albert Herring; Sylvia Fisher sop Lady Billows; Johanna Peters contr Florence Pike; John Noble bar Mr George; Owen Brannigan bass Mr Budd; Edgar Evans ten Mr Upford; April Cantelo sop Mrs Wordsworth; Sheila Rex mez Mrs Herring; Joseph Ward ten Sid; Catherine Wilson mez Nancy;
English Chamber Orchestra / Benjamin Britten
Decca London ② 421 849-2LH2 (138 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Notes and text included. Recorded 1964

Having shown us the grim and nasty side of Aldeburgh life at the beginning of the 19th century in Peter Grimes, Britten had fun with its parochial aspects at the end of the century in his comic opera Albert Herring. For some tastes, it has proved too parochial. This tale of the mother-dominated shop assistant who is elected May King because of his virtue, is slipped a laced drink at his crowning and goes off for a night on the tiles, after which he asserts himself repels some who otherwise admire the composer because of its self-regarding whimsicality. The possible cure for these people is to listen to Britten's own recording, here marvellously transferred to CD and showing again what a genius the producer John Culshaw was. Britten finds all the humour in the piece, but he gives it a cutting-edge and is totally successful in conveying the proximity of comedy to tragedy in the remarkable ensemble where Albert is thought to have been killed. With the English Chamber Orchestra on peak form, all kinds of Bergian echoes in the score are revealed and some, too, of Verdi's Falstaff (Act 3). There is also Sir Peter Pears's brilliant performance as Albert, a genuine piece of perceptive singing-acting. The cast is well-nigh ideal. If only Britten had written more comic operas.

Billy Budd

Peter Glossop bar Billy Budd; Sir Peter Pears ten Captain Vere; Michael Langdon bass John Claggart; John Shirley-Quirk bar Mr Redburn; Bryan Drake bar Mr Flint; David Kelly bass Mr Ratcliffe; Gregory Dempsey ten Red Whiskers; David Bowman bar Donald; Owen Brannigan bass Dansker; Robert Tear ten Novice; Robert Bowman ten Squeak; Delme Bryn-Jones bar Bosun; Eric Garrett bar First Mate; Nigel Rogers ten Maintop; Benjamin Luxon bar Novice's Friend; Geoffrey Coleby bar Arthur Jones
Ambrosian Opera Chorus; London Symphony Orchestra / Benjamin Britten
The Holy Sonnets of John Donne, Op 35. Songs and Proverbs of William Blake, Op 74
Sir Peter Pears ten Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau bar
Benjamin Britten pf
Decca London ③ 417 428-2LH3 (205 minutes: ADD)
Notes and text included Ⓕ
Recorded 1961 ●●

Billy Budd is remarkable in having been composed for male voices, yet not once is there any lack of colour or variety. Britten marvellously supports the tenor, baritone and bass protagonists with extraordinary flair in the use of brass and woodwind. This was the last operatic recording John Culshaw produced for Decca and he again showed himself unsurpassed at creating a theatrical atmosphere in the studio. Although there have been several striking and brilliant stage productions of this opera in recent years, not to mention Nagano's recording, it must also be said that both technically and interpretatively this Britten/Culshaw collaboration represents the touchstone for any that follows it, particularly in the matter of Britten's conducting. Where Britten is superb is in the dramatic tautness with which he unfolds the score and his unobtrusive highlighting of such poignant detail as the use of the saxophone after the flogging. But most of all, he focuses with total clarity on the intimate human drama against the background of life aboard the ship.

And what a cast he had, headed by Peter Pears as Vere, conveying a natural authoritarianism which makes his unwilling but dutiful role as 'the messenger of death' more understandable, if no more agreeable. Peter Glossop's Billy Budd is a virile performance, with nothing of the 'goody-goody' about him. Nor does one feel any particular homo-eroticism about his relationship with Michael Langdon's black-voiced Claggart: it is a straight conflict between good and evil, and all the more horrifying for its stark simplicity. Add to these principals John Shirley-Quirk, Bryan Drake and David Kelly as the officers, Owen Brannigan as Dansker and Robert Tear and Benjamin Luxon in the small roles of the novice and his friend, and one can apply the adjective 'classic' to this recording with a clear conscience. Also on the discs are two of Britten's most sombre song-cycles, the Donne Sonnets and the Blake Songs and Proverbs, the former with Pears, the latter with Fischer-Dieskau, and both incomparably accompanied by Britten. They make ideal complements to Billy Budd. This is without doubt a vintage set.

Billy Budd
Simon Keenlyside bar Billy Budd; Philip Langridge ten Captain Vere; John Tomlinson bass John Claggart; Alan Opie bar Mr Redburn; Matthew Best bass-bar Mr Flint; Alan Ewing bass Lt Ratcliffe; Francis Egerton ten Red Whiskers; Quentin Hayes bar Donald; Clive Bayley bass Dansker; Mark Padmore ten Novice; Richard Coxon ten Squeak; Timothy DuFore bar Bosun; Christopher Keyte bar Bosun; Richard Whitehouse bar Second Mate, Gunner's Mate; Daniel Norman ten Maintop; Roderick Williams bar Novice's Friend, Arthur Jones; Alex Johnson treb Cabin Boy
Tiffin Boys' Choir; London Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos ③ CHAN9826 (165 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included ●
Recorded 1999

Britten's score is so often praised that we tend to neglect the distinction of Forster and Crozier's libretto, sung in this set with unerring conviction by its three principals. Keenlyside and Langridge deserve special mention for their arresting sensitivity throughout the final scenes, when they make the utterances of Billy and Vere so poetic and moving: refined tone allied to eloquent phrasing – the epitome of English singing at its very best. Keenlyside has a voice of just the right weight and an appreciation of how Billy must be at once sympathetic and manly. From first to last you realise the lad's personal magnetism in vocal terms alone, explaining the crew's admiration for his qualities. Langridge is the complete Vere, suggesting the man's easy command of men, his poetic soul, his agony of mind at the awful decision placed in his hands to sacrifice Billy. At the opposite end of the human spectrum, Claggart's dark, twisted being and his depravity of thought are ideally realised by Tomlinson, give or take one or two moments of unsteadiness when his voice comes under pressure. In supporting roles there is also much to admire. Mark Padmore conveys all the Novice's terror in a very immediate, tortured manner. Clive Bayley's Dansker is full of canny wisdom. Alan Opie is a resolute Mr Redburn. Matthew Best's is an appropriately powerful Mr Flint, though his large, gritty bass-baritone records uneasily.

Hickox conducts with all his old zest for marshalling large forces, searching out every cranny of the score, and the London Symphony forces respond with real virtuosity. Speeds now and again sound a shade too deliberate, and there's not always quite that sense of an ongoing continuum you feel in both of Britten's readings, which are by and large tauter. But the Chandos, using the revised two-act version, comes into most direct competition with Britten's later Decca set. The latter still sounds well, though inevitably it hasn't the aural range of the Chandos recording. Yet nobody will ever quite catch the creative tension the composer brings to his own work. For all that, the Chandos set benefits from this trio of imaginative singers, and most newcomers will be satisfied with its appreciable achievement.

Billy Budd (four-act version)
Thomas Hampson bar Billy Budd; Anthony Rolfe Johnson ten Captain Vere; Eric Halfvarson bass-bar John Claggart; Russell Smythe bar Mr Redburn; Gidon Saks bass Mr Flint; Simon Wilding bass Mr Ratcliffe; Martyn Hill ten Red Whiskers; Christopher Maltman bar Donald; Richard Van Allan bass Dansker; Andrew Burden ten Novice; Christopher Gillett ten Squeak; Matthew Hargreaves bass Bosun; Ashley Holland bass First Mate; Simon Thorpe bar Second Mate, Arthur Jones; Robert Johnston ten Maintop; William Dazeley bar Novice's Friend
Manchester Boys' Choir; Northern Voices; Hallé Choir and Orchestra / Kent Nagano
Erato ② 3984-21631-2 (148 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Notes and text included. Recorded live in 1997

This recording is an exciting achievement; it restores to circulation the original, four-act version of the score. The crucial difference between this and Britten's two-act revision is a scene at the close of what is here Act 1, in which 'Starry' Vere addresses his crew and is hailed by them as the sailors' champion, thus establishing the relationship between captain and foretopman. It's an important scene, though musically not particularly distinguished. One can quite see why Britten wanted a tauter two-act drama. Nagano gives us a wonderfully full-bodied and detailed account of the score. There are electrifying moments, not least the battle scene, where the listener feels very much in the middle of things, and the end of Act 3 where those tremendous and ominous series of chords represent Vere telling Budd of the sentence of death. Britten, in his studio recording, prefers a leaner sound and a slightly tauter approach all-round – in his hands you feel the tension of the personal relationships even more sharply than with Nagano. Hampson is very good, singing with all his customary beauty of voice and intelligence of style, though he imparts a touch of self-consciousness that goes against the grain of the writing. Halfvarson, as Budd's antagonist, the evil Claggart, gives us a mighty presence, singing with power and bite, though not always a steady tone. Rolfe Johnson sings his heart out as he presents Vere's tormented soul. For the rest, Gidon Saks makes a dominant Mr Flint, the sailing-master, Richard Van Allan, is here, predictably, a characterful Dansker, and Andrew Burden stands out as a properly scared Novice, far preferable to Tear's placid reading on Decca. The sum here is greater than the parts, and this set can be heartily recommended. The recording possesses an amazingly wide spectrum of sound: indeed sometimes the orchestra is simply too loud.

Curlew River

Sir Peter Pears ten Madwoman; John Shirley-Quirk bar Ferryman; Harold Blackburn bass Abbot; Bryan Drake bar Traveller; Bruce Webb treb Voice of the Spirit
English Opera Group / Benjamin Britten and Viola Tunnard
Decca London 421 858-2LM (69 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Text included. Recorded 1965 ●●

Curlew River captured completely the composer's fascination with the Japanese Noh play on which it was based. The recording, produced by John Culshaw, was made in Orford Church, and the atmosphere of this unforgettable occasion is preserved. The procession of monks at the beginning and end comes towards us and recedes, just as if we were sitting in a pew. Pears's performance as the Madwoman is one of his finest and most touching, while Shirley-Quirk and Drake are equally authoritative. The voice of the Madwoman's dead son is devoid of the sentimentality that might have been a peril if any treble other than Bruce Webb had sung it, and the inventive and beguiling orchestral score is marvellously played. With the composer and Viola Tunnard directing the performance, this is in a class of its own.

Curlew River
Philip Langridge ten Madwoman; Thomas Allen bar Ferryman; Gidon Saks bass Abbot; Simon Keenlyside bar Traveller; Charles Richardson treb Voice of the Spirit
London Voices; Academy of St Martin in the Fields / Sir Neville Marriner
Philips 454 469-2PH (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes and text included. Recorded 1996

Until now, nobody has wanted to challenge the hegemony of Britten's magical performance, but the newer performance is given almost as much presence and perspective by Erik Smith as John Culshaw achieved for Decca. Marriner and his hand-picked instrumentalists follow in the tradition of the Britten-led performance, exposing the extreme originality of the composer's reworking of the Japanese play, the results as mesmeric as they should be. The spare beauty of the scoring and the subtlety of the interaction between voices and instruments is as convincing as one could wish, so there's little to choose here between the two readings. Because the Madwoman was one of Pears's greatest achievements and fitted his voice like the proverbial glove, his interpretation remains hors concours. Langridge is a perceptive enough artist not to ape Pears. He treats the part in an inward, dreamy manner, more intimate and personal than Pears's hieratical approach, just as valid in its way and finely executed. As the strong-willed Ferryman, Thomas Allen almost matches Shirley-Quirk's firm, acutely enunciated portrayal: there is just that much more youthful sap in Shirley-Quirk's voice. On the other hand Keenlyside far surpasses his predecessor as the more ruminative Traveller, singing with the vibrant tone and sharply etched legato for which he is famed. The newer recording obviously has a greater range than the old one; both are sensitively directed to capture the work's very special ethos. Those who have the old one can probably remain satisfied, but newcomers and those seeking another view of the piece, should certainly consider this invaluable, carefully crafted newcomer.

Death in Venice

Sir Peter Pears ten Gustav von Aschenbach; John Shirley-Quirk bar Traveller, Elderly Fop, Old Gondolier, Hotel Manager, Hotel Barber, Leader of the Players, Voice of Dionysus; James Bowman countertenor Voice of Apollo; Kenneth Bowen ten Hotel Porter; Peter Leeming bass Travel Clerk; Neville Williams bass-bar Penelope MacKay sop Strolling Players; Iris Saunders sop Strawberry-seller
English Opera Group Chorus; English Chamber Orchestra / Steuart Bedford
Decca London ② 425 669-2LH2 (145 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Notes and text included. Recorded 1973 ●●

In his insert-notes, Christopher Palmer has pertinent things to say about the sexual climate of Britten's last opera, Death in Venice; but these seem to become of less consequence as one listens to the music. Its potency and inventiveness create this opera's disturbing and intense atmosphere, each episode heightened dramatically by instrumental colouring. Under Bedford's direction each scene is fully integrated into a fluent and convincing whole. This recording was made while Britten was very ill; it omits Aschenbach's first recitative ('I have always kept a close watch over my development as a writer …'), given as an optional cut in the vocal score, which was published after the recording was made, by which time Britten had changed his mind about this cut and wished it had been included in the recording. Pears's Aschenbach, a very English conception, is a masterly performance, matched by John Shirley-Quirk's assumption of the six characters who are Aschenbach's messengers of death and the Voice of Dionysus.

Gloriana

Dame Josephine Barstow sop Queen Elizabeth I; Philip Langridge ten Earl of Essex; Della Jones mez Lady Essex; Jonathan Summers bar Lord Mountjoy; Alan Opie bar Sir Robert Cecil; Yvonne Kenny sop Penelope; Richard Van Allan bass Sir Walter Raleigh; Bryn Terfel bass-bar Henry Cuffe; Janice Watson sop Lady-in-waiting; Willard White bass Blind ballad-singer; John Shirley-Quirk bar Recorder of Norwich; John Mark Ainsley ten Spirit of the Masque; Peter Hoare ten Master of Ceremonies Welsh National Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Sir Charles Mackerras
Argo ② 440 213-2ZHO2 (148 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes and text included. Recorded 1992 ●●●

Four decades on from the ill-fated première of Britten's Coronation opera where, instead of the staid pageant expected by the bejewelled and stiff audience assembled for a royal gala, they were given an intimate study of the ageing Queen's torment as she copes with the conflict of private emotions in the midst of public pomp, Gloriana has now at last been given a complete recording on CD. Mackerras presents it here with the utmost conviction, drawing together the motivic strands of the score into a coherent whole (not an altogether easy task), appreciating the contrast of the public and private scenes, exposing the sinews of the writing for the two principal characters, and drawing superb playing from his own WNO Orchestra. Josephine Barstow crowns her career with her performance as Queen Elizabeth, commanding the opera by her vocal presence, her imposing, vibrant tone, her vital treatment of the text, and her attention to detail. Philip Langridge projects all the vehement impetuosity of Essex but also, in the famous lute songs, the poetic ardour of the handsome if unruly Earl. There is much discerning interpretation elsewhere and the recording is worthy of the performance. Any small reservations are as nothing before the triumph of the achievement as a whole.

A Midsummer Night's Dream

Alfred Deller counterten Oberon; Elizabeth Harwood sop Tytania; Sir Peter Pears ten Lysander; Thomas Hemsley bar Demetrius; Josephine Veasey mez Hermia; Heather Harper sop Helena; John Shirley-Quirk bar Theseus; Helen Watts contr Hippolyta; Owen Brannigan bass Bottom; Norman Lumsden bass Quince; Kenneth Macdonald ten Flute; David Kelly bass Snug; Robert Tear ten Snout; Keith Raggett ten Starveling; Richard Dakin treb Cobweb; John Prior treb Peaseblossom; Ian Wodehouse treb Mustardseed; Gordon Clark treb Moth; Stephen Terry spkr Puck
Choirs of Downside and Emanuel Schools; London Symphony Orchestra / Benjamin Britten
Decca London ② 425 663-2LH2
(144 minutes: ADD). Notes and text included Ⓕ
Recorded 1966 ●●

Brian Asawa counterten Oberon; Sylvia McNair sop Tytania; John Mark Ainsley ten Lysander; Paul Whelan bar Demetrius; Ruby Philogene mez Hermia; Janice Watson sop Helena; Brian Bannatyne-Scott bass Theseus; Hilary Summers contr Hippolyta; Robert Lloyd bass Bottom; Gwynne Howell bass Quince; Ian Bostridge ten Flute; Stephen Richardson bar Snug; Mark Tucker ten Snout; Neal Davies bar Starveling; David Newman treb Cobweb; Claudia Conway sop Peaseblossom; Sara Rey sop Mustardseed; Matthew Long treb Moth; Carl Ferguson spkr Puck

New London Children's Choir; London Symphony Orchestra / Sir Colin Davis
Philips ② 454 122-2PH2 (148 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes and text included. Recorded 1995 ●

The Philips set is, in almost every respect, immediate and present, almost to a fault, yet there are few if any attempts at suggesting the perspectives you hear on the 34-year-old Decca set for the composer. For instance, on Decca, Puck seems to be everywhere, yet on the newer version you are in the front stalls listening to an enjoyable concert with little attempt to simulate a stage. That may have influenced the often leisurely pacing of Davis's reading. Everything is heard with great clarity, the sensuousness of Britten's ravishing score, with all its mysterious harmonies and sonorities, is fully realised, action and reaction among the singers are keenly heard, yet something of the midsummer magic of Britten's direction eludes Davis and his team.

On Decca we hear this music fresh-minted, unadorned; in Davis's hands the work is viewed through a tougher, more modern prism. One wonders if any members of the LSO today were in the orchestra under the composer back in 1966: they are certainly as acute if not more so in their playing than their predecessors. As for pacing, Britten's is a tauter approach, Davis allowing his singers more licence. In the case of McNair this gives her space to develop what is a knowingly sophisticated approach to her role, even more evident in her sensual account of the Act 2 solo 'Hail, mortal, hail'. Her singing is lovely, but it is an earthly reading where Elizabeth Harwood for Britten suggests a more other-worldly Queen of the Fairies.

Similarly the luscious voice of the countertenor Brian Asawa is very different from Deller's ethereal delicacies. Like McNair's singing, Asawa's, taken on its own terms, is most seductive, but disconcerting at first hearing. Puck is also upfront, not so much puckish as rough-hewn. With Bottom we meet another thought-provoking interpretation. Lloyd makes the weaver sound more high-born than his predecessor. This is almost a noble craftsman, with no hint of the rustic portrayed unforgettably by Owen Brannigan, the role's creator, who savours the text so lovingly. Lloyd scores with his splendidly resonant account of 'O grim-look'd night' in the play.

One thing is sure: there has never been a more amusing Flute than Ian Bostridge or a better sung Quince than Gwynne Howell. Another plus for Davis is the casting of the lovers with young singers in their early prime. In particular, Philogene's ripe mezzo as Hermia and Ainsley's ardent tenor as Lysander stand out as ideal interpretations.

You will derive a great deal of pleasure from the newcomer with its exemplary recording and careful preparation on all sides. It is now the prime recommendation for a modern set. But the Decca remains as fresh and inspired as the day it was made; Britten's taut, disciplined yet magical reading unsurpassed.

Noye's Fludde / The Golden Vanity

Noye's Fludde
Owen Brannigan bass Noye; Sheila Rex mez Mrs Noye; David Pinto treb Sem; Darian Angadi treb Ham; Stephen Alexander treb Jaffett; Trevor Anthony spkr The Voice of God; Caroline Clack sop Mrs Sem; Maria-Thérèse Pinto sop Mrs Ham; Eileen O'Donnovan sop Mrs Jaffett
Chorus; English Opera Group Orchestra; An East Suffolk Children's Orchestra / Norman Del Mar

The Golden Vanity, Op 78
Mark Emney treb Captain; John Wojciechowski treb Bosun; Barnaby Jago treb Cabin-boy; Adrian Thompson treb Captain; Terry Lovell treb Bosun; Benjamin Britten pf Wandsworth School Boys' Choir / Russell Burgess
Decca London 436 397-2LM (66 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1961 and 1966

Britten wrote these two works for children, yet one must not imagine that they are cosy and (in the pejorative sense) childish. Many of Britten's friends thought that there remained much of the child in him, and this clearly comes out in the boisterous high spirits of some of this music. By and large, Noye's Fludde and The Golden Vanity are happy works. Noye's Fludde makes invigorating listening. This 1961 performance, recorded in Orford Church where it had its première three years before (at the 1958 Aldeburgh Festival), is immensely vivid and one responds to the enthusiasm of the young singers and instrumentalists. All of the children of East Suffolk seem to be involved in the enterprise: consorts of recorders, bands of bugles, peals of handbell-ringers, plenty of violins, a few lower strings, seven percussion players, child soloists, and a choir as big as you like, enough to give full representation to the 49 different species of animal mentioned in the text. Then three grown-ups, and the English Chamber Orchestra. The skill and imaginative power with which Britten has used these forces defy adequate description. There are inevitably rough edges in the singing and playing, but the spirit is there in abundance. The same is true of The Golden Vanity, and although there's more conscious vocal skill in the singing of the Wandsworth School Boys' Choir, it never gets in the way of the presentation, which bubbles with life.

Peter Grimes

Awards 1986

Sir Peter Pears ten Peter Grimes; Claire Watson sop Ellen Orford; James Pease bass Captain Balstrode; Jean Watson contr Auntie; Raymond Nilsson ten Bob Boles; Owen Brannigan bass Swallow; Lauris Elms mez Mrs Sedley; Sir Geraint Evans bar Ned Keene; John Lanigan ten Rector; David Kelly bass Hobson; Marion Studholme sop First Niece; Iris Kells sop Second Niece Ⓗ
Chorus and Orchestra of the Royal Opera House,

Covent Garden / Benjamin Britten
Decca ③ 414 577-2DH3 (144 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Notes and text included. Recorded 1958 ●●●

Philip Langridge ten Grimes; Janice Watson sop Ellen Orford; Alan Opie bar Captain Balstrode; Ameral Gunson mez Auntie; John Graham-Hall ten Bob Boles; John Connell bass Swallow; Anne Collins contr Mrs Sedley; Roderick Williams bar Ned Keene; John Fryatt ten Rector; Matthew Best bass Hobson; Yvonne Barclay sop First Niece; Pamela Helen Stephen mez Second Niece
London Symphony Chorus; City of London Sinfonia / Richard Hickox
Chandos ② CHAN9447/8 (147 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes and text included. Recorded 1995 ●●

The Decca set has long been regarded as the definitive recording which, in 1958, introduced this opera to many listeners and one which has never been superseded in its refinement or insight. Britten's conducting, lithe and lucid, reveals his work as the complex, ambiguous drama that it is. Peter Pears, in the title-role which was written for him, brings unsurpassed detail of nuance to Grimes's words while never losing sight of the essential plainness of the man's speech. The rest of the cast form a vivid portrait gallery of characters. The recording is as live and clear as if it had been made yesterday and takes the listener right on to the stage. The bustle of activity and sound effects realise nicely Britten's own masterly painting of dramatic foreground and background. For Hickox on Chandos there is Langridge's tense, sinewy, sensitive Grimes. Predictably he rises to the challenge of the Mad scene; this is a man hugely to be pitied, yet there is a touch of resignation, of finding some sort of peace at last, after all the agony of the soul. His portrayal is tense and immediate and a match for that of Pears in personal identification – listen to the eager touch at 'We strained in the wind'.

The next composite heroes are the members of the chorus. Electrifying as their rivals are, the LSO singers, trained by Stephen Westrop, seem just that much more arresting, not least in the hue-and-cry of Act 3, quite terrifying in its immediacy as recorded by Chandos. Hickox's whole interpretation has little to fear from the distinguished competition. Many details are placed with special care, particularly in the Interludes and the parodistic dances in Act 3, and whole episodes, such as the Grimes/ Balstrode dispute in Act 1, have seldom sounded so dramatic. Once or twice one would have liked a firmer forward movement, as in the fifth Interlude (Britten's own direction of this Passacaglia is that bit more urgent), but the sense of total music-theatre is present throughout and it's excitingly laid before us by the City of London Sinfonia and the recording.

Of the other soloists, the one comparative disappointment is Janice Watson's Ellen Orford. She sings the part with tone as lovely as any of her rivals on disc and with carefully wrought phrasing and is very much part of a convincing team but doesn't have the experience to stand out from the village regulars and sound important, as Ellen should. Britten's set remains hors concours, but that recording stretches over three CDs. Hickox is the finest of the modern recordings: as sound it is quite spectacular, vast in range, with well-managed perspectives and just enough hints of stage action to be convincing.

Additional recommendation
Peter Grimes
Vickers Peter Grimes Harper Ellen Orford
Royal Opera House Chorus and Orchestra / C Davis
Philips 432 578-2PM2 (146 minutes: ADD: 11/91) Ⓜ

A mid-price alternative which enshrines the wonderfully drawn Grimes of Jon Vickers and the touching, immensely human Ellen of Heather Harper. Colin Davis's conducting, too, displays his love of the score.

The Turn of the Screw

Sir Peter Pears ten Prologue, Quint; Jennifer Vyvyan sop Governess; David Hemmings treb Miles; Olive Dyer sop Flora; Joan Cross sop Mrs Grose; Arda Mandikian sop Miss Jessel English Opera Group Orchestra / Benjamin Britten 🄷
Decca London mono ② 425 672-2LH2 Ⓕ
(105 minutes: ADD). Notes and text included.
Recorded 1955 ●●

As Sir Colin Davis has shown on Philips, there is room for an alternative interpretation of this remarkable work, but this superb first recording will remain as documentary-historical evidence of the highest importance and value. Will there ever be a better performance, let alone recording, of The Turn of the Screw than this by the original cast, recorded less than four months after the 1954 Venice première?

This score is Britten at his greatest, expressing good and evil with equal ambivalence, evoking the tense and sinister atmosphere of Bly by inspired use of the chamber orchestra and imparting vivid and truthful life to every character in the story. As one listens, transfixed, all that matters is Britten's genius as a composer. Jennifer Vyvyan's portrayal of the Governess is a classic characterization, her vocal subtleties illuminating every facet of the role and she has the perfect foil in Joan Cross's motherly and uncomplicated Mrs Grose. The glittering malevolence of Pears's Quint, luring David Hemmings's incomparable Miles to destruction; the tragic tones of Arda Mandikian's Miss Jessel; Olive Dyer's spiteful Flora – how fortunate we are that these performances are preserved. As with all of the Decca/Britten reissues, the transfer is a triumph.

The Turn of the Screw, Op 54
Ian Bostridge ten Prologue; Peter Quint; Joan Rodgers sop Governess; Vivien Tierney sop Miss Jessel; Julian Leang treb Miles; Caroline Wise sop Flora; Jane Henschel sop Mrs Grose;

Gustav Mahler Chamber Orchestra / Daniel Harding
Virgin Classics ② 545521-2 Ⓕ
(106 minutes: DDD). Notes, texts and translations included. Recorded 2001 ○○○

This absorbing version of Britten's arresting masterpiece (derived from Henry James's ever-mysterious short story) is based on the stage performances given by London's Royal Opera in Deborah Warner's controversial staging. It offers a considerable challenge to both the première recording, conducted by the composer, and the more recent version conducted by Steuart Bedford. As with these, the new recording catches all the sinister fascination of Britten's most tautly composed opera score, so aptly matched to James's tale and to Myfanwy Piper's evocative libretto.

Daniel Harding is a worthy successor of and rival to the composer and to Steuart Bedford in extracting the greatest tension from both the finely wrought writing for the chamber ensemble and from his well-balanced and, by and large, exemplary cast. He is helped by the clearest and most detailed recording the work has yet received.

When discussing the merits of the casts one is comparing three teams of undoubted excellence. Nevertheless there are distinctions to be made. As on stage, Joan Rodgers nicely balances the need to suggest the ingenuous and the excitable side of the Governess's nature, which she conveys in a performance that combines clarity of diction with the vocal verities. Bostridge's ethereal, other-worldly, eerily magnetic Quint provides an interesting contrast with Philip Langridge's more forceful and present assumption for Bedford. Both are preferable to Pears's more mannered singing on the pioneering set, but that, needless to say, has its own authority. On the other hand neither Vivian Tierney nor Nadine Secunde (Bedford) quite match the searing sadness of Arda Mandikian's dark-hued Miss Jessel for Britten. In the case of Mrs Grose, Jane Henschel, imposingly as she sings, sounds a trifle too stock-operatic in her responses to words and notes beside the particular gentility of Joan Cross (Britten) or the marvellously detailed and intensely uttered interpretation of Phyllis Cannan (Bedford).

This is an utterly absorbing new version and, given its masterly engineering and sense of atmosphere is, by a hair's-breadth, preferable to the Bedford among stereo recordings. The composer's set remains both a historic document and – still – the most taut reading, but most will prefer and be satisfied with the conviction and the sound of this newcomer.

Sébastien de Brossard

French 1655-1730

GROVE Lexicographer and composer Sébastien de Brossard was maître de chapelle at Strasbourg Cathedral, 1687-98, then held a similar post in Meaux, where he composed sacred music, chiefly motets. He was among the first in France to write violin sonatas, and his French cantatas are among the few based on biblical subjects. Of his writings on music the most important is his Dictionnaire (1701, rev. 1703), the first of its kind in France. His extensive library is now in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris.

Grands Motets

In Convertendo Dominus. Miserere mei, Deus. Canticum eucharisticum pro pace
Delphine Collot, Catherine Padaut sops Jean-Paul Fouchécourt, Gilles Ragon tens Olivier Lallouette, Jérôme Corréas basses Accentus Chamber Choir; Limoges Baroque Ensemble / Christophe Coin
Astrée Naïve E8607 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1995

The name of Sébastien de Brossard usually appears in music history books only when its owner is being quoted in his capacity as a revealing theorist and lexicographer. As a composer, mainly of church music, his achievements are less often considered next to those of notable contemporaries such as Charpentier and Lalande, but in 1995 the Centre de Musique Baroque de Versailles devoted one of its annual short festivals to him, and this recording arises from that occasion. The three grands motets – large-scale pieces for choir, soloists and orchestra – are surprisingly eventful music, seemingly conceived more for entertainment than for liturgical edification.

Canticum eucharisticum pro pace, a 40-minute show-piece written to celebrate the joining of Strasbourg to France, depicts God/Louis XIV as both angry war hero and generous peacemaker, and even includes a dramatic solo for a singer representing the voice of God. The other two motets, too, contain interesting contrasts and a few good descriptive moments of their own. The performances are refined and attractive, even if the choir is occasionally a little unfocused.

Petits Motets

O Jesu! quam dulce nomen tuum, SdB24[a]. O plenus irarum dies!, SdB31[b]. Beati immaculati, SdB49[c]. Silentium dormi, SdB52[d]. Miserere mei, SdB53[e]
[ace]Cyrille Dubois treb [bc]Alain Buett bar [d]Hervé Lamy bass-bar Juan-Sebastian Lima theorbo Jean-Marie Quint vc [e]Maîtrise de Caen / Robert Weddle org
Assai 207582 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1999 ○

Brossard's Petits motets exemplify the fluent melodic style and intimacy of the genre at its most engaging. Cyrille Dubois is a seasoned treble with an astonishingly natural flair for the conventions and declamatory 'délicatesse' of the French baroque. Put simply, there isn't anyone quite like him. The idiom is in his blood. As the opening motet, O Jesu! quam dulce nomen tuum reveals, Dubois places notes with the accuracy and nonchalance of an old pro, naturally colouring vowels and embellishing cadences without a morsel of fear. Dubois is joined by the expressive and resonant bass of Alain Buett, a commanding presence in the harrowing and harmonically daring O plenus irarum dies!; Weddle, leading from the organ a sensitive accompaniment to a lilting tripla for the merciful Christ, judges the music's Italianate contrasts with sensual relief.

The fine duo motet, Beati immaculati, is sweetly set by Brossard (who reckoned it was his best motet), and Dubois and Buett have a rollicking time in a splendid performance. Silentium dormi suffers in comparison: the tenor, Hervé Lamy, is not in the same league vocally. Finally, we have an unpretentious and musicianly performance of a Miserere, for treble, vocal consort and continuo. Again, few will doubt that treble singing of this quality, guided so intelligently, adds a delectable frisson to French baroque music. A strong recommendation.

Leo Brouwer

Cuban b1939

GROVE Cuban composer and guitarist. He studied in New York (1960-61) but was most influenced by the new music he heard at the 1961 Warsaw Autumn Festival. He has been occupied with being an artist in a revolutionary society; his early works are nationalist, the later ones adopting avant-garde techniques.

Guitar Concerto

Guitar Concerto No 5, 'Helsinki' Albéniz/Brouwer Iberia Suite Lennon-McCartney/Brouwer From Yesterday to Penny Lane
Timo Korhonen gtr Tampere Philharmonic Orchestra / Tuomas Ollila Ⓕ
Ondine ODE979-2 (66 minutes: DDD) ●

The Concerto No 5, Helsinki, was commissioned for the Helsinki Festival but contains no musical reference to that city. As Brouwer explains: 'I compose in Space or in Lightness and Heaviness,' referring to the titles of the first two movements, but whether he ever does so in 'Luminosity', the title of the third, we are not told. No matter though, it is a substantial work that is none the worse for its lack of memorable tunes – except to those who regard them as essential. Brouwer's fingerprints abound, especially in the first movement's gestures, made familiar in other (solo) pieces. He has an intimate knowledge of the guitar and is a skilful and imaginative user of the orchestra.

Renaissance composers didn't hesitate to cross the tracks by using popular and folk tunes, so why shouldn't today's do likewise? Brouwer describes The Beatles' tunes as 'folk songs of today' and the seven in this recording are set in a variety of pastiche forms, à la Wagner, Hindemith, Stravinsky et al, a pleasing counterbalance to the serious business of the Concerto.

Timo Korhonen is a superb guitarist who takes everything in his clean-fingered stride. The Tampere Philharmonic Orchestra shares his zest, the recording is first-class, and every item is new to the catalogue. It all adds up to a strong recommendation.

Max Bruch

German 1838-1920

GROVE Bruch studied with Hiller and Reinecke and had some success with his cantata Frithjof Op 23 (1864) before taking posts in Koblenz, Sondershausen, Liverpool and Breslau. Official recognition came in 1891 when he became professor at the Berlin Academy. Although he composed three operas, his talent lay in epic expression; during his lifetime the secular choral works Odysseus and Das Feuerkreuz, with their solid choral writing and tuneful style, sometimes showing affinities with folk music, were considered particularly significant. Only his violin concertos (especially the appealing No 1 in G minor), the Scottish Fantasy for violin and orchestra and the Kol nidrei for cello and orchestra Op 47 have remained in the repertory.

Clarinet and Viola Concerto, Op 88

Clarinet and Viola Concerto in E minor, Op 88. Romance, Op 85. Eight Pieces, Op 83
Paul Meyer cl Gérard Caussé va François-René Duchâble pf Orchestra of the Opéra National de Lyon / Kent Nagano
Apex 8573-89229-2 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1988

The Double Concerto and the Eight Pieces both stem from Bruch's later years as a composer, by which time he was ill and tiring, also embittered and resentful of the successes being enjoyed by Strauss and Debussy (the latter 'an unqualified scribbler'). His Concerto is not only a backward-looking and inward-looking work: it is the music of a weary composer with little more to say but the habit of a lifetime in saying it. The technique does not fail, though the last movement is thinly stretched; the manner is still lyrical, and makes graceful use both of the solo instruments and of the accompaniments. This is unusually disposed so that the chamber orchestra of the first movement gradually swells in numbers until it is virtually a full symphony orchestra for the finale. Some problems ensue for the viola, which is in any case cast in a secondary role to the clarinet. Parity is restored with the Eight Pieces, though Bruch wrote them for the talents of his son Max Felix, a gifted clarinettist whose performance of these pieces earned him favourable comparison with the great Richard Mühlfeld from the conductor Fritz Steinbach. They are pleasant pieces, sometimes drawing on the tonal companionship which Mozart discovered the instruments to have in his Kegelstatt Trio, sometimes contrasting them with opposing kinds of music.

Violin Concertos

No 1 in G minor, Op 26; No 2 in D minor, Op 44; No 3 in D minor, Op 58

Violin Concertos Nos 1-3. Scottish Fantasy, Op 46. Serenade in A minor, Op 75. Konzertstück in F sharp minor, Op 84. Adagio appassionato, Op 57. In memoriam, Op 65. Romance in A minor, Op 41
Salvatore Accardo vn
Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra / Kurt Masur
Philips Silver Line ③ 432 282-2PSL3 Ⓜ
(214 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1977

This three-disc set contains all the major concertante works for violin and orchestra. They are quite marvellously played by Salvatore Accardo, admirably accompanied by the Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra under Kurt Masur. The G minor Concerto is clearly the most concentrated in its inspiration but there are plenty of attractive ideas elsewhere in this anthology. Certainly the Second and Third Concertos prove to have many memorable pages, especially when the advocacy is so persuasive. Bruch originally intended to use the description 'concerto' for both the Konzertstück and the relatively lightweight but charming Serenade, but thought better of it. The very enjoyable Allegro appassionato and Romanze are both admirably described by their titles, while In memoriam, which Bruch considered the finest of all these works, is undoubtedly inspired. We all know the Scottish Fantasy is brimming with engaging invention and Accardo's account is full of warmth and colour. The only snag is that this issue proves an exception to the usual excellence of the Philips sound balance. Possibly because of the resonant acoustics of the Leipzig Gewandhaus, the engineers have been tempted to place their microphones too close to the soloist. With remastering, this creates a dominating effect and brings a degree of shrillness at times to the solo timbre. It can be mitigated by a roll-off treble control; otherwise it is best to play these recordings at not too high a level. Then the poetry of the solo playing and the rich orchestral tapestry combine to captivate the ear in this lovely music.

Bruch Violin Concerto No 1[a]
Beethoven Violin Concerto in D, Op 61[b]
Kyung Wha Chung vn
[a]Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra; [b]London Philharmonic Orchestra / Klaus Tennstedt
EMI 754072-2 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
[b]Recorded live in 1989 ●●

Kyung Wha Chung has recorded both of these concertos before, but these performances not only have the benefit of more modern sound but are more spontaneous in their expressive warmth. The Bruch was recorded in the studio and reflects Chung's growing ease in a recording environment. Notoriously, she dislikes the constraints of recording, when she is so essentially spontaneous in her expressiveness. Here her rubato is freer, so that in the first movement the opening theme is more impulsive, and her freedom in the second subject conveys the sort of magic you find in her live performances. The slow movement brings extreme contrasts of dynamic and expression from orchestra as well as soloist, and the finale is again impulsive in its bravura. The Beethoven is a live recording. Chung sustains spacious speeds very persuasively indeed. She is freely flexible in her approach to Beethoven, as Tennstedt is too, but magnetically keeping an overall command. The element of vulnerability in Chung's reading adds to the emotional weight, above all in the slow movement, which in its wistful tenderness is among the most beautiful on disc. As for the outer movements, they are full of flair, with a live event bringing few if any flaws of ensemble. Altogether, an exceptionally attractive release.

Bruch Violin Concerto No 1
Mendelssohn Violin Concerto in E minor, Op 64
Maxim Vengerov vn Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra / Kurt Masur Teldec 4509-90875-2 Ⓜ
(51 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1993 ●

The slow movement of the Bruch gains from being taken at a flowing speed, and Vengerov finds a rare depth of expressiveness, which makes the movement a meditation rather than simply a lyrical interlude. With outstanding recorded sound, warm yet clear and detailed, there is now no more recommendable disc of this coupling.

As one might expect with Mendelssohn's own orchestra, the Leipzig Gewandhaus, under Kurt Masur, there is a freshness and clarity in the Mendelssohn which ideally matches the soloist's playing, at once keenly felt and expressive but clean and direct, with articulation of diamond precision and fine tonal shading. If anyone has ever thought this work at all sentimental, this shatters any such idea, and Masur encourages a flowing speed in the central Andante, which brings out the songfulness of the main theme. It is consistent with this approach that in his expressiveness Maxim Vengerov is more inclined to press ahead than to hold back, so that with a dashingly fast speed for the finale one is left breathless at the end.

Bruch Violin Concerto No 2 Goldmark Violin Concerto No 1 in A minor, Op 28
Nai-Yuan Hu vn Seattle Symphony Orchestra / Gerard Schwarz
Delos DE3156 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993-94

Hu is a virtuoso in the best sense of that word, with uncommon lyrical gifts, who can shape phrases with a sense of gentle rapture and coax his violin to produce the most lovely sounds. Even though the Bruch was specifically written for Sarasate, neither of these warm-hearted concertos impresses primarily by its brilliance. Here both gain from the understanding partnership attained by Hu with Schwarz and his excellent Seattle orchestra within a kindly acoustic. Having attended the première of Bruch's Second Concerto, Brahms wrote to Simrock: 'Hopefully a law will not be necessary to prevent any more first movements being written as an Adagio. That is intolerable for normal people.' Bruch's riposte was, 'If I meet with Brahms in heaven, I shall have myself transferred to Hell'. He could not understand why the popularity of the First Concerto precluded performance of the others, 'which are just as good if not better'. Certainly Hu's superb reading here bears out the composer's evaluation of the Second. The ardently simple presentation of the glorious main theme of that maligned Adagio goes right to the heart.

Scottish Fantasy

Bruch Scottish Fantasy
Lalo Symphonie espagnole, Op 21
Tasmin Little vn Royal Scottish National Orchestra / Vernon Handley
HMV Classics HMV5 73041-2 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1996 ◉

It is an excellent idea to couple Bruch's evocation of Scotland with Lalo's of Spain, both works in unconventional five-movement concertante form. Tasmin Little takes a ripe, robust and passionate view of both works, projecting them strongly, as she would in the concert hall, but neither is she lacking in poetry.

Her leisurely speeds give her freedom to point rhythms infectiously and play with an extra degree of individuality in her phrasing, daringly using portamentos or agogic hesitations in a way that adds to the character of the reading. Little has the gift of sounding totally spontaneous on disc, with no feeling of strict studio manners. In this she is here greatly helped by the splendid, keenly polished playing of the Scottish orchestra under Vernon Handley, a most sympathetic partner. Handley is also excellent in pointing the rhythms of the fast movements of the Lalo, matching his soloist, and the recording is superb, with brass in particular vividly caught.

Additional recommendation
Scottish Fantasy[a]
Coupling: Hindemith Violin Concerto[b]
Mozart Sinfonia concertante[c]
[abc]D Oistrakh vn [c]I Oistrakh va
[a]LSO / Horenstein; [b]Hindemith; [c]Moscow Philharmonic Orchestra / Kondrashin
Decca Legends 470 258-2DM (DDD; Ⓜ
recorded 1962-63) ◉◉

The Bruch is a total joy from start to finish, an inspirationally eloquent reading to rank alongside Heifetz's indelible 1961 stereo version. Equally indispensable, though, is the Hindemith – superbly eloquent playing from Oistrakh. A superb coupling.

Symphonies

No 1 in E flat, Op 28; No 2 in F minor, Op 36; No 3 in E, Op 51

Symphonies Nos 1-3
Cologne Gürzenich Orchestra / James Conlon
EMI ② 555046-2 (103 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992-93

Bruch's three symphonies are works whose rather reticent melodic style, at times dense scoring and formal stiffness, need affectionate help if their genuine qualities are to emerge and outweigh their flaws. Carefully handled there is real romantic charm (and some agreeably brusque sturdiness) to the first movement of the Third Symphony; its Adagio has sonorous solemnity and an ardent climax, and its Scherzo exhibits some fire. The Second Symphony, its over-extended finale apart, is stronger still. Conlon and his Cologne players cannot always disguise passages of awkwardly coarse scoring, but their sound, though full, is lean and that is in itself an advantage. Conlon is also able to relax into Bruch's genial melodies, to linger and shape them with affectionate rubato. For anyone wanting all the symphonies of this neglected but likeable composer, this set is all in all a pretty safe recommendation.

Anton Bruckner Austrian 1824-1896

GROVE Bruckner was the son of a village schoolmaster and organist, with whom he first studied and for whom he could deputize when he was ten. His father died in 1837 and he was sent at 13 as a chorister to the St Florian monastery where he could study organ, violin and theory. He became a schoolmaster-organist, holding village posts, but in 1845 went to teach at St Florian, becoming organist there in 1851. During these years he had written masses and other sacred works. In 1855 he undertook a counterpoint course in Vienna with the leading theorist, Simon Sechter; the same year he was appointed organist at Linz Cathedral. He continued his studies almost to the age of 40, but more crucial was his contact, in 1863, with Wagner's music – first Tannhäuser, then Tristan und Isolde; these pointed to new directions for him, as the Masses in D minor, E minor and F minor, and Symphony No 1, all written in 1864-68, show.

In 1868, after Sechter's death, he was offered the post of theory teacher at the Vienna Conservatory, which he hesitantly accepted. In the ensuing years he travelled to Paris and London as an organ virtuoso and improviser. In Vienna, he concentrated on writing symphonies; but the Vienna PO rejected No 1 as 'wild', No 2 as 'nonsense' and 'unplayable' and No 3 as 'unperformable'. When No 3 was given, it was a fiasco. No 4 was successfully played, but No 5 had to wait 18 years for a performance and some of No 6 was never played in Bruckner's lifetime. He was criticised for his Wagnerian leanings during the bitter Brahms-Wagner rivalries. His friends urged him to make cuts in his scores (or made them for him); his lack of self-confidence led to acquiescence and to the formal distortion of the works as a result. Late in his life he revised several of his earlier works to meet such criticisms.

Bruckner taught at a teacher-training college, 1870-74, and at Vienna University – after initial opposition – from 1875. Only in the 1880s did he enjoy real success, in particular with Symphony No 7; his music began to be performed in Germany and elsewhere, and he received many honours as well as grants from patrons and the Austrian government. Even in his last years, he was asked to rewrite Symphony No 8, and when he died in 1896 No 9 remained unfinished.

Bruckner was a deeply devout man, and it is not by chance that his symphonies have been compared to cathedrals in their scale and their grandeur and in their aspiration to the sublime. The principal influences behind them are Beethoven and Wagner. Beethoven's Ninth provides the basic model for their scale and shape, and also for their mysterious openings, fading in from silence. Wagner too influenced their scale and certain aspects of their orchestration, such as the use of heavy brass (from No 7 Bruckner wrote for four Wagner tubas) and the use of intense, sustained string cantabile for depth of expression. His musical forms are individual: his vast sonata-type structures often have three rather than two main tonal areas, and he tends to present substantial sections in isolation punctuated by pregnant silences. Huge climaxes are attained by remorseless reiterations of motifs, or, in the Adagios, by the persistent use of swirling figural patterns in the violins against which a huge orchestral tutti is inexorably built up, often with ascending phrases and enriching harmonies. Secondary themes often have a chorale-like character, sometimes counterpointed with music in dance rhythms. Slow movements are often planned (as in Beethoven's Ninth) around the alternation of two broad themes. Scherzos are in 3/4, often with the kind of elemental drive of that in Beethoven's Ninth; they carry hints of Austrian peasant dances, and some of the trios show ländler-like characteristics. From No 3 onwards, Bruckner's symphonies each end with a restatement of the work's opening theme. Because of their textual complications, Bruckner's symphonies have mostly been published in two editions: the Sämtliche Werke series (ed R Haas and others) usually give the work as first written, the Gesamtausgabe (ed L Nowak and others) the revised and cut versions.

Complete Symphonies

No 00 in F minor, 'Study Symphony'; No 0 in D minor, 'Die Nullte'; No 1 in C minor; No 2 in C minor; No 3 in D minor; No 4 in E flat, 'Romantic'; No 5 in B flat; No 6 in A; No 7 in E; No 8 in C minor; No 9 in D minor

---

Symphonies – Nos 1 (Linz version), 2, 3 (1889 version, ed Nowak), 4-7, 8 (ed Haas) and 9
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
DG ⑨ Karajan Symphony Edition 429 648-2GSE9 Ⓜ
(520 minutes: ADD/DDD). Recorded 1975-81 OOO

Karajan's understanding of the slow but powerful currents that flow beneath the surfaces of symphonies like the Fifth or Nos 7-9 has never been bettered, but at the same time he shows how much more there is to be reckoned with: strong emotions, a deep poetic sensitivity (a Bruckner symphony can evoke landscapes as vividly as Mahler or Vaughan Williams) and a gift for singing melody that at times rivals even Schubert. It hardly needs saying that there's no such thing as a perfect record cycle, and Karajan's collection of the numbered Bruckner symphonies (unfortunately he never recorded 'No 0') has its weaknesses. The early First and Second Symphonies can be a little heavy-footed and, as with so many Bruckner sets, there's a suspicion that more time might have been spent getting to know the fine but elusive Sixth. However, none of these performances is without its major insights, and in the best of them – particularly Nos 3, 5, 7, 8 and 9 – those who haven't stopped their ears to Karajan will find that whatever else he may have been, there was a side to him that could only be described as 'visionary'. As for the recordings: climaxes can sound a touch overblown in some of the earlier symphonies, but overall the image is well focused and atmospheric. A valuable set, and a landmark in the history of Bruckner recording.

Symphonies Nos 0-9
Concertgebouw Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Philips Bernard Haitink Symphony Edition ⑨
442 040-2PB9 592 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1963-72 OO

Right from the start of Haitink's cycle, you sense here is a man who briefed his team, read the map and is raring to go. The cycle began in 1963 with Symphony No 3. The playing is alert, rousing even, though inclined to edginess. This is partly to do with the sound of the post-war Concertgebouw (marginally more Francophone in those days), partly a matter of an as yet not-quite-symbiotic bond between Haitink and the players. The Fourth Symphony followed in 1965. This suggests some deepening and refining of the bond between conductor and orchestra and is a very fine performance. The Scherzo is particularly exciting. The Ninth Symphony (also 1965) came surprisingly early in the cycle. The performance explains why. Both conductor and orchestra play the symphony as if in the grip of a deep compulsion. The orchestral response alone has a terrific explicitness and immediacy. As for Haitink, he plays the work very dramatically, as a symphonic psycho-drama, 'a vastation', as thinkers and theologians of Bruckner's time often termed breakdown and purgation of the spirit.

When it comes to the great central tetralogy, Symphonies Nos 5-8, there are some problems. Most problematic is the Eighth Symphony. The Seventh has a quick first movement; but it survives. Not so the Eighth. The first movement just about hangs together, thanks to some finely concentrated playing at critical junctions. But the Scherzo is absurdly quick, as is the finale. Haitink's account of the Sixth Symphony is less of a problem than it is with some rivals. The recording is exceptionally fine – everything thrillingly immediate, finely 'terraced'. The Adagio always sounded well and so it remains, the keening Dutch oboe and bright trumpets the perfect foil for the Rembrandt-colourings of the strings and lower brass. Symphonies Nos 1, 2, 5 and 6 were the last to be recorded. (Haitink actually ended with this rousing account of No 1.) They are all very fine. This is one of the best Fifths ever made; dramatic where Karajan is epic but fascinatingly alive and well integrated. The Second Symphony also receives an exceptional performance (the text, as elsewhere in the cycle, is Haas). Philips's CD remastering realizes just how vivid and astonishingly natural these Concertgebouw-played, Concertgebouw-made recordings are. You will need a supplementary account of the Eighth, but this hardly matters when the set is remastered, at a knock-down price.

Symphonies Nos 3-9. Choral Works
[ab]Dame Margaret Price sop/mez [b]Doris Soffel mez [a]Christel Borchers contr [a]Claes H Ahnsjö, [b]Peter Straka tens [a]Karl Helm, [b]Matthias Hölle basses [ab]Munich Philharmonic Chorus; [a]Munich Bach Choir; Munich Philharmonic Orchestra / Sergiu Celibidache
EMI ⑬ Celibidache Edition 556688-2
(712 minutes: ADD/DDD). Texts and translation Ⓕ included. Recorded live 1982-95 ●

Also available separately – 556689-2 (66 minutes): No 3 (ed Nowak). 556690-2 (79 minutes): No 4 (ed Haas). ② 556691-2 (90 minutes): No 5 (ed Haas). 556694-2 (66 minutes): No 6 (ed Haas). ② 556695-2 (114 minutes): No 7 (ed Haas); Te Deum[a]. ② 556696-2 (104 minutes): No 8 (ed Nowak). ② 556699-2 (113 minutes): No 9 (ed Nowak). Rehearsal sequences. 556702-2 (77 minutes): Mass No 3 in F minor[b]

As a thinker, Celibidache was part genius, part crank. (This Bruckner set reveals both aspects.) A bizarre aggregation of musical, spiritual and quasi-scientific ideas led him to believe that because of what he called 'epiphenomena' – the need for each note to sound, resonate and return – it was necessary to place round the music an inordinate amount of space: 'The richer the music, the slower the tempo.' It is Celibidache's overriding preoccupation with slowness, with temporal space, which helps conjure forth what has got to be one of the greatest Bruckner performances recorded – this 1987 account of the Fourth Symphony, a truly towering act of the re-creative imagination – and several that are well-nigh interminable. His initial tempos are often quite sprightly. It is when he gets to the second and third subjects – to the great Gesangsperiode in each movement – that he drops down many more gears than most Bruckner conductors would dare. What Celibidache gives us, in effect, is a sequence of slow movements within the symphonic continuum. In each case, the slow movement itself is the crown (what a revelation his reading of the slow movement of the Sixth Symphony is), the dark sun at the centre of the Bruckner universe around which the adagio sections of the opening and closing movements (and the third movement Trio) slowly circle. The problems come in the Seventh, Eighth and Ninth Symphonies. The Haas edition of the Eighth Symphony ('Celi' uses the slightly shorter Nowak edition) gives an estimated playing time of 78 minutes. Many conductors are quicker than this. Some are slower. But even these are as the flash of a swallow's wing alongside the dinosaur flap of Celibidache's record-breaking 104 minutes. The performance of the Seventh is almost as odd. Here Haas gives an estimated playing time of 68 minutes. Par for the course is nearer 62 or 63 minutes. Celi takes nigh on 80. Since the symphonies and the F minor Mass are available separately, the performances to acquire are those of the Fourth and Sixth Symphonies. The Fifth, too, if you don't already have one of Jochum's performances or Karajan's 1975 Berlin recording to which the Celi is surprisingly close in tempo and style, even though the manner of the music-making is a good deal earthier.

The ensemble playing, even in the best performances, is not faultless. Celibidache occasionally has trouble getting woodwind and brass in together; the solo flute can play like a seraph but the flutes en masse are tentative, and the clarinet playing is chancy. The brass playing is generally first-rate, but it is the strings that one comes back to.

The recordings have weight, warmth and immediacy. The choral works, though, fare less well; in the Te Deum, the choir is a misty irrelevance and although you hear more of it in the F minor Mass, neither the recording nor the choral or solo singing is in the top flight. Despite Celibidache's occasional flashes of insight, there are better versions of both works to be had elsewhere. The transfers have been well done. Applause is separately banded, and the pauses between movements are 'live', and feel right in context. Thus we have the best of all worlds, live music-making sensitively preserved on record.

Additional recommendation
Symphonies Nos 1-9 🏵
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra; Berlin Radio SO / Jochum
DG ⑨ 469 810-2GB9 (9 hours 12 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1958-68

If you were raised on Karajan's Bruckner, Jochum's approach can appear rather stop-start. But Jochum admirers will respond to his highly charged, Romantically intense and seemingly spontaneous approach. This is a great set with few real weaknesses, except for the Eighth. Jochum was a great Brucknerian, and these CDs should give hours of listening pleasure.

Symphony No 1

Symphony No 1 (Linz version). Te Deum
Jessye Norman sop Yvonne Minton mez
David Rendall ten Samuel Ramey *bassChicago Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Daniel Barenboim
DG Galleria 435 068-2GGA (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1980

There is still a relative lack of choice when it comes to single CDs of the boisterous First Symphony in its original Linz version, so the reissue of this Chicago recording under Barenboim is a most attractive choice, particularly if you don't mind adding to your collection a superb – eloquently sung, expertly played, exceptionally well-recorded – account of Bruckner's mighty Te Deum. In the symphony, Barenboim is witty, affectionate and vital and the Chicago playing is sumptuous. Here and there one might long for the countrified tread of Eugen Jochum, a German Bruckner conductor of the old school, but one can understand DG's desire to give the best of this Barenboim Bruckner cycle another airing. Warmly recommended if the coupling suits.

Symphonies Nos 1 (ed Carragan) and 3 – Bewegt, quasi Andante (1876 version)
Royal Scottish National Orchestra / Georg Tintner
Naxos 8 554430 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1998 ●

Some of the outstanding performances in the late Georg Tintner's Naxos Bruckner series have been of the early symphonies. 'Your young men shall see visions,' says the Prophet Joel. It has been Tintner's skill to conjure vision by marrying sharpness of detail and youthful diction with a daring breadth of utterance. He did this in his recording of the Symphony No 3 and he does it again here in a fine account of the First recorded in Glasgow's Henry Wood Hall with the RSNO at the top of its considerable form.

Timings of individual movements confirm a broad reading, as broad as Václav Neumann's on his old Leipzig set (nla). But where Neumann's performance ended up sounding soulful and ponderous, Tintner's is as fresh as could be. Bruckner called this a 'cheeky little minx' of a symphony. Tintner shows it to be that, and more. (Bruckner's own generally unavailing pursuit of cheeky post-pubescent minxes clearly fed a rich and lively fantasy life which the symphony vividly charts. Or so Freudians might have us believe.)

The announcement that this is the 'world première recording' of the 'unrevised Linz version' shouldn't cause seasoned collectors to throw out cherished extant recordings of the 1866 'Linz' (as opposed to 1890-91 'Vienna') version. The emendations Bruckner made in 1877 to the 1866 text are fairly minor. That said, future interpreters may want to follow Tintner in using this plainer Haas/Carragan edition rather than the 1955 Nowak edition which, in typically meddling style, incorporates the 1877 changes into the original text. The added plainness of the orchestration at the very end of the symphony is absolutely right for a peroration that is both prompt and ingenious.

The fill-up is rather more intriguing textually. It is the largely forgotten 1876 revision of the original 1873 version of the Adagio of the Third Symphony. The changes include a quicker tempo, a gentle elaboration of the violin figurations near the start, and a disastrous attempt to underpin the lead to the final climax with a new Tannhäuser-like violin accompaniment. Since this is funny in the wrong way, it could be said nicely to complement the main work on the disc which is funny (and fun) in all the right ways.

Symphony No 2

Symphony No 2 (ed Carragan)
National Symphony Orchestra of Ireland / Georg Tintner
Naxos 8 554006 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1996 ●●

This exceptional recording by veteran Austrian conductor Georg Tintner is in a league of its own. It is a beautifully shaped performance, characterfully played and vividly recorded. What's more, it is, in effect, a gramophone 'first', for though the original, 1872 version of Bruckner's Second Symphony has been recorded elsewhere this is the first to reach a wider market. Not that the differences between editions are hugely significant. What the earlier 1872 version principally offers is the reversal of the order of the two inner movements (the Scherzo now comes before the Andante), a full clutch of repeats in the Scherzo and Trio, a rather longer development section in the finale, various small changes to the orchestration and the absence of some of the more meretricious tempo markings. What is appealing about the 'full monty' is the feeling it gives of the symphony's Schubertian pedigree: heavenly length joining hands with a deep sense of melancholy and melodic Angst. Which brings us to Tintner's reading of the symphony, which is shrewd and affectionate, tellingly phrased and beautifully paced, the moves away from and back to the basic pulse nicely handled. This is Bruckner conducting of the old school. There is also something reassuringly old-fashioned about the playing of the National Symphony Orchestra of Ireland. The entire orchestra has the character of a well-to-do country cousin who is blessedly innocent of the more tiresome aspects of metropolitan life. This is an exceptional recording.

Symphony No 2 (1877 Novak edition)
Vienna Symphony Orchestra / Carlo Maria Giulini
Testament SBT1210 (59 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1974

Perhaps the greatest of all recordings of the work, spacious, involved, profoundly human. So persuasive is Giulini's interpretation, it makes it almost impossible to take seriously the attempt at a more detached, monumental approach found in Daniel Barenboim's relatively recent Teldec performance. Giulini's ability to convey fervour without sentimentality is little short of miraculous, and it is clear from the way the early stages of the first movement effortlessly project an ideal balance between the lyrical and the dramatic that this reading will be exceptional. The recording might not have the dynamic range of current digital issues, and resonance can sound rather artificial in louder passages. There's also an obtrusive ex-tension of the trumpet triplets seven bars before the end of the first movement. But such things count for less than nothing in the face of a performance which culminates in a finale of such glowing spontaneity you could almost believe that the orchestra are playing it for the first time, and that neither they (nor any other orchestra) will ever play it better.

A fuller and more authentic text of the symphony is available at super-bargain price in Georg Tintner's fine account of the 1872 edition (on Naxos; reviewed above). Serious collectors will need both. Yet the last thing you are likely to feel after hearing Giulini is that there is something inauthentic about this Bruckner. Matters musicological fade to vanishing point, given such communicative genius.

Symphony No 3

Symphony No 3 (1877/78 version)
Wagner Lohengrin – Act 1, Prelude; Act 3, Prelude
South West German Radio Symphony Orchestra / Michael Gielen
Hänssler Faszination Musik 93 031 Ⓕ
(67 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1999 ○○○

The Bruckner is the thing here. This is a truly inspired performance, keenly argued, swift and clean-limbed, yet one that is also sensitive to the characteristic Brucknerian musings in lyric subjects and at points of transitions. Haitink may create more space in the finale's polka-cum-chorale in his 1988 Vienna recording but his account of the finale runs into gearing problems of its own later on.

The Gielen was made over three days in May 1999 in the Festspielhaus in Baden-Baden. It was evidently made with care; yet it sounds live. It even 'settles' as a real performance might, the orchestra shifting focus a few minutes into the first movement as the players begin to illuminate the drama from within rather than merely sounding it from without. Like Haitink, Gielen includes the scampering coda to the third movement which Bruckner added to this 1877 revision in January 1878. It is a curious afterthought which can sound trite. Not so here. Gielen's performance of the Scherzo and Trio is so lithe and fiery you half expect the music to race on beyond its accredited end.

Brucknerians who lust after the weight and unfailing security of the Berlin or Vienna string ensembles may have a few reservations about this Gielen version. For this reviewer, the Gielen is hors concours principally because of the intuitive brilliance of a reading which profiles so vividly the ardent, aspiring mood of a provincial musician, intoxicated by his craft, giving his all in the service of the god Wagner to whom the work was dedicated. The recording by South-West German Radio's Ute Hesse is everything it should be: bold, open and bright-toned.

Symphonies Nos 3 (1877 version) and 8[a]
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Philips Duo ② 470 534-2PM2 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1988 and [a]1995 ○○

This is the least perfect of the nine symphonies, though not the least magnificent. As a symphonic project it is both magnificent and characteristic. Unfortunately, the sweep of the musical vision outdistanced Bruckner's ability to control it structurally; in 1889 he returned to the text and radically revised it. For most Bruckner scholars, however, the 1877 text is the ideal. 'It is stylistically purer,' Robert Simpson has written 'and though its construction leaves much to be desired, its weaknesses are exacerbated, not propped, by the crude remedies of the later version.' The 1877 is the version to collect. The finale's polka subject, which has a certain sly wit and grace in Haitink's Concertgebouw recording, retains a certain slyness and grace but with the Vienna Phil it is more the slyness and grace some of us associate with that old darling of Chancery Lane, Mr Horace Rumpole. This newer recording, like the playing, is immensely forceful. Haitink, dedicated Brucknerian that he is, makes a wonderful job of the work without resort to all those unseemly cuts, revisions and re-orchestrations that most of his rivals rely on. He is a Brucknerian bold and true, and the Vienna Phil, the brass in particular, plays gloriously, with particular thrust, spontaneity, and weight of tone in the much disputed finale.

This is a slightly disappointing Eighth. What it lacks, by comparison with Karajan's (not to mention the longer-drawn Giulini and Sinopoli versions), is the sense of sustained organic growth. At least, that is how it seems, hearing 'cold' on record what was by all accounts a compelling listen in the concert hall. And for whatever reason, the Vienna Phil playing is only moderately fine. Nevertheless, a disc worth buying for a fine account of the Third.

Symphony No 3 (1873 version)
Royal Scottish National Orchestra / Georg Tintner
Naxos 8 553454 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1998

This original (1873) version of Bruckner's Third is his longest symphony, a work of epic intent filled with youthful fire. It has rarely been recorded and is rarely played, yet this is the work as it was meant to be heard. Had Robert Haas's fully prepared and engraved edition of the 1873 version not been incinerated in a raid on Leipzig in 1944 (happily, an uncorrected proof later turned up in Winterthur) the work's recorded history might have been very different. In the event it was not until 1977 that the Bruckner/Haas edition finally appeared in print, edited by Nowak, since when it has been recorded by Inbal and Norrington (nla). The Inbal recording is admirable in almost every way, a consistently satisfying version orchestrally and technically. What it lacks is the danger and visionary daring of parts of Tintner's reading. The contrast is most marked in the first movement where Tintner, like Inbal but unlike Norrington, judges the written instruction Gemässigt, misterioso ('Moderate, mysterious') to be all-important, taking the alla breve instruction as a secondary consideration. Yet he goes further than Inbal. As early as fig A (1'23"), it is clear that persistence of pulse is not a priority. Tintner conducts the Third as he (and, indeed, all other good Brucknerians) would conduct the Fifth. It makes for a revelatory reading of the first movement. Vivid yet profound are the words that most immediately come to mind – Tintner at his greatest.

The sound he draws from the Royal Scottish National Orchestra – the strings in particular – has an almost Sibelian spareness to it, as does the recording, where space has been cleared for tuttis that are clear, fierce, and unclaustrophobic. Clearing space involves keeping the orchestra slightly at a distance, at some cost to the winds – and the woodwinds in particular – in the two outer movements and in the otherwise wonderfully vibrant and beautifully paced Scherzo and Trio. The finale makes less of a mark. The playing of the polka in the crucial polka-cum-chorale seems to be under-rehearsed, bland and uninvolved; a pity since this juxtaposition of dance hall and funeral rite is one of Bruckner's most graphic inventions.

Symphony No 4

Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Günter Wand
RCA Victor Red Seal 09026 68839-2 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1997 ○○○

Awards 1999

The pacing of each movement is majestic, not too fast, in the first movement; a slow, contemplative tread in the second; animated, but capable of opening out into something more leisurely in the Scherzo; varied, but with the sense of an underlying slow pulse in the finale. Wand allows himself some fairly generous rubato from time to time, halting slightly on the high unaccompanied cello phrase in the first movement second subject. From the start there's something about Wand's performance that puts it in a different league from rival recordings. There's the depth and richness of the string sound in the opening tremolo. A few seconds later the Berlin Philharmonic's principal horn intones the opening phrases so magically and majestically that it's hard to believe one isn't listening to a real voice – a superhuman larynx, not just a contraption of brass and valves. Of course the sound is, to some extent, the orchestra's own, but there is a feeling that the players are giving extra for Wand, something with more inner life; and the unaffected eloquence and shapeliness of the phrasing is all Wand. It carries you along even when the rubato ought to jar, as it does sometimes in other versions.

This is a concert performance, and it feels like one. Things that work in concert – the once-off live inspiration – aren't always ideal solutions on a repeatable commercial recording. Take Wand's big ritardando at the fleeting reference to Brünnhilde's Magic Sleep motif in the finale – the effect might pall after a couple of playings. But then he does ease very effectively into the weird pianissimo cello and bass figures that follow, triplet quavers gradually becoming triplet crotchets. The sound quality is excellent.

Symphony No 4
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Karl Böhm
Decca Legends 466 374-2DM (68 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1973. ○○○

Böhm's VPO account of the Fourth Symphony has the unmistakable stamp of greatness. It was made in the Sofiensaal in Vienna with its helpful acoustic; for though one can detect a whisper of tape-hiss if you put your ear against the loudspeaker, in almost every other way the sound is realistic and warm. There is a roundness in the brass tone with plenty of bite and fullness but no unwanted rasp – especially important in this symphony. Böhm's Fourth is at the head of the field irrespective of price. The warmth as well as the mystery of Bruckner are far more compellingly conveyed in Böhm's spacious view than with any other conductor.

Symphony No 4
Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra / Nikolaus Harnoncourt
Warner Elatus 2564-60129-2 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded live in 1997

If you're expecting something controversial – something to fulminate against – you'll probably be disappointed. Harnoncourt's Bruckner Fourth is nothing like as provocative as his Beethoven. It is relatively fast, but not startlingly so. If Harnoncourt's first movement is more gripping, more like a symphonic drama than usual, that has more to do with the crisp, clear rhythmic articulation than with the number of crotchets per minute. The solo woodwind and horn playing that follows is lovely, expansive enough; what else would one expect from the Concertgebouw in Bruckner? This is an unusually compelling Bruckner Fourth – exciting throughout the first movement and Scherzo, and in passages like the problematical Brucknerian Ride of the Valkyries that erupts after the finale's bucolic second theme. In many more traditional Bruckner performances the bass often seems to move in sustained, undifferentiated pedal points. In Harnoncourt's version one is often aware of a deep pulsation – like the throbbing repeated notes that open the finale – continuing, however discreetly, while the tunes unfold above. To hear the finale's second theme in this version is to be reminded that Bruckner was an excellent dancer, light on his feet until he was nearly 70. Of course one shouldn't confuse the man with the musical personality, but why should Bruckner always sound heavy, sedentary, as though slowly digesting a gigantic meal? Harnoncourt provides us with the light-footedness, while allowing the music to unfold at its own speed, to take time. There's no question that Harnoncourt must be considered a serious contender in Bruckner.

Symphony No 4 (ed Haas)
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
EMI Karajan Edition 566094-2 Ⓜ
(70 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1970-71

There was always something very special about Karajan's EMI recordings of the Fourth and Seventh Symphonies with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. Both works had, of course, been in Karajan's repertory for many years, though it was not until 1970 that he made his first recordings of either work. The recording of the Fourth is one of the finest ever made in Berlin's Jesus-Christus Kirche, the church's clear but spacious acoustic allowing the Berlin playing to be heard in all its multicoloured, multi-dimensional splendour.

Symphony No 5

Staatskapelle Dresden / Giuseppe Sinopoli
DG 469 527-2GH (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1999 ●●●

Publishers publish 'study' scores, but no marketing guru has ever come up with the idea of the 'study' recording. They exist, of course: recordings which do us the singular honour of providing an interpretation while at the same time allowing us to hear all the notes. This doesn't suit every piece of music ('Gentleman,' Richard Strauss once said, 'Give me an impression of the music!'), nor does it suit all listeners. Here we have a study recording par excellence, as close as we have come on record to being provided with a sound facsimile of the symphony's printed page.

Such an undertaking requires immense discipline from the orchestra, the balance engineer and the conductor. On this form the Staatskapelle Dresden have no peer. The sound is characterful, the ensemble exact, the concentration absolute. There must be a quarter of a million notes in this symphony and we hear practically all of them more or less flawlessly delivered. Like Sinopoli's Bruckner Nine recording, the engineering is intensely concentrated: not cold as such but fiercely analytical. It entirely suits the Fifth, arguably the most intricately crafted of all Bruckner's symphonies.

Sinopoli is here more the alpha-quality Kapellmeister than the Bruckner 'interpreter'. The text is his passion; his trust in it is absolute, his patience immense. The first movement is one of Bruckner's most subtle and elusive. So much of it is marked to be delivered in an undertone, with p, pp, and ppp the principal markings. Cynics will argue that Bruckner wrote these in because he did not trust the orchestras and conductors of his time, a theory Sinopoli gives us every reason to doubt.

After the enigma that is the first movement, Sinopoli senses a somewhat easier, more sunlit mood in the Adagio. He is wary, however, of what some conductors see as the Upper Austrian folksiness of the Scherzo. 'A formidable human power directly faced with heedless gaiety' is how Robert Simpson sums up this music, exactly how Sinopoli appears to see it, too.

The finale resolves fugue, chorale and a host of earlier considerations into a glorious home-coming, a process greatly helped here by Sinopoli's refreshingly swift, beautifully integrated treatment of the main exposition. There is here an inevitability about the proceedings that has everything to do with the performance, without the performance in any way drawing attention to itself. It is Bruckner and the impeccable logic of his musical thinking we are listening to (and very moving it proves to be).

Among rival versions, Karajan's 1976 Berlin recording, though rather grander in manner, comes closest to this (though the CD transfers have always seemed foggy and recessed). Welser-Möst's doesn't quite operate on this level and, in any case, is now eclipsed technically and orchestrally. Those who prefer the thrills and spills of a 'real' performance (the Sinopoli may be live but it doesn't seem so) will no doubt prefer Horenstein's 1971 Proms performance. But that is a very different kind of experience, more overtly dramatic, more mundane. Sinopoli's Bruckner Fifth has all the beauty of a great mathematical proof.

Symphony No 6

Bruckner Symphony No 6 (ed Haas)
Wagner Wesendonk Lieder
Christa Ludwig mez
New Philharmonia Orchestra / Otto Klemperer
EMI 567037-2 (77 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1964 and 1968 ●●●

Alleluias are in order. This is the finest – nay, the only wholly acceptable – account of Bruckner's Sixth Symphony on record. Quite why this terse, searching and exhilarating symphony has so eluded interpreters is difficult to establish; suffice it to say that Klemperer's performance, made in London's Kingsway Hall over eight sessions in November 1964, is masterly from first note to last. It is a performance by turns lofty tender and serene, but it is, above all, a structurally cogent performance and within the compass of its steady-treading tempos an intensely exciting one. Back in 1965, it was hailed as glorious – the Klemperer Bruckner style majestic, magisterial, magnificently architectural – at its very finest, and time has dimmed neither the performance nor EMI's superbly articulate recording which reproduces with clarity and immediacy the marvellously transparent textures of Klemperer's reading, the fabulous string traceries and the stark beauty of woodwind and brass playing. All this comes up very vividly on this reissue. Walter Legge disbanded the Philharmonia in 1964 and eight months on, one senses the players – every jot of their former expertise in place – in doubly determined mood. The performance has immense backbone, yet in the Scherzo and the fantastic echoing Trio section the playing marries clarity with immense subtlety. Here and in the slow movement, Klemperer demonstrates that you don't have to be effete to be tender, sensitive or profound. This is a performance that no Brucknerian can afford to miss. This latest CD reissue also has historical significance, the Ludwig/Klemperer Wesendonk interpretation having something of a classic status. Surprisingly, Klemperer's speeds are on the fast side, and he is occasionally perfunctory, but Ludwig's singing is dark and meaningful, the tone refulgent. Her account is illuminating, even if on the heavy side, but it is compelling in its urgency and elevation, with correspondingly warm support from conductor and orchestra.

Symphony No 7

Symphonies Nos 7 and 6
Concertgebouw Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Philips Duo ② 473 301-2PM2 (65 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1970 and 1979 ●

Bernard Haitink's 1979 Concertgebouw account of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony was a change from and an advance on his 1966 Concertgebouw recording. Broader in pace and warmer-toned, it retained much of the earlier reading's classical integrity while also paying more attention to the music's Schubertian aspect. Haitink does not go as far down that particular road as Karajan does in his deeply reflective, pantheistically charged 1971 Berlin Philharmonic version. The velvet sonorities of the Berlin performance will not please everyone, though it has to be said that the Berliners' quiet, affective glow of colour is part and parcel of a reading which is deeply thought through and of a piece with itself. (The Adagio is especially fine, more innig than the Haitink and more of a piece.) But the return of this later Haitink recording to the catalogues is both timely and welcome for those in search of a fine, middle-of-the-road, mid-price recording of the symphony.

The recording of the Sixth is exceptionally fine – everything thrillingly immediate and finely 'terraced'. It is a quicker performance than Klemperer's classic version for EMI (reviewed above). The Adagio sounds particularly well, the keening Dutch oboe and bright trumpets the perfect foil for the Rembrandt colourings of the strings and lower brass.

Symphony No 7 (ed Haas)
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
DG Karajan Gold 439 037-2GHS (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1989 ●

The Vienna Philharmonic features on what was Karajan's last recording, an idiomatic account of the Seventh Symphony, lighter and more classical in feel than either of his two Berlin recordings yet loftier, too. As for the Original-image bit-processing you need go no further than the first fluttered violin tremolando and the cellos' rapt entry in the third bar to realise how ravishingly 'present' the performance is in this reprocessing. Or go to the end of the symphony and hear how the great E major peroration is even more transparent than before, the octave drop of bass trombone and bass tuba 13 bars from home the kind of delightfully euphoric detail that in 1989 only the more assiduous score-reader would have been conscious of hearing. This remastered Bruckner Seventh is definitely pure gold.

Symphony No 7 (ed Haas)
Royal Scottish National Orchestra / Georg Tintner
Naxos 8 554269 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1997

Since there are no recommendable budget, let alone super-budget recordings of Bruckner's Seventh Symphony, this will do nicely. It is a finely schooled performance, chaste and discreet, with a notable reading of the Adagio which lies at the heart of the work. Tintner sees this very much as a piece, the first (G major) climax finely achieved, the later, greater climax splendidly 'placed'. The coda, Bruckner's lament for the dead Wagner, is played relatively swiftly, touchingly and without bombast. In general, his reading of the score is loyal without being in any sense dull or hidebound. In an ideal world, the playing of the first violins would be more consistently secure in alt. In particular, you have the feeling that both the players and the engineers (the engineering is generally excellent) would have benefited from a chance to refine and tidy parts of the performance of the first movement. A notable bargain, none the less.

Symphony No 8

Symphony No 8 (ed Haas)
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
DG ② 427 611-2GH2 (83 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1988 ●●●

As if by some strange act of providence, great conductors have often been remembered by the immediate posthumous release of some fine and representative recording. With Karajan it is the Eighth Symphony of Bruckner, perhaps the symphony he loved and revered above all others. It is the sense of the music being in the hearts and minds and collective unconscious of Karajan and every one of the 100 and more players of the Vienna Philharmonic that gives this performance its particular charisma and appeal. It is a wonderful reading, every bit as authoritative as its many predecessors and every bit as well played but somehow more profound, more humane, more lovable if that is a permissible attribute of an interpretation of this work. The end of the work, always astonishing and uplifting, is especially fine here and very moving. Fortunately, it has been recorded with plenty of weight and space and warmth and clarity, with the additional benefit of the added vibrancy of the Viennese playing. The sessions were obviously sufficiently happy for there to shine through moments of spontaneous eloquence that were commonplace in the concert hall in Karajan's later years, but which recordings can't always be relied upon to catch.

Symphony No 8 in C minor (ed Haas)
Hallé Orchestra / Sir John Barbirolli
BBC Legends BBCL4067-2 (74 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1970 ●●

At the time of this concert in May 1970 there were just three recordings of Bruckner's Eighth Symphony in the catalogue; now there are more than 50, and counting. This performance is that rare thing, an intensely dramatic Bruckner Eighth. It is not often that you hear an account of the turbulent first movement as thrilling as this. The jagged downward slashes of the trumpets are terrible to experience, yet the space that opens up after the vast and glorious E flat cadence 40 bars later is the very reverse, a way to heaven even from the gates of hell. The odd stumble in the brass, the occasional cough are immaterial. This is not a performance for those who measure out their life in coffee spoons.

The Scherzo is ferociously quick with a Trio of compensating loftiness. The loftiness returns in the Adagio which Barbirolli again projects urgently and with a full heart. Plaintive winds, trenchant brass, and speaking strings, full-bodied and emotionally intent, build the heaven on earth that Bruckner envisions. To hear why this is great music-making, listen to the coda and the gloriously articulated long string recitative that underpins it. The finale, too, is fairly gripping, though there is a brief tired patch midway.

The Festival Hall's fierce acoustic suits the performance well and the engineering is spectacular for its day. Barbirolli was mortally ill when this concert took place. He died just 10 weeks later. 'This might be the old man's last, so let's make it a good one,' the players were saying at the time. By all accounts, Karajan's last live Bruckner Eighth was a lofty, out-of-life experience. Barbirolli's is the very opposite, a case of 'Do not go gentle into that good night/Rage, rage against the dying of the light.' It is a one-off, eloquent beyond measure: the boldest, bravest Bruckner Eighth on record.

Symphony No 8 (ed Nowak)
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Carlo Maria Giulini
DG Masters ② 445 529-2GMA2 (88 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1984 ●●

Giulini's performance of the Eighth can confidently be claimed as also being among one of the great Bruckner recordings of the age. It is an immensely long-breathed performance, yet it is of a piece with itself and the music it serves. It is a reading that is suffused from start to finish with its own immutable logic, cast and voiced, you might say, like a great tenor bell. The playing of the Vienna Philharmonic is similarly whole: luminous as though lit from within, immensely strong, yet flawless in every aspect of tone and touch. You might argue that Giulini's case is helped by his use of the tidied Nowak text; that Karajan, in his last and greatest recording, goes one stage further by conjuring from the fuller Haas edition a performance of even greater grandeur and sweep. But the two are not in contention. Both are miracles sufficient unto themselves; the Karajan a shade earthier, perhaps, a shade rougher-hewn than the Giulini which glows, in this magnificent transfer, like Carrara marble lit by the evening sun.

Symphony No 8 in C minor (ed Haas)
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Günter Wand
RCA Red Seal ② 74321 82866-2 Ⓕ
(87 minutes: DDD)
Recorded live in 2001 ●●

Few readings have been more assiduously toured or generally acclaimed than Wand's Bruckner Eighth yet Wand himself struggled to better on record the exact and far-seeing account of the symphony he made with the Cologne RSO in 1979. In January 2001 he harnessed the Berlin Bruckner sound to his own particular ends, a potentially Sisyphean task for a man then nearing his 90th birthday.

And the rewards are here. This Eighth is exceptionally fine. When in the Scherzo you sense that the mountains themselves are beginning to dance, you know you are onto a good thing; on this occasion, Olympus itself seems to have caught the terpsichorean bug. Not that anything is exaggerated or overblown. Wand knows where each peak is and how best to approach it. His reading is broader than it was 20 years ago, yet nowhere is there any sense of unwanted stasis. Wand draws from the orchestra, the brass and strings in particular, sound of great power and transparency which the engineers have translated in a recording of uncommon reach and splendour. The three recordings by the Vienna Philharmonic (surely the Bruckner orchestra) are all incomparable in their way: the 1984 Giulini (closest to Wand IV but with greater spiritual rigour in the Adagio) and the 1989 Karajan (closest to Wand I in its plain-spoken mastery of the whole). Suffice it to say, this is a grand and worthy memento for the tens of thousands who heard Wand conduct the symphony in the concert hall.

Symphony No 9

Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Daniel Barenboim
Teldec 9031-72140-2 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1990 ●

This is an outstanding version of Bruckner's Ninth Symphony – and no surprise, given Barenboim's evident sympathy for the work in concert performances over the past three decades. Like Karajan's reading on DG, it is essentially a 'central' account of the score that attempts neither extreme breadth of utterance nor sharp-edged drama. Rather it is a reading that combines long lines, flowing but astutely nuanced, and sonorities that are full-bodied yet always finely balanced. The outer movements have great rhetorical and emotional power; the Scherzo is thunderous and glinting by turns. The Adagio begins very slowly but, for once, Barenboim gets away with it, the movement growing organically rather than remaining still-born near the start. This is a live performance and, as you would expect, it is superbly executed, the playing every bit as fine as it is on the Karajan recording. But even that doesn't compete with the natural splendours of the Teldec. This is superb Bruckner sound, spacious and clear, with strings, woodwind and brass at once unerringly 'placed' and finely matched. Given good engineering and the kind of astute playing we have from Barenboim and the Berliners, the Philharmonie is far from being the acoustic lemon it is sometimes said to be. This is currently a front-runner for this symphony.

Symphony No 9
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Carlo Maria Giulini
DG 427 345-2GH (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1988 ●

Giulini's Ninth is an idiosyncratic reading – nearly seven minutes longer than Karajan's – but it has about it a kind of immutable breadth and boldness of utterance that is not to be gainsaid. Despite the slowness, there is very much the sense of his being the master of his own brief. As a concept it is quite different from the musically dynamic readings of others. In the first movement's main Gesangsperiode it can seem dangerously broad with the Vienna strings rather tensely following the contours of Giulini's protracted beat. Here the wary score-watcher may notice some unevenness in ensemble though, that said, this is a reading which should be patiently heard rather than proof-read. The Scherzo is very effective, with drive and dynamism. After that, the orchestra is at its finest in the concluding Adagio, not only the Viennese horns, but the entire ensemble in the difficult broad transitions and terrifying C sharp minor climax. The recording is magnificent.

Symphony No 9
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
DG Galleria 429 904-2GGA (62 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1976 ●●

Karajan's 1976 recording has long been something of a classic, capturing the conductor and the Berlin Philharmonic on top form. From the opening of the titanic first movement to the final grinding dissonance of the lofty Adagio Karajan's control of phrase lengths, tempo and rhythmic swing are gloriously apparent. This beautifully recorded performance seems refreshingly urgent, cohesive and properly threatening. Exceptionally vivid, it was sometimes difficult to tame on LP, but the CD version gives unalloyed pleasure.

Symphony No 9
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Günter Wand
RCA Red Seal 74321 63244-2 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live 1995-97 ●

Symphony No 9. String Quintet in F – Adagio (arr Stadlmair)
Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchestra / Herbert Blomstedt
Decca 458 964-2DH (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995-97

Symphony No 9
Royal Scottish National Orchestra / Georg Tintner
Naxos 8 554268 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1997

On this occasion, it is the octogenarians who have it. Blomstedt's account of the Ninth is clear and methodical in its approach but there never seems to be a great deal behind the notes. (In the outer movements, at least: the Scherzo is fine.) Nor is the Leipzig playing all one might hope for in terms of weight of tone or precision of intonation. In the titanic string passage in the first movement (bar 333ff) Blomstedt's Leipzig strings are all but swamped by the brass. Not so the SNO strings under Tintner, though neither orchestra at this point is any real match for Wand's BPO. Decca's Leipzig recording seems clean enough, though the timpani are not always audible (piano registers as pianissimo, pianissimo barely registers at all). The best thing on the Decca is a sensitive and lyrical account of the sublime Adagio from Bruckner's String Quintet. Tintner's account of the symphony, though, is very fine, a disc to be purchased with confidence by those who have been investing in this (generally) excellent budget-price series. His account of the Scherzo and Trio is as quick and glintingly malevolent as Horenstein's on his famous old 1954 Vox recording (nla), his reading of the outer movements logical yet searching, too. There is, for example, nothing maudlin or long-drawn about his treatment of the final Adagio, yet the sense of troubled nobility of utterance is everywhere there, right through to the slightly tremulous quality of the horns' long-held final chord.

In the Scherzo, Wand is slower than Tintner or Blomstedt; this works perfectly well in context, though, the Trio is, by any reckoning, disappointingly flaccid. This, however, is the only flaw in a performance that is otherwise remarkably similar to Tintner's in its sense of the work's mingled spirituality and drama but played by the Berliners with a power, spontaneity and depth of tone that neither of the rival orchestras can quite match. This is not to say that the Berliners' playing is inch-perfect. It isn't. What transforms their performance, lifting it on to the very highest level, is that special visceral quality which has long been bedded deep in the orchestra's collective unconscious. Karajan used to talk of the players taking wing and shifting direction 'like a flock of birds'. A great conductor will allow this to happen without in any sense relinquishing his grasp of the larger argument. Wand's is just such a performance, marvellously directed but with moments of sublime frenzy and sublime quiet.

So powerful a performance could easily produce a slightly cluttered recording. In fact, the RCA recording is first-rate, the best of the three. It is rich and immediate, yet marginally clearer in the depiction of those troublesome timpani entries than the otherwise excellent Naxos. This is Wand's third recording of the Ninth. It surpasses his own earlier Cologne and live North German RSO performances, though it does not supersede all else that has gone before. However, it will no doubt be avidly collected by his fans.

Additional recommendation
Symphony No 9 🏵
Saarbrücken Radio Symphony Orchestra / Skrowaczewski
Arte Nova Classics 74321 80781-2 (61 minutes: DDD: 9/01) Ⓢ

A very closely controlled performance. Skrowaczewski has taken enormous care over the preparation of the performance and the results tell in orchestral playing of a quality and articulacy that few ensembles could rival. The immediate competition at this price is Tintner on Naxos – this is better.

String Quintet in F

String Quintet in F. Intermezzo in D minor. Rondo in C minor. String Quartet in C minor 🅿
L'Archibudelli (Vera Beths, Lisa Rautenberg vns Jürgen Kussmaul, Guus Jeukendrup vas Anner Bylsma vc)
Sony Classical Vivarte SK66251 Ⓕ
(76 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1994

'Bruckner is long, he takes time,' remarked Anner Bylsma in a Gramophone interview in March 1995; not exactly controversial, but it is important in understanding his, and his ensemble's, approach to the Quintet. The first movement in particular is more spacious than any other version. But there is more to it than tempo. What matters here is the subtlety of phrasing and fineness of the shading, giving vitality and inner intensity to patterns that can easily sound repetitive, especially at this speed. Much of the Quintet is marked p, pp or ppp; L'Archibudelli shows how magically suggestive so many of the quiet passages can be and how important it is to respect those dynamic gradings. They also make the work as a whole sound as unified and sublimely purposeful as the best of the symphonies. As for coupling: the 22-minute student Quartet, with its hints of Mendelssohn and rather more obvious debt to Haydn, is beautifully played, and there is more than one pre-echo of greater things to come. The spaciousness of the Sony sound suits the Quintet especially well, the more obviously 'chamber' textures of the Quartet perhaps less so.

Masses

No 1 in D minor; No 2 in E minor; No 3 in F minor

Masses – Nos 1[a], 2 and 3[ba]
Edith Mathis, [b]Maria Stader sops [a]Marga Schiml, [b]Claudia Hellmann mezzos [a]Wiesław Ochman, [b]Ernst Haefliger tens [a]Karl Ridderbusch, [b]Kim Borg basses Bavarian Radio Chorus and Symphony Orchestra / Eugen Jochum
DG ② The Originals 447 409-2GOR2
(148 minutes: ADD). Text and translation included Ⓜ
Recorded [a]1963, [b]1971 and [c]1972 ●●

Like Bruckner, Eugen Jochum came from a devout Catholic family and began his musical life as a church organist. He would have known the Mass texts more or less inside out, which explains why his readings focus not on the sung parts – which, for the most part, present the text in a relatively foursquare fashion – but on the orchestral writing which, given the gloriously full-bodied playing of the Bavarian orchestra, so lusciously illuminates familiar words. He approaches the Masses with many of the same ideas he so eloquently propounds in his recordings of the symphonies and the music unfolds with a measured, almost relaxed pace which creates a sense of vast spaciousness. This can have its drawbacks: one is so entranced by the beautifully moulded orchestral introduction to the Benedictus from the D minor Mass that the entry of a rather full-throated Marga Schiml comes as a rude interruption. DG's transfers are extraordinarily good – they really seem to have produced a sound which combines the warmth of the original LP with the clarity of detail we expect from CD.

Mass No 1 in D minor[a]. Ave Maria in F. Tota pulchra es[b]. Locus iste. Os justi. Christus factus est
[a]Luba Orgonasova sop [a]Bernarda Fink contr [a]Christoph Prégardien, [b]Julian Podger tens [a]Elke Wilm Schulte bass [b]Ian Watson org Monteverdi Choir; [a]Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir John Eliot Gardiner
DG 459 674-2GH (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
[a]Recorded live in 1996 ●

That Sir John Eliot Gardiner's Vienna Festival performance is going to be a cooler, quicker reading than his rival Eugen Jochum's is evident from the opening phrase of the Kyrie where the VPO strings are not allowed to respond to Bruckner's instruction ausdrucksvoll ('expressive') with the kind of 'from the heart, to the heart' intensity Jochum asks of his Bavarian players. The principal characteristics of Gardiner's reading are textural clarity, a typically rigorous way with rhythm and dynamics, and the superbly drilled singing of the Monteverdi Choir. Since the D minor Mass is an intensely dramatic work this is not inappropriate, though there isn't much warmth or 'spirituality' in these accounts of the Kyrie or the Gloria. In the Credo Bruckner excoriates sense with his bold and original setting, and it is here that Gardiner's performance comes into its own, the sheer intensity of the playing and singing pitching it into a new dimension. From there, the performance never really looks back. The Sanctus is grand and exciting and the Benedictus beautifully directed at a flowing moderato which keeps sentimentality, though not sentiment, at bay.

Gardiner's performance is efficiently balanced and recorded, though less immediate-sounding than the grand and golden-toned Jochum.

All in all Gardiner's version is superior to Matthew Best (on Hyperion) without, in the final analysis, matching the power and eloquence of the Jochum (DG, in his two-CD set of all three Masses). There is, however, a further 25 minutes of music on Gardiner's disc: five Bruckner motets in a series of performances which border on perfection. The music is austere, beautiful, exquisitely crafted, yet amazingly powerful.

Mass No 3. Psalm 150 in C
Juliet Booth sop Jean Rigby mez John Mark Ainsley ten Gwynne Howell bass Corydon Singers and Orchestra / Matthew Best
Hyperion CDA66599 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1992

The F minor Mass can certainly be regarded as being among the finest music Bruckner ever created. The intensity of religious feeling is heightened rather than diminished by the sumptuous orchestral support, and the soaring melodies and opulent harmonies are somehow purified and enriched by the devotional character of these familiar texts. Matthew Best's performance, by understating the music's abundant richness, gives tremendous point to the inner conviction of Bruckner's faith. His orchestra, sounding as if it has been playing this music all its days, plays with commendable discretion, balancing admirably with a relatively small choral body. As with everything the Corydon Singers and Best turn their hands to, it is an impeccable performance, infused with real artistry and sensitive musicianship. Enhanced by the glorious solo voices from a high-powered team this is a CD of rare depth and conviction.

Mass No 3 (ed Nowak). Te Deum
Jane Eaglen sop Birgit Remmert contr Deon van der Walt ten Alfred Muff bass Linz Mozart Choir; London Philharmonic Orchestra / Franz Welser-Möst
EMI 556168-2 (79 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1995 Ⓕ ●

Welser-Möst's quartet of soloists, for all their manifest strengths, give the impression of trying a little too hard for their own good. Yet the sheer, almost operatic, spectacle of Welser-Möst's riveting performance of the Mass should not be missed. Raw excitement on an almost primeval level sets the scene for the exhilarating Te Deum. Here again Welser-Möst goes at it with all guns blazing. Joakim Svenhedren treats us to a ravishing solo violin obbligato in the 'Aeterna fac' but this is only the briefest of respites in a performance which sweeps all before it in a consuming whirlwind of energy. Best and the Corydons find a greater depth to this music than Welser-Möst and his team. But if it's sheer, unbridled excitement you want nothing beats this.

Te Deum

Bruckner Te Deum 🄷
Verdi Messa da Requiem
Leontyne Price, Leonie Rysanek sops Hilde Rössl-Majdan, Christa Ludwig mezzos Fritz Wunderlich, Giuseppe Zampieri tens Walter Berry bass-bar Cesare Siepi bass Vienna Singverein; Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Karajan
EMI Salzburg Festival Edition mono ②
566880-2 (107 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded live in 1960 and 1958

Karajan recorded these works more than once in the studio, in better sound, yet these live recordings made at Salzburg have their own validity in the vast Karajan discography because they catch performances undoctored in any way by the conductor or others, and recorded, obviously, at a single stretch. The 1960 Bruckner was recorded in the new Festspielhaus, and is a performance of breadth and conviction, adorned by the singing of Leontyne Price and the youthful Fritz Wunderlich. His Vienna forces are on tremendous form, alive to the nuances Karajan wants us to hear and to his overview of the work's structure. The sound in the Bruckner is very good, albeit mono.

The Verdi was recorded in the Felsenreitschule. In spite of Karajan's many better-recorded versions, we recommend this one – it's a more immediate, more spontaneous experience than those recorded in the studio (the 1967 film done at La Scala apart). It is true there are a few noises off, including one incident that sounds like a member of the audience falling off their perch, and some questionable intonation among the soloists, but these are worth tolerating for Karajan's visionary reading, one also strong on orchestral detail. Heading the solo team is Rysanek, her only recording of this piece. After a tentative start she soon finds her most responsive form, with the arching phrases of 'Salva me' finely taken, a beautifully floated entry at 'Huic ergo' and an even more ethereal one at 'Sed' in the 'Domine Jesu Christe' movement. Ludwig is as ever strength personified in the mezzo solos. Zampieri sings with vibrant tone and great feeling, although his dynamic range is limited. Siepi is his firm sympathetic self on the bass line.

Ignaz Brüll

Austrian 1846-1907

GROVE Brüll was a close friend of Brahms, for and with whom he often played. Brüll wrote chamber and orchestral music, many songs and 10 operas, of which Das goldene Kreuz (1875) was his greatest success.

Piano Concertos

Piano Concertos – No 1 in F, Op 10; No 2 in C, Op 24. Andante and Allegro, Op 88
Martin Roscoe pf BBC Scottish Symphony Orchestra / Martyn Brabbins
Hyperion CDA67069 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●

Ignaz Brüll is remembered today for two things: first his hugely successful opera Das goldene Kreuz, and secondly, for being a member of Brahms's circle in Vienna. His association with Brahms has to some extent militated against an independent evaluation of his work, something this recording should go some way towards redressing. Brüll was an early developer (the booklet contains a photograph of him aged 24 with a six-inch beard!) and his two piano concertos are youthful works. The first was written when he was just 14, and it shows an incredible fertility of ideas and maturity of formal and orchestral handling. The first movement is bold and passionate, and the finale is witty and brilliant, but it is the powerful central Andante that most impresses.

The Second Concerto, written when Brüll was 22, is a more accomplished work, with a stronger melodic vein and more varied and imaginative orchestral writing. The Andante and Allegro, Op 88 (1902), is a more mature work, the lyrical first section (based on an earlier unpublished song) offset by a sparkling finale. The performances are exemplary, full of warmth and character from soloist and orchestra. Roscoe's muscularity and authoritative firmness of style are complemented by his delicacy and range of colour. And the BBC Scottish Symphony Orchestra offers tonal refinement and some lovely woodwind playing. All this is helped by the full and clean recorded sound – the clarity, balance and tonal blending are magnificent.

Gavin Bryars

British 1943

GROVE Bryars studied philosophy at Sheffield University and music privately; in the 1960s he played in jazz groups and since 1970 he has lectured at Leicester Polytechnic. A leading experimental composer, influenced by Cage and Satie, he first wrote for indeterminate forces (The Sinking of the Titanic, 1969), but more recently his music has been influenced by theories of literature; it is often repetitive and witty. His opera Medea was staged in 1984.

Orchestral Works

'A Portrait'
Cello Concerto (Farewell to Philosophy)[a]. One Last Bar, Then Joe Can Sing[b]. Les Fiancailles[c]. Jesus' Blood Never Failed Me Yet[d] – single version; single version remix. The Green Ray[e]. Adnan Songbook[f]. The Sinking of the Titanic – Titanic Lament[g]. The North Shore[h]
[f]Valdine Anderson sop [d]Tom Waits sngr [e]John Harle sax [a]Julian Lloyd Webber vc [b]Nexus (Bob Becker, Bill Cahn, Robin Engleman, Russell Hartenberger, John Wyre perc); [cdfgh]Gavin Bryars Ensemble / [f]Dave Smith, [h]Roger Heaton; [a]English Chamber Orchestra / James Judd; [e]Bournemouth Sinfonietta / Ivor Bolton
Philips ② 473 296-2 (150 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
From Point Music [ab]454 126-2PTH (11/96), [ch]456 514-2PTH (11/97), [d]438 823-2PTH (10/93), [f]462 511-2PTH (2/99), [g]446 061-2PTH (2/95), [e]Argo 433 847-2PTH (7/92)

Play a random three-minute sequence from any one of these CDs and the composer's identity immediately establishes itself. Gavin Bryars at 60 is the same mellow, reflective and quietly innovative composer who years ago unfolded his own heart-rending revision of Jesus' blood never failed me yet. Philips's 'Portrait' includes both a 'single' and a 'single re-mix' condensation of the same piece, the first opening with the singing of that by-now legendary homeless senior citizen, so affecting in his vocal frailty. Both versions add the grainy voice of Tom Waits (which wasn't on the original version) and yet neither can match the cumulatively powerful impact of the expansive full work. To be honest, Jesus' blood isn't really 'single' material. It needs time to make its point, and time is the very quality that other music on these discs thrives on; the exception is another 'single', the 'Titanic Lament', a revision of music from The Sinking of the Titanic (1969, recorded 1994). It's aurally striking though less imposing than the parent work. CBC offers the most recent pieces, the majority hovering around the quarter-of-an-hour mark and all involving dedicated Canadian performers from Bryars' self-acknowledged second home. We're initially offered three sensitively scored songs for Holly Cole, the first opening Rheingold-style and featuring Bryars's own instrument, the double bass. Bryars is the soloist in By the Vaar, composed in 1987 for the jazz bass player Charlie Haden, pizzicato for the duration and with the bass balanced fairly close to the mikes. Here, Bryars's haunting but somewhat somnolent style melds with elements of jazz.

The Porazzi Fragment for strings toys with Wagner's last musical thoughts, quoting them much as Richard Strauss had done with Beethoven's Eroica towards the end of his similarly string-based Metamorphosen. The Violin Concerto, like the Cello Concerto included on the Philips package; is predominantly lyrical and has the soloist weave an almost continuous line. Quotes from Vivaldi's Four Seasons allude to the Primavera Chamber Orchestra, for whom the work was composed, and the subtitle, The Bulls of Bashan, to an ancient piece of musical reportage (check out the booklet for the full facts).

Bryars is a great one for punning, and a good many of his titles prove the point. As to his music, time and again you notice the same stylistic fingerprints: the slow tempi, Parsifal-like string arpeggios (the sort Wagner used in his operatic Prelude), rumbling low percussion (more often than not with tam-tam), chromatic harmonic twists and a musical climate where daylight invariably gives way to dusk. The sun rarely shines in the music of Bryars.

The Philips Collection opens with the Cello Concerto that Bryars composed for Julian Lloyd Webber, named Farewell to Philosophy in verbal tribute to two popular Haydn symphonies: Lloyd Webber had wanted something that he could programme alongside the Haydn cello concertos. Again, low percussion is a prominent feature (aided by the harp), and there's imaginative use of woodwind.

The 'one last bar' of the all-percussion One Last Bar, Then Joe Can Sing harks back to the closing bar from the first part of Bryars's opera Medea, a prompt for a highly tactile, melancholy variety of near-minimalism, the second section all tuned percussion, hissing cymbals and teeth-filing harmonics (beware your fillings). Les Fiancailles was written for performance in Vienna. It opens to a sequence of repeated piano chords with strings sailing above and around them. There's a veiled suggestion of Verklärte Nacht somewhere in the mix, whereas the evocative centre of The Green Ray (a momentary shaft of maritime light) is reminiscent of Rautavaara in 'angel' mode. Here, saxophonist John Harle is on marvellous form.

Particularly enjoyable are the eloquent songs on texts by Etel Adnan, sensually sung by Valdine Anderson, the sixth and eighth of them graced by memorably poetic instrumental postludes. The North Shore suggests vast unpeopled spaces, rather as Arvo Pärt does in his Tabula Rasa.

Like everything else on the set, this is music as a mood-setter, skilfully written, but, as Bryars himself has suggested, neither more nor less than 'another way of making music… touching the lives and feelings of ordinary people' – meaning non-specialists and non-academics, people who crave a musical backdrop for their deeper musings, but don't necessarily want to get involved in a gritty confrontation with musical 'argument'. That hints at a common misconception, not only about Bryars but about Adams, Riley, some Reich, some Turnage, Volans, and many others like them: the idea that uncomplicated new music must somehow be lacking in profundity. Can't it also be true that music such as this can act as a sympathetic midwife for the rebirth of one's deeper, more meditative self? That's certainly how this reviewer hears it.

String Quartets

String Quartets – No 1, 'Between the National and the Bristol'; No 2; No 3
Lyric Quartet (Jonathan Carney, Edmund Coxon vns Nick Barr va David Daniels vc)
Black Box BBM1079 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

A quiet strain of melancholy passes through all three of Gavin Bryars' string quartets, though the Third and latest – which was commissioned by, and is dedicated to, the Lyric Quartet – has a bardic feel to it that is quite unlike the others. Part of the reason lies in the use of pure intervals which in turn reflects a passing preoccupation with the world of early music.

Bryars' original plan for the First Quartet had been to create a sort of compositional séance where memories of such past masters as Ysaÿe, Hindemith and Schoenberg would be conjured musically. In the event it is the Second Quartet that is more suggestive of musical side references: to John Adams of Shaker Loops and the Schoenberg of Verklärte Nacht, though these are probably just coincidental similarities.

All that needs to be said about the music Bryars says himself in the booklet-note, much as he did for the Balanescu Quartet's Argo CD of the first two quartets. There the coupling is Die letzten Tage for two violins but this disc will hold the greater appeal for those building their quartet repertoire on CD. Comparing the two versions finds the colour-conscious Balanescu employing a subtler range of nuance while the Lyric press for greater emphases and rather more in the way of inner voice detail. Either disc will probably find you returning to this haunting, though by no means immobile, music again and again.

Adnan Songbook

Adnan Songbook. Cadman Requiem. Wonderlawn – Epilogue

Valdine Anderson sop The Hilliard Ensemble; Fretwork; Gavin Bryars Ensemble / Dave Smith
Point Music 462 511-2 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1997

When Bryars' music is as well performed and recorded as on this disc, it achieves a power and inevitability that is rare in new music. The voice seems to suit Gavin Bryars's compositional approach. The very presence of a singer accords a subjective intensity that nicely complements the unwavering, dry-eyed clarity of Bryars's instrumental writing. Bryars says he attempts to write vocal material that will highlight the unique character of each singer's voice and that all the vocal works are being performed on this recording by the specific singers he had in mind. His writing for The Hilliard Ensemble does reconstitute the characteristic four-part sound, but they are also given every opportunity to be appreciated as soloists.

In composing the Adnan Songbook for the young British soprano Valdine Anderson, Bryars could almost have used Richard Strauss as a model, so expressive is his treatment of her highest tessitura. On the other hand, the blunt, even artless handling of the text and instrumental accompaniment is typical of Bryars. It is this oblique mixture of understatement and expressive warmth that makes the work so original. Cadman Requiem is also very impressive. Dedicated to the sound engineer Bill Cadman, who died in the Lockerbie aircrash in 1988, the piece was recorded with its two ensembles, Fretwork and The Hilliard Ensemble, facing each other. The resulting rich blend of timbres, well captured by the recording, makes for arresting listening. Overall, a hauntingly beautiful album that provides compelling evidence of the recent resurgence in Bryars's work.

Alan Bush

British b1900

Bush studied at the Royal Academy of Music GROVE and privately with John Ireland, going on to study musicology and philosophy at Berlin University. In 1925 he began teaching at the RAM and in 1936, already a committed communist, founded the Workers' Music Association. His earlier works (Dialectic for string quartet, 1929; First Symphony in C, 1940) are progressive, using his own 'thematic' method, in which each note must be thematically significant. After the war he simplified his style and began a series of operas expressing his political beliefs: Wat Tyler (1953), Men of Blackmoor (1960), The Sugar Reapers (1966) and Joe Hill (1970), all produced in East Germany. He has also composed much choral, chamber and solo vocal music.

Violin Concerto

Violin Concerto, Op 32^{a}. Dialectic, Op 15^{b}
Six Short Pieces, Op 99^{c}

^{a}Manoug Parikian vn ^{c}Alan Bush pf
^{b}Medici Quartet (Paul Robertson, David Matthews vns Ivo-Jan van der Werff va Anthony Lewis vc); ^{a}BBC Symphony Orchestra / Norman Del Mar
Claudio Ⓕ CB51512 (52 minutes: DDD)
Recorded in ^{a}1983, ^{b}1984, ^{c}1984 ●

Alan Bush – pupil of John Ireland, Professor of Composition at the Royal Academy of Music for half a century – was undoubtedly one of the major musical figures of British music in the 1920s, '30s and '40s. More importantly, in his earlier works he developed a promising 'thematic' variation of serialism, which retained a tonal base, convincingly and appealingly demonstrated here. Yet little of his output has been recorded, and performances in England have been, and are still, very rare indeed. However his music was regularly performed (including the four operas!) in the 1950s and '60s in Soviet Russia and East Germany, and was apparently much admired by Shostakovich.

The reason is simple. Bush joined the British Communist Party in 1935 and remained a devotee of the Soviet political mirage throughout his life, even moderating his sinewy early lyricism into a more easily communicative style in 1948, loyally following the Soviet directive. In England his firm political stance alienated many in positions of power, and his works in consequence went unheard.

Now, at last, time begins to make amends, and although the (splendid) recordings on this disc date from the 1980s, they are of the very highest quality. This CD includes two key works in Bush's output: the riveting Dialectic for string quartet of 1929, and the vividly attractive and much mellower Violin Concerto of 1948. This marked the composer's change to a more directly communicative, rhapsodical lyricism, which balances the work's pulsing, rhythmic opening and its closely related dance-like finale. The solo writing has an attractive neo-Classical element also reflected in the orchestral string-writing, while the brass interjections in the opening movement remind one of British film music during its golden era. This is a concentrated work which invites the listener's immediate participation, especially in a performance so persuasively assured and sympathetic as Manoug Parikian's, admirably accompanied by the BBC Orchestra.

As for the Dialectic, it is so marvellously played that one longs to hear it live. Tersely argued, but brimming over with passionate lyricism, it reaches a fugal climax of thrusting intensity, one which even recalls Beethoven's Grosse Fuge. In short, this CD cannot be recommended too highly.

Chamber Works

Three Concert Studies, Op 31^{abd}. Two Easy Pieces^{ad}. Two Melodies, Op 47^{ac}. Sonatina, Op 88^{ac}. Concert Piece, Op 17^{ad}. Summer Valley, Op 125^{ad}

[a]Catherine Summerhayes pf Adam Summerhayes [b]vn/[c] va [d]Joseph Spooner vc
Meridian CDE84458 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002

The challengingly rhapsodic Concert Piece for cello and piano was written prophetically as war clouds were gathering in Europe. The music's angst expresses real despair, the harmony bleakly astringent. Yet there is a touching central cantilena of the utmost sadness before the malevolent closing section with its march rhythms builds to an urgent and uncompromising climax. One then turns to the balm of the Sonatina for viola with its pastoral atmosphere (the opening and close might almost be by Vaughan Williams) or the lovely, very English evocation of a Summer Valley (ravishingly played here). These three artists have obviously lived with this music and play very sympathetically indeed and with fine ensemble.

There is all the expressive power needed in Op 17, while the central 'Nocturne' of the Op 31 Concert-Studies for piano trio is haunting in its gentle atmospheric feeling, and the closing 'Alla Bulgaria' great fun. The two charming Easy Pieces for cello, and the pair for viola (both with piano) show Bush's disarming melodic gift.

In short, this CD combines excitement and real stimulation, lyrical strength and musical pleasure, in varying measure. Let John Amis, who wrote the booklet notes, have the final word. He tells us that 'Bush was a delightful man' who 'wrote music for head and heart, and many times managed to combine the two elements...these [works] are all masterly and endearing.'

Antoine Busnois French c1430-1492

GROVE Busnois was possibly a pupil of Ockeghem in Paris, he was a much-favoured singer in the chapel of Charles the Bold and then of his daughter, Mary of Burgundy. After her death in 1482 he became attached to the church of St Sauveur, Bruges. Two masses, a Credo, a Magnificat, eight motets, two hymns and 61 songs for three or four voices are attributed to him with reasonable certainty. His music typifies the Burgundian style in the third quarter of the 15th century and he occupies a central position in the development of music between Dufay and Josquin His works are characterized by triadic sonority, strong harmonic progressions, clear structure and extensive use of imitation. The chansons, for many of which he probably wrote the texts, are his most original works. Most are three-part rondeaux or bergerettes and some are based on popular melodies. Both his masses are four-voice cantus firmus structures and the motets, like the chansons, exploit a wide variety of contrapuntal technniques.
Sacred music: Missa 'L'homme armé '; Missa 'O crux lignum'; Credo; Magnificat; 8 motets; 2 hymns. Secular music: 30 rondeaux; 13 bergerettes; 18 chansons.

Missa L'homme armé

Busnois Anima mea liquefacta est. Missa L'homme armé. Gaude celestis domina[a] Domarto Missa Spiritus almus Pullois Flos de spina[a]
[a]Robin Tyson counterten
The Binchois Consort / Andrew Kirkman
Hyperion CDA67319 (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included ●●

Few works embody the spirit of an age as eloquently as the L'homme armé Mass of Antoine Busnois. Teeming with incident, it engages the listener from the off, but retains throughout a classical balance and poise. No other Mass of the mid-15th century survives in as many sources, and no other setting of the famous tune was as influential.

The Binchois Consort improves on Pro Cantione Antiqua's magnificent 1976 recording in several ways. Kirkman takes an a cappella approach instead of using a chamber organ for colla parte voice-doubling as PCA do. Some courageously close miking captures the slightly rough-edged grain of these voices; by allowing an element of risk into the performance, the singers exhilaratingly replicate the balance of finely wrought detail and clarity of design that characterises the work itself. He also slows the basic tempo down just a notch: this dramatises one of the Mass's most sublime moments, when the inverted cantus firmus is momentarily exposed, the basses holding a low F for several seconds with a lone, static voice for company. One of the Mass's high-points, it ranks among the supreme inspirations of the 15th century. The Binchois Consort has never sounded more assured.

The remaining motets are nicely varied, too. Anima mea liquefacta est is surprisingly rhapsodic by Busnois' standards. Gaude celestis domina has only recently been identified as his work, but his stamp is unmistakeable. Finally, Pullois' Flos de spina is given a similarly involving rendition. This is musicianship of a very high order, transcending specialisms.

Missa, 'O crux lignum'

Missa, 'O crux lignum'. Anthoni usque limina. In hydraulis. Magnificat sexti toni.
Regina coeli
Kapel van de Lage Landen / Harry van der Kamp
Emergo Classics EC3954-2 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded c1994

Busnois left only two securely ascribed Masses; the one on L'homme armé is easily the more famous, but this one, based on part of the sequence Victimae Paschali, is equally accomplished on a technical level, and stylistically very close to it. As to the motets that accompany it here, they are all top-drawer Busnois, and together with the Mass they paint a rounded, appealing portrait of that fastidiously elegant composer. Kapel van de Lage Landen uses an all-male, one-to-a-part approach, which sounds extremely well here, and the resulting performances – the Mass especially – give considerable enjoyment. A more interventionist producer would no doubt have sorted out most of the problems – occasional lack of rhythmic cohesion and melodic shape – but the sound-quality produced by these Flemish musicians (led by the incomparable Harry van der Kamp) lends the recording real character. Do these singers sound anything like their forebears at Charles the Bold's chapel? One could be seduced into thinking so, and ultimately the illusion wins out.

Ferruccio Busoni

Italian/German 1866-1924

GROVE Born to musician parents, an Italian father and a German mother, Busoni appeared from the age of eight as a pianist. In 1876 the family settled in Graz, where he had lessons with Wilhelm Mayer and produced his first published works. He then moved to Vienna, where he came to know Goldmark and Brahms, to Leipzig and eventually Berlin in 1894. Until he was 40 his output consisted mostly of piano and chamber music, including arrangements of Bach (these were eventually published in seven volumes). But in 1902 he began conducting concerts of modern music, including works by Debussy, Bartók, Sibelius and himself, and his music began to open itself to a wider range of influence. He adopted an aesthetic of 'junge Klassizität', by which he intended a return to the clarity and purely musical motivation of Bach and Mozart; yet such works as his Elegien (1907), the virtuoso Fantasia contrappuntistica (1910) and the Second Sonatina (1912), all for piano, show his awareness of the latest developments including Schoenberg's most recent music, along with his reverence of the past. His Sketch of a new Aesthetic of Music (1907) looks forward with enthusiasm to the use of microtones and electronic means.

The unresolved conflicts in his musical mind between futurism and classical recovery, Italian vocality and German substance, Lisztian flamboyance and Mozartian calm all inform his larger works, which include a Piano Concerto with choral finale (1904), several works on American Indian themes and operas – the E.T.A. Hoffmann fantasy Die Brautwahl (1912), a commedia dell'arte double bill of Arlecchino and Turandot (1917) and the unfinished Doktor Faust (1924), where the protagonist's search after knowledge and experience is finally assuaged when he gives birth to a new future.

Orchestral Works

Turandot – concert suite, Op 41. Sarabande und Cortège: Zwei Studien zu Doktor Faust, Op 51. Berceuse élégiaque, Op 42
Hong Kong Philharmonic Orchestra / Samuel Wong
Naxos 8 555373 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 2001

Of the six works recorded here two are essential for anyone interested in Busoni: the Berceuse élégiaque and the Sarabande und Cortège. Samuel Wong, the recently appointed music director of the Hong Kong Philharmonic, is on this reading a very interesting artist. He takes the Berceuse élégiaque, for example, at a very slow tempo and indeed its pace suggests mournful sighing rather than the rocking of a cradle. The extraordinary end of the piece, string chords with the dark glow of gong strokes, is quite magical, partly because it is so sombrely slow. In the Cortège, also a touch slow, he misses something of Busoni's mercurial quality but imparts a lovely nobility to its string counter-subject.

Every one of the Turandot suite's movements is entertaining, two are Busoni at his most imaginative (the strikingly malign fourth and the sinister seventh) and they are all brilliantly and characterfully played. Wong's intriguing musicality and Naxos's bargain price make this a worthwhile issue.

Piano Concerto, K247

Marc-André Hamelin pf
Men's Voices of the City of Birmingham Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Mark Elder
Hyperion CDA67143 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 OO

Busoni's Piano Concerto has never become a repertoire piece. It fits awkwardly into a concert programme, due to its length and its choral finale, and the extreme difficulty of its solo writing cannot quite disguise the fact that it's really more of a symphony with an elaborate piano part than a real concerto. This new recording might just change all that, for like no other performance (not even Garrick Ohlsson's stunning account on Telarc) it proves what a richly enjoyable piece it is. Without in the least understating the grandeur of the central movement (or its Faustian pointers to Busoni's later style), it finds humour not only of the gallows kind in the first Scherzo (even a touch of irony to its nostalgic centre), while the brilliant tarantella second Scherzo is often very funny indeed: Busoni celebrates his Italian ancestry, but at times bursts into helpless laughter at it as well. Hamelin obviously loves the work's opportunities for grand romantic pianism and barnstorming, and he has a fine ear for its stark boldness. Elder is splendidly eloquent, from the nobly Brahmsian introduction to the full-throatedly sung finale. Both are at their best in the central Pezzo Serioso, which is grand and grave, but alert to the presence of Chopin as well as Liszt. The recording is warm and spacious, the piano at times just a touch (but forgivably) close. This is a remarkable performance.

Additional recommendation
Piano Concerto, K247
Ogdon pf John Alldis Choir, RPO / Revenaugh
HMV Classics HMV5 73857-2 Ⓢ
(69 minutes: ADD: 9/00)

Ogdon's pioneering 1968 recording of this marathon work was among the very finest of his records. It's a hugely impressive interpretation and at this price a steal.

Die Brautwahl

Siegfried Vogel bass Voswinkel; Carola Höhn sop Albertine; Graham Clark ten Thusman; Vinson Cole ten Lehsen; Pär Lindskog ten Baron Bensch; Roman Trekel bar Leonhard; Günter von Kannen bar Manasse
Chorus of the Deutsche Staatsoper, Berlin; Staatskapelle Berlin / Daniel Barenboim
Teldec ② 3984-25250-2 (116 minutes: DDD)
Notes, text and translation included Ⓕ
Recorded live in November 1993 ●

Busoni's first mature opera occupied him for seven years (1905-11). He may not have been as natural a man of the theatre as Richard Strauss, but Die Brautwahl has plenty of fine music in it – at times foreshadowing the splendours of Doktor Faust. This 1992 Berlin production used a version made by Antony Beaumont, whose completion of Doktor Faust was a great success. As Beaumont explains in the booklet, we get only about two-thirds of the whole, and all aspects of the opera's subject-matter may not be ideally balanced. This 'fantastic comedy' is based on a story by E T A Hoffmann, with the climactic scene in which a bride is chosen (hence the title) leaning heavily on The Merchant of Venice. The action is set in Berlin, but there are echoes of Wagner's Nuremberg in the text and characterization. Musically, Busoni keeps his distance from Wagner, and the music is attractive, ranging widely in character.

This performance is a strong one, with a certain, untroublesome amount of stage noise. No doubt reflecting the staging, the recording occasionally recesses the singers, but the energy and command of Barenboim's conducting are never in doubt. The energy does not mean that anything is rushed, and the romantic episodes are warmly moulded, the scenes of fantasy properly attentive to matters of colour and texture. Roman Trekel, a warm yet dramatically resonant baritone, makes a strong impression as Leonhard. He is the perfect foil to Graham Clark, who tackles the role of Thusman with relish, and with considerable technical skill in music which demands lyrical sensitivity as well as comic agility.

Doktor Faust

Dietrich Henschel bar Doktor Faust; Markus Hollop bass Wagner, Master of Ceremonies; Kim Begley ten Mephistopheles; Torsten Kerl ten Duke of Parma; Eva Jenis sop Duchess of Parma; Detlef Roth bar Soldier; William Dazeley bar Natural Philosopher; Eberhard Lorenz ten Lieutenant; Frédéric Caton bass Theologian; Jérôme Varnier bass Jurist; Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau spkr Poet
Geneva Grand Theatre Chorus; Chorus and Orchestra of the Opéra National de Lyon / Kent Nagano
Erato ③ 3984-25501-2 (196 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Notes, text and translation included.
Recorded 1997-98 ●

This recording, not only provides the full, uncut text, as completed by Busoni's pupil Philipp Jarnach soon after the composer's death, but also offers as supplements Antony Beaumont's very different realisations of parts of the opera's later stages. So complete is this version, indeed, that it includes the spoken prologues and epilogues, with Fischer-Dieskau providing a poignant link to DG's heavily cut 1969 recording. Given that Beaumont worked from sketches and other information of which Jarnach was unaware (or chose to ignore), there can be no question as to which of the two is the more genuinely Busonian, and the extended closing scene in Beaumont's version has a persuasive gravity and sense of fulfilment quite different from Jarnach's more terse yet slightly melodramatic completion. Nevertheless, it will take a sensibility more refined than most not to be swept away by the sheer visceral power of Jarnach's rendering of the death of Faust.

Dietrich Henschel displays considerable style and stamina during his two monologues in the opera's final stages, and although his singing isn't entirely free of straining for effect, or of bluster, the character's tortured humanity is vividly conveyed. Kim Begley makes a considerable success of the other principal role, although, in an ideal world, Mephistopheles would manage more variety. But Begley tackles the many demanding aspects of the part with panache and, in the scintillating ballad, wit and menace are in perfect balance. Other parts are adequately taken, though articulation of the German text varies in clarity and accuracy.

This variability is one reason why the performance takes some time to take wing: another, more fundamental reason concerns the rather dry nature of the recording itself. At times, principal voices are backwardly placed, and even when they are not one suspects that the brilliance of the orchestral sound is being damped down in order to ensure their audibility. Nevertheless, Nagano's shaping of this extremely demanding score is neither inflexible nor inexpressive. Doktor Faust can at last be heard in a recording, that, in the end, reaches and reveals its essence.

George Butterworth British b1923

GROVE After study with Richard Hall at the Royal Manchester College of Music he worked as a trumpeter and freelance conductor. His music is conservative, influenced primarily by Sibelius and Elgar, and draws on the North Country for its inspiration; it includes four symphonies (1957, 1965, 1975, 1985).

Songs

Two English Idylls[a]. The Banks of Green Willow[b].
Bredon Hill and other songs[c].
A Shropshire Lad – Rhapsody[d]
Six Songs from A Shropshire Lad[e]
[ce]Benjamin Luxon bar [ce]David Willison pf
[abdf]ASMF / Sir Neville Marriner
Decca 468 802-2DM
(56 minutes: ADD/DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1976

George Butterworth's music creates a perfect, idealised image of pastoral England before World War I (in which the composer met his death). His lovely songs are indelibly associated with the poetry of AE Housman, notably A Shropshire Lad (though Butterworth himself lived in Oxfordshire), and although they have a simple folk inspiration, do not draw on actual folk tunes. Benjamin Luxon's performances are deeply felt and find the widest range of expression, always responsive to the words' meanings, never treating the songs just as charming miniatures.

Marriner's superbly recorded accounts of the wonderful orchestral evocations, which are folk-song based, is full of passionate yearning as well as delicacy of feeling. Is there any more magically haunting opening in English orchestral pastoralism than the rhapsody A Shropshire Lad?

Dietrich Buxtehude German c1637-1707

GROVE Buxtehude's first studies were under his father, who held posts as organist in Hälsingburg and Helsingor (Elsinore), as did Buxtehude himself between c1657 and 1668, when he became organist at the Marienkirche at Lübeck, one of the most important posts in north Germany; he was also appointed Werkmeister (general manager) of the church. Later that year he married Anna Margarethe Tunder, his predecessor's daughter. Besides his normal duties on Sundays and feast days, he reinstated the practice of giving Abendmusik concerts in the church on five Sunday afternoons each year. These events attracted much interest and drew JS Bach from Arnstadt in Advent 1705.

Surviving texts from the Abendmusik performances show that he composed a number of oratorio-like works, but none has survived. The bulk of his known sacred music consists of cantatas or sacred concertos, the latter often settings of psalm texts, consisting of contrasting sections in which each line of the text is treated with a new motif. He used a concertato style, for voices and continuo (sometimes with other instruments), in which the motifs are treated in dialogue in a manner related to the Venetian polychoral style; there are also arioso sections. Buxtehude wrote a number of chorale settings, commonly with the melody in the soprano but with instrumental accompaniment and interludes; in ensemble settings he used the chorale motet style, in the manner of a sacred concerto but with motifs from the chorale melody, and he also set chorales with the melody in one voice and instrumental counterpoints. His sacred arias are mostly in strophic or varied strophic form, with a fluent, sometimes Italianate melodic style. Some extended vocal works, akin to Bach's cantatas, combine movements in the sacred concerto style with others of the aria type.

Most of Buxtehude's instrumental music is for the organ: about half consists of freely composed music, often using a toccata-like section with several fugues and incorporating virtuoso passage-work, while half consists of chorale settings, some of the variation and fantasia types, but mostly highly unified settings of a single stanza of the chorale with a richly ornamented melody. He composed suites and other music for the harpsichord; his courantes are variations of the allemandes and the gigues are loosely fugal. French influence is noticeable. He also wrote several variation sets. The only works published in his lifetime were two collections each of seven sonatas, for violins, viola da gamba and harpsichord continuo (seven more sonatas survive in MS); they are closer to the German tradition of improvisatory viol playing than to the Corelli tradition, with movements in contrasting tempo and texture. They include ground bass movements and fugues, usually only in two parts as the viol part is not always independent of the bass. Especially in his sacred vocal works and his organ music, Buxtehude represents the climax of the 17th-century north German school, and he significantly influenced Bach.

Harpsichord Works

Harpsichord Works, Volumes 1-3 🅿
8 224116: Toccata in G, BuxWV165. Canzona in C, BuxWV166. Fugue in B flat, BuxWV176. Auf meinen lieben Gott, BuxWV179. Wie schön leuchtet der Morgenstern, BuxWV223. Canzonetta in A minor, BuxWV225. Suites – C, BuxWV226; D minor, BuxWV233. Aria in A minor, BuxWV249 Ⓕ

8 224117: Canzona in G, BuxWV170. Canzonetta in G, BuxWV171. Fugue in C, BuxWV174. Nun lob mein Seel' den Herren, BuxWV215. Suites – No 10 in E minor, BuxWV235; No 18 in G minor, BuxWV242. Courant zimble in A minor, BuxWV245. More Palatino, BuxWV247 🅿 Ⓕ

8 224118: Prelude and Fugue in G, BuxWV162. Canzonetta in D minor, BuxWV168. Suites – No 13 in F; BuxWV238; No 19 in A, BuxWV243. La capricciosa, BuxWV250 🅿
Lars Ulrik Mortensen hpd
Da Capo ③ 8 224116/7/8 Ⓕ
(Only available separately: 52, 53 and 54 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1998 ●

Trying to determine for which instrument – organ, harpsichord or clavichord – Buxtehude's keyboard works were intended is a difficult exercise, since in the 17th century they were largely interchangeable. Reasonably enough, Mortensen includes in his survey all but those works which demand pedals – and few of these pieces seem to call for the greater degree of sostenuto possible on the organ. In all three discs he uses a fine Ruckers-type instrument tuned in mean-tone temperament, and arranges his programmes effectively to illustrate the wide range of Buxtehude's art, though the contrapuntal facility that drew Bach to trudge 200 miles to hear him is everywhere apparent. On Volume 1 Buxtehude's influence is most conspicuous in the Toccata, whose dashing initial declamation and subsequent tremolos prefigure Bach's D major Toccata; then a series of extraordinary rising modulations leads to a long fugue. The popular Fugue in C (Vol 2) is a jolly gigue, worthy to stand beside Bach's Fugue à la gigue. Equally appealing to Bach must have been Buxtehude's inventiveness, illustrated on the second and third volumes by three sets of variations. More extensive than Sweelinck's set, the 12 on More Palatino (whose theme is majestically expounded) show a wide variety of moods and treatments; but the 32 on La capricciosa – a bergamesca dance whose melody will be recognised as one of the tunes quoted in the Quodlibet of the Goldberg Variations – is without doubt among the finest of pre-Bachian variation sets. It also calls for very considerable virtuosity – which Mortensen, in his clean-cut, well controlled playing supplies brilliantly. The recordings vividly capture Mortensen's strongly rhythmic and engaging playing. These are enthusiastically recommended discs, especially volume 3 for La capricciosa.

Membra Jesu nostri, BuxWV75

Membra Jesu nostri 🅿
The Sixteen; Symphony of Harmony and Invention / Harry Christophers
Linn Records CKD141 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included

Composed in 1680, this group of seven tiny cantatas – each meditating on a part of Christ's body (feet, knees, hands, side, breast, heart and face) – represents an extreme in formal compression. Each cantata has just six movements: an instrumental introduction, a choral setting of the relevant Biblical citation, three short solo arias, and a repeat of the chorus. Few of those movements last more than 90 seconds, and some are a lot shorter. But the real catch is that the solo arias are all on texts consisting of 80-syllable trochaic lines: Buxtehude sets the vast majority of them to four-bar phrases, which can lead to musical predictability. The first task of musicians is to counteract the numbing regularity of those phrases. They approach this by adopting a generally very smooth rhythmic style, benefiting much from the marvellous continuo group of Paul Nicholson (organ), Jane Coe (cello) and Elizabeth Kenny (theorbo): all three superbly resourceful in their range of colours and attacks, without ever interrupting the music's flow. Above this the violins of David Woodstock and Walter Reiter glow or sparkle as the music requires. In line with today's best practice, the choruses are taken just by the five excellent solo singers, led by Carolyn Sampson in luscious form.

A wonderfully moving account of Buxtehude's remarkable cycle of cantatas.

Sacred Cantatas

Sacred Cantatas 🅿
Fuga, BuxWV174. Ich habe Lust abzuscheiden, BuxWV47[abc]. Ich halte es dafür, BuxWV48[bc]. Jesu meine Freude, BuxWV60[abc]. Mein herz ist bereit, BuxWV73[cd]. Herr, wenn ich nur dich hab, BuxWV38[b]. Salve, Jesu, Patris gnate unigenite, BuxWV94[ab]. Jesu dulcis memoria, BuxWV56[ab]. Cantate Domino, BuxWV12[abc]
[a]Emma Kirkby, [b]Suzie LeBlanc sops
[c]Peter Harvey bass [d]Clare Salaman vn
Purcell Quartet (Catherine Mackintosh vn/va Catherine Weiss vn Richard Boothby bvio Robert Woolley org)
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0691 Ⓕ
(76 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included
Recorded c2002

Setting various German and Latin texts for solo voices, violins and continuo, these sacred cantatas are typical products of the late 17th century in their pragmatic approach to form.

Here are patchworks such as Jesu dulcis memoria and Salve, Jesu, Patris gnate unigenite; chorale or song variations such as Jesu, meine Freude; and others, like Ich halte es dafür and Ich habe Lust abzuscheiden, which combine the two. Cantate Domino is liltingly Italianate, Mein Herz ist bereit is an agile showpiece for solo bass, while Herr, wenn ich nur dich hab is a set of variations over a ground bass. The Purcell Quartet's essential string sound has always been sweet, airy and lucid, and it is interesting to hear how that has been transferred here from the instrumental sphere to the vocal. To this end the choice of singers is important, and on this occasion they could hardly have picked more shrewdly: Emma Kirkby and Suzie LeBlanc make an excellent pairing, distinguishable from each other in both voice and approach, yet at the same time superbly matched in duet; and Peter Harvey has the friendliest of bass voices, his alert account of Mein Herz ist bereit, set against the thrillingly radiant background of three violins, being one of the disc's highlights.

An expert recording in an amenable acoustic completes a release of many refined pleasures.

Nimm von uns, Herr, BuxWV78. Jesu, meines Lebens Leben, BuxWV62. Mit Fried und Freud, ich fahr dahin, BuxWV76. Führwahr, er trug unsere Krankheit, BuxWV31. Herzlich lieb, hab' ich dich o Herr, BuxWV41. Der Herr ist mit mir, BuxWV15
Claron McFadden sop Franciska Dukel mez
Jonathan Peter Kenny counterten Marius van Altena ten Stephan MacLeod bass Collegium Vocale; The Royal Consort; Anima Eterna

Orchestra / Jos van Immerseel
Channel Classics CCS7895 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included (in German only). Recorded 1994

The North German middle ground between chorale concertato and the early cantatas of Bach is an interesting one, especially in the hands of composers of Buxtehude's stature. In these cantatas the disparate textual elements of bible passage, hymn and devotional poetry are complemented by the composer's skill in drawing together the comparably disparate musical ones of sonata, concertato principles, aria and chorale. That in itself might give these cantatas only an ephemeral charm, but Buxtehude was a musician who was gifted in the art of word-painting and, above all, in the expression of deep, often grief-stricken emotions. He could be brilliant, too, in his lyrical approach to texts, but it is an all-pervading melancholy which seems to characterise most strongly much that is most profound in his sacred vocal music. These six works demonstrate Buxtehude's formal versatility with two large-scale chorale cantatas; a beautiful ostinato-based strophic aria, with an almost startling dissonance; the famous, austere and highly contrapuntal Canticum Simeonis ('Mit Fried und Freud') which Buxtehude performed at his father's funeral in 1674; and two concertante pieces. The performances respond to the highly charged emotional outpouring of these works but can lack polish. However, the music is first-rate (the ostinato- and chaconne-based movements make particularly strong appeal) and Immerseel's direction is stylish and sensitive.

William Byrd

British 1543-1623

GROVE Brought up in London, Byrd was a pupil of Tallis. In 1563 he became Organist and Master of the Choristers at Lincoln Cathedral and married there in 1568. Though he remained at Lincoln until c1572 he was a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal from 1570 and its organist from 1575 (at first jointly with Tallis). In London he rapidly established himself as a composer, gaining influential friends and patrons and earning favour with Queen Elizabeth, who granted him a patent (with Tallis) in 1575 for the printing and marketing of part-music and MS paper. After his wife's death in the 1580s he remarried. He and his family were often cited as Catholic recusants, but he continued to compose openly for the Roman church. In 1593 Byrd moved to Essex, where he spent the rest of his life and was frequently involved in property litigation. His reputation was very high: he was described as 'Father of British Music'. Morley and Tomkins were among his pupils.

Much of Byrd's vast and varied output was printed during his lifetime. His sacred music ranges widely in style and mood, from the florid and penitential motets of the Cantiones sacrae to the concise and devotional ones in the Gradualia (motet sections intended to form an impressive scheme of complete Mass Propers). His secular songs predate the true madrigal; they use intricate, flowing counterpoint derived from an earlier English style (eg Tallis, Taverner) and range from solemn lamentations to exuberant jests. His instrumental music is specially important: the many consort songs greatly influenced the later lute ayre, while the virginal pieces are unparalleled in richness of invention and contrapuntal brilliance. In all the genres in which he wrote Byrd was both traditionalist and innovator, channelling continental ideas into a native English tradition, and his expressive range was unusually wide for his day. He wrote for both Catholic and Anglican churches with equal genius.

Chamber works

Byrd Fantasia a 6. Pavan and Galliard – Kinbourough Good, MB32. The Queen's Alman, MB20, 'Hugh Ashton's Ground'. Pavan and Galliard a 6. Pavan and Galliard, MB14. Browning. Pavan a 5. The Carman's Whistle, MB36. The Irish March, MB94. My Lord of Oxenford's Maske. Pavan, MB17. A Fancie, MB25. Praeludium and Ground. Pavan and Galliard, MB60 Anonymous Pavans – Mille regretz; Belle qui tiens ma vie Ⓟ
Capriccio Stravagante / Skip Sempé hpd
Astrée Naïve E8611 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●

This is technically superb and musically distinctive. Skip Sempé and his musicians grab hold of each piece and play it in a way that leaves no doubt why it was chosen; that is, they have something new and interesting to say musically about each work. The sound is also wonderful: Sempé plays on a Skowroneck harpsichord that he enthusiastically describes as 'one of the first truly admirable harpsichords of the 20th century'; the viols and the recorder group are beautifully recorded, with every detail of the dense polyphony clear. This is the kind of disc you could play to almost any music-lover as a way of explaining that Byrd is not just a great composer but one of the greatest. On the other hand, those who know the music may well feel a touch uncomfortable. While Sempé plays with often truly dazzling skill and virtuosity, many may wish that his pavans were a touch steadier. He also has a slightly mannered way of overdotting cadential bass figurations. The ensemble pieces are sometimes heavily orchestrated: the great six-part Fantasia that opens the disc, for example, has recorders and continuo instruments added to the viols as though to underline contrasts that some would think were already there in the music. Caveats apart, this is an invigorating disc which gives you a new understanding of some of the finest masterpieces of English music.

Byrd Fantasia a 5, BE17/8. Browning a 5, BE17/10. Fantasias a 6, BE17/13-14. In Nomines a 5, BE17/19-22 Mico Fancies a 4 Nos 4a, 5-7, 9, 10, 14, 18 and 19. Pavans a 4 Nos 2-4
Phantasm (Laurence Dreyfus, Wendy Gillespie, Jonathan Manson, Markku Luolajan-Mikkola, viols)

with Martha McGaughey, Alison McGillivray viols
Simax PSC1143 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

The odd juxtaposition of Byrd's very finest chamber music with pieces by Richard Mico may seem rather like pairing late Beethoven with Vanhal; but it works extremely well. Though Mico has been little regarded, much of his music shows absolute mastery (his Pavan No 4 is in some ways one of the most perfect and beautiful examples of the simple eight-bar pavane). The Mico selection includes two pieces that are by no means certainly his (Fancies Nos 18 and 19); but they are still glorious pieces. Phantasm play this music with immaculate control and balance, finding many telling details that might elude less careful musicians. Some listeners may be a touch less happy with the Byrd, feeling that the honeyed sounds cover certain details, that the speed of Browning loses the work's harmonic and contrapuntal magic, that the myriad changes in the grand six-voice fantasias could benefit from greater lightness of touch. But that would be like saying that only the English can perform Elgar idiomatically. What Phantasm brings to this music is a clear and unusual view of the music. Moreover, they present what is absolutely the best of Byrd's consort work, omitting the troublesome first In Nomine and the less perfect first six-part Fantasia. The four Fantasias and the four In Nomines on this disc are the core of Byrd's claim to stand among the world's greatest composers of chamber music. The performances convincingly support that claim.

Complete Keyboard Works

23 Pavans and Galliards (with two additional Pavans and five Galliards). 14 sets of Variations. 11 Fantasias. 11 Grounds. Nine Preludes. Miscellanea and variant versions Ⓟ
Davitt Moroney chbr org/clav/hpd/muselar virg/org
Hyperion ⑦ CDA66551/7 (497 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1991-97 ●●●
Selected highlights available on Ⓕ CDA66558

The three volumes of keyboard music added in 1950 as an afterthought to Edmund Fellowes's edition of Byrd have only slowly made their full impact as containing one of the most remarkable and innovative repertories in the history of music. A much-needed new edition by Alan Brown (1969-71) was followed by Oliver Neighbour's important critical study (1978), which perhaps for the first time made it absolutely clear that Byrd was not at all just another of the 'Elizabethan Virginalists' but stood head and shoulders above all his contemporaries – in range, in contrapuntal technique, in melodic invention and above all in formal control and imagination. Davitt Moroney has completed the picture by presenting the entire body of music on seven CDs. The results here are definitive and a triumph for all concerned. Moroney absolutely has the music in his hands, head and soul. There are so many glorious details in his playing that it is hard to know where to begin in its praise: with the wonderful clarity of the part-writing; with the superb energy of the playing; with the glittering virtuosity; with the ability to vary the colours and move from the ineffably light and whimsical to the seriously confrontational; with the constant delicate flexibility of his metre; or with his compelling grasp of Byrd's often difficult formal designs.

Moroney approached this Everest of a project over many years, in constant consultation with Brown and particularly Neighbour (who – appropriately enough – plays the 'third hand' for the duet Fantasia on Disc 4). The various engineers have coped well with the different recording venues and occasions. Six different instruments are used to vary the colour and to fit the different styles of the music. The most novel is the muselar virginal, a marvellously earthy instrument with a refreshingly noisy action. The others are plainly chosen with loving care. A harpsichord by Hubert Bédard (after Ruckers) tends to be used for the lighter pieces, while he chooses one by Reinhard von Nagel (after Couchet) for some of the more serious works. Neatly enough, the set ends with a prelude already heard on Ahrend's Toulouse organ, now played on four different instruments in turn (omitting only the chamber organ). Alongside all of this, Moroney has provided the most detailed set of notes: 200 pages of wide-ranging erudition (in English and French) including a key to the 'BK' numbers of the Brown edition which are used throughout his running prose. So when you have got through the 497 minutes needed to listen to the discs, you still have several hours of reading to do. Enjoy.

Cantiones Sacrae

Cantiones Sacrae (1575) – Tribue, Domine. Siderum rector. Domine secundum. Fantasias – C; D. Attollite portas. Miserere mihi. Aspice Domine. Peccantem me quotidie. Salvator mundi II. O lux, beata Trinitas
New College Choir, Oxford / Edward Higginbottom with Timothy Morris org
CRD CRD3492 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1994

There is so much wonderful six-part writing in this attractive selection from the 1575 Cantiones Sacrae that such a medium appears in a new light, particularly when performed by the choir and in the acoustic of New College Chapel – where, as Edward Higginbottom reminds us, they 'have been rehearsing for 500 years'. The beauty and balance of the musical architecture is constantly conveyed to the listener, particularly in the six-part writing. It doesn't matter whether these compositions were intended for liturgical or domestic use, or as a noble offering to the Queen: from a purely musical point of view they are superb. To give a single example, the little Vespers hymn O lux, beata Trinitas displays consummate craftsmanship through the ingenious use of the number three – three high, then three low voices, three diverse voices, a canon three-in-one, three strophes, triple time, and so on, building up to a tremendous final 'Amen'. The point made by this recording is that it all sounds natural, uncontrived, magnificent. The three organ pieces are a welcome addition: with their brilliant fingerwork and gentle registrations they present a charming and lively contrast to the vocal settings.

Cantiones Sacrae 1589 – Vigilate; In resurrectione tua; Aspice Domine de sede; Ne irascaris Domine. Propers for the Feast of the Purification – Ave regina caelorum; Adorna thalamum; O quam gloriosum; Tribulationes civitatum; Domine secundum multitudinem; Laetentur caeli
The Cardinall's Musick / Andrew Carwood
ASV Gaudeamus CDGAU309 Ⓕ
(71 minutes: DDD). Recorded c2002

ASV's Byrd Edition presents Propers for Candlemas (also known as the 'Feast of the Purification'), and further motets from the 1589 Cantiones Sacrae, many of them composed to strengthen the spirits of the Queen's loyal Catholic subjects in those troubled and highly dangerous times. Which goes to explain the high proportion of sorrowful or penitential texts, the frequent cries for deliverance (Aspice Domine, Ne irascaris, Tribulationes), and the mastery with which Byrd sets them. This historical background, vital to an understanding of the music, does not exclude the possibility of a joyful outcome: Byrd can also contemplate the ultimate joys of heaven, (O quam gloriosum, Laetentur caeli).

The choir enters deeply into an understanding of what lies behind these pieces. And Byrd is never averse to raising his singers' spirits by introducing a jaunty rhythm – the crowing cock in Vigilate, for example – or a bright, rising theme to inspire hope. The choir responds with sustained restraint, perfect balance and crisp rhythms.

The settings of the Propers for Candlemas offer a short recital of their own, this time in the full context of the liturgy for this ancient feast, and following the whole course of events as the story unfolds. A thoroughly satisfying disc.

Consort Songs

O Lord, within thy tabernacle. Quis me statim. With Lilies White. Wretched Albinus. Blame I Confess. Ye Sacred Muse. Rejoice unto the Lord. Fair Britain Isle. In Nomines a 5, BE17 Nos 18-22. Browning a 5, BE17 No 10. Fantasia a 5, BE17 No 8. Praeludium and Ground a 5
Gérard Lesne counterten Ensemble Orlando Gibbons (Wieland Kuijken, Kaori Uemura, Anne-Marie Lasla, Sylvie Moquet, Jérôme Hantaï viols)
Virgin Classics Veritas 545264-2 Ⓕ
(65 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1996

The five In Nomines reveal the growing maturity and control over form of the inventive fledgling Byrd, though you will need to shuffle tracks to follow it in sequence. This is the only CD where the In Nomines are coupled with Byrd's consort songs. Of the other instrumental items, the Praeludium and Ground are treated with winsome lightness but the 20 remarkable variations on Browning hang more heavily than is suggested by the words of either version of the tune (the other is The leaves be green). Solemnity is the prevailing mood of the consort songs, four of them laments. Wretched Albinus refers to the disgracing of the Earl of Essex, attributed to a 'silly woman' – the same Queen Elizabeth whose protection of Byrd from anti-Catholic laws is obliquely celebrated in Rejoice unto the Lord, the only cheerful oasis in this desert of sorrow. Fortunately the sorrow is expressed in magnificent music of which Ye Sacred Muse, Byrd's tribute to the recently deceased Tallis, is the jewel in the crown. Magnificent vocal music calls for a matching singer and Gérard Lesne fills that requirement to the full. First-class recording and excellent booklet-notes provide additional reasons for acquiring this disc.

All in a garden green. La volta No 1 in G, 'Lady Morley'. O mistress mine I must. Wolsey's Wild. O Lord, how vain are all our delights. Psalmes, Sonets and Songs – Who likes to love; My mind to me a kingdom is; Farewell, false love. Triumph with pleasant melody. Truth at the First. Ad Dominum cum tribularer. Cantiones sacrae – Attollite portas; da mihi auxilium; Domine secundum actum meum; Miserere mihi, Domine 🅿
Sophie Yates virg I Fagiolini / Robert Hollingworth; Fretwork
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0578 (73 minutes: DDD)
Texts and translations included Ⓕ
Recorded 1994 ●

This disc adopts an imaginative approach to programming Byrd's music by presenting works in different genres grouped together to demonstrate a single stage in his development. It includes Latin motets, keyboard dances and variations on popular songs of the day, and sacred and secular songs (and a dialogue) with viols. There is so much here that wins our admiration: the dazzling contrapuntal elaboration of Attollite portas, the close-knit texture of Da mihi auxilium and the massive Ad Dominum cum tribularer; the exuberant variations on O mistress mine (neatly played by Sophie Yates) and Byrd's melodic gift in the strophic O Lord, how vain. The singers' adoption of period pronunciation of English – so that, for example, 'rejoice' emerges as 'rejwace' – affects the tuning and the musical sound, it is claimed here, but without rather clearer enunciation the point remains not proven. Probably more upsetting to many will be the Anglicised pronunciation of Latin. The viol consort gives stylish support and is well balanced, the Fagiolini sopranos occasionally 'catch the mike' on high notes (eg in the passionate pleas of Miserere mihi, Domine), and the recorded level of the virginals might have been a little higher without falsifying its tone. But these are minor criticisms of a most rewarding disc.

Gradualia

Gradualia – Volume 1: Saturday Lady Masses in Advent. Domine quis habitabit. Omni tempore benedic Deum. Christe redemptor omnium. Sermone blando a 3. Miserere. Ne perdas cum implis. Lamentations of Jeremiah. Christe, qui lux es a 5. Christe qui lux es a 4. Sanctus. Audivi vocem de caelo. Vide Dominum quoniam tribulor. Peccavi super numerum (all ed Skinner)
The Cardinall's Musick; Frideswide Consort (Caroline Kershaw, Jane Downer, Christine Garratt, Jean McCreery recs) / Andrew Carwood
ASV Gaudeamus CDGAU170 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996

This is a great start to The Cardinall's Musick's project to record Byrd's complete output. On the disc, some of the shorter motets are entrusted to The Cardinall's' habitual instrumental accomplices, the Frideswide Consort. A full list of sources is given for each piece, along with appropriate editorial commentary. Since Byrd set certain texts a number of times, such precision seems only sensible. Much of this music is new to the CD catalogue, and even in this selection of largely unpublished motets, there are impressive finds (the nine-voice Domine quis habitabit, for instance). This repertory is the mother's-milk of English choristers, and of the younger generation of English vocal ensembles The Cardinall's Musick remains perhaps the closest to that tradition outside of actual choral establishments. So they respond to Byrd with a suavity and confidence born of long-standing acquaintance. The expansive penitential pieces, such as the early Lamentations, are far removed from the small-scale forms of the Gradualia. The Cardinall's Musick respond effectively to these different functions and moods, and the recording complements them admirably.

Gradualia – Volume 2: Nativity of our Lord Jesus Christ – Puer natus est; Viderunt ... omnes fines terrae; Dies sanctificatus; Tui sunt coeli; Viderunt omnes fines terrae; Hodie Christus natus est; O admirabile commercium; O magnum mysterium. Ave regina caelorum. O salutaris hostia. Confitemini DomiNo In exitu Israel (with Sheppard and Mundy). Laudate pueri Dominum. Decantabat populus. Deus in adjutorium. Ad Dominum cum tribularer (all ed Skinner)
The Cardinall's Musick / Andrew Carwood
ASV Gaudeamus CDGAU178 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996 ●

This second volume of The Cardinall's Musick's Byrd edition is, if anything, more impressive than the first. It may be a matter of programming, for the works recorded here seem to be of a higher overall calibre: even an obviously experimental piece such as O salutaris hostia could have been included on merit alone – yet this appears to be its first recording. Complete surveys sometimes turn up items of lesser interest, yet they also allow one to hear pieces that might have difficulty in finding a home elsewhere: witness the responsory, In exitu Israel, an intriguing collaborative effort by Byrd and his contemporaries, Mundy and Sheppard. Finally, one can judge for oneself the authenticity of works that modern scholarship has deemed doubtful (such as the opening Ave regina caelorum). Most of the pieces here involve male altos on the top line. The centrepiece is a collection of Propers from the Gradualia of 1607, this time for the Nativity. As on their first set, Skinner's and Carwood's decision to structure each volume around a set of Propers proves an astute piece of programming, integrating shorter items as it does (such as the various Alleluia settings) within a framework that allows them their own space. The singers are on very fine form indeed. It takes confidence to carry off O salutaris hostia, whose fierce false relations could so easily have sounded merely wilful. Only in the final, extended settings does the pace flag: the disc's last moments are rather ponderous. That aside, this is a disc to delight Byrd-lovers everywhere.

Masses

Masses – for Three Voices; for Four Voices; for Five Voices (ed Skinner). Fantasias[a] – in G, 'A Voluntary for My Ladye Nevell'; in D minor; C, 'A Fancie for My Ladye Nevell'
[a]Patrick Russill org
The Cardinall's Musick / Andrew Carwood
ASV Gaudeamus CDGAU206 (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included.
Recorded 1999 and [a]2000 ●●●

This is incomparable music by one of the greatest English composers and it was high time for someone to take a fresh look at these works in the light of more recent research and of changing attitudes to performance practice.

Byrd had composed his three settings of the Ordinary of the Mass in troubled times for the small recusant Catholic community that still remained in England in spite of persecution. The settings would have been sung, in all probability, during festive, albeit furtive, celebrations of the old time-honoured Roman liturgy, in private chapels in the depths of the country, at places such as Ingatestone, the seat of Byrd's principal patron, Sir John Petre. Andrew Carwood has recorded them in the Fitzalan Chapel of Arundel Castle, a small but lofty building with a clear resonance that enables the inner voices of the part-writing to come through straight and clean. It hasn't the aura of King's College Chapel, but is probably easier to manage than, say, Winchester Cathedral or Merton College Chapel.

Carwood uses two voices to a part in all three Masses. In comparison with rival recordings he is alone in selecting high voices for the three-part Mass, transposed up a minor third, which introduces a note of surprising lightness and grace. He, too, is alone in taking the initiative of using an all-male choir for the four-part Mass – alto, tenor, baritone, bass. This close, low texture, together with the transposition down an augmented fourth, adds a fitting sense of gravity to the performance. In particular, it heightens the poignancy of such passages as the 'dona nobis pacem' in the Agnus Dei, with its series of suspensions in the drooping phrases leading to the final cadence. This is a world away from the slick performance of Dutch ensemble Quink (the four-part Mass, in 1985), who canter here like young colts to the last chord without a trace of emotion, every note precisely in its place, but missing entirely one essential dimension: an understanding of what it all means and in what context it was composed.

That dimension of understanding, however, is precisely what this recording by The Cardinall's Musick so keenly demonstrates. Theirs is a simplicity of style that belies simplistic criticism. Vibrato is used sparingly: 40 years on, some listeners might consider the constant use of it by a King's Choir of the late 1950s almost too overpowering. Carwood chooses his tempos with care, avoiding the modern tendency to speed everything up inordinately.

The interesting historical note on the whole background is a good pointer to what the listener may experience as the music unfolds.

Masses – Three Voices; Four Voices; Five Voices
Motet – Ave verum corpus a 4
The Tallis Scholars / Peter Phillips
Gimell CDGIM345 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1984 ●●

Byrd was a fervently committed Roman Catholic and he helped enormously to enrich the music of the English Church. His Mass settings were made for the many recusant Catholic worshippers who held services in private. They were published between 1593 and 1595 and are creations of great feeling. The contrapuntal writing has a much closer texture and fibre than the Masses of Palestrina and there is an austerity and rigour that is allowed to blossom and expand with the text. The beautifully restrained and mellow recording, made in Merton College Chapel, Oxford, fully captures the measure of the music and restores the awe and mystery of music that familiarity can dim.

Mass for Five Voices (with Propers for the Feast of Corpus Christi). Gradualia ac cantiones sacrae: Part 2 – Corpus Christi. Gradualia seu cantionum sacrarum, liber secundum: Votive Mass for the Blessed Sacrament – Ab ortu solis; Alleluia: Cognoverunt discipuli
Winchester Cathedral Choir / David Hill
Hyperion CDA66837 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1995

On this CD the five movements of Byrd's Mass for five voices are interspersed with the five pieces of the Proper for the Feast of Corpus Christi. We can therefore transport ourselves back in time to the end of the 16th and beginning of the 17th century, and imagine their being performed, in early summer, at a live celebration of Mass in one of the great houses of the Catholic nobility. Winchester Cathedral Choir has purposely sought out an enclosed space in the great cathedral to make this recording, so that the sound captures something of the immediacy of singers performing in a small hidden room. One is particularly struck by the quality of the trebles – the slight edge to the gentle tone of very young singers – and also by the teamwork of the whole choir.

The secret of this recording lies in its unity of theme and in its understanding of Byrd's triumphant statements of belief, expressed in music of great tenderness as well as strength.

Music for Holy Week and Easter

Plorans plorabit. Passio Domini nostri Jesu Christe secundum Johannem[a]. Adoramus te[bc]. Vespers for Holy Saturday[a]. Mass Propers for Easter Day. Haec dies. Angelus Domini. Mane vobiscum. Post dies octo. Christus resurgens
The Cardinall's Musick / Andrew Carwood [a]ten with [b]Robin Tyson counterten [c]Patrick Russill org
ASV Gaudeamus CDGAU214 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 2000 ●●●

The sixth volume of The Byrd Edition is a landmark recording, covering most of Byrd's Holy Week and Easter music, from the St John's Passion choruses for Good Friday to the Octave day of Easter, and including miniature Vespers at the end of the Easter Vigil, and the whole of the Proper of the Mass for Easter Day.

The opening motet Plorans plorabit, recalling the Lamentations chanted earlier in the week, is a stern reminder of the recusant atmosphere in which Byrd lived out his religious beliefs. The straightforward Passion choruses are rightly set into their proper context, an edition of St John's Passion prepared by Byrd's Roman contemporary, Guidetti. Admirably sung, Carwood maintains throughout a remarkable balance between drama and restraint. A gentle consort song, Adoramos te, fills the space in the listener's imagination between the burial of Christ and his rising from the dead. The miniature Vespers follow, sung, almost with bated breath, to Byrd's simple three-part settings of the two antiphons, with a correction of Bretts' suggested psalm-tone for the single – and shortest – psalm.

The Mass Resurrexi is exhilarating, with surging themes, rhythmic interplay and bursts of joy. Byrd, unable to resist word-painting suggestive of earthquake at the Offertory, introduces here a note of merriment into a particularly serious liturgy, and doesn't entirely avoid it elsewhere. Thankfully it was underrather than overplayed.

The solemn final four-part processional Christus resurgens is a triumphant re-statement of the Easter: total joy.

John Cage

American 1912-1992

GROVE Cage left Pomona College early to travel in Europe (1930-31), then studied with Cowell in New York (1933-34) and Schoenberg in Los Angeles (1934): his first published compositions, in a rigorous atonal system of his own, date from this period. In 1937 he moved to Seattle to work as a dance accompanist, and there in 1938 he founded a percussion orchestra his music now concerned with filling units of time with ostinatos (First Construction (in Metal), 1939). He also began to use electronic devices (variable-speed turntables in Imaginary Landscape No 1, 1939) and invented the 'prepared piano', placing diverse objects between the strings of a grand piano in order to create an effective percussion orchestra under the control of two hands. He moved to San Francisco in 1939, to Chicago in 1941 and back to New York in 1942, all the time writing music for dance companies (notably for Merce Cunningham), nearly always for prepared piano or percussion ensemble. There were also major concert works for the new instrument: A Book of Music (1944) and Three Dances (1945) for two prepared pianos, and the Sonatas and Interludes (1948) for one.

During this period Cage became interested in Eastern philosophies, especially in Zen, from which he gained a treasuring of non-intention. Working to remove creative choice from composition, he used coin tosses to determine events (Music of Changes for piano, 1951), wrote for 12 radios (Imaginary Landscape No 4, also 1951) and introduced other indeterminate techniques. His 4'33" (1952) has no sound added to that of the environment in which it is performed; the Concert for Piano and Orchestra (1958) is an encyclopedia of indeterminate notations. Yet other works show his growing interest in the theatre of musical performance (Water Music, 1952, for pianist with a variety of non-standard equipment) and in electronics (Imaginary Landscape No 5 for randomly mixed recordings, 1952; Cartridge Music for small sounds amplified in live performance, 1960), culminating in various large-scale events staged as jamborees of haphazardness (HPSCHD for harpsichords, tapes etc, 1969). The later output is various, including indeterminate works, others fully notated within a very limited range of material, and pieces for natural resources (plants, shells). Cage also appeared widely in Europe and the USA as a lecturer and performer, having an enormous influence on younger musicians and artists; he wrote several books.

The Seasons

The Seasons. Suite for Toy Piano[a]. Concerto for Prepared Piano and Orchestra[b]. Seventy-Four (Versions A and B)[c]
Margaret Leng Tan [a]toy pf/[b]prepared pf American Composers Orchestra / Dennis Russell Davies
ECM New Series 465 140-2 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded [ab]1999 and [c]2000 ●

This is an enchanting CD, every item a sheer delight. Margaret Leng Tan worked with Cage in the last decade of his life and her earlier recordings show a special sympathy for Cage's keyboard music. The second of her New Albion CDs included the piano solo version of The Seasons, and Cage was honest enough to admit to her that he had help from Virgil Thomson and Lou Harrison in making the orchestral version recorded here. The result is Cage at his most poetic, evoking each of the four seasons in lovely changing colours. There are two realisations of one of the last of what are called Cage's 'Number Pieces', Seventy-Four, written specially for the American Composers Orchestra a few months before his death in 1992. This seamless garment of sustained sound in two overlapping parts is an immensely moving document from a unique human being at the end of his life. Anyone who responds to the spiritual minimalism of Pärt, Górecki or Tavener will understand, especially in these dedicated performances. The Concerto for Prepared Piano (1951) takes its rightful place as the major classic for the transformed instrument with orchestra – a status emphasised by this fastidious performance with its delicate sonic tapestry, including discreet radio, all reflecting Cage's absorption with oriental philosophy. Tan has recorded the Suite for Toy Piano (1948) before. This time the sound is closer, you can hear her in-breath just before some movements, and we could have done with more precise rhythms. Lou Harrison's orchestration is perfectly in the spirit and makes a fascinating complement – Cage writing memorable tunes! This disc shows that much of Cage has now entered the mainstream and that his music is unique.

Music for Piano

Music for Piano – 1; 2; 3; 4-19; 20; 21-36; 37-52; 53-68; 69-84; 85. Music for ... Two Pianos I/II; Three Pianos; Four Pianos; Five Pianos. Electronic Music for Two Pianos
Steffen Schleiermacher pf
Dabringhaus und Grimm ② MDG613 0784-2 Ⓕ
(153 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1996

This set is devoted to the Music for Piano series almost entirely written in the 1950s, which is neglected and mostly unavailable. One can see why performers have found these pieces less attractive. After Cage's crisis year of 1952, which saw him produce the so-called silent piece 4'33", he was obsessed with removing his own tastes and desires from his compositions. Before he became fully committed to the I Ching's random numbers he marked out blotches and imperfections in the manuscript paper he was using as a way of getting the notes. Cage said he looked at his paper and suddenly realised that all the music was there. This procedure also settled the density of notes on the page. In the whole series the performer is left to decide dynamics and pace in a continuity dominated by single notes. If this sounds austere, we are reckoning without the ingenuities of Schleiermacher. Cage specifies various types of sound production, apart from the use of the keys: primarily plucking the strings from inside or muting them. As in Schleiermacher's prepared piano recordings, the quality of sound has been most carefully considered. A muted low note or a single plucked string can be marvellously evocative in conjunction with conventionally produced pitches. The ambience of the prepared piano is not far away. Further, Schleiermacher avails himself of Cage's provision for several of these pieces to be played together, which he does at intervals in the series. Since we have heard the same pieces solo, the superimposed versions bring back familiar material in a fascinating way. Fastidiously researched and performed, Schleiermacher says he has taken the pieces seriously. In so doing he has begun a new chapter of virtually unknown Cage.

Sonatas and Interludes

Yuji Takahashi prpf
Fylkingen Records FYCD1010 Ⓕ
(58 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1965

Written between February 1946 and March 1948, the Sonatas and Interludes were, at the time of this recording, still quite new, although already established as core contemporary repertoire. Even when they were premièred they were accepted as among the least controversial of Cage's works: the somewhat conservative journal Musical America welcomed them as 'quite enchanting'. Cage had devised the prepared piano in 1940. Wanting a percussion ensemble for a dance piece but having room only for a piano, he began to transform the instrument into a substitute gamelan. In the Sonatas and Interludes he explored the timbral possibilities further, here and there extending them by the use of contact mikes.

These pieces, often structured in accordance with complicated mathematical schemes, leave little to chance. The preparation of the piano is a long and meticulous process, and Cage provided precise directions. Nevertheless, performers do need to make choices, and the results can be very different.

The benchmark recording by Aleck Karis (on Bridge) is certainly an impressive, powerful, virtuoso performance. Yet, compared with Takahashi's fresh-sounding reading, with its endlessly subtle gradations and reflective approach, evoking the image of a musical archaeologist's brush carefully revealing ancient, magical inscriptions, Karis sounds too burly, sometimes seeming to fall prey to the contemporary tendency to confuse aggression with conviction. Takahashi is a marvellous guide through the mystery and strange beauty of these appealing pieces.

Litany for the Whale

Litany for the Whale. Aria No 2. Five. The Wonderful Widow of Eighteen Springs. Solo No 22. Experiences No 2. Thirty-six Mesostics re and not re Marcel Duchamp. Aria (arr Hillier). The Year Begins to Be Ripe
Theatre of Voices (Paul Elliott, Andrea Fullington, Allison Zelles, Terry Riley vocs Alan Bennett voc/closed pf Shabda Owens voc/electronics) / Paul Hillier voc
Harmonia Mundi HMU90 7279 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Texts included. Recorded 1995

This is a landmark for Cage, Paul Hillier's group and everyone else. Hillier says he has been interested in Cage for years and here his own considerable advocacy has turned Cage into a troubadour of our global village. The Theatre of Voices' collection jumps right in at the deep end with Litany for the Whale (1980), a 25-minute monody with two uncannily similar voices (Alan Bennett and Paul Elliott) using only five notes in antiphonal phrases. Shut your eyes and this ritual could almost be Gregorian chant. The scope narrows to three notes in The Wonderful Widow, where the closed piano part is slightly subdued, and the same three recur in Thirty-six Mesostics, spoken by American minimalist Terry Riley and sung by Hillier. Cage's Aria (1958), for Cathy Berberian, has been associated with one voice but this realization for seven voices and electronic sounds is thoroughly idiomatic. Experiences No 2, another monody to a poem by E E Cummings is beautifully sung, but the precisely notated pauses are not always accurate. Aria No 2 is a fastidious mix of extended vocal techniques by Alan Bennett with weather sounds. Cage convinces us of the musical beauty of rainfall, water and thunder. Five is a vocal version of one of Cage's late number pieces. This type of sustained writing is ideal for voices and there are meditative qualities in all these performances. The close-microphone breathing in Solo No 22 is, like everything else here, artistic and well engineered.

Antonio Caldara

Italian c1670-1736

GROVE Caldara was a chorister at St Mark's, Venice, and proficient on the viol, cello and keyboard. In the 1690s he began writing operas, oratorios and cantatas; his trio sonatas opp. 1 and 2 (1693, 1699) are his only known instrumental chamber works. He served as maestro di cappella da chiesa e dal teatro to the Duke of Mantua, 1699-1707, and maestro di cappella to Prince Ruspoli in Rome between 1709 and 1716, meanwhile composing for other cities. From 1716 until his death he was vice-Kapellmeister at the Viennese court. He was much favoured there for his dramatic works, cantatas liturgical music and oratorios; latterly he also composed stage works for the Vienna Carnival, for court celebrations and for Salzburg. His output (over 3000 works, almost all vocal) was one of the largest of his generation. His operas and oratorios make him a central figure in the creation of music drama in the tradition of Metastasio, many of whose texts he was the first to set.

Maddalena ai piedi di Cristo

Awards 1997

Maria-Cristina Kiehr, Rosa Dominguez sops Bernarda Fink contr Andreas Scholl counterten Gerd Türk ten Ulrich Messthaler bass Schola Cantorum Basiliensis / René Jacobs
Harmonia Mundi ② HMC90 5221/2 Ⓕ
(126 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1995 ●●●

Caldara was the most prolific and famous oratorio composer of his day and this one, written around 1700, is wonderfully rich in fresh and attractive invention. Practically devoid of external action, it is dramatically tense and concentrates on the struggle between the forces of good and evil, the sinner Magdalen being urged towards penitence by her sister Martha; the roles of Christ and a Pharisee are considerably smaller. The work opens arrestingly, with an agitated sinfonia followed by the hypnotic aria 'Dormi, o cara': then come another 27 brief da capo arias with their associated recitatives. There is no lack of variety: some arias are accompanied only by a continuo instrument; others are furnished with different usages of the five-part strings. René Jacobs furthers the dramatic impact by his pacing; and his casting is flawless. He has the highly effective idea of differentiating the parts of Earthly and Celestial Love by allocating the former to a mezzo and the latter to a countertenor. Both are excellent, but so are all the participants. It seems almost invidious to single out highlights but one must cite the aria 'Diletti' for Magdalen (Kiehr) and the succeeding ornate 'Vattene' for Martha (Dominguez) and, even more, two florid arias from Scholl and two delivered passionately by Fink. You are urged to acquire this disc.

Joseph Canteloube

French 1879-1957

GROVE Canteloube studied with d'Indy at the Schola Cantorum and collected and arranged folksongs from throughout France, especially from his native province (four volumes of Chants d'Auvergne for voice and orchestra, 1923-30). He also wrote two operas and other works.

Chants d'Auvergne

Canteloube Chants d'Auvergne – La pastoura als camps; Baïlèro; L'ïo de rotso; Ound' onorèn gorda; Obal, din lou Limouzi; Pastourelle; L'Antouèno; La pastrouletta è lo chibaliè; La delïssádo; N'aï pas iéu de mio; Lo calhé; Lo fiolaïré; Passo pel prat; Lou boussu; Brezairola; Maluros qu'o uno fenno. Jou l'pount d'o Mirabel; Oï, ayaï; Pour l'enfant; Chut, chut; Pastorale; Lou coucut; Postouro sé tu m'aymo; Quand z-éyro petituono; Té, l'co tèl; Uno jionto postouro; Hél beyla-z-y-dau fél; Obal, din lo combuèlo; Là-haut, sur le rocher; Lou diziou bé
Villa-Lobos Bachianas brasileiras No 5
Dame Kiri Te Kanawa sop English Chamber Orchestra / Jeffrey Tate
Double Decca ② 444 995-2DF2 (111 minutes: DDD)
Notes, text and translation included Ⓜ
Recorded 1982-83

Te Kanawa's richly sensuous approach to these delightful songs is very seductive, especially when the accompaniments by Jeffrey Tate and the ECO are so warmly supportive and the sound so opulent. Her account of the most famous number, 'Baïlèro', must be the most relaxed on record, yet she sustains its repetitions with a sensuous, gentle beauty of line, supported by lovely wind playing from the orchestra which seems to float in the air. There is a resonance given to the sound, which means that certain of the brighter, more obviously folksy numbers, lose a little of their rustic sharpness. However, the overall effect is very appealing, particularly when her voice (recorded in the early 1980s) is so young and fresh. As an encore we are offered the Villa-Lobos Bachianas brasileiras No 5, an 'Aria' for soprano and cellos. She sings this in Portuguese and the result is ravishing, almost decadent at its softly intoned reprise. An enticing disc.

Canteloube Chants d'Auvergne, Volume 2 – La pastoura als camps; Baïlèro; L'ïo dè rotso; Ound' onorèn gorda; Obal, din lou Limouzi; L'Antouèno; La pastrouletta è lo chibaliè; N'aï pas iéu de mio; Lo calhé; Maluros qu'o uno fenno; Pour l'enfant; Quand z-éyro petituono; Hél beyla-z-y-dau fél; Là-haut, sur le rocher; Lou diziou bé
Emmanuel Chansons bourguignonnes du Pays de Beaune, Op 15 – Quand j'ai sôti de mon villaige; Il était une fille, une fille d'honneur; Le pommier d'Août; Noël; Complainte de Notre Dame; Aidieu, bargeire!
Dawn Upshaw sop Orchestra of the Opéra de Lyon / Kent Nagano
Erato 0630-17577-2 (63 minutes: DDD). Texts and Ⓕ translations included. Recorded 1996 ●

Chants d'Auvergne – Baïlèro; L'ïo dè rotso; Ound' onorèn gorda; Obal, din lou Limouzi; L'Antouèno; La delïssádo; N'aï pas iéu de mio; Lo calhé; Lo fiolaïré; Passo pel prat; Brezairola; Oï, ayaï; Pour l'enfant; Chut, chut; Lou coucut; Tè, l'co, tè!; Uno jionto postouro; La pastoura als camps; Pastourelle; La pastrouletta è lo chibaliè; Lou boussu; Malurous qu'o uno fenno; Jou l'pount d'o Mirabel; Pastorale
Frederica von Stade mez Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Antonio de Almeida
Sony Classical Essential Classics SBK63063 Ⓑ
(73 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1980s

Maurice Emmanuel's arrangements of his local Burgundian folk-songs are antecedents to what Canteloube was to do a decade or two later. This is the second disc that Dawn Upshaw has devoted primarily to Canteloube's Songs of the Auvergne. Upshaw and Nagano seem to have taken a conscious decision to re-establish a link with the music's folk texts and banish as much sentimentality as they can. Their 'Baïlèro' is keenly dramatized and refuses to wallow. The simple 'Pour l'enfant' is bright-eyed with detail; and 'L'ïo dè rotso' is given a more sarcastic edge than usual. In general, there is a grittiness here that sets it apart from most recordings, with Upshaw's determination to put across the words and Nagano's restraint in the orchestra, encouraging cool strings to let the bright Lyon wind section pipe through clearly. The Sony selection with Frederica von Stade is an old friend. Two sets of recordings have been combined and all the best-known songs are here in more conventional performances than are found on the Erato disc. Von Stade varies her tone according to the sense of each song, but the overall mood is less sharp, more comfortable if you like, than with Upshaw. The RPO sounds a lot richer than its Lyon counterpart and, at slower speeds, Antonio de Almeida provides big-orchestra accompaniments, where Nagano prefers chamber-music detail. You will probably find that the consoling romanticism of the Songs of the Auvergne on this tried-and-trusted disc is more what you had in mind,

André Caplet

French 1878-1925

GROVE Caplet studied at the Paris Conservatoire (1896-1901) and started his career as a conductor, in Paris and at the Boston Opera (1910-14). Debussy was a great influence on him, and a friend, Caplet being entrusted with the orchestration of Le martyre de St-Sébastien (1911), of which he conducted the first performance. His compositions became more individual, and even extraordinary in their melodic contours and effects of colour. His main works include the Conte fantastique after Poe for harp and strings (1919), the cello concerto Epiphanie (1923) and Le miroir de Jésus for women's voices, harp and strings (1923).

Légende pour orchestre

Caplet Suite persane – Nihavend. Légende pour orchestre. Marche triomphale et pompière
Debussy (orch Caplet) Children's Corner. Pagodes. Suite bergamasque – Clair de lune
Rheinland-Pfalz State Philharmonic Orchestra / Leif Segerstam
Marco Polo 8 223751 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1987

The valuable services rendered by André Caplet to Debussy – besides the pieces orchestrated here he also completed Gigues and Boîte à joujoux, scored the Martyre de Saint-Sébastien and conducted its first performance – have overshadowed his own gifts as a composer. Colour plays a large part in Caplet's early (1901) Nihavend, despite its having originally been scored only for double wind quintet: it is a kind of Rimskian passacaglia or set of variations on a simple, and apparently authentic, Persian melody. The Légende, four years later, is also an orchestral expansion, from a nonet: a solo saxophone has a prominent role in both versions. Highly charged emotionally and clearly structured, it is disquieting in mood: like the previous piece, it has nothing Debussian about it. The Debussy items are well done, especially Pagodes, which culminates in a shimmering web of exotic sound with its celesta, string trills and glissandos in contrary motion from two harps.

Conte fantastique

Conte fantastique[a]. Les prières[b]. Deux divertissements[c]. Deux sonnets[d]. Septet à cordes vocales et instrumentales[e]
[be]Sharon Coste, [de]Sandrine Piau sops [e]Sylvie Deguy mez [acd]Laurence Cabel hp Ensemble [abe]Musique Oblique
Harmonia Mundi Musique d'abord HMA190 1417 Ⓑ
(55 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1992

Few listeners will fail to respond to the evocative opening of the chamber version of André Caplet's Conte fantastique for harp and strings based on Poe's Masque of the Red Death. It is dramatic too, but far from lurid in its menace, with the harp chiming to represent Death. The other three major works on this disc are even more appealing and often quite ravishing. The composer makes a memorable success of the combination of voices, harp and string quartet, helped by lovely singing, sensitive playing, and warmly atmospheric sound. If you enjoy Ravel's chamber music, you will be captivated by this Caplet anthology.

Elliott Carter

American b1908

GROVE Carter studied at Harvard (1926-32), at the Ecole Normale de Musique in Paris (1932-35) and privately with Boulanger. Back in the USA he worked as musical director of Ballet Caravan (until 1940) and as a teacher. From boyhood he had been acquainted with the music of Schoenberg, Varèse, Ives and others, but for the moment his works leaned much more towards Stravinsky and Hindemith: they included the ballets Pocahontas (1939) and The Minotaur (1947), the Symphony No 1 (1942) and Holiday Overture (1944). However, in his Piano Sonata (1946) he began to work from the interval content of particular chords, and inevitably to loosen the hold of tonality. The development was taken further in the Cello Sonata (1948), already characteristic of his later style in that the instruments have distinct roles.

A period of withdrawal led to the First Quartet (1951), a work of complex rhythmic interplay, long-ranging atonal melody and unusual form, the 'movements' being out of step with the given breaks in the musical continuity: effectively it is a single unfolding of 40 minutes' duration. It was followed by exclusively instrumental works of similar complexity, activity and energy, including the Variations for orchestra (1955), the Second Quartet (1959), the Double Concerto for harpsichord and piano, each with its own chamber orchestra (1961), the Piano Concerto (1965), the Concerto for Orchestra (1969), the Third Quartet (1971) and the Brass Quintet (1974). At that point Carter returned to vocal composition for a triptych of works for soloist and ensemble: A Mirror on which to Dwell (1975), Syringa (1978) and In Sleep, in Thunder (1981), with words by Elizabeth Bishop, John Ashbery and Robert Lowell respectively. But he has also continued the output of large instrumental movements with A Symphony of Three Orchestras (1976), the piano solo Night Fantasies (1980), the Triple Duo (1983) and Penthode for small orchestra (1985). His String Quartet No 4 (1986) is in a simpler style.

Piano Concerto

Piano Concerto. Concerto for Orchestra.
Three Occasions
Ursula Oppens pf South West German Radio Symphony Orchestra / Michael Gielen
Arte Nova Classics 74321 27773-2 Ⓢ
(62 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1992

Oppens and Gielen have collaborated in a recording of the Piano Concerto before, and their long familiarity with the work brings an air of confidence to an account which is admirable in its feeling for the essential character as well as the formal logic of a score whose shoals of notes will defeat all but the most dedicated of interpreters. Gielen's ability to bring a convincing sense of shape and a persuasive expressive profile to complex music is no less apparent in an admirable reading of the Concerto for Orchestra. Again and again, the solo lines marked in the score are brought out, although the recording isn't able to give ideal clarity to the highly detailed string writing (a compositional problem, perhaps). But Gielen's is as compelling a presentation of this turbulent yet strangely affirmative music as one could hope to hear.

In Three Occasions Gielen is weighty, perhaps to excess in the often delicate third piece. Nevertheless, the interpretation is full of character, and the orchestra confirms its excellence in this demanding repertory. Recommended, despite the inadequate insert-notes.

Symphonia

Symphonia: sum fluxae pretium speia.
Clarinet Concerto[b]
[b]Michael Collins cl [a]BBC Symphony Orchestra, [b]London Sinfonietta / Oliver Knussen
DG 20/21 459 660-2GH (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ○○○

Carter's three-movement Symphonia (1993-96) seems certain to provide the crowning glory to his orchestral output, just as his recent chamber opera What Next? should prove the summit of his vocal works. Nevertheless, Symphonia's 45 minutes are not a mere distillation of the techniques and moods developed over the previous half-century or so, and while it is not radically innovative it has plenty of challenges to offer: and not only to orchestral players! The 'I' of Symphonia's subtitle – 'I am the child of flowing hope' – is a 'charming, wanton, inconstant, beautiful, gleaming and noble' bubble, the subject of Richard Crashaw's extraordinary Latin poem Bulla. Carter transforms this image into a musical celebration of modernist instability and unpredictability: but in so doing he makes a permanent statement in a masterwork which deserves to endure, and to be heard and reheard. In Knussen's supremely authoritative interpretation, the sound quality has been meticulously managed in order to help the listener trace those gradually emerging and steadily unfolding arcs of eloquent melody. It takes time to appreciate how Symphonia's extraordinary variety of pace contributes to the music's melodic and harmonic coherence. The Clarinet Concerto, written soon after Symphonia's completion, is more immediately approachable, an exuberant tribute to Boulez's seminal Domaines in the way it moves the soloist around in dialogue with various well-contrasted instrumental groups. This performance will leave you breathless with admiration, not only for Carter's inventiveness but also for the brilliance with which the score is realized by these dedicated artists.

String Quartets

Awards 1999

String Quartet No 5. Duo. Cello Sonata. Fragment. Figment. 90+
Ursula Oppens pf Arditti Quartet (Irvine Arditti, Graeme Jennings vns Garth Knox va Rohan de Saram vc)
Auvidis Montaigne MO782122 Ⓜ
(76 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1996 ○○○

There is a 47-year time-span for the compositions on this hugely rewarding disc, and comparison of the earliest and most recent works underlines that, for Carter, there has been no turning back. While casting a few glances over its shoulder at the fast-disappearing world of neo-classicism, the Cello Sonata (1948) is well on the way to Carter's own personal brand of modernism, and the Fifth String Quartet (1994-95) is a notably intense distillation of that arrestingly personal style. The quartet is by some way the toughest item included, a lattice of eloquently shaped, persistently diverse fragments, whose moments of continuity are the more telling for their rarity. This is the kind of musical discourse in which silence can be as highly charged as sound, and there's little of the kind of loquacious yet never incoherent exuberance that makes the Cello Sonata such a joy, and which is realised to admiration in this superbly characterised performance by Rohan de Saram and Ursula Oppens.

An even more powerful shaping of dialogue in terms of a constantly shifting kaleidoscope of similarities and differences can be heard in the Duo for violin and piano (1973-74). Irvine Arditti and Ursula Oppens ensure that the music's epic voyage grips as strongly as ever, even though the dryish recording makes their reading sound almost superhumanly effortless. With three of Carter's typically resourceful late miniatures, rather clinically but very clearly recorded, and all played with outstanding sympathy and technical skill, this is an indispensable Carter release.

Giuseppe Cavallo Italian ?-1684

GROVE Almost nothing is known about Cavallo. Active in 17th-century Naples – one of the musical capitals of Europe in the 17th and 18th centuries – he was a student of important Neopolitan composer Francesco Provenzale and in 1675 succeeded him as maestro di canto at the Conservatorio di S Maria di Loreto until his death in 1684. The exceptional quality of his surviving music has ensured its resurrection.

Il giudizio universale

Roberta Andalò, Roberta Invernizzi sops Ⓟ
Stefano di Fraia, Rosario Totaro, Giuseppe de Vittorio tens Giuseppe Naviglio bass
Cappella de' Turchini / Antonio Florio
Opus 111 OPS30-262 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included
Recorded 1999

Cavallo or Cavalli was a twilight figure who is thought to have frequented the monastic order of 'Oratorio di Napoli', maybe as a priest. What we know for certain is that the institution attracted thousands of manuscripts from leading composers in the city. Il giudizio universale, or 'The Last Judgement', is something of a rarity in the collection since the majority of 'spiritual melodramas' or 'oratorios' are now lost.

Written in 1681, Il giudizio was probably performed by one of the established conservatories in Naples. Its demands are unusual: short, swiftly interchanging sections of instrumental ritornellos and pairs of protagonists, be they angels, mortals, damned souls or blessed souls, all expostulating on their precarious condition. This contrasts strongly with other oratorios of the period, such as Stradella's Giovanni Battista, in which action is more markedly offset against extended, reflective lyricism. This is a 'hot to trot' theatrical mélange.

The musical characterisation is unquestionably the work of an accomplished composer who can, in cricketing parlance, play down the right line. Cavallo has a tendency to work a strong musical idea for as long as the text demands. Only some of the recitatives test his (and our) patience, but these are in Part 2, preparing the way for the all-important sorting of the saved and the damned. This is where bold colouring, a strong harmonic presence and attractive tunefulness lead us to a skilful five-part choral conclusion, complete with imitation 'last trumpet' calls. Before that, Antonio Florio expertly guides his receptive soloists to rapturous arias for the saved souls and descending chromatic figures for the 'howling amidst horrid lakes'. There is something terrifying about Cavallo's fire-and-brimstone Christ, who seems so resolutely trapped in the spirit of Jeremiah; and something comic about the saved souls gloating, 'Go now, you damned' – a kind of 'we're all right Jack, on yer bike'. It relieves the formulaic and stilted juxtaposition of good and evil which not even the ebullient musical shading of Cavallo can entirely conquer.

The singing, apart from occasional lapses in intonation, is commanding and atmospheric. Roberta Invernizzi is vocally mesmerising and the ensemble carefully matched. The strings sparkle and then soften with the doubled recorders to match the instrumental palette to the theatrical commentary. It all makes for an engrossing experience. For just under an hour, this is a perfect college production alternative to Dido.

Emmanuel Chabrier French 1841-1894

GROVE Chabrier was trained as a lawyer and worked in the Ministry of the Interior until 1880, meanwhile developing his talents as a pianist and improviser, studying composition, publishing piano pieces and writing light stage works. His friends included Verlaine, Manet, Fauré and Chausson, who encouraged his admiration for Wagner. He produced several imaginative operas, among which the Wagnerian Gwendoline (1885) and the graceful opéra comique Le roi malgré lui (1887) were favourably received in Germany. He is best known for his sparkling orchestral rhapsody España (1883), but his natural talent for the lyric, the comic and the colourful is most apparent in his piano works, notably the Impromptu (1873), the ten Pièces pittoresques (1881), the Bourrée fantasque (1891) and the Valses romantiques (1883); they show free treatment of dissonance, modality, bold harmonic contrasts, rhythmic verve and dynamic inventiveness, and inspired subsequent generations of French composers, particularly Ravel.

Suite pastorale

Suite pastorale. Habanera. España. Larghetto. Prélude pastoral. Joyeuse marche. Gwendoline – Overture. Le roi malgré lui – Fête polonaise
Ronald Janezic vn Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir John Eliot Gardiner
DG 447 751-2GH (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ●●

Gardiner enters territory previously occupied by Paul Paray and the Detroit Symphony with some superbly responsive playing by the Vienna Philharmonic and a first-class recording that, while warm, leaves all detail clear, and sweeps the board with a set of outstanding, exuberant performances. The early Larghetto for horn and orchestra is the least characteristic of the composer, being a long-breathed, lyrical piece in the Romantic tradition: it is played with quiet mastery by Ronald Janezic. But the Suite pastorale of five years later is quintessential Chabrier. Poulenc described the 'Idylle' as being as heady as one's first kiss; and light-footed as the 'Danse villageoise' is here, with telling cross-accents and a splendidly rowdy end. España, that ever-fresh centrepiece, is enormously ebullient; but for all its verve, its internal balance is excellent throughout, the brass brilliant but never drowning out the ornamental subsidiary phrases. In contrast the Habanera is suitably languorous.

The Overture to Gwendoline – the nearest Chabrier came to Wagnerism – has one clinging to the edge of one's seat in the agitated urgency of the opening and the blazing ferocity of its final pages; Gardiner brings well-managed rubato to the noisy orgy of the Roi malgré lui scene. Judging by the speed at which he takes it, he seems to have had French chasseurs in mind for the brash Joyeuse marche, which the orchestra obviously enjoyed. Altogether an exhilarating disc.

Chabrier España. Suite pastorale. Joyeuse marche 🄷
Bourrée fantasque. Le roi malgré lui – Fête polonaise; Danse slave. Gwendoline – Overture
Roussel Suite in F, Op 33
Detroit Symphony Orchestra / Paul Paray
Mercury 434 303-2MM (68 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1957-60

Paray's classic Chabrier collection radiates a truly life-enhancing spontaneity, an all-too-rare commodity today. His España has to be one of the most twinklingly good-humoured ever committed to disc – an account overflowing with rhythmic panache and unbuttoned exuberance – whilst the adorable Suite pastorale has rarely sounded so fresh-faced and disarming, even if Paray's very swift 'Sous bois' does take some getting use to. The excerpts from Le roi malgré lui are dispatched with memorable theatrical charisma and huge gusto, qualities which extend to a blistering rendition of the remarkable, almost feverish overture to Gwendoline. But Paray reserves perhaps his finest achievement for the uproarious Joyeuse marche and Bourrée fantasque (an astonishingly quick-witted, vital conception). The orchestra respond with irrepressible spirit and characteristic Gallic poise, and the Mercury engineering astonishes in its intrepidly wide range of dynamic and full-blooded brilliance (just sample those hefty bass-drum thwacks towards the end of España). All this and Roussel's bustling, neo-classical Suite too! An irresistible confection.

Further listening

Chabrier Bourrée fantasque. Dix pièces pittoresques – Idylle; Scherzo-valse
Couplings: Fauré Ballade, Op 19 Ravel Gaspard de la nuit. Jeux d'eau. Pavane pour une Infante défunte
Satie Gymnopédie No 1
Cole pf
Decca 748 021-2DH (64 minutes: DDD: A/01) Ⓕ

Cole not only has a superb technique but uses it to fulfil the composers' intentions with a fidelity all too rare in this repertoire. Terrific playing.

Cécile Chaminade French 1857-1944

GROVE Chaminade studied privately with Godard and other Conservatoire teachers and gave her first public concert at 18. She wrote several major works in the 1880s, including an orchestral suite, a symphonie dramatique Les amazones, a Concertstück for piano and orchestra and an opéra comique; thereafter she wrote little besides piano pieces and songs, music of considerable charm, perhaps influenced by what was expected of a woman composer. She toured widely, several times in England (from 1892) and in the USA (1908).

Piano works

Piano Sonata in C minor, Op 21. Rigaudon, Op 55 No 6. Les Sylvains, Op 60. Arabesque, Op 61. Prelude in D minor, Op 84 No 3. Troisième valse brillante, Op 80. Inquiétude, Op 87 No 3. Quatrième valse, Op 91. Valse-Ballet, Op 112. Album des enfants – Book 1, Op 123: No 4, Rondeau; No 5, Gavotte; No 9, Orientale; No 10, Tarantelle; Book 2, Op 126: No 1, Idylle; No 2, Aubade; No 9, Patrouille; No 10, Villanelle. Le passé, Op 127 No 3. Cortège (Fragment), Op 143. Sérénade espagnole, Op 150
Peter Jacobs pf
Hyperion CDA66846 Ⓕ
(74 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1995 ●

Cécile Chaminade's craftsmanship, talent for graceful melodic inventiveness, easy natural charm and effective keyboard writing are indisputable even by those whose tastes are for more elaborate or more solid fare. This volume from Peter Jacobs offers eight of her children's pieces of Opp 123 and 126 – small but far from the conventional pap so often palmed off on children, as is shown by the scintillating Tarantelle (which is not all that easy!). There are more substantial concert works here too: the emotional Le passé, the once very popular Sérénade espagnole which Kreisler took up, and the immensely engaging Troisième valse brillante. Since Chaminade is usually thought of as a miniaturist, however, the big eye-opener here is a relatively early C minor Sonata which, if not a masterpiece, reveals that as well as knowing her Chopin and Schumann she had a firm sense of form and an enviable abundance of ideas; the lyrical Andante is unexpectedly thoughtful, and the spirited finale goes well beyond Norman Demuth's rather patronizing remark that she was 'nearly a genius who knew what and how to write for pianists of moderate ability' – which perhaps is best exemplified here in a brilliant D minor Prelude that sounds harder than it is. As before, Peter Jacobs shows himself to be fluent, clean-fingered, elegantly delicate where required, and able to invest the music with fine nuances of tone and pace – an ideal interpreter of Chaminade.

Songs

Awards 2002

'Mots d'amour'
Alleluia[a]. L'amour captif[a]. L'anneau d'argent[a]. Attente (Au pays de Provence)[a]. Auprès de ma mie[a]. Bonne humeur[a]. Capriccio, Op 18[b]. Chanson triste[a]. Danse païenne, Op 158[c]. Ecrin[a]. Espoir[a]. L'Eté[a]. Je voudrais[a]. La lune paresseuse[a]. Malgré nous[a]. Ma première lettre[a]. Menuet[a]. Mignonne[a]. Nice-la-belle[a]. Mots d'amour[a]. Pas des cymbales, Op 36 No 2[c]. Rondeau, Op 97[b]. Ronde d'amour[a]. Sérénade espagnole, Op 150[b]. Si j'étais jardinier[a]. Sombrero[a]. Valse carnavalesque, Op 73[c]. Viens! mon bien-aimé![a]. Villanellea. Voisinage[a]
[a]Anne Sofie von Otter mez [b]Nils-Erik Sparf vn Bengt Forsberg, [c]Peter Jablonski pfs
DG 471 331-2GH (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●

Here is something to delight all but the most misanthropic listeners. Although Cécile Chaminade's piano music has never been entirely neglected, her songs have remained firmly locked away. Chaminade composed over 125 mélodies at the height of her fame between 1890 and 1910; she was equally popular as a pianist and composer, in 1907 giving a 25-concert tour in the USA.

Von Otter and Forsberg open with one of Chaminade's most popular songs, Ronde d'amour. It is also one of the very few to have been recorded before – by the 80-year-old Lucien Fugère in 1928. He sings it more as a folksong, but von Otter tilts it towards the theatre, taking it very fast and with some lovely playful half-spoken effects. La lune paresseuse that follows, with a beautiful rippling melody in the accompaniment, shows Chaminade in a more ecstatic vein, the singer offering a prayer to the moon. The recital moves back and forth between the romantic, the exotic and the whimsical. In the hands and the voice of lesser artists, Chaminade's songs might seem hoplessly dated, but von Otter and Forsberg so obviously relish the elegant vocal lines and the really imaginative (and demanding) piano parts.

A totally entrancing CD from two of the greatest explorers of repertory.

Gustave Charpentier

French 1860-1956

GROVE Charpentier studied at the Lille Conservatory and with Massenet in Paris, developing a passion for the bohemian life of Montmartre and a distaste for authority, also winning the Prix de Rome in 1887. In Rome he wrote the orchestral suite Impressions d'Italie, the symphony-drama La vie du poète and the first act of his most famous work, the opera Louise (1900). His growing reputation and the expected scandal of its theme of women's liberation made Louise a success; it anticipated Puccini's verismo works but also recalls Gounod and, in its leitmotifs and harmony, Wagner. In 1913 he had short-lived success with his last opera, Julien, further operas of the 'people' being projected but not completed. He was founder of the Conservatoire Populaire Mimi Pinson, which gave free musical tuition to midinettes from 1902.

Louise

Ninon Vallin sop Louise; Georges Thill ten Julien; André Pernet bass Father; Aimée Lecouvreur mez Mother Christiane Gaudel mez Irma Rougel Chorus; Orchestra / Eugène Bigot Ⓗ
Nimbus Prima Voce mono NI7829 Ⓜ
(69 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1935

The première of Louise took place at the Opéra-Comique in April 1900 and it now seems to be back in fashion. The spell works from the very first moment, with Georges Thill's clarion voice calling up the hill in Montmartre for his lover. As can be seen in Abel Gance's famous film of the opera, made in 1938, Thill was a trifle stiff as an actor, visually, but the power and passion of his vocal acting is heart-stopping. Until you've heard him you don't know what a heroic French tenor is.

Vallin's voice was sometimes described as mezzo-soprano and her version of 'Depuis le jour' is robust, with more urgency than many modern sopranos give it. The scenes chosen here concentrate on Louise, Julien and Louise's father – her mother and all those extras and crowds don't get much of a hearing. The final scene, the row between Louise and her father – the first resounding blow struck for modern feminism in a modern opera – is the greatest moment in this recording, Vallin and Pernet generating enough electricity to light up the Eiffel Tower. The sound is very well reproduced. This glimpse of this adorable opera is one of the most delightful and important of all historic recordings.

Marc-Antoine Charpentier

French 1643-1704

GROVE Charpentier studied in Rome, probably with Carissimi, whose oratorios he introduced into France. On his return to Paris he was employed as composer and singer by the Duchess of Guise and also collaborated with Molière in the theatre. In the early 1680s he entered the service of the grand dauphin, for which Louis XIV granted him a pension in 1683, and he was for a time music teacher to Philippe, Duke of Chartres (later Duke of Orleans and Regent of France). Perhaps also in the 1680s Charpentier became attached to the Jesuit church of St Louis in Paris, and from 1698 until his death he held the important post of maître de musique of the Saint-Chapelle, for which he wrote some of his most impressive works.

Charpentier's church music was based initially on mid-century Italian models, but soon incorporated French modes of expression – the 'official' grandeur of the grand motet; the declamatory manner of the court air and Lullian récit; the 'popular' simplicity of noëls; and an often elaborately ornamented melodic line. Charpentier was the only Frenchman of his time to write oratorios of any quality. His theatre compositions are even more indebted to French models, and he was an important composer of airs sérieux and airs à boire.

Concert pour quatre violes, H545

Concert pour quatre parties de violes, H545. Il faut rire et chanter: Dispute de bergers, H484. La pierre philosophale, H501. Airs – Ah! Qu'ils sont courts les beaux jours, H442. Ah qu'on est malheureux, H443. Ah, laissez-moi rêver, H441. Auprès du feu l'on fait l'amour, H446. Ayant bu du vin claret, H447. Charmantes fleurs naissez, H449*b*. En vain rivaux assidus, H452. Fenchon, la gentile Fenchon, H454. Non, non je ne l'aime plus, H455. Quoi! Je ne verrai plus, H461. Quoi! rien ne peut vous arrêter, H462. Rentrez, trop indescrets soupirs, H464. Sans frayeur dans ce bois – Chaconne, H467. Tristes déserts, sombre retraîte, H469 P

Sophie Daneman, Adèle Eikenes, Patricia Petibon sops Paul Agnew, Andrew Sinclair, François Piolino tens David le Monnier bar Alan Ewing bass Ensemble Orlando Gibbons; Les Arts Florissants / William Christie

Erato 3984-25485-2 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included ●

Here is a delightfully constructed programme, of which only the tenderly expressive Concert pour quatre parties de violes has made previous appearances on disc. But it is the way in which William Christie has dispersed its six movements irregularly within a longer sequence of mainly continuo airs for one and two solo voices that lends particular charm to the programme, ensuring at the same time a consistently high and diverting musical interest. The four-strand string Concert is a piece of outstanding merit, beautifully crafted and affectingly expressive. Ensemble Orlando Gibbons play with tonal warmth, rhythmic suppleness and insight into the subtle inflective nuances present in each and every section of the piece. The texture is light and transparent, which it needs to be in order to disclose the sheer beauty of the harmonies and phrase contours. After the Concert it is the airs sérieux, all but one of which are supported solely by continuo, that most readily engage your interest.

The odd one out is Charmantes fleurs naissez for two sopranos and, in this performance, sporting two recorders. It's a ravishing piece, sung with sensibility by Sophie Daneman and Adèle Eikenes. Paul Agnew has four solo airs which he sings with declamatory elegance and a feeling for their expressive intensity.

La pierre philosophale is a comedy by Thomas Corneille and Donneau de Visée, for which Charpentier provided music for one of its five acts. The story-line is Indian paper-thin, but Charpentier's score is characteristically animated and entertaining. Christie brings it to life with all his customary flair and the performance is captivating from start to finish. In short, this disc is a winner.

Dialogus inter angelum et pastores

Dialogus inter angelum et pastores, H406^{a}. Mors Saülis et Jonathae, 'Cum essent congregata ad praelium', H403^{b}. Sacrificium Abrahae, H402^{c} P

^{bc}Jaël Azzaretti, ^{bc}Marie-Louise Duthoit sops Gérard Lesne, ^{bc}Benjamin Clee countertens Jean-François Novelli, ^{bc}Nicholas Bauchau tens Ronan Nédélec, ^{bc}Raimonds Spogis basses Il Seminario Musicale / Gérard Lesne Ⓕ

Naïve Astrée E8821 (68 minutes: DDD) ●

French countertenor Gérard Lesne and Il Seminario Musicale manage to bring Charpentier's three miniature oratorios vividly to life. The works employ narrators – sometimes a solo voice, sometimes the chorus – in a highly dramatic series of instrumental and vocal movements, carefully tinged with suspensions and chromatic inflections. Both Mors Saülis et Jonathae and Sacrificium Abrahae rely on tightly constructed dialogues cast in recitative. Lesne intensifies the characterisation by associating particular combinations of continuo instruments and organ stops with each of the interlocutors. Melodic, melismatic movements are reserved for moments of powerful emotion, as when David weeps for his brother Saül.

Although Il Seminario Musicale take pride in performing without a conductor, they would not produce the precision of ensemble so evident in this recording but for the vigilance of the continuo players. The absence of a principal interpreter is audible and here, as in less complex chamber music, the effect is highly desirable. Lesne delivers a string of inspiring performances in a raft of roles – as do Jean-François Novelli as David and Abraham and the bass Raimonds Spogis as Samuel. This recording should definitely top your shopping list.

Leçons de Ténèbres du Vendredi Saint

Agnès Mellon sop Ian Honeyman ten Jacques Bona bar Il Seminario Musicale / Gérard Lesne counterten Virgin Classics Veritas 759295-2 (71 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included P Ⓕ

Recorded 1994

Charpentier wrote many settings of the Tenebrae, or Leçons de Ténèbres, and they invariably inspired him to great heights of expressive intensity. Their texts come from the Lamentations of Jeremiah the Prophet, but are interspersed with affective, ornamental, melismatic phrases inspired by letters of the Hebrew alphabet. In addition to the Leçons the sequence includes Antiphons and Responses as well as plainchants with their faburdens for the Psalms, and occasional instrumental ritornellos. Not quite all of this music is by Charpentier. Pieces by Nivers, one of the greatest French organists of the time, are also included in the sequence.

The Leçons de Ténèbres idiom allows for dramatically highly charged effects and, in the hands of Charpentier, such effects are often realised with thrilling suspensions, dissonances and impassioned declamation. Indeed, one often senses the composer's love for, and experience in writing for, the stage in the many theatrical gestures and in his vividly pictorial handling of the texts. Certainly this highly emotive blend of sacred and secular ingredients resulted in music of extraordinary intensity, none of which is lost on Gérard Lesne and his ensemble, Il Seminario Musicale. They are sensible to the myriad expressive nuances suggested by the texts and realized in music of reflective intensity.

Leçons de Ténèbres de la Semaine Sainte de 1692 – H135; H136; H137. Méditations pour le Carême – H380; H381; H386; H387; H388
Thibaut Lenaerts, Cyril Auvity countertens Pierre Evreux, Ian Honeyman tens Alain Buet, Ronan Nédélec bars Le Concert Spirituel / Hervé Niquet
Glossa GCD921604 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, texts and translations included

Messe de Monsieur de Mauroy, H6
Marie-Louise Duthoit, Claire Gouton sops Serge Goubiod counterten Pierre Evreux ten Christophe Sam bass Le Concert Spirituel / Hervé Niquet
Glossa GCD921602 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, texts and translations included

It almost goes without saying that a Hervé Niquet recording of Charpentier is going to be a thing of beauty, and these two offerings do nothing to confound such expectations. Whether it is in the long build-up to the top of the grand arch that is the opening Kyrie of the Messe de Monsieur de Mauroy, or the ardent twists and dissonances with which the first of the Leçons de Ténèbres announces itself, it only takes a few moments for Niquet's expert team of singers and instrumentalists to draw us into the achingly expressive world of 17th-century France.

Composed around 1691, this is the longest of his 11 Masses, and its many sections seem to move effortlessly from one to another, creating a constantly shifting range of subtle responses to text – some sweet, some stirring, some lilting and some weighty – while successfully maintaining the work's continuity.

Charpentier composed 31 incomplete sets of Leçons de Ténèbres, those intense settings of the Lamentations of Jeremiah that were so popular in Holy Week in France during the mid-Baroque period, and which produced some of its most ravishing musical moments. Scored for six male voices, strings, flutes and continuo, this set moves between straightforward declamation and music of increasing harmonic and dramatic urgency to present a striking evocation of the desolation of the ruined Jerusalem.

Hervé Niquet and his team touch their accustomed heights here. Their performances are exquisitely judged, showing an unerring feel for the music's expressive ebb and flow. Two releases of thorough desirability.

Christmas Music

Canticum in nativitatem Domini, 'Usquequo avertis', H416. Dialogus inter angelos et pastores Judeae in nativitatem Domini, H420. Noël: un flambeau, Janette, Isabelle!, H460c
Aradia Ensemble / Kevin Mallon
Naxos 8 557036 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded c2002 ●

Perhaps few composers have produced as much beautiful Christmas music as Charpentier. Both oratorios recorded here are generously laid out for soloists, chorus and a sweet-toned, atmospherically nocturnal ensemble of recorders and strings, a grand motet-style line-up which Charpentier uses to create a work with clear dramatic pretensions. Thus, in addition to the ravishing choral writing of the kind at which Charpentier excelled, each oratorio has a gentle instrumental number to represent night (an archetype taken straight from the dreamy sommeils of French Baroque opera), followed by a tootly little dance-chorus to represent the 'awakening of the shepherds', and later on a perky march to send them off to Bethlehem. In this way Charpentier's faultless music brings together his own contemporary world and that of the New Testament in an utterly beguiling mixture of richness and simplicity.

The Toronto-based Aradia Ensemble are superbly attuned to the music's atmosphere. Perhaps an extra ounce of vocal refinement could have been drawn from the choir, but more important is that these performances show an unfailing appreciation of style, taste and sheer beauty of sound. The result is a Christmas treat for us all.

Mass, H1

Mass, H1. Te Deum, H147. Precatio pro filio regis, H166. Panis quem ego dabo, H275. Canticum Zachariae, H345, 'Benedictus Dominus Deus' 🅿
Le Concert Spirituel / Hervé Niquet
Naxos 8 553175 (57 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996 Ⓢ

This early Mass is a beautiful piece, intimately scored for voices with two melody instruments and continuo. The Mass is harmonically richly inventive with passages of vivid word-painting. Taken as a whole the work is generously endowed with subtle inflexions, a pervasive element of contemplation, and effectively varied rhythmic juxtapositions which enliven the text and hold our attention.

The Te Deum, for four soloists, four-part choir and colla parte instruments, is not that one for which Charpentier is renowned but a smaller, later piece belonging to the last years of his life. Modest in scale it may be but musically it is impressive and emotionally satisfying. The choir and instrumentalists of Le Concert Spirituel are on their usual lively form. Some of the solo vocal contributions are more focused than others but the choir maintains a high standard of vocal blend and secure intonation. The recorded sound is very good indeed and Niquet directs with stylistic assurance.

Messe pour les trépassés, H2

Messe en la mémoire d'un prince Ⓟ
Charpentier Messe pour les trépassés, H2[a]. Motet pour les trépassés, H311[b]. Miserere mei , H193[b]
Couperin Les carillons de Paris[c]
Roberday Fugue et Caprice VIII[c]
[a]Caroline Pelon sop [a]Pascal Bertin counterten [a]Hans Jörg Mammel ten [a]Jean-Claude Sarragosse bass [c]Jean-Marc Aymes org [ab]Namur Chamber Choir, [ab]Ensemble La Fenice / Jean Tubéry rec
Virgin Classics Veritas 545394-2
(63 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included Ⓕ
Recorded 1999

This recording is the product of a close and fruitful collaboration between scholars (including the late Jean Lionnet, Jean Duron and Catherine Cessac) and performers. Together they have given us a deeply moving requiem service that reflects the latest thinking in period style. The performances are simple and dignified, like a rather exquisite string of pearls. The succession of musical forms, textures, instruments and voices is breathtaking and complex. Charpentier created individual musical architectural structures to enhance the individual lines of the Latin texts, exploiting seemingly endless combinations of voices (apparently eight) and instruments. To complete the sense of a religious occasion, church bells are rung at the beginning, and organ music by Charpentier's distinguished contemporaries, Louis Couperin and François Roberday, has been interleaved. The performances suit the notional occasion, and so while – appropriately – no one voice stands out among the solo singers, as a choir they produce strong clean lines, consistently in tune. The finely tuned continuo instrumentation and the added ornamentation are stunning refinements worthy of a jeweller.

Te Deum, H146

Te Deum, H146. Dixit Dominus, H202. Domine salvum fac regem, H291. In honorem S Ludovici Regis Galliae canticum, H365. Marches pour les trompettes, H547
Le Concert Spirituel / Hervé Niquet Ⓕ
Glossa GCD921603 (55 minutes: DDD) ●

Hervé Niquet and his ensemble are old hands at the repertoire of the French grand motet for choir and instruments by now, and Charpentier in particular has been well served by them. Here they move into familiar ground in the form of the best-known of his Te Deum settings, prefaced by two scurrying, delightful little marches and coupled with three motets not currently available elsewhere. These last should be good enough reason to acquire the disc, but even for those who have a Te Deum or two in their collection already, Niquet's reading of it is another. With a choir of 12 and a one-to-a-part band, this is as limpid and lithe a performance of the piece as you are likely to hear. Niquet chooses some fleet tempos, but also injects the music with a catchy rhythmic lilt and an attention to declamatory detail that constantly keeps the music alive. And when a smoother arch is required, as in the choral soprano setting of 'te ergo quaesumus', he can touch the heart too. Good recorded sound and balance make this a disc to have.

Vesper psalms / Magnificat, H72

Charpentier Beatus vir, H221. Laudate pueri, H149. Laetatus sum, H216. Nisi Dominus, H150. Lauda Jerusalem, H210. Ave maris stella, H60. Magnificat, H72. Salve regina, H24 Nivers Antiphonarium Monasticum, Antiennes I-VI
Le Concert Spirituel / Hervé Niquet
Naxos 8 553174 (61 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1995 Ⓢ

This release offers a liturgical reconstruction of the Vespers office. The five Vesper psalms and Magnificat belong to different periods in Charpentier's life and the six antiphons are by his organist-composer contemporary, Nivers. The reconstruction works well and Le Concert Spirituel, under Hervé Niquet, demonstrates its rapport with Charpentier's music. The vocal sound is fresh and the wide range of musical Affekt shows off a greater diversity of tonal colour. Tenors and basses incline towards a roughness of timbre here and there yet, overall, the bright and full-blooded choral sound is pleasing and vital. Some may find the recording balance of the psalms and canticle a fraction too close, creating the atmosphere of a drawing-room Vespers rather than one in more spacious, ecclesiastical surroundings. The antiphons fare much better in this respect, having a deeper aural perspective. This is a richly rewarding programme of music which never disappoints.

Actéon

Awards 1982/83

Dominique Visse counterten Actéon; Ⓟ
Agnès Mellon sop Diane; Guillemette Laurens mez Junon; Jill Feldman sop Arthébuze; Françoise Paut sop Hyale; Les Arts Florissants Vocal Ensemble
La Comtesse d'Escarbagnas/Le Mariage Forcé – Ouverture

Michel Laplénie ten Philippe Cantor ten
Les Arts Florissants Ensemble / William Christie
Harmonia Mundi Musique d'abord HMA195 1095 Ⓑ
(47 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1981 ●●●

Charpentier's little vignette opera is an astonishingly rich score containing most, if not all, the ingredients of a tragédie-lyrique. There is a profusion of fine choruses and dances but an overture which departs somewhat from the standard Lullian pattern. Actéon is made up of six short scenes well contrasted with one another. The first of them is musically the most colourful with appealing evocations of La chasse and a riotous dance as the hunters go in search of their quarry. The second scene is much gentler with a tender air for Diana, pastoral reflections from her followers and a recurring chorus of nymphs which recalls passages in Blow's Venus and Adonis. Jill Feldman as Arthebuze, one of Diana's attendants, is admirably languid in her air disdaining love's ardour. Scene 3 discloses a pensive Actéon who, whilst reflecting on matters of the heart, stumbles upon Diana and her retinue in a state of déshabillé. Actéon's defence is touching and is delicately portrayed by Dominique Visse. The fourth tableau begins with Acteon's discovery that he has been turned into a stag: 'A horrible fur enwraps me', he cries and, at this point Visse cleverly alters the character of his voice: 'Ma parole n'est plus qu'une confuse voix.' A poignant symphonie follows. In the fifth tableau Actéon is torn to pieces by his own hounds and, in the sixth and final scene, Junon imperious as ever explains to the hunters what they have just done. A chorus of grief mingled with anger sung by Acteon's followers brings this little opera de chasse to an end.

Christie directs the work from beginning to end with conviction and assurance. The action is well paced and there is an intensity of expression, a fervour, which gives a touching emphasis to the drama.

Médée

Lorraine Hunt sop Médée; Bernard Deletré bass Créon; Monique Zanetti sop Créuse; Mark Padmore ten Jason; Jean-Marc Salzmann bar Oronte; Noémi Rime sop Nérine P
Les Arts Florissants / William Christie
Erato ③ 4509-96558-2 (195 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1994 ●●

Lorraine Hunt's Medea is something of a tour de force. She invests every word with meaning and produces the widest range of colour to express all the emotional nuances in Medea's complex character – jealousy, indignation, tenderness, sorrow, fury, malignity and outright barbarism: she is especially outstanding in Act 3, one of the most superb acts in all baroque opera, in which she has no fewer than four great monologues, the first with affecting chromatic harmonies, the second accompanied by feverish rushing strings, the third the sombre 'Noires filles du Styx' with its eerie modulations, the fourth with dark orchestral colours. Charpentier's orchestration and texture, indeed, are wonderfully effective: string writing varies between extreme delicacy (beautifully played here) and savage agitation; the cool sound of the recorders is refreshing and the many dances featuring recorders and oboes are enchanting. As Jason, Mark Padmore, a real haute-contre, sings with admirable ease and intelligence and the tragic Creusa, poisoned by the vengeful Medea is the light-voiced Monique Zanetti, the very embodiment of youthful innocence and charm: her death scene, still protesting her love for Jason, is most moving. A notable detail in all the principals, incidentally, is their absorption of agréments, with Hunt showing special mastery in this regard. There is a large cast for the numerous minor roles, all well taken; and the chorus sings cleanly and with evident commitment. All told, a considerable achievement, and a triumph for Christie.

Ernest Chausson French 1855-1899

GROVE Chausson grew up in comfortable and cultured circumstances but turned to music only after being trained in law. Studying with Massenet at the Paris Conservatoire, he came under Franck's influence and visited Germany to hear Wagner. His friends in Paris included Mallarmé, Debussy, Albéniz and Cortot. He died prematurely in a cycling accident but his output reflects his growing maturity from dependence on Massenet, Franck and Wagner, seen in the prettiness of early songs and the orchestration of the symphonic poem Viviane (1882), to a more elaborate, intensely dramatic style in the Poème de l'amour et de la mer (1882-93) and the opera Le roi Arthus (1886-95), and finally to a period of serious melancholy which produced the Turgenev-inspired Poème op.25 for violin and orchestra (1896) and some concise chamber music. Once criticised for being vague and Wagnerian, his music took on a more classical expression from about 1890, when he turned towards older Gallic and Italian resources and to Couperin and Rameau.

Soir de Fête, Op 32

Symphony in B flat, Op 20. Viviane, Op 5. Soir de fête, Op 32. La têmpete – Air de danse; Danse rustique
BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Yan Pascal Tortelier
Chandos CHAN9650 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ●

There are at least two misconceptions to put right about Franck's arguably most gifted pupil. The first, which this disc dispels admirably, is that the majority of Chausson's music, in the manner of his Poème, is endlessly melancholic or elegiac. And the second, which Tortelier's disc doesn't dispel quite so well, is that in his orchestral writing Chausson never managed to free himself from Wagner's embrace. Never entirely perhaps, but by the time the 43-year-old composer came to write his last orchestral piece, the nocturnal Soir de fête included here, his escape from Wagner was well underway, and who knows where it might have led, had it not been for his tragically early death the following year? The outer sections of Soir de fête have something about them of 'the vibrating, dancing rhythms of the atmosphere' of Debussy's later Fêtes. The programme as a whole, the overall richness of the orchestral process – whether Wagnerian, Franckian, Straussian (as in the Arthurian sorcerer Merlin's final enchantment by Viviane) or Chaussonian – is well served by the full-bodied sound of Tortelier's BBC Philharmonic. The Symphony, like Franck's, is cyclical, but not otherwise as indebted to the older composer as is often suggested. There are none of Franck's organ-loft sonorities anywhere in Chausson's wonderfully variegated, open-air orchestration. Tortelier here gives us the finest modern recording of the Symphony now available. Each movement is superbly built, and Chandos's recording is truly impressive although in the excerpts from Chausson's incidental music for The Tempest, the sound is perhaps a little bulky.

Poème, Op 25

Poème, Op 25 (arr cpsr). Piano Trio in G minor, Op 3. Andante et Allegro. Pièce, Op 39
Charles Neidich cl Philippe Graffin vn Gary Hoffman vc Pascal Devoyon pf Chilingirian Quartet (Levon Chilingirian, Charles Sewart vns Asdis Valdimarsdottir va Philip de Groote vc)
Hyperion CDA67028 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

The opulent sound of this disc is ideal for Chausson; it especially suits the impassioned early Trio. Devoyon plays the demanding piano part in the grand style, yet the strings are never swamped. In particular, Philippe Graffin's sensuous, unforced tone sails above the texture without any of the strenuous feeling we experience in other performances. All three players sound completely at home, whether in the rhetorical gestures of the work's big moments, or the poised delicacy of the second movement. This Trio, though an early work, is already fully characteristic of Chausson – the way the carefree, day-in-the-country atmosphere at the start of the finale is gradually overtaken by tragic portents very strongly shows his melancholic nature. The Andante et Allegro is less individual, but here, too, the performance rises to the occasion – and beyond. Neidich's playing is quite remarkable for its breadth of expression in the Andante as well as for the extraordinarily brilliantly articulated Allegro. Hoffman and Devoyon are equally convincing in the beautiful, dreamy Pièce for cello and piano The most novel aspect of the disc, paradoxically, concerns the most familiar music: this is the first recording of a newly rediscovered version of the Poème, with string quartet and piano accompaniment. As a chamber work, the music's essentially intimate tone is felt more strongly, and Graffin gives a plangent account of the solo part, with something of that sense of freedom that Ysaÿe, the work's sponsor, would certainly have conveyed. The only trouble with the arrangement is the loss of perspective between the soloist and an 'orchestra' led by another solo violin. But the Chilingirian and Devoyon play the sustained 'tutti' music beautifully.

Carlos Chávez

Mexican 1899-1978

GROVE Chávez studied with Ponce (1910-14) and Ogazón (1915-20) but was self-taught as a composer, being most influenced by his experience of Indian culture. A visit to Europe in 1922-3 was unproductive, but his first trip to the USA (1923-4) began a close association: in 1926-8 he lived in New York and formed friendships with Copland, Cowell and Varèse. On his return to Mexico he became founder-director of the Mexico SO (1928-48) and director of the National Conservatory (1928-33), having a decisive influence on Mexican cultural life. His works include seven symphonies (the Sinfonía india is no.2, 1936) and two Aztec ballets (El fuego nuevo, 1921; Los cuatro soles, 1925). He was a master of orchestration, particularly of wind writing, and explored concerto writing; characteristic are the four Soli (1933-66) for small groups and orchestra.

Piano Sonatas

Sonatas – No 2; No 6. Cinco caprichos. Seven Pieces. 10 Preludes
Hsuan-Ya Chen pf
Elan ② CD82406 (123 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998

Chávez's piano music presents a very different picture of the composer from that we are familiar with through his orchestral music, even the more abstract later symphonies (Vox). There are precious few indications of the folkloric exoticism of the Sinfonía india in the five works played here, indeed little enough to suggest their Mexican origin.

The three large movements of the Second Sonata (1919-20) possess a Lisztian bravura which persuaded Ignaz Friedman, no less, to arrange for its publication in 1923. By that time Chávez was moving to a more modernistic, angular style in a series of miniatures collated in 1930 as the Seven Pieces. The 10 Preludes (1937) are radically different again. Starting out as a set based on the seven Gregorian modes, Chávez exchanged the percussive, overtly colouristic manner of earlier pieces for a more contrapuntal style. Deceptively simple-sounding, the Preludes form a wonderfully expressive sequence that deserves exposure in the recital room.

So, too, does the excellent Cinco caprichos (1975), his final solo piano work. The quicker, odd-numbered movements are capricious indeed, twisting and turning through a variety of moods, offset by the second and fourth, with their evocative bass-up writing for the left hand.

The biggest surprise, though, is the Sixth Sonata which is convincingly Mozartian in every fibre, but without a hint of pastiche. If ever a work was meant to be heard with the innocent ear then this is it. Across a full half-hour Chávez recreates the spirit of the classical sonata, however modern the inner structure.

Hsuan-Ya Chen plays with admirable authority, and the sound is nicely clear and resonant.

Luigi Cherubini

Italian 1760-1842

GROVE Cherubini was a dominant figure in French musical life for half a century. At 18, with 36 works (mainly church music) to his credit, he began a period of study with Sarti in Bologna and Milan (1778-80). The resulting Italian operas he produced in Italy and London (1784-85), and his work as an Italian opera director (1789-90) in Paris (where he had settled in 1786), pale in significance next to the triumphant première of his second French opera, Lodoïska (Paris, 1791). He was appointed inspector at the new Institut National de Musique (from 1795 the Conservatoire), his status soon being enhanced by the successes of Médée (1797) and Les deux journées (1800). As surintendant de la musique du roi under the restored monarchy, he turned increasingly to church music, writing seven masses, two requiems and many shorter pieces, all well received (unlike his later operas). National honours, a commission from the London Philharmonic Society (1815) and the directorship of the Conservatoire (1822) and completion of his textbook, Cours de contrepoint et de fugue (1835), crowned his career.

Cherubini's importance in operatic history rests on his transformation of merely picturesque or anecdotal opéra comique into a vehicle for powerful dramatic portrayal (eg Médée's depiction of psychological conflict) and for the serious treatment of contemporary topics.

His best church music, notably the C minor Requiem (specially admired by Beethoven, Schumann, Brahms and Berlioz), unites his command of counterpoint and orchestral sonority with appropriate dramatic expression, while his non-vocal works, chiefly the operatic overtures, Symphony in D and six string quartets, make their effect through the creative use of instrumental colour.

Mass No 1 in C minor

Mass No 1 in C minor. Marche funèbre
Corydon Singers; Corydon Orchestra / Matthew Best
Hyperion CDA66805 (54 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included
Recorded 1995

It would be an oversimplification to suggest that Matthew Best emphasizes the Beethoven rather than the Berlioz aspect of the main work here; but he does seem less interested in the fascinating use of colour as an element in the actual invention than in the rugged moral strength and the force of the statements. The recording reflects this emphasis, and is firm and clear without being especially subtle over orchestral detail. The choir delivers the Dies irae powerfully, and much dramatic vigour is recalled in the fugue traditionally reserved for 'Quam olim Abrahae'. Berlioz, however, was satirical about Cherubini's fugues, and saved his admiration for the wonderful long decrescendo that ends the Agnus Dei. This is beautifully controlled here. Best includes the tremendous Marche funèbre, inspiration here again for Berlioz. Best handles this superbly, opening with a merciless percussion crash and sustaining the pace and mood unrelentingly. It sounds more original than ever, a funeral march that, rather than mourn or honour, rages against the dying of the light.

Mass in D minor

Mass in D minor
Camilla Tilling, Azuko Suzuki sops Sara Fulgoni contr Kurt Streit, Andreas Schulist tens Tómas Tómasson bass Bavarian Radio Chorus and Symphony Orchestra / Riccardo Muti
EMI 557166-2 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included
Recorded live in 2001

Like the better-known and more frequently recorded Requiem in C minor, this superb work might appear to owe much to Beethoven and Berlioz. In fact, they are the ones who owe so much to Cherubini. From the dynamic, sometimes almost exhausting energy on display here came much in Beethoven, as with sections of the Gloria. There is much else to admire in this Mass, including a fine Agnus Dei and a Sanctus on the spacious scale of the French Revolutionary ceremonial music that also inspired Berlioz. Muti, heir to Toscanini's and Serafin's admiration of Cherubini, has a powerful sense of the drama that charges the music, and he draws soloists and chorus into a performance of the greatest conviction. The recorded sound is a little thick and dry, but not so as to deter the curious, who are sure to be rewarded.

Requiem in C minor

Requiem in C minor[a]. Marche funèbre
[a]Gruppo Vocale Cantemus; Italian Swiss Radio [a]Chorus and Orchestra / Diego Fasolis
Naxos 8 554749 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1996

Cherubini's C minor Requiem was admired by both Berlioz and Beethoven, with good reason, since both owed a great deal to a work that is not far short of a masterpiece. For Beethoven, the music's rugged strength and the force of the statements held much; Berlioz, often mocking and unfair to Cherubini, responded warmly to the use of instrumental colour as part of the actual invention (and took the monotone chanting that movingly ends the Agnus Dei for Juliet's funeral cortège in his Romeo and Juliet). To oversimplify, if Christoph Spering and his Cologne artists (Opus 111) give a more colourful, 'Berliozian' performance, Matthew Best and the Corydon Singers (Hyperion) and players respond to the 'Beethovenian' aspect of the music. There is, of course, much more to it than that. Both are excellent performances.

So is the present one. Certainly it has more of an emotional charge in the 'Dies irae' than Spering's which, once the trump has sounded, gathers the voices with nervous intensity rather than the urgent drama that both Best and Fasolis discover. Best and Fasolis also produce great vigour for the 'Quam olim Abrahae' fugue. No-one can make very much of the Sanctus, a surprisingly weak movement; all respond sensitively to the strange 'Pie Jesu', Best and Fasolis with rather sharper definition of phrasing.

All three open with the tremendous Marche funèbre, another piece that inspired Berlioz when he came to write his Hamlet funeral march. Excellent as the new performance is, those who acquired Best, in particular, can rest content.

Medée

Maria Callas sop Medea; Gino Penno ten Jason; H
Maria Luisa Nache sop Glauce; Giuseppe Modesti bass Creon; Fedora Barbieri mez Neris; Angela Vercelli mez Maidservant I; Maria Amadini mez Maidservant II; Enrico Campi bass Captain of the Guard; La Scala, Milan Chorus and Orchestra / Leonard Bernstein
EMI mono ② 567909-2 (129 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded live at La Scala Theatre, Milan in 1953 ●

It was Callas's particular genius to find exactly the appropriate mode of expression for every role she tackled. Here we have Callas the avenging tigress as Medea. But there are also a hundred different individual inflections to reflect the emotion of the moment: indeed, as John Steane points out in one of his illuminating notes, it is often a small aside that reveals as much about the character she is portraying as a big set-piece. That said, it is the shattering outburst of Act 3 that makes her Medea such a terrifying experience. This is a reading of the central solo that has seldom, if ever, been surpassed. De Sabata was intended as the conductor of Medea but fell ill. Serafin wasn't available, so Callas asked for Bernstein, of whom she had heard good things. The results are revelatory. Bernstein, in his first operatic assignment anywhere, breathes new life into Cherubini's score, in spite of some rude cuts, and finds much more immediate drama in it than did an ageing Serafin in Callas's commercial recording. In consequence she is in absolutely terrific form, the very incarnation of a woman who has been crossed in love.

And it isn't only Callas and Bernstein who make this set so unmissable. Here is a house at the peak of its form. La Scala produces just the apt singer for each role. Gino Penno has the right heroic, spinto sound for Jason. Giuseppe Modesti is a warm Creon.

This is a feast not only for Callas aficionados but for anyone interested in Italian opera at its most potent.

Additional recommendation
Medea
Sass Medea Luchetti Jason Kováts Creon
Budapest Symphony Orchestra; Hungarian Radio and Television Chorus / Gardelli
Hungaroton ② HCD11904/5 Ⓕ
(137 minutes: rec 1977). Notes, text and translation included

Sass is impressive, managing to capture the humanity as well as the horror. She also has a vivid, distinctive vocal personality so essential for the recording of such a role. The other soloists are equally fine.

Fryderyk Chopin Polish 1810-1849

GROVE The son of French émigré father (a schoolteacher working in Poland) and a cultured Polish mother, Chopin grew up in Warsaw, taking childhood music lessons (in Bach and the Viennese Classics) from Wojciech Zywny and Jósef Elsner before entering the Conservatory (1826-29). By this time he had performed in local salons and composed several rondos, polonaises and mazurkas. Public and critical acclaim increased during the years 1829-30 when he gave concerts in Vienna and Warsaw, but his despair over the political repression in Poland, coupled with his musical ambitions, led him to move to Paris in 1831. There, with practical help from Kalkbrenner and Pleyel, praise from Liszt, Fétis and Schumann and introductions into the highest society, he quickly established himself as a private teacher and salon performer, his legendary artist's image being enhanced by frail health (he had tuberculosis), attractive looks, sensitive playing, a courteous manner and the piquancy attaching to self-exile. Of his several romantic affairs, the most talked about was that with the novelist George Sand – though whether he was truly drawn to women must remain in doubt. Between 1838 and 1847 their relationship, with a strong element of the maternal on her side, coincided with one of his most productive creative periods. He gave few public concerts, though his playing was much praised, and he published much of his best music simultaneously in Paris, London and Leipzig. The breach with Sand was followed by a rapid deterioration in his health and a long visit to Britain (1848). His funeral was attended by nearly 3000 people.

No great composer has devoted himself as exclusively to the piano as Chopin. By all accounts an inspired improviser, he composed while playing, writing down his thoughts only with difficulty. But he was no mere dreamer – his development can be seen as an ever more sophisticated improvisation on the classical principle of departure and return. For the concert-giving years 1828-32 he wrote brilliant virtuoso pieces (eg rondos) and music for piano and orchestra the teaching side of his career is represented by the studies, preludes, nocturnes, waltzes, impromptus and mazurkas, polished pieces of moderate difficulty. The large-scale works – the later polonaises, scherzos, ballades, sonatas, the Barcarolle and the dramatic Polonaise-fantaisie – he wrote for himself and a small circle of admirers. Apart from the national feeling in the Polish dances, and possibly some narrative background to the ballades, he intended notably few references to literary, pictorial or autobiographical ideas.

Chopin is admired above all for his great originality in exploiting the piano. While his own playing style was famous for its subtlety and restraint, its exquisite delicacy in contrast with the spectacular feats of pianism then reigning in Paris, most of his works have a simple texture of accompanied melody. From this he derived endless variety, using wide-compass broken chords, the sustaining pedal and a combination of highly expressive melodies, some in inner voices. Similarly, though most of his works are basically ternary in form, they show great resource in the way the return is varied, delayed, foreshortened or extended, often with a brilliant coda added.

Chopin's harmony however was conspicuously innovatory. Through melodic clashes, ambiguous chords, delayed or surprising cadences, remote or sliding modulations (sometimes many in quick succession), unresolved dominant 7ths and occasionally excursions into pure chromaticism or modality, he pushed the accepted procedures of dissonance and key into previously unexplored territory. This profound influence can be traced alike in the music of Liszt, Wagner, Fauré, Debussy, Grieg, Albéniz, Tchaikovsky, Rachmaninov and many others.

Piano Concertos

No 1 in E minor, Op 11; No 2 in F minor, Op 21

Awards 1999

Piano Concertos Nos 1 and 2
Martha Argerich pf Montreal Symphony Orchestra / Charles Dutoit
EMI 556798-2 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●●●

Martha Argerich's first commercially released recordings of the Chopin concertos were for DG; No 1 in 1968, No 2 in 1978. Here she revisits both concertos and offers an act of re-creative daring, of an alternating reverie and passion that flashes fire with a thousand different lights. Indeed, her earlier performances are infinitely less witty, personal and eruptive, less inclined to explore, albeit with the most spontaneous caprice and insouciance, so many new facets, angles and possibilities. Now, everything is accomplished without a care for studios and microphones and with a degree of involvement that suggests an increase rather than a diminution of her love for these works. The recordings are impressively natural and if Dutoit occasionally seems awed if not cowed into anonymity by his soloist (the opening tuttis to the slow movements of both concertos are less memorable than they should be) he sets off Argerich's charisma to an exceptional degree. Argerich's light burns brighter than ever. Rarely in their entire history have the Chopin concertos received performances of a more teasing allure, brilliance and idiosyncrasy.

Piano Concertos Nos 1 and 2
Murray Perahia pf
Israel Philharmonic Orchestra / Zubin Mehta
Sony Classical SMK87323 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded live in 1989 ●

Perahia has never made any secret of his liking for the 'inspirational heat-of-the-moment' of a live performance as opposed to a studio recording, where 'sometimes things get tame'. As enthusiastic audience applause (discreetly rationed on the disc) makes plain, these two concertos were recorded live at Tel Aviv's Mann Auditorium. Whether they were subsequently 'doctored' we don't know, but the finished product brings us a Perahia miraculously combining exceptional finesse with an equally exceptional urgency. In all but the finale of No 1 (where Pollini on EMI beats him by a minute) his timings throughout both works are considerably faster than most of his rivals on disc. Was this prompted by 'inspirational heat-of-the-moment'? Or was it a deliberate attempt to come closer than others do to the surprisingly briskish metronome markings printed in the Eulenburg scores? The two slow movements are distinguished by exquisitely limpid cantabile and superfine delicacy of decorative detail while again conveying urgent undercurrents. But in a guessing-game perhaps it would be the two finales that would most betray the identity of the soloist. Not only are they faster, but also of a more scintillating, scherzando-like lightness. The recording is first-rate.

Piano Concertos Nos 1 and 2
Polish Festival Orchestra / Krystian Zimerman pf
DG ② 459 684-2GH2 (82 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1999 ●

Krystian Zimerman was in his early twenties when he recorded the Chopin concertos for DG two decades ago, with Carlo Maria Giulini conducting the Los Angeles Philharmonic. For his long-anticipated remakes he directs the Polish Festival Orchestra from the keyboard, an ensemble he founded and trained from scratch. Are the results worth all the extraordinary effort (and no doubt expense) that went into this project? In many ways, yes. Helped by DG's exquisite engineering, Chopin's oft-maligned orchestrations emerge with the clarity of a venerable painting scrubbed clean and fully restored. Not one string phrase escapes unaccounted for. Every dynamic indication and accent mark is freshly considered, and each orchestral strand is weighed and contoured in order for each instrument to be heard, or, at least, to make itself felt. Some listeners may find the strings' ardent vibrato and liberal portamentos more cloying than heartfelt, yet the vocal transparency Zimerman elicits from his musicians underscores the crucial influence of bel canto singing on this composer. If he downplays many of Chopin's dynamic surges and enlivening accents, he compensates with carefully pinpointed climaxes in both concertos' slow movements. The slow timings, incidentally, have less to do with fast versus slow than the pianist's insidiously spaced ritardandos and broadening of tempos between sections. More often than not he lets his right hand lead, rather than building textures from the bottom up, or bringing out inner voices as Argerich does in her more forceful, impulsive renditions. By contrast, some of Zimerman's salient expressive points have calcified rather than ripened with age. Having said that, he has clear ideas of what he wants, and commands the formidable means to obtain the desired results, both at the keyboard and in front of his hand-picked musicians. Of the many offerings made to celebrate Chopin's 150th anniversary, Zimerman's achievement stands out.

Piano Concertos Nos 1^a and 2^b 🄷
Noel Mewton-Wood pf ^{a}Netherlands Philharmonic Orchestra, ^{b}Zurich Symphony Orchestra / Walter Goehr
Dante Historical Piano Collection HPC105 Ⓕ
(69 minutes: ADD). Recorded c1951 and 1948

Inconsolable after the death of his partner Bill Fredricks, Noel Mewton-Wood (1922-53) committed suicide and robbed the world of a musical genius. Born in Melbourne, he included, in his London-based career, work with Schnabel, a début (in Beethoven's Third Concerto) with Sir Thomas Beecham, the frequent replacement of Benjamin Britten as Peter Pears's musical collaborator and, mercifully for the present generation, the making of several recordings taken from his eclectic and enterprising repertoire.

Amazingly, in his incomparably sensitive and robust hands, the Chopin concertos seem as though heard for the first time, their passions and intimacies virtually re-created on the spot. Who of today's pianists would or could risk such candour or phrase and articulate Chopin's early intricacy with such alternating strength and delicacy? The notes (in French only) suggest parallels with Solomon, Anatole Kitain and Murray Perahia, yet as with all truly great artists, Mewton-Wood's playing defies comparison, however exalted. No more vital or individual performances exist on record. The orchestra is hardly a model of precision or refinement, but the recordings have come up remarkably well.

Piano Concerto No 1. Ballade in G minor, Op 23 . Nocturnes, Op 15 – No 1 in F; No 2 in F sharp minor. Nocturnes, Op 27 – No 1 in C sharp minor; No 2 in D flat. Polonaise No 6 in A flat, Op 53, 'Heroic'
Maurizio Pollini pf Philharmonia Orchestra / Paul Kletzki
EMI Studio Plus 566221-2 (73 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1960-68 ●●

This disc is a classic. The concerto was recorded shortly after the 18-year-old pianist's victory at the Warsaw competition in 1959. Nowadays we might expect a wider dynamic range to allow greater power in the first movement's tuttis, but in all other respects the recording completely belies its age, with a near perfect balance between soloist and orchestra. This is, of course, very much Pollini's disc, just as the First Concerto is very much the soloist's show, but effacing as the accompaniment is, Pollini's keyboard miracles of poetry and refinement could not have been achieved without one of the most characterful and responsive accounts of that accompaniment ever committed to tape. The expressive range of the Philharmonia on top form under Kletzki is throughout exceptional, as is the accord between soloist and conductor in matters of phrasing and shading. The solo items are a further reminder of Pollini's effortless bravura and aristocratic poise.

Piano Concerto No 2. Preludes, Op 28
Maria João Pires pf Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / André Previn
DG 437 817-2GH (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992 ●●

Here, beautifully partnered by Previn and the RPO, and recorded with the greatest warmth and clarity, Pires gets the treatment she deserves. What gloriously imposing breadth as well as knife-edged clarity she brings to each phrase and note. The stylishness of her rubato reminds us that the inspiration behind the F minor Concerto was Constantia Gladkowska, a young singer and Chopin's first love. Listen to Pires's fioritura in the heavenly Larghetto or her way of edging into the finale's scintillating coda and you will gasp at such pianism and originality. Indeed, the opening of her finale may surprise you with its dreaminess (Allegro vivace?) but as with all great pianists, even her most extreme ideas are carried through with unshakeable conviction and authority.

Pires's 24 Preludes, too, remind us that she is the possessor of one of the most crystalline of all techniques. Understatement plays little part in her conception and those who prefer the more classically biased playing of artists such as Pollini are in for some surprises. You will rarely hear Chopin playing of greater mastery or calibre. In her own scrupulously modern way she surely embodies the spirit of the great pianists of the past; of Kempff, Edwin Fischer and, most of all, Cortot.

Piano Concerto No 2 in F minor, Op 21^{a}. 🄷
Ballade No 1 in G minor, Op 23. Mazurka in C minor, Op 56 No 3. Etudes, Op 10 – No 6 in E flat minor; No 8 in F; No 9 in F minor. Scherzo No 4 in E, Op 54. Andante spianato and Grande Polonaise, Op 22
Artur Rubinstein pf
^{a}Philharmonia Orchestra / Carlo Maria Giulini
BBC Legends/IMG Artists mono BBCL4105-2 Ⓕ
(78 minutes: ADD)
Recorded live in 1959; ^{a}1961 ●

Rubinstein remains the most elegant and life-affirming of all great Chopin pianists, his patrician ease and stylistic distinction the envy and despair of lesser mortals. Above all he understood a central paradox, that Chopin was in love with the human voice yet sensing the limitation of words and a single vocal line confided his deepest, most fiery and intimate thoughts to the piano, an instrument of a supposed percussive limitation. No pianist has played Chopin with a more translucent and uncluttered tone, with a greater sense of singing 'line', of vocal breathing and inspiration. His rubato was personal and inimitable, a subtle bending of the phrase, an ebb and flow. Above all there was his sovereign naturalness. Audiences felt transported, indeed transfigured by his playing.

These wondrous performances literally transport you to another world. True, there are tiny slips of finger and concentration (an amusing one in the Andante Spianato where at 4'04" he starts a descent in the wrong clef only to quickly right himself) yet they do nothing to qualify a sense of supreme mastery. In the Concerto where, despite a once traditional and disfiguring cut in the opening tutti, he is memorably partnered by Giulini, Rubinstein achieves a flawless balance between Chopin's ever-elusive mix of poise and intensity. In his recital his reading of the great C minor Mazurka surely numbers among the greatest of all Chopin performances in its play of light and shade, of brio and introspection.

But all these performances are memorable, haunting one over the years and now, thankfully, available in beautifully remastered sound.

Piano Concertos Nos 1 and 2 (chamber versions)
Fumiko Shiraga pf Jan-Inge Haukås db Yggdrasil Quartet (Fredrik Paulsson, Per Oman vns Robert Westlund va Per Nyström vc)
BIS CD847 Ⓕ
(72 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1996 ●

This is one of the most exciting Chopin recordings in recent years because it confronts and deepens the uneasiness that Chopin lovers have with his concertos. They are more comfortable as chamber works, the chamber works he never succeeded in writing when he confronted that form head on. If you find Chopin's ideas inflated when cast in orchestral form, this recording will remove the last traces of doubt. Pianist Fumiko Shiraga has reduced the scope of the music, and wisely so. The heroism and grandeur is of the sort one finds in Schumann's piano-chamber context, the dynamic and expressive extremes that Shiraga achieves are no less compelling than a pianist unleashed against a large orchestra. Shiraga doubles in some tutti passages – a surprise at first, but again a wise decision. She adds gravity and fullness to the Yggdrasil Quartet's excellent accompaniment while remaining hidden, diligently underscoring but never overbearing.

Piano Trio in G minor, Op 8

Piano Trio. Cello Sonata in G minor, Op 65. Introduction and Polonaise brillant in C, Op 3 (versions for pf, vc and pf, arr Feuermann)
Pamela Frank vn Yo-Yo Ma vc Emanuel Ax, Eva Osinska pfs
Sony Classical SK53112 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1989-92

This most welcome reminder of the 'chamber music' Chopin starts with his G minor Piano Trio dedicated to his compatriot, the would-be composer-cum-cellist, Prince Radziwill. Rarely has it enjoyed what might be termed 'bigger-named' rescue on disc. For even if Chopin's beloved piano gets the best of it, a performance as imaginatively characterised as this makes you salute the teenage work anew. Despite the procrustean (for Chopin) demands of sonata-form, the minor-key challenges of the opening Allegro con fuoco are conveyed with appealing urgency before the amiable grace of the Scherzo, the smouldering romance of the Adagio sostenuto and the dance-like gaiety of the finale. Shortly after accepting the Trio's dedication, Prince Radziwill invited Chopin to stay at his country estate – hence the Op 3 Polonaise brillant in C for the Prince to play with his bewitching 17-year-old pianist daughter. Here, Yo-Yo Ma chooses Emanuel Feuermann's reworking of the cello part – as Chopin himself might well have enhanced it with decorative fioriture had the Prince's fingers been as agile as his daughter's.

The mature Cello Sonata receives a tactfully balanced, persuasively fluid performance from Ma and Ax that ranks with the best of its rivals. The recording is vivid and true.

Cello Works

Cello Sonata in G minor, Op 65. Polonaise brillante in C, Op 3 (ed Feuermann). Grande duo concertante in E on themes from Meyerbeer's 'Robert le Diable'. Nocturne in C sharp minor, Op posth (arr Piatigorsky). Etude in E minor, Op 25 No 7 (arr Glazunov). Waltz in A minor, Op 34 No 2 (arr Ginzburg). Etude in D minor, Op 10 No 6 (arr Glazunov)
Maria Kliegel vc Bernd Glemser pf
Naxos 8 553159 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1994

Here are Chopin's complete works for cello and piano complemented by an intriguing garland of encores. Performed with youthful relish, impressively balanced and recorded, this is a notable offering. Clearly, Kliegel and Glemser have few reservations concerning the sonata's surprisingly Germanic overtones. Recognisably Chopin in virtually every bar there remains an oddly Schumannesque bias, particularly in the finale's tortuous argument – an irony when you consider that Chopin had so little time for his adoring colleague. Yet this awkward and courageous reaching out towards a terser form of expression is resolved by both artists with great vitality and, throughout, they create an infectious sense of a live rather than studio performance. Kliegel and Glemser are no less uninhibited in Chopin's earlier show-pieces, written at a time when the composer had a passing passion for grand opera and for what he dismissed as 'glittering trifles'. Their additions (transcriptions by Glazunov, Piatigorsky and Ginzburg) remind us how singers, violinists and cellists beg, borrow or steal Chopin from pianists at their peril. As Chopin put it, 'the piano is my solid ground; on that I stand the straightest', and his muse has proved oddly and magically resistant to change or transcription. Still, even though the selection often suggests an alien opacity, the performances are most warmly committed.

'Cello Waltzes', Volume 1
Etude in C sharp minor, Op 25 No 7 (arr Glazunov). Grande valse brillante in D, Op 18 (arr Davïdov). Mazurkas – G minor, Op 67 No 2; C, Op 67 No 3; A minor, Op 67 No 4; A minor, Op 68 No 2; B flat, Op posth (arr Wispelwey/Lazić). Preludes, Op 28 – No 2 in A minor; No 3 in G; No 4 in E minor; No 6 in B minor; No 7 in A (arr Wispelwey/Lazić). Waltzes – No 2 in A flat, Op 34 No 1; No 3 in A minor, Op 34 No 2; No 5 in A flat, Op 42 (arr Davïdov). Nocturne No 20 in C sharp minor, Op posth (arr Piatigorsky). Introduction and Polonaise brillante in C, Op 3. Cello Sonata in G minor, Op 65 – Scherzo
Pieter Wispelwey vc Dejan Lazić pf
Channel Classics CCS16298 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 and 2000 ●●

Chopin's music, so beautifully conceived for the piano's sonority and technique, is treacherous territory for an arranger. But a good case can be made for transcription to Chopin's next most favoured instrument, the cello. The performances, full of verve and expressive sensitivity, provide an even stronger argument. The valse arrangements by the 19th-century cellist Davïdov transform Chopin's pianistic evocations into virtuoso cello pieces, most spectacularly so in the case of Op 34 No 1, with its rocketing scales and sparkling passagework. That the original character often changes – the repeated-note figure at the start of Op 18 has a quite different effect when articulated by a bouncing bow – seems not to matter when the music sounds so idiomatic in its new dress.

Glazunov's beautiful arrangement of the famous slow Etude from Op 25 and Piatigorsky's version of the Nocturne are just as successful. The artists' own arrangements are simpler in scope. The Mazurkas are, no doubt, specially chosen for their appropriateness as cello pieces, and the lyrical Preludes sound most impressive, if more overt and operatic than usual. Only the third Prelude seems a mistake; the semiquavers are a cellistic tour de force, but the long notes added to the piano bass introduce an earthbound quality that's not there in the original. Very good recorded sound, and brilliant and imaginative cello playing.

Four Ballades

No 1 in G minor, Op 23; No 2 in F, Op 38;
No 3 in A flat, Op 47; No 4 in F minor, Op 52

Ballades Nos 1-4. Mazurkas – No 7 in F minor, Op 7 No 3; No 13 in A minor, Op 17 No 4; No 23 in D, Op 33 No 2. Waltzes – No 1 in E flat, Op 18; No 5 in A flat, Op 42; No 7 in C sharp minor, Op 64 No 2. Etudes, Op 10 – No 3 in E; No 4 in C sharp minor. Nocturne No 1 in F, Op 15
Murray Perahia pf
Sony Classical SK64399 Ⓕ
(61 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1994 ●●●

This is surely the greatest, certainly the richest, of Perahia's many exemplary recordings. Once again his performances are graced with rare and classic attributes and now, to supreme clarity, tonal elegance and musical perspective, he adds an even stronger poetic profile, a surer sense of the inflammatory rhetoric underpinning Chopin's surface equilibrium. In other words the vividness and immediacy are as remarkable as the finesse. And here, arguably, is the oblique but telling influence of Horowitz whom Perahia befriended during the last months of the old wizard's life. Listen to the First Ballade's second subject and you will hear rubato like the most subtle pulsing or musical breathing. Try the opening of the Third and you will note an ideal poise and lucidity, something rarely achieved in these outwardly insouciant pages. From Perahia the waltzes are marvels of liquid brilliance and urbanity. Even Lipatti hardly achieved such an enchanting lilt or buoyancy, such a beguiling sense of light and shade. In the mazurkas, too, Perahia's tiptoe delicacy and tonal irridescence (particularly in Op 7 No 3 in F minor) make the music dance and spin as if caught in some magical hallucinatory haze. Finally, two contrasting Etudes, and whether in ardent lyricism (Op 10 No 3) or shot-from-guns virtuosity (Op 10 No 4) Perahia's playing is sheer perfection. The recording beautifully captures his instantly recognizable, glistening sound world.

Ballades Nos 1-4. Barcarolle in F sharp, Op 60. Berceuse in D flat, Op 57. Scherzo No 4 in E, Op 54
Evgeni Kissin pf
RCA Red Seal 09026 63259-2 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998

Kissin plays Chopin with a rhetorical drama, intensity and power that few could equal. His technique is of an obliterating command, enough to make even his strongest competitors throw up their hands in despair, and yet everything is at the service of a deeply ardent and poetic nature. Listen to his slow and pensive Andantino in the Second Ballade, its rhythm or thought-pattern constantly halted and checked, the following presto storms of such pulverizing force that they will make even the least susceptible hackles rise and fists clench as Jove's thunder roars across the universe. The first subject of the First Ballade is daringly slow and inward-looking, the start of the glorious Fourth evoking the feelings of a blind man when first granted the gift of sight, while the Berceuse is seen through an opalescent pedal haze that creates its own hallucinatory and rarified atmosphere. The final page of the Barcarolle – always among music's most magical homecomings – is given with an imaginative brio known to very few, and the Fourth Scherzo is among the most Puckish and highly coloured on record. The recordings are less than ideally beautiful but more than adequate. An astonishing achievement.

Ballades[f] – No 3 in A flat, Op 47; No 4 in F minor, Op 52. Etude in E, Op 10 No 3[a]. Grande Valse Brillante in D, Op 18[f]. Nocturnes – No 2 in E flat, Op 9 No 2[d]; No 8 in D flat, Op 27 No 2[e]; No 13 in C minor, Op 48 No 1[g]; No 15 in F minor, Op 55 No 1[f]; No 19 in E minor, Op 72 No 1[e]. Scherzos – No 2 in B flat minor, Op 31[g]; No 4 in E, Op 54[c]. Waltz No 7 in C sharp minor, Op 64 No 2[b]
Shura Cherkassky pf
BBC Legends/IMG Artists BBCL4057-2 Ⓜ
(76 minutes: ADD/[c]DDD). Recorded live in [a]1970, [b]1978, [c]1991, [d]1980, [e]1983, [f]1987 and [g]1988 ●●

A compilation such as this would be outstanding in any context. That it comes at a time when Decca's series of live Cherkassky recordings has not only dried up but also been deleted (shame!) makes it all the more welcome. Aficionados will not need to be told that Cherkassky was a pianist for whom the epithet 'magician' might have been invented. How he managed to play so freely, in every dimension of the pianist's art, and yet (usually) without violence to the music, is something that would challenge the powers of the subtlest analyst and the most imaginative essayist to convey. Even in his favourite repertoire he seemed to be constantly surprised and enthralled by every turn the music took, while another part of his musicianship stood guarantor of coherence and inevitability. Best not to enquire too deeply. Best simply to marvel.

Not that everyone would agree with that assessment; and certainly Cherkassky's studio recordings often found the magic dimmed. There were even live appearances that seemed to support the sceptics more than the believers. But this Chopin selection is overwhelmingly a delight. The Nocturnes float as if on a magic carpet, the Waltzes are as affectionate as they are elegant (with wicked echt-Cherkasskian voicings in the C sharp minor), the Ballades seem to follow some secret narrative thread, and the Scherzos are shot through with daring, yet never self-serving, nuances.

Total consistency is not to be expected: the end of the F minor Ballade, the central section of the Etude, and several passages in the Op 31 Scherzo are uncomfortably strenuous. Yet those very same pieces have moments of heart-stopping inspiration, and the E major Scherzo – recorded a decade ago on Cherkassky's 82nd birthday – is technically the most wizardly performance of them all. The recordings come from seven different occasions, and the quality of the instruments is variable. The pianos in London's Queen Elizabeth Hall and, especially, the Queen's Hall, Edinburgh sound poorly regulated, affecting three of the Nocturnes. But this remains a CD to cherish.

Etudes

Etudes – Opp 10 and 25
Murray Perahia pf Ⓕ
Sony Classical SK61885 (56 minutes: DDD) ●●●

Perahia brings order and lucidity to the heart of Chopin's most audacious fire-storms and in, for example, Etudes Nos 1 and 4 from Op 10, you are made more aware than ever of an incomparable mix of poetry and precision. Perahia's may be a wholly modern voice yet he truly speaks in the spirit of his revered masters of the past, of Cortot and Fischer in particular, and this, allied with his immaculate infinitely polished and shaded pianism, gives his performances the rarest distinction and quality.

How superb and unfaltering is his mastery in No 1, that magnificent curtain-raiser to Op 10, how magical his improvisatory touch in its closing page. His textural translucency and musical breathing, his rubato in No 3, like that of Rubinstein, is that of a great and natural singer of the keyboard. Chopin would surely have cried out once again, 'ah, mon patrie!' if he had heard this performance.

No 8 is delightfully rumbustious and just when you note a touch of evasion in his rapid spin through the morbid near-Wagnerian chromaticism of No 6 you find yourself relishing his cool tempo, a musical ease and flexibility that give new meaning to Chopin's prescribed con molto espressione. On the other hand No 7 from Op 25 unfolds with the truest, most memorable sense of its lento elegy. And where else have you heard a more impassioned or articulate Revolutionary Etude?

Faced with artistry of this calibre, criticism falls silent; one can only listen and wonder at such unalloyed perfection. Perahia's is the finest of all modern discs of the Etudes, and Sony's sound captures all of his artistry.

Etudes, Opp 10 and 25
Maurizio Pollini pf DG 413 794-2GH Ⓕ
(56 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1972 ●

The 24 Etudes of Chopin's Opp 10 and 25, although dating from his twenties, remain among the most perfect specimens of the genre ever known, with all technical challenges – and they are formidable – dissolved into the purest poetry. With his own transcendental technique (and there are few living pianists who can rival it) Pollini makes you unaware that problems even exist – as for instance in Op 10 No 10 in A flat, where the listener is swept along in an effortless stream of melody. The first and last of the same set in C major and C minor have an imperious strength and drive, likewise the last three impassioned outpourings of Op 25. Lifelong dislike of a heart worn on the sleeve makes him less than intimately confiding in more personal contexts such as No 3 in E major and No 6 in E flat minor from Op 10, or the nostalgic middle section of No 5 in E minor and the searing No 7 in C sharp minor from Op 25. Like the playing, so the recording itself could profitably be a little warmer at times, but it is a princely disc all the same.

Etudes, Opp 10 and 25. Ballades.
Waltzes – Nos 1–19
Augustin Anievas pf
EMI Double Forte ② 574290-2 Ⓜ
(146 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1966-75 ●

These recordings celebrate the sadly far-distant heyday of American pianism, a time when New York's Juilliard School turned out keyboard athletes of an enviable prowess and charisma. Here is a pianist whose dismissal of every daunting difficulty of the 24 Etudes is so nonchalant that it allows him total freedom to turn pragmatism into the purest poetry, and achieve a glamorous perfection. His scintillating play of light and shade in the opening curtain-raiser is as delectable as it is masterly, and he is even more magically deft in No 2, where his impeccable right-hand flight is counterpointed by the most witty relish of the left hand's tic-toc momentum. Listen to the lift he gives each phrase in the etude in sixths, or hear him in the so-called 'Winter Wind', and you will be aware of the most imperious command combined with the most elegant musicianship.

In the Ballades Anievas may offer a less potent or focused experience than, say, Zimerman or Perahia, yet all these readings are alive with special insights. In the Waltzes Anievas is once more in his element, a ballroom dancer of rare urbanity and ease. In short, few more beguiling recordings of the Waltzes exist.

The recordings have come up admirably. This is an invaluable issue by a superlative pianist.

Fantasie, Op 49

Fantasie in F minor, Op 49. Waltzes – No 2 in A flat, Op 34 No 1; No 3 in A minor, Op 34 No 2; No 5 in A flat, Op 42. Polonaise No 5 in F sharp minor, Op 44. Nocturnes – No 1 in C sharp minor, Op 27 No 1; No 2 in D flat, Op 27 No 2; No 10 in A flat, Op 32 No 2. Scherzo No 2 in B flat minor, Op 31
Evgeni Kissin pf
RCA Victor Red Seal 09026 60445-2 Ⓕ
(67 minutes: DDD). Recorded live in 1993

Evgeni Kissin's playing at 21 (when these performances were recorded) quite easily outmatches that of the young Ashkenazy and Pollini – and most particularly in terms of the maturity of his musicianship. The programme launches off with a reading of the great F minor Fantasie, which, though a bit measured, is integrated to perfection. The power and determination of the performance certainly make one sit up and listen, but at the same time it would be difficult not to be moved by the heartfelt lyricism of the melodic passages. Although Kissin may be a little unsmiling in the three waltzes, at least he has admirable sophistication in being able to add interest to the interpretations. His control in the tricky A flat, Op 42, is quite amazing. The Nocturne in C sharp minor is a jewel. This reading is among the most darkly imaginative and pianistically refined on disc. The disc ends with a powerfully glittering performance of the Second Scherzo.

Mazurkas

Nos 1-64: Op 6 Nos 1-4 (1-4); Op 7 Nos 1-5 (5-9); Op 17 Nos 1-4 (10-13); Op 24 Nos 1–4 (14-17); Op 30 Nos 1-4 (18-21); Op 33 Nos 1-4 (22-25); Op 41 Nos 1-4 (26-29); Op 50 Nos 1-3 (30-32); Op 56 Nos 1-3 (33-35); Op 59 Nos 1-3 (36-38); Op 63 Nos 1-3 (39-41); Op 67 Nos 1-4 (42-45); Op 68 Nos 1-4 (46-49); Op posth (50-64)

Mazurkas Nos 1-51
Artur Rubinstein pf
RCA Victor Red Seal ② 09026 63050-2 Ⓑ
(140 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1960s ●●

Recording in the studio, rather than at a live concert, quite naturally leads to a safe and uniform approach, which does not really serve the inspired inventiveness of the music. In some ways these recordings suffer from this. If one compares Rubinstein's readings here with those that he recorded on 78rpm records in 1938-39 (reviewed overleaf), one immediately notices that an element of fantasy and caprice has given way to a more sober view of the music. The Mazurkas are so intricate in their variety of moods that the successful pianist has to be able to treat each one as a definite entity, contrasting the emotional content within the context of that particular piece. Rubinstein, with his serious approach, lends the music more weight than is usual and he wholly avoids trivializing it with over-snappy rhythms. With him many of the lesser-known Mazurkas come to life, such as the E flat minor, Op 6 No 4, with its insistent little motif that pervades the whole piece. His phrasing is free and flexible and he has utter appreciation of the delicacy of Chopin's ideas. He does not, however, take an improvisatory approach. Rubinstein judges to perfection which details to bring out so as to give each piece a special character. He convinces one that he has made this music his own. When you hear Rubinstein tackle the C sharp minor Mazurka, Op 53 No 3, you at once know that he fully comprehends the depth of this, perhaps the greatest of all of them. He ranges from the pathos of the opening to a persuasive tonal grandeur in the more assertive parts, and yet is able to relate the two. The recording has a number of blemishes: the piano is too closely recorded, the loud passages are hollow-toned, especially in the bass, and little sparkle to the sound.

Mazurkas Nos 1-52, 55, 56, 59-62 ✪
Vladimir Ashkenazy pf
Double Decca 448 086-2DF2 Ⓑ
(143 minutes: DDD/ADD). Recorded 1976-85 ●●

Vladimir Ashkenazy made his integral set of the Mazurkas over a decade. He has always played outstandingly. He does so again here, giving complete satisfaction. The set includes all those published posthumously and the revised version of Op 68 No 4; so his is the most comprehensive survey in the current catalogue. Ashkenazy memorably catches their volatile character, and their essential sadness. Consider, for example, the delicacy and untrammelled spontaneity with which he approaches these works. He shows the most exquisite sensibility, each item strongly, though never insistently characterised. His accounts of the Mazurkas, Op 6 and Op 7, for instance, offer a genuine alternative to Rubinstein. Nine pieces in all, they were Chopin's first published sets and their piquancy, the richness of their ideas, is here made very apparent. One is given a sense of something completely new having entered music. Although there are fine things in all the groups, Op 24 is the first Mazurka set of uniformly high quality and No 4 is Chopin's first great work in the genre.

On hearing them together like this one appreciates the cumulative effect which the composer intended, and Ashkenazy makes a hypersensitive response to their quickly changing moods. The recorded sound has the warmth, fullness and immediacy typical of this series, with a nice bloom to the piano tone.

Mazurkas Nos 1-51^{a}; No 23 in D, Op 33 No 2^{b}; Ⓗ
No 35 in C minor, Op 56 No 3^{e}; No 41 in C sharp minor, Op 63 No 3^{f}. Waltzes – No 2 in A flat, Op 34 No 1^{c}; No 7 in C sharp minor, Op 64 No 2^{d}
Artur Rubinstein pf
Naxos Historical mono ② 8 110656/7 Ⓢ
(137 minutes: ADD)
Recorded ^{cd}1928-30, ^{bef}1930-32 and ^{a}1939 ●●●
Nocturnes^{a} – Opp 9, 15, 27, 32, 37, 48, 55, 62 and 71. Scherzos^{b} – Opp 20, 31, 39 and 54 Ⓗ
Artur Rubinstein pf
Naxos Historical mono ② 8 110659/60 Ⓢ
(132 minutes: ADD). Recorded ^{b}1932 and ^{a}1936-37
The Mazurkas – coupled with the Barcarolle, Berceuse, Polonaises Nos 1-7 and Andante spianato and Grand polonaise: all recorded 1938-39 – are also available on EMI Références mono ③ Ⓕ 764697-2 ●●●

At the risk of sparking controversy, one can only say that such playing makes a mockery of present-day standards. A reminder of the cruel adage 'if it is not done easily it is not worth doing', all these performances prove that Rubinstein played the piano as naturally as a bird flies or a fish swims. He was, quite simply, in his element, and never more so than in Chopin.

Who else has given us the Nocturnes with such ravishing inwardness, pianistic sheen and a bel canto to rival the finest singer? Decorative fioriture are spun off like so much silk, and whether or not you consider Op 15 No 2 'inseparable from champagne and truffles' and Op 27 No 1 a portrait of 'a corpse washed ashore on a Venetian lagoon', or hear the nightingales of Nohant in Op 62 No 1 and the chant of the monks of Valdemosa in Op 15 No 3 and Op 37 No 1, you can hardly remain unaffected by Rubinstein's unique artistry. His feline ease in the double-note flow of Op 37 No 2, or the way he lightens the darkness of the great C minor Nocturne without losing an ounce of its tragedy, all form part of the genius that made him the most celebrated of all Chopin pianists.

Rubinstein's Mazurkas are equally the stuff of legends. Chopin's most subtle and confessional diary, they transcend their humble origins and become in Rubinstein's hands an ever-audacious series of miniatures extending from the neurasthenic to the radiant, from Chopin's nagging child (Op 17 No 3) to the unfurling of proud ceremonial colours (Opp 63 No 1). What heartache he conveys in Op 63 No 3; and when has Op 67 No 3 been more intimately confided, its banal association with Les sylphides more blissfully resolved? Chopin's final composition, Op 68 No 4, becomes a valediction encouraging rather than forbidding weeping, Rubinstein's rubato the caressing magic that created a furore at his unforgettable recitals.

Finally the Scherzos, played with an outrageous but enthralling disregard for safety. Only a pedant will underline the odd mis-hit or pockmark within the context of such sky-rocketing bravura and poetic impulse. As an added bonus there are additional recordings of three Mazurkas and two Waltzes, the A flat Op 34 No 1 alive with dizzying virtuoso trickery. The sleeve-note writer may comically mistake the Mazurkas for the Polonaises in referring to Schumann's oft-misquoted description, 'guns [sic] buried in flowers', but that is a mere spot on Naxos's blazing sun. No more life-affirming Chopin exists.

Nocturnes

No 1 in B flat minor, Op 9; No 2 in E flat, Op 9; No 3 in B, Op 9; No 4 in F, Op 15; No 5 in F sharp, Op 15; No 6 in G minor, Op 15; No 7 in C sharp minor, Op 27; No 8 in D flat, Op 27; No 9 in B flat, Op 32; No 10 in A flat, Op 32; No 11 in G minor, Op 37; No 12 in G, Op 37; No 13 in C minor, Op 48; No 14 in F sharp minor, Op 48; No 15 in F minor, Op 55; No 16 in E flat, Op 55; No 17 in B flat, Op 62; No 18 in E, Op 62; No 19 in E minor, Op 72; No 20 in C sharp minor, Op posth; No 21 in C minor, Op posth

---

Nocturnes Nos 1-19
Maria João Pires pf DG ② 447 096-2GH2 Ⓕ
(109 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1996 ●●●

Passion rather than insouciance is Pires's keynote. Here is an intensity and drama that scorn all complacent salon or drawing-room expectations. How she relishes Chopin's central storms, creating a vivid and spectacular yet unhistrionic contrast with all surrounding serenity or 'embalmed darkness'. The con fuoco of Op 15 No 1 erupts in a fine fury and in the first Nocturne, Op 9 No 1, Pires's sharp observance of Chopin's appassionato marking comes like a prophecy of the coda's sudden blaze. Chopin, she informs us in no uncertain terms, was no sentimentalist. More intimately, in Op 15 No 3 (where the music's wavering sense of irresolution led to the sobriquet 'the Hamlet Nocturne') Pires makes you hang on to every note in the coda's curious, echoing chimes, and in the dolcissimo conclusion to No 8 (Op 27 No 2) there is an unforgettable sense of 'all passion spent', of gradually ebbing emotion. Pires with her burning clarity has reinforced our sense of Chopin's stature and created a new range of possibilities (showing us that there is life after Rubinstein). Naturally, Rubinstein's legendary cycles possess a graciousness, an ease and elegance reflecting, perhaps, a long-vanished belle époque. Yet moving ahead, one has no hesitation in declaring Maria João Pires among the most eloquent master-musicians of our time.

Polonaises

No 1 in C sharp minor, Op 26; No 2 in E flat minor, Op 26; No 3 in A, Op 40, 'Military'; No 4 in C minor, Op 40; No 5 in F sharp minor, Op 44; No 6 in A flat, Op 53, 'Heroic'; No 7 in A flat, Op 61, 'Polonaise-fantaisie'; No 8 in D minor, Op 71; No 9 in B flat, Op 71; No 10 in F minor, Op 71; No 11 in B flat minor; No 12 in G flat; No 13 in G minor; No 14 in B flat; No 15 in A flat; No 16 in G sharp minor

---

Polonaises Nos 1-7. Andante spianato and Grande Polonaise in E flat, Op 22 🄷
Artur Rubinstein pf
Naxos Historical mono 8 110661 (64 minutes: ADD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1934-35 ●●●

Here, in all their glory, are Rubinstein's 1934-35 recordings of Chopin's six mature Polonaises framed by examples of his early and late genius (Opp 22 and 61 respectively). Together with his early discs of the Mazurkas, Scherzos (EMI) and Nocturnes, these performances remain classics of an unassailable calibre, their richness and character increased rather than diminished by the passage of time.

For Schumann, the Polonaises were 'canons buried in flowers' and whether epic or confiding, stark or florid their national and personal fervour is realised to perfection by Rubinstein. Listen to the Andante spianato from Op 22 and you will hear a matchless cantabile, a tribute to a bel canto so often at the heart of Chopin's elusive and heroic genius. Try the central meno mosso from the First Polonaise and witness an imaginative freedom that can make all possible rivals sound stiff and ungainly by comparison. The A major Polonaise's colours are unfurled with a rare sense of its ceremonial nature and the darker, indeed tragic, character of its sombre C minor companion is no less surely caught. The two 'big' Polonaises, Opp 44 and 53, are offered with a fearless bravura (you can almost hear the audience's uproar after Rubinstein's thunderous conclusion to the latter), rhythmic impetus and idiomatic command beyond criticism.

The simple truth is that Rubinstein played the piano as a fish swims in water, free to phrase and inflect with a magic peculiarly his own, to make, in Liszt's words, 'emotion speak, weep and sing and sigh'. The sound may seem dated but Naxos's transfers are excellent, and to think that all this is offered at a bargain price…

Polonaises Nos 1-7
Maurizio Pollini pf
DG The Originals 457 711-2GOR Ⓜ
(62 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1975 ●●

This is Pollini in all his early glory, in expertly transferred performances. Shorn of all virtuoso compromise or indulgence, the majestic force of his command is indissolubly integrated with the seriousness of his heroic impulse. Rarely will you be compelled into such awareness of the underlying malaise beneath the outward and nationalist defiance of the Polonaises. The tension and menace at the start of No 2 are almost palpable, its storming and disconsolate continuation made a true mirror of Poland's clouded history. The C minor Polonaise's denouement, too, emerges with a chilling sense of finality, and Pollini's way with the pounding audacity commencing at 3'00" in the epic F sharp minor Polonaise is like some ruthless prophecy of every percussive, anti-lyrical gesture to come. At 7'59" Chopin's flame-throwing interjections are volcanic, and if there is ample poetic delicacy and compensation (notably in the Polonaise-fantaisie, always among Chopin's most profoundly speculative masterpieces), it is the more elemental side of his genius, his 'canons' rather than 'flowers' that are made to sear and haunt the memory. Other pianists may be more outwardly beguiling, but Pollini's magnificently unsettling Chopin can be as imperious and unarguable as any on record. That his performances are also deeply moving is a tribute to his unique status.

Polonaises Nos 1-16. Allegro de concert in A, Op 46. Etudes – F minor, Op posth; A flat, Op posth; D flat, Op posth. Tarantelle in A flat, Op 43. Fugue in A minor. Albumleaf in E. Polish Songs, Op 74 – Spring. Galop marquis. Berceuse. Barcarolle. Two Bourrées
Vladimir Ashkenazy pf

Double Decca ② 452 167-2DF2 Ⓑ
(145 minutes: DDD/ADD). Recorded 1974-84

Ashkenazy's Chopin hardly needs any further advocacy. His distinguished and virtually complete survey rests alongside the Rubinstein recordings in general esteem. The 16 Polonaises were not recorded in sets but individually, or in small groups, which is one reason why they sound so fresh, with Ashkenazy striking a sensitive artistic balance between poetic feeling and the commanding bravura that one takes for granted in the more extrovert pieces, with their Polish patriotic style. The recordings vary between analogue and digital, and the recording venues are as different as the Kingsway Hall, St John's, Smith Square, and All Saints, Petersham; but the realism of the piano sound is remarkably consistent. A series of shorter pieces is included on the second disc and the playing is always distinguished. Among the major items, the gentle Berceuse is quite melting, while the Allegro de concert and Barcarolle are hardly less memorable.

Preludes, Op 28

No 1 in C; No 2 in A minor; No 3 in G; No 4 in E minor; No 5 in D; No 6 in B minor; No 7 in A; No 8 in F sharp minor; No 9 in E; No 10 in C sharp minor; No 11 in B; No 12 in G sharp minor; No 13 in F sharp; No 14 in E flat minor; No 15 in D flat; No 16 in B flat minor; No 17 in A flat; No 18 in F minor; No 19 in E flat; No 20 in C minor; No 21 in B flat; No 22 in G minor; No 23 in F; No 24 in D minor; No 25 in C sharp minor; Op 45; No 26 in A flat, Op posth

Preludes Nos 1-26[a]. Barcarolle[b]. Polonaise No 6[c]. Scherzo No 2 in B flat minor, Op 31[d]
Martha Argerich pf
DG Galleria 415 836-2GGA (62 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded [a]1977, [b]1961, [c]1967, [d]1975 ●

Professor Zurawlew, the founder of the Chopin Competition in Warsaw, was once asked which one of the prize-winners he would pick as having been his favourite. The answer came back immediately: 'Martha Argerich'. This disc could explain why. There are very few recordings of the 24 Preludes (Op 28) that have such a perfect combination of temperamental virtuosity and compelling artistic insight. Argerich has the technical equipment to do whatever she wishes with the music. Whether it is in the haunting, dark melancholy of No 2 in A minor or the lightning turmoil of No 16 in B flat minor, she is profoundly impressive. It is these sharp changes of mood that make her performance scintillatingly unpredictable. In the Barcarolle there is no relaxed base on which the melodies of the right hand are constructed, as is conventional, but more the piece emerges as a stormy odyssey through life, with moments of visionary awareness. Argerich is on firmer ground in the Polonaise, where her power and technical security reign triumphant. The CD ends with a rippling and yet slightly aggressive reading of the second Scherzo. This is very much the playing of a pianist who lives in the 'fast lane' of life. The sound quality is a bit reverberant, an effect heightened by the fact that Argerich has a tendency to overpedal.

Op 47; in F minor, Op 52 No 4. Nocturnes – in C minor, Op 48 No 1; in D flat, Op 27 No 2; in E, Op 62 No 2
Nikolai Lugansky pf Ⓕ
Erato 0927-42836-2 (78 minutes: DDD) ●

Nikolai Lugansky is the young Russian protégé of the late Tatiana Nikolayeva who, confident of his dazzling talent, pronounced him 'the next one'. His first prize in the 1994 Tchaikovsky Competition entirely justified her claim and this disc offers formidable evidence of her unswerving belief. Here we see Chopin gaunt and intense, his inner rage and torment dramatically exposed, the salon figure of popular imagination erased for ever. For Lugansky it is all or nothing, and there is, indeed, 'something of the dark' (and not only in the Nocturnes) about the seething passions he evokes. Hear him in the B major Nocturne and note the tonal richness and imaginative freedom of the greatest Russian singers. How daringly he underlines the sense of elegy in the great C minor Nocturne, how menacingly he weights Prelude No 18, telling its violence with an uncompromising strength.

True, there are, thankfully, other approaches to Chopin. But if some turn for relief to Cortot's careless rapture or Rubinstein's urbanity they will surely admit that Lugansky's Chopin is of a formidable commitment and audacity; Chopin 'through a glass darkly'.

Preludes
Grigory Sokolov pf
Opus 111 OP30-336 (47 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in 1990

Grigory Sokolov is an uncompromising, exclusively serious rather than commercial artist and has consequently paid a price. Even today, he remains an awe-inspiring figure to connoisseurs rather than a wider public. His recordings, too, are sadly few, though this reissue reaffirms him as among the most formidable and characterful pianists of our time. So deeply is every bar, indeed, every note, weighed and considered that each Prelude emerges in a new and arresting light. True, he can bear down so intensely that Chopin is not always allowed his truest or most natural voice. But glories far outweigh queries. Prelude No 2 is authentically lento and lugubrious, its morbidity realised quite without a cool and over-familiar evasion. Again, just as you wonder whether No 13, an idyllic Nocturne, needs such strenuous pleading, you find yourself at No 16, played with a thunderous and lavishly pedalled aplomb, and to a reading of No 17 inflected with rare affection. What daring in No 18, what imaginative delicacy in No 19 (that flight into a cloudless azure), what aerial magic in No 23 with its audacious close, and when have you heard a more dramatic dip from fortissimo to pianissimo in the elegaic and processional C minor Prelude (No 20)?

The sound captures Sokolov's immense dynamic range exceptionally well, and even if you are a lover of understatement or of Cortot's careless and unforgettable rapture you will surely admit that this is among the most powerfully individual of all Chopin recordings.

Chopin 24 Preludes[a] Mendelssohn (arr Rachmaninov) A Midsummer Night's Dream[b] – Scherzo Prokofiev Suggestion diabolique, Op 4 No 4[c] Rachmaninov Lilacs[d]. Moment musical in E minor, Op 16 No 4[e]. Preludes – G, Op 32 No 5[f]; B minor, Op 32 No 10[g] Schumann Kinderszenen, Op 15[h] Stravinsky Etude, Op 7 No 4[i] Vallier Toccatina[j] Weber Piano Sonata No 1 in C – Rondo, 'Perpetuum mobile'[k] H
Benno Moiseiwitsch pf
Testament SBT1196 (78 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded [h]1930, [i]1938, [b]1939, [g]1940, [ad]1948, [cjk]1950, [ef]1956 ●●

Chopin Four Ballades – No 1 in G minor, Op 23[a]; No 2 in F, Op 38[b]; No 3 in A flat, Op 47[c]; No 4 in F minor, Op 52[d]. Nocturne No 2 in E flat, Op 9 No 2[e]. Polonaise No 9 in B flat, Op 71 No 2[f]. 24 Preludes, Op 28[g] H
Benno Moiseiwitsch pf
APR APR5575 (77 minutes: ADD). Recorded [ac]1938 and 1939, [e]1940, [f]1943, [bd]1947, [g]1948 Ⓕ ●●

Benno Moiseiwitsch's love affair with the piano spawned numerous fine recordings, though few match this superlative 1948 set of Chopin's Preludes. The first Prelude is candid and forthright, whereas No 4's Largo projects an outspoken top line (and note how sensitively Moiseiwitsch negotiates the accompaniment's constantly shifting harmonies). De-synchronised chords mark the opening of Prelude No 6, while the same Prelude's quiet close segues almost imperceptibly into the gnomic A major (a parallel sense of transition marries Preludes 10 and 11). Bryce Morrison, in his booklet-notes for Testament, singles out No 16 for its dexterity, but the more oratorical Nos 18 and 22 are particularly notable too for their especially keen sense of narrative.

But the greatness of these performances lies beyond detail. Much of the magic resides in Moiseiwitsch's ability to balance close-up and landscape, cultivating the individual phrase while keeping an eye on whole paragraphs. His touch, pedalling and attention to contrapuntal side-play are remarkable. These are profoundly individual readings that positively teem with incident. But which CD to choose? Transfer-wise, Testament achieves a marginally clearer sound frame, APR a touch more warmth (with a tad more surface noise). One minor criticism of Testament's disc: there is a very slight drop in pitch between the end of the 14th Prelude and the beginning of the 15th – not a full semitone, but noticeable enough to trouble those with perfect or relative pitch. APR's transfer is spot-on.

Choosing between the two programmes is more problematic. APR's all-Chopin sequence includes fluent accounts of the four Ballades, the Fourth a first-ever release. Odd smudges hardly matter in the face of such compelling musicianship. In the B flat Polonaise it's fascinating to compare Moiseiwitsch with fellow-Leschetizky-pupil Ignaz Friedman, the one restrained and elegant, the other (Friedman) pointed and rhythmically fierce. Likewise in the A flat Ballade, where Friedman invests the 'Galloping Horse' second set (Sir Winston Churchill's description) with extra impetus, Moiseiwitsch's musical manners are far milder.

Testament's makeweights highlight Moiseiwitsch's virtuosity, most memorably in Rachmaninov's re-working of the Scherzo from the Midsummer Night's Dream, which is heard to even better advantage than on the arranger's own recording. So much happens, so quickly and at so many dynamic levels, you can hardly credit the results to a single pair of hands. A Rachmaninov sequence includes a stereo G major Prelude (Op 32 No 5) and a justly famous 1940 account of the sombre B minor Prelude, Op 32 No 10. His primary-coloured 1930 recording of Kinderszenen is a joy. In contrast, lightning reflexes benefit textually bolstered Weber and the dry wit of Prokofiev, Stravinsky and John Vallier.

Those fancying an 'Essential Moiseiwitsch' collection should plump for Testament, though Chopin's magnificent Ballades are a significant enough draw to push the scales in APR's direction. It really is a matter of repertory preferences. Both discs are extremely well annotated.

Scherzos

No 1 in B minor, Op 20; No 2 in B flat minor, Op 31; No 3 in C sharp minor, Op 39; No 4 in E, Op 54

Chopin Scherzos Nos 1-4
Schumann Bunte Blätter, Op 99
Sviatoslav Richter pf
Olympia OCD338 (75 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1970-77

Remarkably well recorded considering the source, one performance after another here is so memorable as to rank among the best versions around of the piece in question. There is nothing amidst all the glorious playing here that will not keep your attention galvanised to the music. Richter is not usually thought of as a very credible Chopin player, and yet he strides through the four Scherzos with an abundance of technique and deftly coloured textures that make this version a definite front-runner. His Chopin is finely controlled, spaciousness being the watchword rather than overt passion. His Schumann, on the other hand, has always been dazzling, because he has a temperament that convincingly responds to the extreme swings in mood. Many of the Bunte Blätter are amazingly fast and unnerving. Don't miss these performances.

Scherzos Nos 1-4
Ivo Pogorelich pf
DG 439 947-2GH (42 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ●

Love him or hate him, Pogorelich guarantees a response. Chopin for the faint-hearted this is not; original, provocative, challenging, daring, it emphatically is. Nevertheless, if Pogorelich's most unconventional ideas approach wilful eccentricity, the rewards far outweigh any reservations. True, if they weren't reinforced by such transcendental pianism Pogorelich's interpretations wouldn't carry nearly the same authority or conviction; but it is precisely the marrying of his imaginative scope with his extraordinary technical resource that opens up such startling expressive possibilities.

The first and second Scherzos show the juxtaposition of extremes at its most intense, stretching the limits of the musically viable. Predictably, the outer sections of the B minor Scherzo are incredibly fast, possessed with an almost demonic drive, while the central Polish carol (Sleep, little Jesus) is unusually slow and luxuriously sustained. But such extremes, of character as much as tempo, place enormous tension on the musical structure, and this is most evident in the B flat minor Scherzo. Make no mistake, Pogorelich's playing is astounding, from the imperious opening to the lingering and ravishing middle section, where his sublime lyrical simplicity is of the deepest inward poetry.

To sum up, a recording like this is not easy. Some may find Pogorelich's probing individualism too overwhelming. There are more ideas crammed into under 42 minutes than on many discs almost twice the length, although most collectors will still feel short-changed by the playing time. This may not be Chopin for every day, but the force of Pogorelich's musical personality subtly and irrevocably shapes one's view of the music. A truly extraordinary disc.

Waltzes

No 1 in E flat, Op 18; No 2 in A flat, Op 34 No 1; No 3 in A minor, Op 34 No 2; No 4 in F, Op 34 No 3; No 5 in A flat, Op 42; No 6 in D flat, Op 64 No 1; No 7 in C sharp minor, Op 64 No 2; No 8 in A flat, Op 64 No 3; No 9 in A flat, Op 69 No 1; No 10 in E minor, Op 69 No 2; No 11 in G flat, Op 70 No 1; No 12 in F minor, Op 70 No 2; No 13 in D flat, Op 70 No 3; No 14 in E minor, Op posth; No 15 in E, Op posth; No 16 in A flat, Op posth; No 17 in E flat, Op posth; No 18 in E flat, Op posth.; No 19 in A minor, Op posth

---

Waltzes Nos 1-14
Artur Rubinstein pf
RCA Red Seal 09026 63047-2 (50 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1960s ●

There has in recent years been a tendency to take Rubinstein's imposing series of Chopin recordings from the mid-1960s for granted, but to hear them digitally refurbished soon puts a stop to that. His tone does not have much luxuriance, being quite chiselled; yet a finely tuned sensibility is evident throughout. This is at once demonstrated by his direct interpretation of Op 18, its elegance explicit. His reading of Op 34 No 1 is brillante, as per Chopin's title. In Op 34 No 2 Rubinstein judges everything faultlessly, distilling the sorrowful yet cannily varied grace of this piece. The two finest here are Opp 42 and 64 No 2, and with the former Rubinstein excels in the unification of its diverse elements, its rises and falls of intensity, its hurryings forward and holdings back. This is also true of his reading of Op 64 No 2, the yearning of whose brief più lento section is memorable indeed. The sole fault of this issue is that conventional programming leads to the mature Waltzes, which were published by Chopin himself, coming first, the lesser, posthumously printed, items last. Not all of these latter are early but they have less substance than Opp 18-64, and should come first.

Waltzes Nos 1-14. Mazurka in C sharp minor, 🄷
Op 50. No 3. Barcarolle. Nocturne in D flat,
Op 27 No 2 Dinu Lipatti pf
EMI Great Recordings of the Century mono
566904-2 (65 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1947-50 ●●●

As an erstwhile pupil of Cortot, it was perhaps not surprising that Lipatti always kept a special place in his heart for Chopin. And thanks, primarily, to the 14 Waltzes, played in a non-chronological sequence of his own choosing, it is doubtful if the disc will ever find itself long absent from the catalogue. Like the solitary Mazurka, they were recorded in Geneva during his remarkable renewal of strength in the summer of 1950. The Nocturne and Barcarolle date back to visits to EMI's Abbey Road studio in 1947 and 1948 respectively. Just once or twice in the Waltzes you might feel tempted to question his sharp tempo changes for mood contrast within one and the same piece – as for instance in No 9 in A flat, Op 69 No 1. However, for the most part his mercurial lightness, fleetness and charm are pure delight. His Nocturne in D flat has long been hailed as one of the finest versions currently available. And even though we know he himself (one of the greatest perfectionists) was not completely happy about the Barcarolle, for the rest of us this glowing performance has a strength of direction and shapeliness all its own. In fuller contexts there is just a trace of plumminess in the recorded sound.

Waltzes Nos 1-19
Vladimir Ashkenazy pf
Decca 414 600-2DH (56 minutes: ADD/DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1976-83

No one has served Chopin's cause more faithfully than Ashkenazy. He always preferred miscellaneous programmes which, while wholly understandable from his own point of view, occasionally posed problems for the collector wanting conveniently packaged sets of this or that genre in its entirety. So hats off to Decca for this reissue. All 19 known waltzes are here, including the last six posthumous publications. Rubinstein and Lipatti have long been the heroes in the sphere of the waltz. Ashkenazy must now join their number. From all three of these outstanding artists the waltzes emerge as true 'dance poems'. Ashkenazy also finds the ideal, translucent sound world for this composer, without excessive weight in the bass or injudicious use of the right pedal. What lessons he can teach certain younger contenders about exaggerated point-making (especially in the spotlighting of inner parts), and whirlwind spontaneity in faster numbers achieved without loss of grace or finesse. There is no need to be worried by any suggestion of inconsistency arising from date, level or system of recording.

Waltzes Nos 1-17. Polonaises – G minor, Op posth; B flat, Op posth
Allan Schiller pf
ASV Quicksilva CDQS6149 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1994

Allan Schiller's playing has a wholesomely musical, straightforward directness that could be described as quintessentially English. Far more sparing than his rivals in resorting to cajoling rubato, he avoids personal idiosyncrasies of all kinds so that the music, as printed, can tell its own tale. The recording itself has a similar unforced naturalness to it. That said, sometimes Schiller's well-trained, obedient fingers are a little too impersonal in more nostalgic moods – Op 64 No 2 in C sharp minor, Op 69 No 1 in A flat (inspired by a youthful love, Maria Wodzinska) and even Op 69 No 2 in B minor. In several more agile contexts a little more light-fingered fancy and charm would not have come amiss. However, in both contexts Schiller's imagination seems to be given freer rein as the set progresses. And he certainly comes close to the truth in the spirited Op 70 No 1 in G flat, as is indeed also the case in the warmly benign posthumous E flat major Waltz with which he concludes. Both Polonaises are played with an engaging youthful purity of sound and sentiment.

Piano Sonatas

No 1 in C minor, Op 4; No 2 in B flat minor, Op 35; No 3 in B minor, Op 58

Piano Sonatas Nos 2 and 3. Etudes – Op 10 Nos 1-12 (two versions); Op 25 Nos 1-12 (two versions). Waltzes Nos 1-14. Ballades Nos 1-4. Preludes Nos 1-24. Impromptus Nos 1-3. Nocturnes Nos 2, 4, 5, 7, 15 and 16. Polonaise No 6. Berceuse (two versions). Fantasie in F minor, Op 49. Tarantelle in A flat, Op 43. Barcarolle. Chants polonais, Op 74 – No 2, Spring (trans Liszt); No 12, My darling; No 14, The ring. Piano Concerto No 2 🄷
Alfred Cortot pf orchestra / Sir John Barbirolli
EMI mono ⑥ 767359-2 (429 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1920-43

Has there ever been a more bewitching or endearing virtuoso than Alfred Cortot? His touch was of a crystalline clarity, his coloration alive with myriad tints and hues. Combined with a poetic passion that knew no limits, such qualities created an idiosyncrasy and style that usually survived a fallible and bewilderingly confused keyboard mechanism. His left hand in particular had a way of drifting in and out of focus and leading a wayward and disobedient life of its own. Yet Cortot's famous errors surely resulted not from incompetence, but from his nervous, high-pitched intensity; a sheer involvement that could easily cloud his composure or unsettle his equilibrium. Importantly, Chopin's elusive essence emerged, for the greater part, unscathed from his inaccuracy and caprice.

Here on six glorious CDs is Cortot's Chopin in all its infinite richness and variety. The transfers are outstanding, with no attempt made to mask the glitter of his brilliance in the interests of silent surfaces or to remove other acoustical hiccups. Although not everything is included, the selection is wonderfully enterprising, offering several alternative performances of the same work. The only quibble is the preference shown for the 1942 set of the Preludes when the earlier 1933 recording seems infinitely superior. The 1931 B minor Sonata is far superior to a later version from 1933. Cortot's 1933 B flat minor Sonata is also a far cry from one made in 1953, where his powers failed him almost totally and is, indeed, of a dizzying aplomb and brio.

There is elaboration in the Second Ballade, the volcanic interjections ablaze with added notes, and in the opening of the last and glorious Fourth Ballade there is a convulsive leap across the rhythm. However, the gem is surely the Third Ballade with the opening pages played as if improvised on the spot, the figuration foaming and cascading with a freedom and liberality unknown to most players. The F minor Fantasie also suggests that Cortot never compromised where his intensity of vision was concerned. Cortot's Barcarolle is as insinuating as it is blisteringly intense, even though the hectic rush through the final pages shows him at his least eloquent. In the Etudes (the 1934 is preferable to the 1942 set; both are included) he reaches out far beyond mere pedagogical concerns. The final and awe inspiring Op 25 No 12, too, is not the cantus firmus of a traditional view but an elemental declamation and upheaval.

In the Waltzes there is a near operatic freedom in the melody of Op 42 with its cunning mix of duple and triple rhythm, a charming decorative aside at bar 20 in the E flat, Op 18 (only in the 1943 version), and a puckish mercurial touch throughout that banishes all possible monotony from so many pieces in three time. There is a comically confused start to the A flat, Op 64 No 3, and an unholy muddle at the end of the final

Waltz in E minor. The Second Concerto, heard in Cortot's own arrangement or refurbishment with some marginal re-texturing here and there, shows him at his most excitingly rhetorical. Barbirolli's accompaniment may be rumbustious rather than subtle, yet the music sounds as if newly minted. Six Nocturnes are included in the set and, while hardly examples of the stylistic purity to which we have become accustomed in the post-Cortot era, they are brilliantly alive with his own heady alternative. You will not easily find a more absorbing box-set of piano discs.

Piano Sonatas Nos 2[a] and 3[b]. Scherzo No 3
in C sharp minor, Op 39[c]
Martha Argerich pf
DG 419 055-2GGA (56 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded [a]1975, [b]1967, [c]1961 ●●

Here, simply and assuredly, is one of the most magisterial talents in the entire history of piano playing. She is hardly a comfortable companion, confirming your preconceptions. Indeed, she sets your heart and mind reeling so that you positively cry out for respite from her dazzling and super-sensitive enquiry. But again, in the final resort, she is surely a great musician first and a great pianist second. From her, Chopin is hardly the most balanced or classically biased of the romantics. Argerich can tear all complacency aside. How she keeps you on the qui vivre in the Second and Third Sonatas. Is the Funeral March too brisk, an expression of sadness for the death of a distant relative rather than grief for a nation? Is the delicate rhythmic play at the heart of the Third Sonata's Scherzo virtually spun out of existence? Such qualms or queries tend to be whirled into extinction by more significant felicities. Who but Argerich, with her subtle half-pedalling, could conjure so baleful and macabre a picture of 'winds whistling over graveyards' in the Second Sonata's finale, or achieve such heart-stopping exultance in the final pages of the Third Sonata (this performance is early Argerich with a vengeance, alive with a nervous brio). And if her free spirit leaves us tantalised, thirsting for Chopin's First, Second and Fourth as well as his Third Scherzos, for example, she has also left us overwhelmingly enriched, for ever in her debt.

Chopin Piano Sonata No 3. Polonaise in A flat, 'Heroic', Op 53
Schumann Kinderszenen, Op 15. Papillons, Op 2
Alex Slobodyanik pf
EMI Debut 573500-2 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ Recorded 1998

Alex Slobodyanik (the son of Alexander Slobodyanik, a celebrated pianist of the '60s and '70s) is Russian-born but American-based and the possessor of a truly prodigious talent. His Schumann Papillons are among the most engaging on record, delicate and piquant in No 4, immaculately virtuosic in No 6 and with the sort of haunting nuance and cantabile in No 7 that usually only comes later in a pianist's career. Rarely has carnival night (the coda) died away more magically, its gaiety lost in a mist of distant chimes, while Slobodyanik's Kinderszenen shows a no less breathtaking rapport with Schumann's poetry. His 'Dreaming' is memorable, while 'Child Falling Asleep' evolves into a lullaby of exquisite joy and pain, of childhood revisited through adult eyes and perceptions.

Chopin's Third Sonata begins more flamboyantly, if no less poetically, with a fierce thrust that is hardly maestoso, yet contains such zest and ardour that one listens as if mesmerised. There is no repeat – the authenticity of the first-movement repeats in either of the mature sonatas is in any case debatable – and, throughout, some of Chopin's most richly ornate pages are allowed to blossom and expand in glorious profusion (the reverse of the gaunt and death-haunted Second Sonata). Again, there is absolutely no sense of the studio, but rather of live and immediate responses caught on the wing. Only a touch of diffidence mars the A flat Polonaise, yet even here the playing reveals the most exceptional refinement and musicianship. The English-based recordings are virtually ideal and, overall, this is a début of débuts.

Piano Sonatas Nos 1-3
Vladimir Ashkenazy pf
Decca Ovation 448 123-2DM (76 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1976-81

Ashkenazy's grouping of the three sonatas is particularly valuable as he makes such a good case for the early (1827) C minor Sonata, and his account of No 3 is undoubtedly very fine, with an excitingly spontaneous account of the last movement. But it is the 'Funeral March' Sonata that one especially remembers. He obviously identifies with the music profoundly and after the concentration of the first two movements the dazzling finale seems the more mercurial. The analogue piano recording is very real and vivid.

Piano Sonatas Nos 2 and 3
Maurizio Pollini pf
DG 415 346-2GH (52 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1986 ●

These two magnificent sonatas are Chopin's longest works for solo piano The passion of the B flat minor Sonata is evident throughout, as is its compression (despite the overall length) – for example, the urgent first subject of its first movement is omitted in the recapitulation. As for its mysterious finale, once likened to 'a pursuit in utter darkness', it puzzled Chopin's contemporaries but now seems totally right. The B minor Sonata is more glowing and spacious, with a wonderful Largo third movement, but its finale is even more exhilarating than that of the B flat minor, and on a bigger scale.

Pollini plays this music with overwhelming power and depth of feeling; the expressive intensity is rightly often disturbing. Magisterial technique is evident throughout and the recording is sharp-edged but thrilling.

Piano Sonatas Nos 2 and 3
Murray Perahia pf
Sony MK76242 (50 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1974 ●

Listening to Perahia's Chopin Sonatas, you have the impression of an unusually searching mind at work behind the fine fingers. The catalogue has long offered more urgently driven performances but with his deliberate tempo and his very lightly pedalled texture, Perahia draws attention to a host of hidden subtleties – harmonic and rhythmic, as well as inner voices – often merely glossed over. Just now and again you might be prompted to feel that pursuit of detail encourages shorter-lapped phrasing than we often hear, that it breaks the music's broader sweep. But if so, that is a small price to pay for revelations of such beauty. Chopin specialists will find much of interest in the text he uses for the Largo (or rather its central sostenuto section) of the B minor Sonata, incidentally one of the loveliest things on the disc. The CD transfer is good enough even if the acoustic lacks ideal spaciousness.

Piano Sonatas Nos 2 and 3
Fantasie in F minor, Op 49
Artur Rubinstein pf
RCA Victor Red Seal 09026 63046-2 Ⓜ
(61 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1960s

In the Chopin sonatas it is difficult to think of which performance to choose as the greatest. Aside from the Funeral March itself, Rubinstein's account of the Second Sonata is a bit too imperious; the Third is much more thrilling, with considerable technical risks being taken both in the first movement and the finale. His own feeling for quiet nuances in the Largo of this work is quite superb, and here too Pollini on DG achieves an innocence that is disarming. Pollini's disc is the most perfect, both in terms of the pianist's technical accomplishment and the lucid piano sound, with nothing that offends the ear. The middle treble range in Rubinstein's piano sound has a hollow resonance. Rubinstein tackles the F minor Fantasie in rather a heavy-handed manner, with more power than searching drama. To sum up this release, if you want your Chopin sonatas balanced and formally cohesive, then Rubinstein is for you.

Piano Sonata No 3. Mazurkas Nos 36-38.
Nocturne No 4. Polonaise No 6. Scherzo No 3
Martha Argerich pf
EMI 556805-2 (52 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1965

Argerich's pianism is notable for its remarkable combination of seemingly effortless technical resource and temperamental volatility. For all the combustibility of the mixture, however, the vehemence of Argerich's playing is seldom exploited to the disadvantage of the extraordinary subtleties of her art. Moreover, despite the self-imposed limits she places on the repertory she performs, such is the spontaneity of her approach that each of her interpretations, no matter how familiar in broad outline, is characterised by a profusion of contrasting details beneath the surface. In the B minor Sonata she omits the first-movement repeats. Such a formal contraction can, of course, contribute to the momentum with which the movement unfolds. Ironically, however, Argerich seems to some extent to rein in the propulsive power for which she has been renowned, even at this stage in her career, appearing instead to be seeking at every turn to exploit a deeply-felt exprssive lyricism to offset the febrile intensity of the most energetic figurational devices. This has the virtue of allowing us a less hectic view of subsidiary elements within the music, which elsewhere can too often be overwhelmed by the sheer turbulance of the action. Some of the most satisfying playing on the disc comes in her account of the Op 59 Mazurkas. There is a vulnerability as well as an affecting wistfulness about the playing which captures the elusiveness of the idiom, with its harmonic ambiguities, with rare acuity. At the other end of the scale, the excitement she generates in the A flat Polonaise is of an order that goes far beyond mere effect. If these accounts do not necessarily outstrip her other recordings, they nevertheless offer an intriguing insight into ongoing 'work in progress' from a pianistic giant whose artistry continues to fascinate and perplex.

Piano Sonata No 3. Mazurkas – A minor, Op 17 No 4; B flat minor, Op 24 No 4; D flat, Op 30 No 3; D, Op 33 No 2; C sharp minor, Op 50 No 3; C, Op 56 No 2; F sharp minor, Op 59 No 3; B, Op 63 No 1; F minor, Op 63 No 2; C sharp minor, Op 63 No 3; F minor, Op 68 No 4
Evgeni Kissin pf
RCA Victor Red Seal 09026 62542-2 Ⓕ
(65 minutes: DDD). Recorded live in 1993 ●

Kissin is among the master-pianists of our time, and in poise and maturity all these performances seem light-years away from colleagues twice his age. What magnificence and assertion he finds in the B minor Sonata's opening, what menace in the following uprush of chromatic scales, his deliberate pedal haze capturing one of Chopin's most truly modernist moments. Kissin may relish left-hand counter-melody in the return of the second subject and elsewhere, yet such detail is offered within the context of the whole. A momentary failure of concentration at 1'04" in the Scherzo comes as reassuring evidence of human fallibility but elsewhere one can only marvel at a manner so trenchant, musicianly and resolutely unsentimental. The equestrian finale is among the most lucid on record and concludes in a controlled triumph that has the audience cheering to the heavens. The 12 Mazurkas are no less remarkable for their strength and discretion. Everything is unfolded with complete naturalness and authority. Kissin's rubato is beautifully idiomatic yet so stylishly applied that you are only aware of the finest fluctuations of pulse and emotion. Few other pianists have gone to the heart of the matter with such assurance (always excepting Artur Rubinstein). The recording captures Kissin's clear, unnarcissistic sonority admirably and audience noise is minimal.

Piano Sonata No 3. Polonaise-Fantaisie in A flat, Op 61. Nocturne No 1. Scherzo No 4. Barcarolle. Ballade No 4
Nelson Goerner pf
EMI Debut 569701-2 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1996

Nelson Goerner is Argentinian, a student of Maria Tipo, and devotes his most personal and inflammatory recital to Chopin's later masterpieces. How fearlessly he launches the B minor Sonata's imperious opening, never using Chopin's maestoso instruction as an excuse for undue rhetoric or inflation. Even the startling sense of hiatus in the first movement repeat (can this really be authentic?) makes sense given such intensity. His second movement Scherzo is as colourful as it is volatile and in the Largo the playing is, again, gloriously free-spirited and keenly felt. His transition out of the Polonaise-Fantaisie's central Più lento, back to Chopin's principal idea, shows a compelling sense of the composer's depth and introspection, and if his choice of the Fourth Scherzo is surprising, given such seriousness, he is brilliantly attuned to one of Chopin's most mercurial flights of fancy. The C minor Nocturne pulses with profound elegy, its central octaves fired off like so many ceremonial cannons, and Goerner makes something very special out of the Fourth Ballade's coda, tempering Chopin's bravura with fine melodic intricacy. EMI has provided this most personal and distinctive artist with an impressively bold and spacious recording.

Muzio Clementi Italian/British 1752-1832

GROVE Clementi trained first in Rome, but in 1766-7 went to Dorset, England, to study the harpsichord. Moving to London in 1774, he became conductor at the King's Theatre and from 1770 gave concerts, often including his well-known keyboard sonatas Op 2 (1779).

Clementi travelled widely as a pianist in 1780-85, and in 1781 took part in a piano contest with Mozart in Vienna. In 1785-1802 he was a frequent piano soloist in London and conductor of his own symphonies, but in the 1790s he was overshadowed by the visiting Haydn. He was in great demand as a teacher. In 1798 he established a music publishing and piano-making firm, touring Europe (initially with his pupil John Field) as its representative in 1802-10. Among the firm's publications were major works by Beethoven. Clementi continued to conduct his symphonies in London and abroad; his last major works were three piano sonatas Op 50 (1821).

Foremost in Clementi's large output are c70 keyboard sonatas, spanning some 50 years. Counterpoint, running figuration and virtuoso passage-work are constant elements. Dramatic writing (which strongly influenced Beethoven) appears increasingly, and works such as Op 13 (1785) feature motivic unity and powerful expression. The sonatas of after c 1800 tend to be more diffuse. Only six of the symphonies and one piano concerto (1796) survive. Clementi also wrote keyboard duets, chamber music and two influential didactic works, Introduction to the Art of Playing on the Piano Forte (1801) and the comprehensive keyboard collection Gradus ad Parnassum (1817-26).

Keyboard Sonatas

Keyboard Sonatas – F minor, Op 13 No 6; F, Op 33 No 2; G minor, Op 34 No 2. Musical Characteristics, Op 19 – Preludio I alla Haydn; Preludio I alla Mozart. Capriccio in B flat, Op 17. Fantasie with Variations, 'Au clair de lune', Op 48 🅿
Andreas Staier fp
Teldec Das Alte Werk 3984 26731-2 Ⓕ
(68 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1999 ○○○

One is inclined to think of Clementi as a rather dry composer, however brilliant, but there is nothing remotely dry about this CD, which is full of expressive and often powerful music. Partly it is the instrument: on the fortepiano Clementi's music has a sharpness of impact that it lacks on a modern grand, and also a gently poetic, often almost mysterious ring that carries overtones of early Romanticism, especially in some of the slower music. But the chief responsibility belongs with Andreas Staier, who is clearly fired by the music and discovers so many layers of expression in it.

Essentially he plays three sonatas with a framework of single pieces surrounding them. Two of those pieces come from Clementi's Musical Characteristics, a group of short preludes published in 1787 and imitating Haydn and Mozart as well as Sterkel, Kozeluch and Vaňhal. Interestingly, these lively pieces indicate the features of the two composers that Clementi regarded as distinctive. Then there is a Capriccio, a charming piece demanding (and receiving) crisp and athletic fingerwork. The final item is a brilliant and imaginative fantasy on Au clair de lune, which Clementi varies in some highly inventive ways. This is a late work, from about 1820, and its style is comparable with mature Beethoven.

Of the three sonatas, the last (Op 33 No 2, 1794) is an elegantly written piece, in effect in two movements. Staier is masterly in his command of Clementi's dialectic and of the slightly quirky character of some of his themes, as in the first movement's finale. Op 34 No 2 is a big G minor work: its Adagio draws beautifully shapely and pointed playing from Staier, and the finale, another elaborate and extended movement, is impassioned music, powerfully done. The first of the sonatas, the earlier F minor work (1785), seems in some ways the most 'Romantic' in tone, with its Allegro agitato carrying hints of menace and darkness (enhanced by Staier's sensitive pedalling and misty textures), its eloquent Largo, where the melodic line is enunciated with real pathos, and its stormy final Presto. In all, Staier's reconciliation of the poetic and imaginative content of this music, with his command of its structure and its arguments, makes this one of the most impressive fortepiano discs in memory.

Keyboard Sonatas – B flat, Op 24 No 2; F sharp minor, Op 25 No 5; B minor, Op 40 No 2; D, Op 40 No 3
Nikolai Demidenko pf
Hyperion CDA66808 Ⓕ
(69 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1994

Several recent excellent releases – on period and modern instruments – have done much to counter Mozart's evaluation of Clementi as a 'mere mechanicus'. For those who remain unconvinced, this issue (on a modern piano) provides a comprehensive demonstration of the composer's skill and imagination that should ensure an enthusiastic following. The B flat Sonata, Op 24 No 2, which Clementi played at Joseph II's court in December 1781, is an exuberant exhibition piece. Demidenko's spontaneous keyboard virtuosity and delightful variety of touch underline the music's surprising diversity. Indeed, the soft lighting of his performances in general heightens the emotional impact of his interpretations. Two of the Op 40 Sonatas offer remarkable illustrations of Clementi's dramatic and expressive power. Demidenko's performance of the dazzling D major Sonata reveals its potent cocktail of Beethovenian boldness and Mozartian dolce in the first movement, and luxuriates in its poignant, improvisatory melody and rich harmony in the second. However, Demidenko's tonal range, technical polish and musical intelligence are even more impressive in the B minor Sonata. Here, his apt characterisation of the first movement's turbulent mix of icy reserve and fiery bravura, and deft handling of the second movement's fusion of adagio and finale, compellingly evoke the music's spirit of fantasy.

Louis-Nicolas Clérambault

French 1676-1749

GROVE Like his father Dominique (c1644-1704) and earlier members of the family, Clérambault served the French court. From 1714 he was organist of the Maison Royale de St Cyr (a school near Versailles) and at St Sulpice, Paris, and, from 1719, the Jacobins. He was considered one of France's finest players. His first harpsichord collection (1704) is wholly in the French style, but many of his other works combine French and Italian elements. Most notable are his 25 French cantatas (1710-43), some simple, others dramatic and intense. His other works include violin solo and trio sonatas, organ music and many motets. Clérambault's sons César-Franc;ois-Nicolas (d1760) and Evrard Dominique (1710-90) were both organists; the former succeeded to his father's posts and probably composed cantatas.

Cantatas

Orphée. Léandre et Héro. Harpsichord Suite No 2 in C minor. Sonata prima in G, 'Anonima'. Simphonie à cinq in G minor
Sandrine Piau sop Les Solistes du Concert Spirituel (Jocelyn Daubigney fl Patrick Cohën-Akenine, Martha Moore vns Alix Verzier va da gamba Catherine Arnoux viol Blandine Rannou hpd)
Naxos 8 553744 (62 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996 Ⓢ

These chamber cantatas, Orphée and Léandre et Héro, are captivating pieces which reveal Clérambault's sensitivity in setting texts and endorse his reputation as, perhaps, the master of the cantate française. Orphée, contained in the First of his five anthologies of cantatas, is often regarded as Clérambault's masterpiece, but Léandre et Héro, from the Second Book, at times hardly seems inferior. Sandrine Piau is no stranger to this subtly inflected repertoire and sings with passion and a lively sense of style. Her voice is clear, lightly textured and attractive, and she pays close attention to textural detail. Léandre et Héro, inspired by the touching love-story of Hero and Leander, is similarly scored to Orphée, that is, for high voice with violin, flute and continuo. Perhaps Clérambault, notwithstanding a splendidly vigorous air de tempête, never quite achieves the expressive variety of Orphée, but Léandre is graced by music of strong character, admirably realized by Piau. The remaining items are instrumental and add to a satisfying programme, well performed.

Motets

Panis angelicus, C131. Exultet omnium, C112. P
Domine salvum fac regem, C152. Domine ante te, C158. O deliciis affluens, C109. Magnificat. Salve regina, C114. O piisima, o sanctissima, C135. Domine salvum, C157
Gérard Lesne counterten Mark Padmore ten Josep-Miquel Ramon i Monzó bass Il Seminario Musicale
Virgin Classics Veritas 545415-2 Ⓕ
(63 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1999 ●●

Here are six very good reasons to get better acquainted with the music of Nicolas Clérambault. The qualities so admired in his cantatas – think no further than Orphée – are amply evident in these motets for three male voices, flute, violins and continuo, which celebrate in turn the Virgin Mary, Louis XV and Saint Sulpice (Clérambault was organist at the Parisian church named after him from 1715). The Clérambault authority Catherine Cessac rightly places these works among the finest of their kind from the first half of the 18th century.

The presence of the concertante flute in the opening motet, Panis angelicus, C131, at once alerts the listener to the fashionableness of Clérambault's music. But the rather secular impression (then also very fashionable) gained from the occasionally rustic, strummed accompaniment in the otherwise uplifting hymn of praise, Exultet omnium, C112, and a hint of the flirtatious in the 'Stella matutina' of O delicii affluens, C109, should be attributed more to the exuberance of Il Seminario Musicale than the composer. Clérambault himself was a masterful accompanist to judge from his beautifully crafted bass lines, which are both melodic in themselves and harmonically memorable.

Clérambault's attention to the texts – their meanings and their rhythms – is also impressive. The rhetorical qualities of the Domine salvum, C152, the 'Quia fecit' of the Magnificat, C136, and the Domine salvum, C157, the antiphony in the Domine, C158, the melismas in the 'Tecum cantemus domino' of O deliciis affluens, in the (almost Handelian) 'Et exultavit' of the Magnificat, and the chromatic suspensions in O piisima, o sanctissima, C135, draw the listener to the texts. But the crowning work on this disc is the Salve regina, C114: the groaning and weeping of the 'Ad te clamamus', the catchy 'Eya ergo' and the powerful downward sequences ('O clemens, o pia, o dulcis Virgo Maria') make for compelling listening.

The performers deserve the highest praise for their part in bringing this music to life. In addition to delivering superbly judged solos (especially in the Magnificat), Gérard Lesne, Mark Padmore and Josep-Miguel Ramon i Monzó – their Latin properly tinged with French – join in exquisitely executed duos and trios (for example, in the Simphonie of the Exultet omnium, the 'Et misericordia ejus' and 'Gloria Patri' of the Magnificat and the 'Ad te clamamus' of the Salve regina). The skilful instrumentalists of Il Seminario Musicale, particularly the bass player, Richard Myron, contribute sensitively and spiritedly. The recording is clear and resonant, allowing the listener greater access to the subtleties of Clérambault's remarkable music than could ever have been enjoyed by 18th-century worshippers at the cavernous Saint Sulpice.

Eric Coates

British 1886-1957

Coates studied at the Royal Academy of Music, worked as an orchestral viola player, and wrote light orchestral music and c100 songs. He is best known for the suite London (1933) and The Dam Busters march from his film score.

Light orchestral works

Saxo-Rhapsody. Wood Nymphs 🄷
Music Everywhere (Rediffusion March). From Meadow to Mayfair. The Dam Busters – march; London. Cinderella – Phantasy. London Again
Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Charles Groves
The Merrymakers – Miniature Overture. Summer Days – At the dance. By the Sleepy Lagoon. The Three Men – Man from the sea. The Three Bears – Phantasy
London Symphony Orchestra / Charles Mackerras
Calling all Workers – March. The Three Elizabeths
City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra / Reginald Kilbey
HMV Classics ② HMV5 72327-2 (129 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1956-71

Eric Coates reached a vast public through the use of his music as signature tunes for radio programmes, and the cinema furthered the cause with the huge success of The Dam Busters march. There is much more to his music, though, than mere hit themes. Suites such as London, London Again, From Meadow to Mayfair and The Three Elizabeths offer a wealth of delights and are all the better for the juxtaposition of their contrasted movements. The two tone-poems for children, Cinderella and The Three Bears, are splendidly apt pieces of programme music – simple to follow, ever charming, never trite. The miniature overture The Merrymakers and the elegant waltz 'At the dance' are other superb pieces of light music, whilst the Saxo-Rhapsody shows Coates in more serious mood. Throughout there is a rich vein of melody, and an elegance of orchestration that makes this music to listen to repeatedly with ever-increasing admiration. The three conductors and orchestras featured adopt a no-nonsense approach that modestly suggests that his music should not be lingered over, never taken too seriously. Considering that the Mackerras items were first issued in 1956 (the rest being from 1968-71), the sound is of astonishingly good quality. This is a veritable feast of delightful music.

Sweet Seventeen. Summer Afternoon. Impressions of a Princess[a]. Salute the Soldier. Two Light Syncopated Pieces. For Your Delight. The Unknown Singer[a]. I Sing to You. Coquette. Over to You. Idyll. Under the Stars. By the Tamarisk. Mirage. Last Love. The Green Land[a]
[a]Peter Hughes sax BBC Concert Orchestra / John Wilson
ASV White Line CDWHL2107 (79 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1996

The title of these pieces won't ring much of a bell with any but the most avid Coates fans. Indeed, four pieces are here recorded for the first time. But what delights there are! It goes without saying that Coates's craftsmanship is in evidence from start to finish. Yet so often, one wonders just why a particular piece never quite made it in the way his most popular works did. Isn't Summer Afternoon every bit as delightful as By the Sleepy Lagoon? And wouldn't Salute the Soldier have served just as well as other marches as a radio signature tune? Most simply, aren't Under the Stars, For Your Delight and others just simply such utter charmers? The BBC Concert Orchestra plays beautifully, and the conductor seems thoroughly imbued with the Coates style. The recorded sound is crisp and clean, too. You are urged to sample the pleasures of this splendid collection.

Songs

Rise up and reach the stars; At vesper bell; The young lover; The grenadier; Four old English songs; Because I miss you so; Sigh no more, ladies; Tell me where is fancy bred; The fairy tales of Ireland; Music of the night; Betty and Johnny; The mill o' dreams; When I am dead; The little green balcony; Ship of dream; The outlaw's song; Your name; Beautiful lady moon; Princess of the dawn. First meeting
Richard Edgar-Wilson ten Michael Ponder va Eugene Asti pf
Marco Polo 8 223806 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1994

Richard Edgar-Wilson has a natural and expressive tenor voice, his words coming through with complete clarity, while Eugene Asti revels in Coates's luxurious accompaniments. Such, moreover, is the consistency of Coates's inspiration and musicianship that, though these are not his best-known songs, the selection here is still immensely enjoyable. At the most obviously popular end of the spectrum The grenadier has one of those rousing Fred Weatherly lyrics after the fashion of Stonecracker John, while at the more ambitious end are some delightfully fresh Shakespeare settings, as well as the short song-cycle The mill o' dreams. The songs Because I miss you so, The fairy tales of Ireland and Music of the night are particularly lovely compositions. By way of variety the collection also includes a piece for viola and piano that Coates composed for his teacher Lionel Tertis. This gives producer Michael Ponder a chance to step into the limelight, which he deserves for this diverting collection.

Aaron Copland

American 1900-1990

Copland studied with Goldmark in New York and with Boulanger in Paris (1921-24), then returned to New York and took a leading part in composers organisations, taught at the New School for Social Research (1927-37) and composed. At first his Stravinskian inheritance from Boulanger was combined with aspects of jazz (Music for the Theatre, 1925) or with a grand rhetoric (Symphonic Ode, 1929), but then he established an advanced personal style in the Piano Variations (1930) and orchestral Statements (1935). Growing social concerns spurred him towards a popular style in the cowboy ballets Billy the Kid (1940) and Rodeo (1942), but even here his harmony and orchestral spacing are distinctive. Another ballet, Appalachian Spring (1944) – a continuous movement towards a set of variations on a Shaker hymn – brought a synthesis of the folksy and the musically developed.

Other works from the 'Americana' period include the Lincoln Portrait for speaker and orchestra (1942), the Fanfare for the Common Man (1942), the 12 Poems of Emily Dickinson for voice and piano (1950), two sets of Old American Songs (1950-52) and the opera The Tender Land (1954). But there were also more complex developments, especially among the chamber and instrumental works: the Piano Sonata (1941), Violin Sonata (1943), Piano Quartet (1950) and Piano Fantasy (1957). In the orchestral Connotations (1962) and Inscape (1967) he completed a journey into serialism, though again the sound is individual. Other late works, including the ballet Dance Panels (1963), the String Nonet (1960) and the Duo for flute and piano (1971), continue the cool triadic style. He was conductor, speaker and pianist, a generous and admired teacher, and author of several books, among them Music and Imagination (1952).

Symphony No 3

Copland Symphony No 3[a]
Hanson Symphony No 2, 'Romantic'[b]
[a]Dallas Symphony Orchestra / Eduardo Mata
[b]Saint Louis Symphony Orchestra / Leonard Slatkin
HMV Classics HMV5 73544-2 (72 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1986 ●

This release is a superb coupling of two of the very greatest American symphonies. Mata's account of the Copland may seem understated when compared with Bernstein's – the scherzo has a taut, spare energy but much less weight, while the slow movement has a fine intensity, capable of relaxing into grace and lyrical purity but never approaches Bernstein's transported, slightly Thespian poignancy. The colours of the finale are bright and crisp, the mood exhilaratingly joyous, but the sudden grinding of brakes and the gaze into the abyss beneath all this exuberance is less of a shock than in Bernstein's version. In short, the work does not seem quite such a huge gesture of a symphony in Mata's hands, but in compensation for this the quieter emotions are more gravely stated (the first movement, after all, is marked 'with simple expression', and throughout the work Mata often comes closer to this injunction than Bernstein). The strings in the scherzo's trio section, too, have a hushed lyricism that is more touching than Bernstein's heartfelt but rather over-the-top eloquence, while the reminder of this mood at the centre of the slow movement seems a natural progression. Mata's players are not quite a match for the NYP but they are splendidly recorded; DG's live recording glares rather at times.

Turning to the coupling, anyone who has been moved by the Barber Adagio for strings must respond to the yearning lyricism of the string writing of Hanson's Romantic Symphony, composed for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 50th anniversary in 1930. This splendid work has real tunes – the Andante is its melodic focal point. It is convincing structurally, too, with the finale quoting earlier themes succinctly and powerfully (it is neither too long or too rhetorical) and without false optimism. Some will find Hanson's harmonic language not daring enough, but his music communicates. This performance is very fine. Perhaps, it has rather less grip and fervour than the composer's own, but it has breadth and a natural response to the atmosphere of the piece, while the orchestral playing is committed and fresh and the spacious acoustics add to the evocative effect.

Symphony No 3. Billy the Kid – Suite
New Zealand Symphony Orchestra / James Judd
Naxos American Classics 8 559106 Ⓢ
(64 minutes: DDD) ●

The first of Copland's three popular ballets is coupled here with what is arguably the greatest American symphony. Judd's first movement has more dynamic range than Eiji Oue's performance (Reference Recordings) and the long lines feel better paced. The second movement is the rumbustious Scherzo in Copland's most extrovert manner. Judd's interpretation works, and makes Oue seem a trifle pedestrian, closer to Copland's own performances than the dazzle that Bernstein brought to this kind of texture. The New Zealand strings are not as precise in the taxing high opening as Oue's Minnesota players but, when it eventually comes, the fanfare and the subtle textures surrounding it are completely convincing.

The verdict on this efficient and sympathetic performance will be affected by its being the best buy around now. The suite from Billy the Kid gets thoroughly idiomatic treatment too and the coupling will encourage lovers of the most folksy Copland to recognise and enjoy the same composer in the big symphony.

Symphony No 3. Appalachian Spring. Fanfare for the Common Man
Minnesota Orchestra / Eiji Oue
Reference Recordings RR-93CD (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●

As an opening salute, the Fanfare for the Common Man makes a good centenary tribute and prepares listeners for its appearance in the finale of the Third Symphony. It also shows off the prowess of the Minnesota brass. The version of Appalachian Spring here is the suite, not the full ballet, and it is well paced under Oue although occasionally lacking attack in the strings, for example at 15'22", where Copland said he wanted 'bitten out marcato'.

Significant earlier versions of the Third Symphony have included Copland's rather understated treatment with the New Philharmonia and, of course, Bernstein's much better projected interpretation on DG, considered by some the best. Yet Oue's approach is compelling throughout, falling midway between Copland's objectivity and Bernstein's dramatisation. The soft, long lines of the first movement move inexorably towards the first climax, and Copland's translucent scoring tells in its purely personal way. The scherzo is a controlled riot, again showing off the brass – the orchestra's best feature – and the finale is convincing. The recorded sound is spectacular too.

Ballets

Appalachian Spring. Billy the Kid. Rodeo
San Francisco Symphony Orchestra / Michael Tilson Thomas
RCA Red Seal 09026-63511-2 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●●●

For Appalachian Spring Tilson Thomas boldly opts for the rarely heard full orchestral version of the complete ballet score (Slatkin does likewise on his admirable 1985 recording on HMV Classics or part of an all-Copland 'twofer' on EMI Double Forte). This includes an extra 10 or so minutes of fretful, dark-hued music omitted from the familiar suite (try from around 22'), after which that glorious final statement of Simple Gifts seems to emerge with even greater éclat and emotional release than usual. Elsewhere, these newcomers distil all the tender poetry and dewy freshness you could wish for, while bringing a marvellously supple spring and athletic purpose to any faster music.

Under Tilson Thomas, the suite from Billy the Kid opens with a real sense of 'once upon a time' wonder, the illimitable expanses of the prairie stretching out before our very eyes. The ensuing street scene soon generates an infectious rhythmic snap, and there's a wonderfully affecting contribution from the SFSO's principal trumpet during the card game at night. Best of all is 'Billy's death', as poignantly intoned as you've ever heard it. Absolutely no grumbles, either, about the four Rodeo dance episodes. Tilson Thomas sees to it that 'Buckaroo Holiday' packs all the requisite punch and high-kicking swagger, while the two middle numbers ravish the ear in their disarming beauty. Moreover, the concluding 'Hoe-Down' goes with terrific, toe-tapping gusto, though the orchestra's delirious whoops of delight may perhaps strike some listeners as too much of a good thing.

Boasting some opulent, exhilaratingly expansive sonics, this is one corker of a release.

El salón México[a]. Danzón cubano[b]. An Outdoor Overture[b]. Quiet City[b]. Our Town[b]. Las agachadas[a]. Fanfare for the Common Man[b]. Lincoln Portrait[b]. Appalachian Spring – suite[b]. Rodeo – Four Dance Episodes[b]. Billy the Kid – orchestral suite[b]. Music for Movies[c]. Letter from Home[b]. John Henry[b]. Symphony No 3[c]. Clarinet Concerto[d]
Benny Goodman cl Henry Fonda narr [a]New England Conservatory Chorus; [b]London Symphony Orchestra; [c]New Philharmonia Orchestra; [d]Columbia Symphony Orchestra / Aaron Copland
Sony Classical ③ SM3K46559 (226 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1963-76
Single 'Copland conducts Copland' disc available on Sony Classical Ⓜ SMK89874 (includes El salón México, Appalachian Spring, Fanfare for the Common Man, Rodeo – Four Dance Episodes, Three Latin American Sketches and An Outdoor Overture)

This offers a welcome gathering of a lot of Copland's own performances. Only Las agachadas

('The shake-down song') for unaccompanied chorus is new to the British catalogue; this is a rather lame performance and nobody would buy the three-CD set for that. The oldest recording is the Clarinet Concerto with Benny Goodman – the second of the two he made under Copland. Lincoln Portrait with Henry Fonda is disappointing, but apart from earlier recordings in Spanish and Portuguese, this, made in 1968, is the only one under Copland. He was surprisingly modest about interpretation and wrote (in Copland on Music; New York: 1960): 'Composers rarely can be depended upon to know the correct tempi at which their music should proceed'. All the same it is a pleasure to have Copland as both composer and interpreter in some of his most delightful shorter works such as Letter from Home, John Henry, Quiet City and An Outdoor Overture. All told, this is an economical way to build up a collection of his performances which provide such an insight into his personality.

El salón México. Dance Symphony. Fanfare for the Common Man. Rodeo – Four Dance Episodes. Appalachian Spring – suite
Detroit Symphony Orchestra / Antál Dorati
Decca Ovation 430 705-2DM (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1980s

This glorious disc shows how well Antál Dorati assimilated the music of Aaron Copland. The big-boned swagger of 'Buckaroo Holiday' from Rodeo with its vision of open spaces and clear blue skies is established straightaway in Dorati's performance with keen rhythmic drive and fine orchestral articulation. The 'Hoe Down' is properly exciting while the other two dance episodes are wonderfully expressive. In the 1945 suite of Appalachian Spring Dorati secures marvellous phrasing and dynamics but tends to understate the score's poetic elements. Decca's exemplary sound quality is of demonstration standard in Fanfare for the Common Man, as it is in the enjoyable curtain-raiser, the sturdy, big-hearted El salón México. Dorati's vast experience as an interpreter of Stravinsky and Bartók pays fine dividends in Copland's gruesome Dance Symphony. A most welcome mid price release.

Piano Quartet

Movement[a]. Two Pieces[a]. Vitebsk[b]. Piano Quartet[c]. Sextet[d]
[d]Michael Collins cl [bcd]Martin Roscoe pf
[ad]Vanbrugh Quartet ([bc]Gregory Ellis, Keith Pascoe vns [c]Simon Aspell va [bc]Christopher Marwood vc)
ASV CDDCA1081 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999

This fine collection of Copland's small output of chamber music offers the first British recording of Movement, a characteristically introspective piece from his student years in Paris which shares a theme with the Symphony for Organ and Orchestra. The Two Pieces (1928) are also rarities well worth having, the rapid second one embodying to perfection the ideals of Nadia Boulanger's teaching.

Then there are the three major chamber works, starting with Vitebsk, the 1929 trio based on a Jewish folk theme. This is a commanding performance, which makes the most of the off-key quarter-tones and is thoroughly adroit in the central Allegro. The Sextet is a genuine chamber piece, although it was an arrangement of the Short Symphony which was found too difficult for most orchestras in 1933 and had to wait until 1944 for its American première. With Collins and Roscoe the Vanbrugh give an accomplished performance of the Sextet's sparklingly affirmative rhythms.

The Piano Quartet (1950) is in the same slow-quick-slow layout as Vitebsk. Like the final slow movement of the Piano Sonata its outer movements have a sublime immobility. Written while Copland was working on his great cycle, Twelve Poems of Emily Dickinson, the first two movements of this impressive quartet enter new territory, Copland tentatively exploring serial techniques before Stravinsky did. A few exposed string phrases lack finesse, and some soft details in the piano are almost lost – at the end of the first movement and more seriously at the end of the last movement when the dissonant note in the last chord is inaudible. But this is a valuable collection, well worth acquiring to have all these works together, played – and recorded – like this.

Arcangelo Corelli Italian 1653-1713

GROVE Corelli studied in Bologna from 1666, and was admitted to the Accademia Filarmonica at 17. By 1675 he was in Rome, where he became the foremost violinist and a chamber musician to Queen Christina of Sweden, to whom he dedicated his 12 trio sonatas da chiesa Op 1 (1681). His 12 trio sonatas da camera Op 2 (1685) were dedicated to Cardinal Pamphili; Corelli was his music master, 1687-90. His next patron, Cardinal Pietro Ottoboni, received the dedication of the trio sonatas Op 4 (1694). Corcilli came to dominate Rome musical life, and also directed opera performances there and in Naples. After 1708 he retired from public view.

Corelli was the first composer to derive his fame exclusively from instrumental music. His works were immensely popular during his lifetime and long afterwards, and went through numerous reprints and arrangements (42 editions of the op.5 violin sonatas had appeared by 1800). They were seen as models of style for their purity and poise. His small output – six published sets and a few single pieces – contains innovations of fundamental importance to Baroque style, reconciling strict counterpoint and soloistic violin writing, and using sequential progressions and suspensions to give a notably modern sense of tonality. Distinctions between 'church' (abstract) and 'chamber' (dance) idioms are increasingly blurred in his sonatas. The op.6 concerti grossi (1714) resemble trio sonatas with orchestral reinforcement and echo effects. They were especially popular in England, preferred even to Handel's concertos well into the 19th century. There were many imitations of Corelli's music, notably of the folia variations in the violin sonata Op 5 No 12 (1700), and some composers used his music as a springboard; Bach borrowed a theme from the trio sonata Op 3 No 4 (1689) for an organ fugue. As a violinist Corelli was the finest, most influential teacher of his day; as an ensemble director he imposed high standards of discipline.

Concerti grossi

Awards 1989

12 Concerti grossi, Op 6 – No 1 in D; No 2 in F; No 3 in C minor; No 4 in D; No 5 in B flat; No 6 in F; No 7 in D; No 8 in G minor; No 9 in F; No 10 in C; No 11 in B flat; No 12 in F 🅿
The English Concert / Trevor Pinnock
Archiv Produktion ② 459 451-2ATA2 Ⓜ
(130 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1988 ●●●

In his working life of about 40 years Corelli must have produced a great deal of orchestral music, yet the 12 Concerti grossi, Op 6, form the bulk of what is known to have survived. Their original forms are mostly lost but we know that those in which they were published in Amsterdam by Estienne Roger had been carefully polished and revised by the composer – and that they were assembled from movements that had been written at various times. The first eight are in da chiesa form, the last four in da camera form – without and with named dance movements respectively, and the number of their movements varies from four to seven. Each features the interplay of a group of soloists, the concertino (two violins and a cello) and the orchestra, the ripieno, the size of which Corelli stated to be flexible. These are without doubt masterpieces of their genre, one that was later developed by, notably, Bach and Handel, and they are rich in variety. The scores leave scope for embellishment, and the players of The English Concert take full advantage of them.

Trio Sonatas

Trio Sonatas, Op 3[a] – F; D; B flat; B minor; D minor; G. Trio Sonatas, Op 4[b] – C; G minor; A; D; A minor; E Jakob Lindberg theorbo Purcell Quartet (Catherine Mackintosh, [a]Elizabeth Wallfisch, [b]Catherine Weiss vns Richard Boothby vc); Robert Woolley [a]hpd/[b]org 🅿
Chandos Chaconne CHAN0526 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1990s
Trio Sonatas, Op 1-4, also available on Chandos Chaconne Classics ④ CHAN0692/4 Ⓜ
(4 hours 36 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1990s ●

Corelli's chamber music was reprinted 84 times during his lifetime and 31 more during the rest of the 18th century, a record that most composers would find enviable even today. The Sonatas of Op 3 are da chiesa, those of Op 4 are da camera (with dance-titled movements); the recording contains the first six of each set – the remaining ones are on another disc (Chandos CHAN0532), should you (as is probable) be tempted to add them to your collection. They are small gems: most have four movements and their durations range from five-and-a-half to seven-and-a-half minutes, within which they pack a wealth of invention, pure beauty and variety of pace and mood. Surviving evidence suggests that they were played at a much lower pitch than today's standard, the lower string tension adding warmth and opulence to the sound. Catherine Mackintosh takes full advantage of the works' opportunities for pliant phrasing and added embellishments; Elizabeth Wallfisch 'converses' with her in her own characteristic way, whilst Catherine Weiss follows her example more closely. The Purcell Quartet's oneness of thought and timing is a joy to hear and the recording is superb in all respects.

Violin Sonatas, Op 5

Violin Sonatas, Op 5
Andrew Manze vn Richard Egarr hpd
Harmonia Mundi ② HMU90 7298/9 Ⓜ
(131 minutes: DDD). Recorded c2002 ●●

Considering the acknowledged status of Corelli's Op 5 violin sonatas, it is surprising how few of today's star Baroque violinists have recorded them. Published as a clear statement of intent on January 1, 1700, they are a benchmark not only in the history of the violin but of chamber music in general; yet despite being an accepted model of compositional purity and refinement which lasted throughout the 18th century and beyond, for many music-lovers – even Baroque music-lovers – they are still relatively little-known territory. Perhaps it is their finely honed perfection which has counted against them. Maybe they just seem too polite. Accounts of Corelli's violin-playing tell us that his eyes would glow 'red as fire' and his face contort, but evidence of this volatile character has not not always been easy to detect in the written notes of the violin sonatas.

If anyone is going to find him, however, it is Andrew Manze, who has repeatedly demonstrated that the heart of Baroque music lies beyond what is on the printed page. At a time when improvisational flair and spontaneity have never been a more exciting part of Baroque music-making, Manze and his accompanist Richard Egarr are the masters of it, and here they have produced a Corelli recording which is nothing short of revelatory.

Not that it is unthinkingly wild or bizarre. Manze may have adorned the music with his customarily liberal decoration of extra double-stops, flowery arabesques and emphatic gestures – and Egarr may have performed his usual extraordinary feats at the keyboard, devising an array of inventive keyboard textures which ranges from luxurious feather-bed arpeggios and swirls to daring, stabbing left-hand double-octaves (no other continuo player manages to sound so much as if his fingers were a direct extension of his imagination) – but this is still Corelli with a measure of north Italian dignity.

The resulting balance between restraint and urgency is compelling, because the performers, you feel, are not out to shock but to search for something new and real. This really is Corelli as you have not heard him before.

The performances reach a high technical standard, as does the recording, which leaves as my only quibble the strangely long gaps left between some of the movements. This vital, ear-opening disc is in a category of its own, classic music in a classic – maybe even an epoch-making – recording.

William Cornysh British 1468-1523

GROVE After being at court (from 1494) Cornysh became Master of the Children at the Chapel Royal, a post he held until his death. From 1509 he was the leading figure in the plays and entertainments that enlivened court life. In 1513 he made the first of several visits to France with the Chapel Royal, in Henry VIII's retinue. Several of his sacred vocal works are in the Eton Choirbook; their style ranges from the flamboyance of the Stabat mater to the simplicity of the Ave Maria Mater Dei. His notable secular partsongs (in MSS are similarly versatile, Yow and I and Amyas being simple and chordal and A robyn a three-part canon apparently incorporating elements of pre-existent melody. Several other musicians with the surname Cornysh were active in the late 15th century and early 16th.

Magnificat

Salve regina. Ave Maria, mater Dei. Gaude virgo mater Christi. Magnificat. Ah, Robin. Adieu, adieu, my heartes lust. Adieu courage. Woefully arrayed. Stabat mater

The Tallis Scholars / Peter Phillips

Gimell CDGIM014 (65 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included. Recorded 1988 Ⓕ

Cornysh's music is a riot of abundant, often seemingly wild melody, constantly in search of wanton, abstract, dare-devil ideas. Take, for example, the extraordinary conclusion to the five-part Magnificat, where pairs of voices are challenged with music of gradually increasing complexity, peaking in an exchange of quite hair-raising virtuosity between the sopranos – and all this just for the words 'and ever shall be, world without end'! As far as the sacred works are concerned, The Tallis Scholars respond magnificently to Cornysh's audacious imagination. Theirs is a majestic and glorious sound, to be relished in full in the Stabat mater, a huge piece that survives incomplete and for which the late Frank Harrison composed treble parts that may even trump Cornysh himself in their sheer bravura. Marginally less striking in The Tallis Scholars' performances are the short part-songs and the carol Woefully arrayed, robbed as they are here of some of their latent expressiveness and strength by being sung (admittedly very beautifully) in an inappropriately resonant building, and in rounded modern English vowels. But judged as a whole this disc must be reckoned an outstanding success.

François Couperin French 1668-1733

GROVE Couperin was the central figure of the French harpsichord school. He came from a long line of musicians, mostly organists, of whom the most eminent was his uncle, Louis Couperin, though his father Charles (1638-79) was also a composer and organist of St Gervais. Franc;ois succeeded to that post on his 18th birthday; his earliest known music is two organ masses. In 1693 he became one of the four royal organists which enabled him to develop his career as a teacher through his court connections. He was soon recognized as the leading French composer of his day through his sacred works and his chamber music and, from 1713, his harpsichord pieces. In 1716 he published an important treatise on harpsichord playing and the next year he was appointed royal harpsichordist.

Among the music Couperin composed for Louis XIV's delectation were his Concerts royaux, chamber works for various combinations. He had written works in his own elaboration of trio-sonata form in the 1690s following the Italianate style of Corelli but retaining French character in the decorative lines and rich harmony. Later, he published these alongside French-style groups of dances as Les nations; they include some of his emotionally most powerful music. He was much concerned with blending French and Italian styles; he composed programmatic tributes to Lully and Corelli and works under the title Les goûts-réünis. He also wrote intensely expressive pieces for bass viol.

But it is as a harpsichord composer that Couperin is best known. He published four books with some 220 pieces, grouped in 27 ordres or suites. Some movements are in the traditional French dance forms, but most are character pieces with titles that reflect their inspiration: some are portraits of individuals or types, some portray abstract qualities, some imitate the sounds of nature. The titles may also be ambiguous or metaphorical, or even intentionally obscure. Most of the pieces are in rondeau form. All are elegantly composed, concealing a complex, allusive and varied emotional world behind their highly wrought surface. Couperin took immense pains over the notation of the ornaments with which his harpsichord writing is sprinkled and animated. These, and his style generally, are expounded in his L'art de toucher le clavecin.

Couperin's children were also musicians: Nicholas (1680-1748) succeeded his father at St Gervais, and probably composed, while Marie-Madeleine (1690-1742) was probably an abbey organist and Marguerite-Antoinette (1705- c1778) was active as a court harpsichordist, c1729-1741.

Pièces de clavecin

L'art de toucher le clavecin – Prelude No 6 in B minor. Troisième livre de pièces de clavecin – Treizième ordre; Quatorzième ordre; Quinzième ordre P
Robert Kohnen hpd Barthold Kuijken fl
Accent ACC9399D (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993

Kohnen's playing is rhythmically incisive, fastidious in detail – Couperin was hot on that – and full of character. If, on first acquaintance, his realization of Couperin's vignette 'Les lis naissans' (Ordre No 13) seems a shade spiky then his lyrical approach to the flowing 6/8 melody of the rondeau 'Les rozeaux', which follows, reassures us that Kohnen does have the poetry of the music at heart, and intends that it should be so. Less appealing are Kohnen's somewhat intrusive vocal introductions to 'Les folies françoises'. This information is provided in the booklet so it hardly needs to be reiterated. In a concert recital such snatches of actuality can be effective; on a disc, after repeated listening, they become an unwelcome interruption. Occasional departures from the norm in the following two ordres are of an altogether more agreeable nature. In 'Le rossignol-en-amour' (Ordre No 14) Kohnen takes Couperin up on his suggestion to use a transverse flute, played here with a beautifully rounded tone by Barthold Kuijken. Likewise, in the jaunty rondeau, 'La Julliet', the trio texture is realized by flute and harpsichord rather than the more usual two-harpsichord texture. This piece is beautifully done, as is the subtly bell-like 'Carillon de Cithère' which follows it. In short, a stylish and entertaining release which is as likely as any to draw the cautious listener into Couperin's refined, allusory and metaphor-laden idiom.

Leçons de ténèbres

Trois leçons de ténèbres. Laetentur coeli et exultet. Magnificat anima mea. Victoria! Christo resurgenti P
Les Talens Lyriques (Véronique Gens, Sandrine Piau sops Emmanuel Balsa va da gamba) / Christophe Rousset org
Decca 466 776-2OH (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1999 OO

Couperin's superb settings for solo voices and continuo of the sombre Tenebrae lessons for the Wednesday of Holy Week were composed around 1715. Their exquisitely drawn melodies and anguished but dignified chromaticisms will come as a surprise to listeners used to seeing Couperin only as an urbane, perhaps even rather frivolous court harpsichord composer. In their sheer power and beauty the Leçons de ténèbres rate among the highest musical achievements of the Baroque period.

This recording features two of France's leading Baroque sopranos. Both sing with a refined sense of vocal intensity learned in the Baroque stage repertoire, bringing a declamatory flavour to the Leçons' recitatives, heart-rending laments and occasional apocalyptic outbursts, while also demonstrating in the more free-flowing music consummate control and poise. Sandrine Piau's voice is the lighter and purer of the two; that of Véronique Gens is somewhat darker, heavier and has a touch more vibrato, yet when the two of them come together in the Third Leçon they blend surprisingly well. The gamba-and-organ accompaniments are both tasteful and unobtrusive (typically so for the serious-minded Christophe Rousset). By comparison, William Christie's harpsichord accompaniments on Erato are more interventionist and less earnest, their greater range of textural options helping to push Les Arts Florissants sopranos Patricia Petibon and Sophie Daneman into readings which are rather more sprightly and text-aware. The Decca release, though, is considerably more generous than the Erato, filled out to a more respectable length in joyous vein by two additional two-voice motets and a substantial Magnificat.

Bernhard Crusell
Finnish 1775-1839

GROVE Crusell studied the clarinet from the age of eight and at 12 joined a military band in Sveaborg; in 1791 he went to Stockholm where he became a court musician two years later. He studied the clarinet in Berlin in 1798 with Tausch and in 1803 went to Paris to study composition with Gossec and Berton and the clarinet with Lefèvre. He later held posts as music director in the Swedish court chapel and royal regiment. His compositions include three clarinet concertos (1811, 1816, 1829), an air and variations for clarinet and a Concertante for clarinet, bassoon and horn (1816); he also wrote chamber music, including three clarinet quartets (1812, 1816, 1823), an opera Den lilla Slafvinnan (1824, Stockholm) and 12 songs. He was a fluent composer with a fresh vein of melody. He also made Swedish translations of operas by Mozart, Rossini and others.

Clarinet Concertos

Crusell Clarinet Concerto No 2 in F minor, 'Grand' Baermann Adagio in D flat Rossini Introduction and Variations in C minor Weber Concerto Concertino in C minor, J109
Emma Johnson cl English Chamber Orchestra / Sir Charles Groves
ASV CDDCA559 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1985

It was this Crusell Grand Concerto which Emma Johnson played when she won the BBC Young Musician of the Year competition in 1984. That occasion was the first time she had played a concerto with a full symphony orchestra, and her special affection for the piece, her total joy in each of the three movements, comes over vividly in this performance. The uninhibited spontaneity of her playing, exactly matching a live performance, brings an extra compulsion and immediacy of expression. Emma Johnson in each movement translates the notes with very personal phrasing and expression, always taking risks and bringing them off. This is a daring performance, naughtily lilting in the outer movements, happily songful in the Andante pastorale of the slow movement. In the three shorter pieces Johnson may not have the same technical perfection, but the free expressiveness could not be more winning. Her moulding of legato melodies in the Weber and Rossini works, as well as the Baermann, brings warm expressiveness, with free rubato and sharp contrasts of tone and dynamic. The orchestral sound is full and bright, with Groves a lively, sympathetic accompanist.

Clarinet Concertos – No 1 in E flat, Op 1; No 2 in F minor, Op 5; No 3 in B flat, Op 11
Kari Kriikku cl Finnish Radio Symphony Orchestra / Sakari Oramo
Ondine ODE965-2 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2000 ●

With full, bright, immediate sound, the Finnish clarinettist Kari Kriiku gives dazzling performances of these three delightful clarinet concertos. In many ways he is even more daring than the two excellent rivals Karl Leister (BIS) and Emma Johnson (ASV and Regis Records), regularly choosing speeds that stretch virtuosity to the limit, particularly in the finales. Those of Nos 1 and 2 may be marked allegretto merely, but Kriiku, by choosing exceptionally fast speeds, brings out an extra scherzando quality, often sharp and spiky, in which Crusell's characteristically dotted rhythms are delightfully crisp. The almost impossibly rapid tonguing never seems to get in the way of detailed characterisation.

Johnson in her recordings is altogether more relaxed, regularly adopting speeds rather broader, extremely so in the Alla Polacca which ends No 3. Consistently, her pointing of rhythm brings out the fun in the writing, and in her comparably broad approach to slow movements she finds extra poetry. Partly as a result of the immediacy of the recording, Kriiku's pianissimos are not as extreme, yet in flair and panache Kriiku is second to none, superbly supported by the crisp, purposeful playing of the Finnish National Radio orchestra under Sakari Oramo.

An excellent disc, guaranteed to win friends for these sparkling works.

Jean-Henri D'Anglebert

French 1635-1691

GROVE In 1662 D'Anglebert succeeded Chambonnières as harpsichordist to Louis XIV, a post he officially held until his death. His Pièces de clavecin (1689) contains four suites of dances (three beginning with unmeasured preludes) complemented by transcriptions of popular tunes, arrangements of works by Lully, and five organ fugues that show a firm grasp of contrapuntal techniques. The volume contains a comprehensive table of ornaments, with many new signs that passed into general usage, and ends with a short treatise on keyboard harmony.

Pièces de clavecin

Pièces de clavecin – A minor; C; D; D minor; G; G minor 🅿
Christophe Rousset hpd
Decca L'Oiseau-Lyre ② 458 588-2OH2 Ⓕ
(159 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1996 ●

Jean-Henri d'Anglebert is one of the three most important figures of the influential French harpsichord school of the 17th century, yet his music, like that of his immediate predecessor as court harpsichordist to Louis XIV, Chambonnières, is not nearly as well represented on disc as that of the triumvirate's third member, Louis Couperin. Its relative lack of popularity probably has to do with the musical preoccupations of our own time, for in d'Anglebert's music, for all its stylistic and technical assurance, we find less of the touching melancholy and haunting expressiveness with which Couperin can speak to us across the ages. By comparison, d'Anglebert seems more a prisoner of his own time and place, namely the courtly surroundings of Versailles where, if seriousness was still a requirement, so too was an approach which is less subjective, less fragile, and consequently probably less striking to modern ears. D'Anglebert it was, however, who took harpsichord music forward, expanding its expressive range and weight – he appears to have been the first French keyboard composer to write a set of variations – and paving the way for the keyboard achievements of François Couperin, Rameau, and even Bach. For all harpsichordists, then, he is a composer not to be ignored.

That this set claims to be the 'complete' harpsichord works is a little misleading. For example, owners of the 'complete works' published in 1975 by Heugel will notice that while all the published pieces appear, be they d'Anglebert originals or transcriptions, only genuine d'Anglebert works are included from the manuscript sources. In view of the undoubted documentary value (and intent) of this recording, it seems a shame that Decca does not see fit to give more information.

Turning to the performances, Christophe Rousset is in many ways the ideal harpsichordist for this music. Sympathetic to d'Anglebert – he considers his output to be 'a jewel of French music' – he possesses both the serious temperament and the exquisite technique his music demands. D'Anglebert's works must be among the most ornament-encrusted in existence, yet Rousset never struggles in this complex of tremblements, ports de voix and chutes, executing them instead with unfailing poise and control, whichever hand or finger they lie under. (The harpsichord, a beautifully prepared 1629 Ruckers, must likewise be commended for meeting the tough demands made on it by so many notes.) Ornaments aside, however, Rousset's overall touch is in any case positively aristocratic, producing a rich and gently sonorous tone which never clatters and never jangles. His elegant realisations of the unmeasured preludes are an utter delight. It is true that spontaneity is not high on his list of attributes – he springs few interpretative surprises and sticks rigorously to the text, adding scarcely a single decoration of his own – but nobody could deny that this is harpsichord-playing of an extremely high level of refinement.

Claude Debussy

French 1862-1918

GROVE Debussy studied with Guiraud and others at the Paris Conservatoire (1872-84) and as prizewinner went to Rome (1885-7), though more important impressions came from his visits to Bayreuth (1888, 1889) and from hearing Javanese music in Paris (1889). Wagner's influence is evident in the cantata La damoiselle élue (1888) and the Cinq, poèmes de Baudelaire (1889) but other songs of the period, notably the settings of Verlaine (Ariettes oubliées, Trois mélodies, Fêtes galantes, set 1) are in a more capricious style, as are parts of the still somewhat Franckian G minor String Quartet (1893); in that work he used not only the Phrygian mode but also less standard modes, notably the whole-tone mode, to create the floating harmony he discovered through the work of contemporary writers: Mallarmé in the orchestral Prélude à 'L'après-midi d'un faune' (1894) and Maeterlinck in the opera Pelléas et Mélisande, dating in large part from 1893-5 but not completed until 1902. These works also brought forward a fluidity of rhythm and colour quite new to Western music.

Pelléas, with its rule of understatement and deceptively simple declamation, also brought an entirely new tone to opera - but an unrepeatable one. Debussy worked on other opera projects and left substantial sketches for two pieces after tales by Poe (Le diable dans le beffroi and La chûte de la maison Usher), but nothing was completed. Instead the main works were orchestral pieces, piano sets and songs.

The orchestral works include the three Nocturnes (1899), characteristic studies of veiled harmony and texture ('Nuages'), exuberant cross-cutting ('Fêtes') and seductive whole-tone drift ('Sirènes'). La mer (1905) essays a more symphonic form, with a finale that works themes from the first movement, though the centrepiece ('Jeux de vagues') proceeds much less directly and with more variety of colour. The three Images (1912) are more loosely linked, and the biggest, 'Ibéria', is itself a triptych, a medley of Spanish allusions. Finally the ballet Jeux (1913) contains some of Debussy's strangest harmony and texture in a form that moves freely over its own field of motivic connection. Other late stage works, including the ballets Khamma (1912) and La boîte à joujoux (1913) and the mystery play Le martyre de St Sébastien (1911), were not completely orchestrated by Debussy, though St Sébastien is remarkable in sustaining an antique modal atmosphere that otherwise was touched only in relatively short piano pieces (e.g.'La cathédrale engloutie').

The important piano music begins with works which, Verlaine fashion, look back at rococo decorousness with a modern cynicism and puzzlement (Suite bergamasque, 1890; Pour le piano, 1901). But then, as in the orchestral pieces, Debussy began to associate his music with visual impressions of the East, Spain, landscapes etc, in a sequence of sets of short pieces. His last volume of Etudes (1915) interprets similar varieties of style and texture purely as pianistic exercises and includes pieces that develop irregular form to an extreme as well as others influenced by the young Stravinsky (a presence too in the suite En blanc et noir for two pianos, 1915). The rarefaction of these works is a feature of the last set of songs, the Trois poèmes de Mallarmé (1913), and of the Sonata for flute, viola and harp (1915), though the sonata and its companions also recapture the inquisitive Verlainian classicism The planned set of six sonatas was cut short by the composer's death from rectal cancer.

Orchestral Works

Images. Berceuse héroïque[a]. Danse sacrée et danse profane[b]. Jeux. Nocturnes. Marche écossaise sur un thème populaire. Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune. La mer. Première rapsodie[c][b]

Awards 1980

Vera Badings hp [c]George Pieterson cl Concertgebouw Orchestra / [a]Eduard van Beinum, Bernard Haitink

Philips Duo ② 438 742-2PM (141 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ

Recorded [b]1957, 1976-79 ●●●

Philips has repackaged Haitink's late-1970s recordings on two CDs for the price of one. Space has also been found for Debussy's last orchestral work, the short Berceuse héroïque conducted by Eduard van Beinum (in excellent 1957 stereo). In every respect this package is a bargain. In La mer, like the 1964 Karajan on DG Galleria, there is a concern for refinement and fluidity of gesture, for a subtle illumination of texture; and both display a colourist's knowledge and use of an individually apt variety of orchestral tone and timbre. It is the wind playing that you remember in Haitink's Images: the melancholy and disconsolate oboe d'amore in 'Gigues'; and from 'Ibéria', the gorgeous oboe solo in 'Les parfums de la nuit', and the carousing clarinets and raucous trumpets in the succeeding holiday festivities. And here, as elsewhere in the set, the Concertgebouw acoustic plays a vital role. Haitink's Jeux is slower and freer than average, and possessed of a near miraculous precision, definition and delicacy. The jewel in this set, for many, will be the Nocturnes, principally for the purity of the strings in 'Nuages'; the dazzling richness and majesty of the central procession in 'Fêtes'; and the cool beauty and composure of 'Sirènes'. Haitink opts for an ethereal distance; there may be passages where you are unsure if they are singing or not, but the effect is magical.

Debussy La mer. Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune
Ravel Daphnis et Chloé – Suite No 2. Boléro
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
DG Galleria 427 250-2GGA (64 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1964-65 ○○○
Also available on DG ② 474 278-2GX2 (coupled with Saint-Saëns 'Organ' Symphony, Ravel Pavane and Rapsodie espagnole) Ⓜ

Beautifully recorded, controlled and aristocratic, these performances show a scrupulous regard for the composers' wishes. The sound of the Berlin strings is sumptuous, with detail well placed and in a generally natural perspective. It is a joy to relish the beauty of the playing in such clear, well-defined sound. It has that indefinable quality that one can more readily recognize than describe, a magic that makes one forget the performer and transports one into the composer's world. You can either be seduced by some of the most sheerly beautiful orchestral sound recorded, or appreciate it for its wide-ranging imagery and its properly mobile pacing; whichever, it is one of the great recorded La mers and one of the classics of the gramophone. Karajan's interpretation of Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune remains one of the most beautiful readings committed to record – the first flute, Karlheinz Zöller, plays like a wizard. Boléro is slow and steady (but Karajan risks floating the early solos). This is also a ravishing account of the Second Suite from Daphnis et Chloé.

Debussy La mer Stravinsky The Rite of Spring
Boulez Notations VII
Chicago Symphony Orchestra / Daniel Barenboim
Teldec 8573-81702-2 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2001

Barenboim's La mer is formidable, and you will need to turn to other accounts, like Haitink's or Karajan's, if you expect a gentler touch and fewer turbulent undercurrents in Debussy. You will find yourself completely won over by the emotional force and intellectual grasp of this reading, as well as by the spectacular Chicago sound. Barenboim takes risks, as in the broad presentation of the first movement's climactic chorale, but because his rhythms are never stodgy, his response to contrast vividly immediate yet always coherent with respect to the larger whole, he brings a strength of character and depth of expression to this music which few other conductors have matched.

Barenboim's Rite of Spring comes hard on the heels of Valery Gergiev's ultra-theatrical version with the Kirov Orchestra, and differences are not hard to hear. Gergiev is recorded with a warmer resonance, but this does his brass players, especially the horns, no favours, and – at least compared to Barenboim – there is some loss of pungency and force of attack in the later stages, as well as a melodramatically drawn-out final cadence. So, although other versions of The Rite, like Markevitch's, might convey greater spontaneity, Barenboim's formidable yet never mechanical interpretation is even more compelling in music which seems to present a grimmer, more unsettling message the further we get from its time of composition.

Not to mince words, this recording captures some great music-making in all three works. However many versions of the Debussy and Stravinsky you have, you are urged to try it.

Nocturnes – Nuages; Fêtes H
Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune. Le martyre de Saint-Sébastien – symphonic fragments. La mer
Philharmonia Orchestra / Guido Cantelli
Testament mono SBT1011 (67 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1954-55 ◉

The death of Guido Cantelli in an air crash at the age of 36 in 1956 was a terrible loss. In a career lasting just 13 years he made his way right to the top, although at the end of his life he was still developing and maturing, and would surely have been one of the most important artists of our time. Fortunately he made a number of superlative recordings and this disc, which contains all his Debussy, shows why concert audiences in the 1950s were bowled over by him.

It is a pity that he never conducted all three Nocturnes, for 'Nuages' flows beautifully and expressively and he chooses just the right tempo for 'Fêtes'. He does not press this piece too hard as most conductors do, and its colour and piquant personality thus flower freshly and easily. L'après-midi is also given plenty of room to breathe: the playing cool, elegant, beautifully poised, yet very eloquent. In La mer Cantelli avoids the ham-fisted, overdramatic approach of so many conductors, and instead we have a performance with clear, gleaming textures. The first movement ebbs and flows in a movingly poetic fashion: every detail makes its effect and everything is perfectly in scale. The middle movement is taken quite briskly, but phrasing is hypersensitive and appropriately fluid. In the last movement there is plenty of drama and excitement, although climaxes are kept within bounds in a way which paradoxically makes for a greater effect than if they were given Brucknerian proportions, as they often are.

During Cantelli's lifetime Le martyre de Saint-Sébastien was strangely regarded as a tired, feeble work, yet he conducted the 'Symphonic fragments' quite frequently. His approach is very much of the concert hall in that he gives the four pieces a life of their own rather than relating them to the unfolding drama. However, he still captures the music's peculiarly fervent, religious-cum-exotic flavour very effectively. The Philharmonia plays with extraordinary subtlety, and the recordings sound very well indeed.

Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune[a]. Images[b]. Jeux[c].
Danse sacrée et danse profane[d]

[b]František Kimel ob [d]Karel Patras hp Czech Philharmonic Orchestra / Serge Baudo
Supraphon Archiv SU3478-2 (70 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1966 and 1977 ◉

Serge Baudo's Debussy collection brings together three of the most outstanding recordings Supraphon gave us in the analogue era. Indeed the rich, balmy sound is perfect for the ravishing Czech playing in the Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune, with a wonderfully limpid flute solo, and Baudo letting the music flow onwards in the most natural way. Debussy's translucent colours gleam vividly at the very opening of Images, and the piquant oboe solo is ear-catching. 'Les parfums de la nuit' waft softly and languorously in the evening breeze, and the opening of 'Le matin d'un jour de fête' is hauntingly mysterious before the orchestra blazes into life. Finest of all is Jeux, always an elusive work on record, but here presented with richly glowing colouristic magic, ravishingly seductive string textures, and a subtle feeling for the music's ebb and flow. The transfer is ADD, and if you are one of those collectors who think that a digital CD can't transfer analogue hall ambience and decay properly, sample this.

String Quartet

Awards 2001

Debussy String Quartet in G minor, Op 10 Ravel String Quartet in F Dutilleux Ainsi la nuit
Belcea Quartet (Corina Belcea, Laura Samuel vns Krzysztof Chorzelski va Alasdair Tait vc)
EMI Debut 574020-2 Ⓑ
(71 minutes: DDD). Recorded 2000 ◉◉◉

This CD confirms the impression formed from broadcasts of a highly talented, exceptionally well-integrated ensemble. Their excellent balance is highlighted by crystal-clear recording. This is quartet playing of great musicality with a wonderful sense of interaction. They find a near ideal transparency in the Ravel, its subtleties beautifully articulated.

The denser, less light-filled style of the Debussy, too, is perfectly weighted – this is a work they've clearly played on numerous occasions and their performance has a feeling of a work truly inhabited by its players. And the Dutilleux is exquisitely observed, its fragmentary structure creatively embraced by these young musicians. And if all that weren't enough, this disc comes at budget price.

Debussy String Quartet in G minor, Op 10
Ravel String Quartet in F
Quartetto Italiano (Paolo Borciani, Elisa Pegreffi vns Piero Farulli va Franco Rossi vc)
Philips Silver Line 420 894-2PSL (57 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1968 ◉

Coupling the Debussy and Ravel String Quartets has become a cliché of the record industry, but as someone has said, a cliché is only a great truth made stale by repetition, and these two wonderful pieces do make a satisfying pair. The account of them by the Quartetto Italiano is over 30 years old but none the worse for that. They are marvellously vital performances in which intensity of feeling does not preclude refinement. The only quibble is about the high-level transfer to CD which may send you reluctantly to the volume control of your amplifier. But when the necessary adjustment is made, the result as sound is satisfactory and the playing good enough to make this Philips issue a first choice at medium price in these works despite its age.

Piano Trio

Debussy Piano Trio in G Fauré Piano Trio in D minor, Op 120 Ravel Piano Trio in A minor
Florestan Trio (Anthony Marwood vn Richard Lester vc Susan Tomes pf)
Hyperion CDA67114 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ◉

The Florestan Trio has the ability to adapt its style to different kinds of music without any loss of conviction. After Brahms and Schumann comes this French disc showing it equally adept at entering the 1880 salon world of Debussy's youthful Trio, Ravel's brilliant exotic idiom, and the intimate, intense thoughts of Fauré's old age. In the quicker movements Susan Tomes's playing is remarkably light and precise. The finale of the Fauré, for example, has a scherzando quality that throws into relief the seriousness of the strings' initial gesture. The string players are always ready to modify their sound to produce special expressive effects – the eerily quiet unison passage in Fauré's Andante (track 2, 2'54") or the vibrato-less duet in the Ravel Passacaille (track 10, 5'15") – sounding wonderfully remote and antique. The clarity of the Hyperion recording allows the fantastical detail in the Ravel Pantoum to emerge. In the Debussy, the Florestan favour elegance rather than trying to search out expressive depths. Their freshness, imagination and purposeful directness makes this a top choice.

Sonata for Flute, Viola and Harp

Sonata for Flute, Viola and Harp[a]. Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune (arr Samazeuilh)[b]. Syrinx[b]. La flûte de Panc. Chansons de Bilitis[d]
[cd]Irène Jacob spkr Philippe Bernold, [d]Mathieu Dufour fls [a]Gérard Caussé va [ad]Isabelle Moretti, [d]Germaine Lorenzini hps Ariane Jacob [b]pf/[d]celesta
Harmonia Mundi HMC90 1647 (50 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included.

The high point of this disc is a beautifully sensitive performance of Debussy's elusive late sonata, a 'terribly sad' work according to the composer himself, but also containing in its latter two movements an uneasy kind of high spirits born of desperation. The opening and close of the first movement provide two of those haunting moments at which French composers seem to excel. Philippe Bernold is a player of delicate, refined tone whose descents to the edge of sound are hypnotic in their effect; and with his two partners the performance rivals those recordings hitherto cherished as yardsticks – the classic Melos of 1962 and the Nash of 1991. Bernold captures the spirit of rapture in Syrinx, which is heard both in its usual form as an unaccompanied solo and as it was originally intended, as incidental music to a play, Psyché. Unfortunately Irène Jacob, who reads the text admirably, is too distantly placed in relation to the flute. The same criticism applies to the erotic Chansons de Bilitis poems. It was Debussy's own idea to make a transcription for flute and piano of the Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune; but imaginatively as Samazeuilh wrote this and Ariane Jacob plays the piano part, the sensuous magic of this score suffers from this reduction of colour.

Cello Sonata

Debussy Cello Sonata in D minor
Britten Cello Sonata, Op 65
Schumann Fünf Stücke im Volkston, Op 102
Mstislav Rostropovich vc Benjamin Britten pf
Decca The Classic Sound 452 895-2DCS Ⓜ
(51 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1961 ○○○

Rostropovich was second only to Sir Peter Pears as a Britten catalyst, inspiring some of his finest instrumental works as well as some of his most memorable accompanying. Or should we say partnering, for soloist and accompanist are so well matched, and respect each other so much, that the rigid role-play of leader and follower is joyously over-ruled, turning chamber music into a dramatic experience which suggests the dialogue of two actors. This is particularly evident in the temperamental caprice of the Debussy Sonata, where the range of colour drawn by Britten from the keyboard, in response to Rostropovich's own, has to be heard to be believed. Their spontaneously attuned rubato throughout, as well as their rhythmic vitality in the finale, are further sources of delight. Rostropovich and Britten are also indisputable winners in Schumann's five folk-style pieces (even though No 2, marked langsam, is questionably fast), much more at one with each other as well as with the rustic simplicity and strength of the music itself. Regardless of more recent recordings, Rostropovich remains the real heavyweight in the Britten Sonata – it's a classic. It's difficult to believe the recording is nearly 40 years old. This disc can confidently be hailed as a collector's piece, likely to survive in the gramophone archives for all time.

Debussy Cello Sonata
Bridge Cello Sonata in D minor, H125. Four Short Pieces, H104 – Meditation; Spring song
Dohnányi Cello Sonata in B flat minor, Op 8
Bernard Gregor-Smith vc Yolande Wrigley pf Ⓕ
ASV CDDCA796 (68 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1992

The commedia dell'arte inspiration of the Debussy Cello Sonata can be appreciated on minimal acquaintance, but the highly individual formal structure of the work and its extraordinary variety of mood and content present huge challenges not easily met in live performance; and the Sonata can seem even more unattainable on disc. Bernard Gregor-Smith and Yolande Wrigley take up the challenge in this very fine performance of lyrical elegance, and not a little rococo irony and wit. Speeds are on the fast side, but there is no lack of refinement and flexibility in the playing, with superb bravura displays from Gregor-Smith in the finale. Whilst the performance of the Debussy is generally excellent, the centrepiece is the fervent and frequently heroic account of the Sonata in B flat by Ernö Dohnányi. The work is seldom performed, and Gregor-Smith's fine-toned and dexterous reading deserves high praise. The Frank Bridge Cello Sonata is a personal expression of grief and outrage, dating from the final year of the First World War, and shares a common tonality with the Debussy. Its broad paragraphs dictate the interpretative approach, but the work receives a fluent and idiomatic reading, reserving the last degree of energy for the poignantly rhetorical closing pages of the piece. The disc also includes two characteristic Bridge miniatures, again eloquently played by this expert husband-and-wife duo. They have been faithfully, if not brilliantly recorded. As for the playing, however, the skill of execution is matched by a refined insight into each work, lending a rare equilibrium to a superb recital of unusual perception and eloquence.

Violin Sonata

Debussy Violin Sonata Franck Violin Sonata in A
Ravel Berceuse sur le nom de Gabriel Fauré. Pièce en forme de habanera. Tzigane
Augustin Dumay vn Maria João Pires pf
DG 445 880-2GH (56 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1993 Ⓕ

There is a spacious, eloquent view here of Franck's Sonata, in which Dumay's sweet tone also has the requisite strength; as for Pires, she accompanies where necessary and yet can offer a partner's contribution too, as well as being equal to the composer's considerable pianistic demands. Although the recorded balance favours the violinist, the brilliant second movement is very effective, as is the flowing canonic finale, in which the players rightly think in long phrases. Debussy's emotionally fragile world fares even better: this playing has the right flexibility of time and tone, and the rapidly shifting moods of this essentially sad music, so different from Franck's with its emotional assurance, are unerringly captured; and the sound is excellent here. Dumay and Pires are also at home in Ravel's music with its delicate tenderness and – in Tzigane at least – glittering virtuosity.

En blanc et noir

En blanc et noir. Petite suite. Nocturnes (arr Ravel) – Nuages; Fêtes. Six épigraphes antiques. Lindaraja
Katia and Marielle Labèque pf duet/pfs
Philips 454 471-2PH (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

Katia and Marielle Labèque give a Debussy programme which is stylish and scintillating. Playing with a fierce, recognisably French clarity and verve they make you doubly aware of the extraordinary force of nature that consumed Debussy during his final years. Faced with the outbreak of war, the possible destruction of his beloved France and his own terminal illness, he composed, among other masterpieces, his En blanc et noir, a wild dreamscape containing some of his most startling and original music. And if the Labèques play with an electrifying bravura, they are no less enviably refined, registering every detail of the score with scrupulous precision and sensitivity. They are no less dazzling in the more openly endearing Petite suite and if 'Fêtes' (from the Nocturnes) explodes in an orgy of brilliance, such open display is poetically balanced in Epigraphes antiques, where the duo are hauntingly memorable. Time and again they show how the finest insights are only available to pianists liberated from all difficulty. The recordings are immaculate and combined with the Labèque sisters' verve and pianistic aplomb provide a special, crystalline experience.

Complete Piano Works

Awards 1996

Préludes, Books 1ª and 2ª. Ⓗ
Pour le pianoª. Estampesª . Images, Sets 1a and 2a. Children's Cornera. 12 Etudes. D'un cahier d'esquisses. Rêverie. Valse romantique. Masques. L'îsle joyeuse. La plus que lente. Le petit nègre. Berceuse héroïque. Hommage à Haydn. Danse bohémienne. Mazurka. Deux Arabesques. Nocturne. Tarantelle styrienne. Ballade. Suite bergamasque. Fantaisie (recorded live)
Walter Gieseking pf Hessian Radio Orchestra, Frankfurt / Kurt Schröder
EMI mono ④ 565855-2 (276 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1951-55 ○○○
The complete Préludes with items marked ª are also available on HMV Classics ② HMVD5 73192-2 Ⓑ and (Préludes only) on EMI Great Recordings of the Century 567233-2 Ⓜ

Gieseking's insight and iridescence in Debussy are so compelling and hypnotic that they prompt either a book or a blank page – an unsatisfactory state where criticism is concerned! First and foremost, there is Gieseking's sonority, one of such delicacy and variety that it can complement Debussy's witty and ironic desire to write music 'for an instrument without hammers', for a pantheistic art sufficiently suggestive to evoke and transcend the play of the elements themselves ('the wind, the sky, the sea...'). Lack of meticulousness seems a small price to pay for such an elemental uproar in 'Ce qu'a vu le vent d'ouest', and Puck's elfin pulse and chatter (pp aérian) are caught with an uncanny deftness and precision. The final Debussian magic may not lie in a literal observance of the score, in the unfailing dotting and crossing of every objective and picturesque instruction, yet it is the start or foundation of a great performance. More domestically, no one (not even Cortot) has ever captured the sense in Children's Corner of a lost and enchanted land, of childhood re-experienced through adult tears and laughter, as Gieseking does here. 'Pour les tierces', from the Etudes, may get off to a shaky start but, again, in Debussy's final masterpiece, Gieseking's artistry tugs at and haunts the imagination. Try 'Pour les sonorités opposées', the expressive centre of the Etudes, and you may well wonder when you have heard playing more subtly gauged or articulated, or the sort of interaction with a composer's spirit that can make modern alternatives seem so parsimonious by comparison. So here is that peerless palette of colour and texture, of a light and shade used with a nonchalantly deployed but precise expertise to illuminate every facet of Debussy's imagination. An added bonus, a 1951 performance of the Fantaisie for piano and orchestra, completes an incomparable set of discs. The transfers are a real triumph – these discs should be in every musician's library.

Etudes

Etudes – Books 1 and 2
Mitsuko Uchida pf
Philips 50th Edition 464 698-2PH Ⓜ
(47 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1989 ●

The harmonic language and continuity of the Etudes is elusive even by Debussy's standards, and it takes an artist of rare gifts to play them 'from within', at the same time as negotiating their finger-knotting intricacies. Mitsuko Uchida is such an artist. On first hearing perhaps rather hyperactive, her playing wins you over by its bravura and sheer relish, eventually disarming criticism altogether. This is not just the finest-ever recorded version of the Etudes; it is also one of the finest examples of recorded piano playing in modern times, matched by sound quality of outstanding clarity.

Préludes

Préludes – Books 1 and 2
Walter Gieseking pf
EMI Great Recordings of the Century 567233-2
(71 minutes: ADD) (in USA; 5 67262-2) Ⓜ
Recorded 1953/4 ○○○

Gieseking's set of both Books of the Préludes is one of the great classics of the gramophone. The individual insights are endless, so is the extraordinary feeling for the music's evocation and atmosphere. The 1953-54 recordings just missed the stereo era, but the Abbey Road mono sound is first-class. Don't miss it.

Awards 1994

Préludes – Books 1 and 2
Krystian Zimerman pf
DG ② 435 773-2GH2 Ⓜ
(84 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1991 ●●●

Two discs, retailing at a high mid-price and playing for a total of 84 minutes? The playing and the recording had better be in the luxury class. Fortunately they are. Zimerman is the very model of a modern virtuoso. His overriding aim is vivid projection of character. His quasi-orchestral range of dynamic and attack, based on close attention to textual detail (there are countless felicities in his observation of phrase-markings) and maximum clarity of articulation, is the means to that end. As a result, he draws out the many connections in this music with the romantic tradition, especially in pianistic tours de force such as 'Les collines d'Anacapri', 'Ce qu'a vu le vent d'ouest' and 'Feux d'artifice', which are treated to a dazzling Lisztian élan. The instrument he has selected is itself something of a star and DG's recording combines opulence with razor-sharp clarity.

At the other extreme Zimerman displays an exquisite refinement of touch that makes the quieter pieces both evocative and touching. Such sensitively conceived and wonderfully executed Debussy playing stands, at the very least, on a level with a classic recording such as Gieseking's.

Préludes – Book 1. D'un cahier d'esquisses. Morceau de concours. La plus que lente. Hommage à Joseph Haydn. The little nigar. Children's Corner
Noriko Ogawa pf
BIS BIS-CD1205 (76 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded c2002 ●●

Every bar of these performances confirms Ogawa as a most elegant, scrupulously sensitive interpreter of 'music like a dream from which one draws away the veil' (Debussy).

What magical transparency she achieves throughout Book 1 of the Préludes with her super-fine pedalling and her cool command of texture and colour. In 'Voiles' she makes you readily recall Cortot's heady description of 'the flight of the white wing on the crooning sea toward the horizon bright with the setting sun' while simultaneously maintaining her own individuality. Her hushed start before the start of the whirling tarantella in 'Les collines d'Anacapri' is one of innumerable haunting touches; and her playing of 'Des pas sur la neige', the Arctic centre of Book 1 of the Préludes, truly suggests some ultimate desolation.

In Children's Corner she never turns 'Doctor Gradus', marked modérément animé, into a glittering presto and finds ample time to convey its mix of guile and sophistication.

Although this reviewer would never want to be without Gieseking's eternally evocative recordings (reviewed above under Complete Piano Works), you could hardly find a more skilful or sympathetic artist from a younger generation than Noriko Ogawa. BIS's demonstration sound quality crowns this superb issue.

Préludes – Books 1 and 2^a. Images. Children's Corner
Arturo Benedetti Michelangeli pf
DG ② 449 438-2GH2 (128 minutes: ADD/^{a}DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1971-88 ●

Of Debussy playing his own music Alfredo Casella said 'he made the impression of playing directly on the strings of the instrument with no intermediate mechanism – the effect was a miracle of poetry'. This is not Michelangeli's way. He can certainly be poetic and produce miracles but his manner is not ingratiating. Generalized 'atmosphere' doesn't interest him. His superfine control is put at the service of line and movement, above all, and the projection of perspectives. He gives you a sense not just of foreground and background but of many planes in between. Michelangeli was capable of a transcendental virtuosity that had nothing to do with playing fast and loud and everything to do with refinement, and it is very much in evidence here – in many Préludes and especially in the first two Images of the Second Book. The clarity of texture and the laser-like delineation can sometimes be disconcerting if you're accustomed to a softer, more ethereal style, but they have a way of making Debussy's modernism apparent and thrilling. He sounds here as if he has had nothing to do with the 19th century. The Images and Children's Corner are among the finest versions ever recorded. But in some of the Préludes, particularly in Book 1, the sound is rather close and dry – maybe how Michelangeli wanted it. He uses as little pedal as he can get away with.

There are people who regard Gieseking as unparalleled in this music, but after a quarter of a century the best of Michelangeli, similarly, will run and run. Today's generation of Debussy pianists will be expected to work from a less corrupt text, quite rightly, but they will have far to go before they can rival the penetrating qualities of Michelangeli's Debussy at its best. He could take your breath away and he was illuminating in this repertoire in a rare way.

Additional recommendation
24 Preludes – Books 1 and 2
Tirimo pf
Regis RRCD1111 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ ●

It would be hard to find a more quietly stylish or subtle account than that offered by Tirimo. His undemonstrative mastery makes him among the finest Debussy interpreters on disc – and all at super-bargain price.

Images

Images. Le petit nègre. Children's Corner. La plus que lente. Valse romantique. Tarantelle styrienne. Mazurka. Suite bergamasque. Hommage à Haydn. Elégie. Berceuse héroïque. Page d'album. Etudes. Etude retrouvée
Jean-Yves Thibaudet pf
Decca ② 460 247-2DH2 (151 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994-98

Jean-Yves Thibaudet's Debussy cycle is a cornucopia of delights. Whatever sparkles and enchants is here in super-abundance. The 12 Etudes could hardly be presented more personally or vivaciously. Nos 6 and 7 are marvels of bright-eyed irony and humour while Nos 8 and 9 contrast a haunting alternation of lassitude and hyperactivity with razor-sharp cascades of repeated notes. Thibaudet's timing in the central lento, molto rubato of No 12 (which, as Roger Nichols tells us in his excellent notes, shows Debussy as more than a 'soft-centred voluptuary drifting through life on a cloud of disembodied dissonances') is memorably acute and, throughout, you are made more than aware of a pianist with a penchant for spare pedalling and a superfine brilliance far remote from, say, Gieseking's celebrated, opalescent magic. Thibaudet brings a pristine, spine-tingling quality to every bar. He takes a brisk hand to the Children's Corner suite (allegro rather than allegretto in 'Serenade for the Doll', hardly modérément animé in 'The Snow is Dancing') but even here his spruce technique and vitality are never less than enlivening. In the Suite bergamasque he dances the 'Menuet', so to speak, with an unusual sense of its underlying grace and gravity and his 'Clair de lune' is exceptionally silvery and transparent. Both books of Images are given with a rare sense of epiphany or illumination, of flashing fins and sunlight in 'Poissons d'or' and of a timeless sense of archaism in 'Hommage à Rameau'. Given such palpable relish, early works (the Ballade and Danse, for example) hardly emerge as 'sins of Debussy's youth', their key influences still evident. And anyone doubting Thibaudet's teasing wit should hear him in the Valse romantique and Mazurka, Debussy's sophisticated memory of his beloved Chopin. The Etude retrouvée provides an enchanting bonus and encore, and Decca's presentation and sound are, respectively, lavish and natural. If you want to hear Debussy new-minted, with air-spun and scintillating textures, Thibaudet is your man.

Awards 1990

Images – Sets 1 and 2. D'un cahier d'esquisses. L'îsle joyeuse. Deux arabesques. Hommageà Haydn. Rêverie. Page d'album. Berceuse héroïque
Zoltán Kocsis pf Philips 422 404-2PH Ⓕ
(62 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1988 ○○○

Zoltán Kocsis stands out as an especially idiomatic exponent of Debussy's piano style. Here he plays four relatively early sets of pieces of which all but the Suite bergamasque are in the composer's favourite triptych form that he also used in La mer. The rarity here is the Images oubliées, pieces dating from 1894 that Debussy left unpublished, doubtless because he reworked material from them in the Estampes and very obviously in the Sarabande of Pour le piano, but they are fine in their own right and here we can compare the different treatments of the similar ideas. For superfine sensitivity to details of textural shading Kocsis is at his most spellbinding in the first two numbers of the second set, 'Cloches à travers les feuilles' and 'Et la lune descend sur le temple qui fût'. He is also successful in reminding us of Debussy's wish to 'forget that the piano has hammers' in the atmospheric washes of sound that he conjures in D'un cahier d'esquisses. The sharp clear daylight world of L'îsle joyeuse reveals a Kocsis exulting in his own virtuosity and strength as he also does in the last piece of each set of Images. The recording is first-rate. Highly recommendable.

Le martyre de Saint-Sébastien

Awards 1993

Sylvia McNair sop Ann Murray mez Nathalie Stutzmann contr Leslie Caron narr London Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Michael Tilson Thomas
Sony Classical SK48240 Ⓕ
(66 minutes: DDD). Text and translation included. Recorded 1991 ○○○

'Archers aim closely, I am the target; whoever wounds me the most deeply, loves me the most. From the depths I call forth your terrible love ... again ... again! ... AGAIN!' cries the Saint in ecstasy. What Oscar Wilde did to the story of Salome, so the Italian writer D'Annunzio did to the story of Saint Sebastian (a young Roman officer ordered to be killed by his own archers because of his sympathy for persecuted Christians). This was the first modern recording, not of the complete play (which lasted five hours!), but of an intelligent and effective reduction of the written text using the Saint as narrator, and incorporating all of an hour's worth of Debussy's incidental music. And it must be deemed a triumph. Leslie Caron's Saint is quietly intense and a model of restraint; Sylvia McNair's vox coelestis is just that, a gift from God; and the chorus and orchestra respond with total conviction to Tilson Thomas's committed direction. The sheer sorcery of Debussy's music, benefits enormously from the acoustic of, appropriately, All Saints Church in Tooting, London.

Pelléas et Mélisande

Jacques Jansen bar Pelléas; Irène Joachim sop Mélisande; Henri Etcheverry bar Golaud; Paul Cabanel bass Arkel; Germaine Cernay mez Geneviève; Leila ben Sedira sop Yniold; H

Emile Rousseau bass Shepherd; Armand Narçon bass Doctor Yvonne Gouverné Choir; symphony orchestra / Roger Desormière
EMI Références mono ③ 761038-2 Ⓜ
(196 minutes: ADD)
Booklet with translation included. Recorded 1941 ●

The strength of the performance owed much to the fact that Irène Joachim, Jacques Jansen and Henri Etcheverry had already sung the work many times under Desormière at the Opéra-Comique. Irène Joachim had studied the role of Mélisande with its creator, Mary Garden; and both she and Jansen had been coached by Georges Viseur, who with Messager had been the répétiteur for the opera's first performance. Jansen with his free, youthful-toned production and Joachim with her silvery voice and intelligent response to every verbal nuance, set standards for the doomed lovers that, though nearly equalled, have never been surpassed; but even more impressive is Etcheverry's interpretation of Golaud, a role in which, arguably, he has yet to be rivalled. Leila ben Sedira gives one of the most convincing portrayals ever heard of the child Yniold; and Germaine Cernay and Paul Cabanel (who alone is just a trifle free with the text in places) fill the parts of the older characters with distinction. In this recording, the placing of the voices is such that every single word is crystal-clear. More important every word is invested with meaning by a native French cast – in other versions allowances sometimes need to be made for non-French singers – which had immersed itself totally in the emotional nuances and overtones of the text. Every shade of expression is caught, but nevertheless the overall feeling is of subtle Gallic understatement – with Golaud's self-tormenting jealousy and Pelléas's final inability to resist declaring his love for his brother's mysterious, fey wife creating the great emotional climaxes.

Keith Hardwick's alchemy in transforming these old recordings into sound of improved quality (and with only minimal vestiges of the 78rpm surfaces) is nothing short of amazing. He has not, of course, been able to correct the thin 1941 recording of the woodwind, but one soon comes to terms with the dated instrumental sound because of Desormière's inspired pacing and moulding of the score, the committed orchestral playing, and the well-nigh perfect casting.

Pelléas et Mélisande
Wolfgang Holzmair bar Pelléas; Anne Sofie von Otter sop Mélisande; Laurent Naouri bar Golaud; Alain Vernhes bass Arkel; Hanna Schaer mez Geneviève; Florence Couderc sop Yniold; Jérôme Varnier bar A Doctor; A Shepherd
Radio France Chorus; French National Orchestra / Bernard Haitink
Naïve ③ V4923 (160 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Notes, texts and translations included
Recorded live in 2000 ●

Bernard Haitink has always had a soft spot for French music, where his control of texture and pace often brings out beauties and strengths that other conductors do not find. Pelléas et Mélisande, for which long-term flow is a crucial requirement, is ideally suited to his talents. He has the ability, like a good games player, to create his own time and space.

Throughout, the beauty, energy and brilliance of the orchestral playing ride over an undertow of melancholy and impending disaster, echoing that 'strange air' Mélisande has of someone who, in Arkel's words, 'is always waiting for some great sorrow in the sunshine in a lovely garden'. Haitink is well served by his singers. Holzmair is a fresh-voiced, ardent but elegant Pelléas, and innocent enough to make his entrapment plausible. Even the slight signs of tiring on his high notes in Act 4 can be heard as portraying vulnerability. Anne Sofie von Otter plays Mélisande in the traditional way as timid and fatally seductive. But von Otter brings more vibrato to her top notes than some other interpreters and this gives her timidity a slightly used, passive-aggressive colouring, as though she has employed her don't-touch-me gambit several times in the past, and has found it works.

Laurent Naouri is a supremely intelligent Golaud, slow to jealousy and anger, but terrifying when the dam finally bursts. By contrast, in the final act he is the image of a spiritually lost soul and his choked cries of 'Mélisande!' are truly heartrending. Alain Vernhes's Arkel has that 'goodness' in his tone that the composer wanted, though his pitching, hitherto perfect, wanders somewhat in Act 5.

Members of the French National Orchestra are, apparently, still talking two years later of this Pelléas as a high point in their professional lives. It is not to be wondered at: Haitink gives us a deeply serious and powerful interpretation of the opera.

Additional recommendations
Pelléas et Mélisande
Henry Pelléas Alliot-Lugaz Mélisande
Montreal Symphony Orchestra / Dutoit
Decca 430 502-2DH2 (151 minutes: DDD: 3/91) Ⓕ

A fine modern alternative to the Abbado with Didier Henry and Colette Alliot-Lugaz a touching central pair. Dutoit conducts his superb Montreal orchestra with great style – sumptuously recorded.

Stilwell Pelléas von Stade Mélisande
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Karajan
EMI 567057-2 (162 minutes: ADD: 11/99) Ⓜ

A controversial recording: too 'hot-house' for some but full of breathtaking playing and a heartbreakingly touching pair of lovers. This was clearly a labour of love for the great Austrian conductor.

Rodrigue et Chimène

(recons Langham Smith and orch Denisov)
Laurence Dale ten Rodrigue; Donna Brown sop Chimène; Hélène Jossoud mez Iñez; Gilles Ragon ten Hernan; Jean-Paul Fouchécourt ten Bermudo;

José van Dam bass-bar Don Diègue; Jules Bastin bass Don Gomez; Vincent le Texier bass-bar King; Jean-Louis Meunier ten Don Juan d'Arcos; Jean Delescluse ten Don Pèdre de Terruel
Chorus and Orchestra of the Opéra de Lyon / Kent Nagano
Erato ② 4509-98508-2 (109 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1993-94

It may come as a surprise to many who treasure the unique magic of Pelléas et Mélisande that Debussy toyed with some 30 other plans for operas, and two years before Pelléas had all but completed his first operatic venture. Debussy very soon realised that the libretto's blustering tone was alien to his ideals of half-hinted action in short scenes, and became increasingly restive, finally abandoning it and claiming that it had been accidentally destroyed. In reality it survived complete in a sketch in short score, though some pages have since been lost. Richard Langham Smith reconstructed the work from the manuscripts in the Piermont Morgan Library in New York, it was completed and orchestrated, with a remarkable insight into Debussian style, by Edison Denisov, and in 1993 it was presented by the Opéra de Lyon to mark the opening of its new house. Inconsistencies of style reveal something of Debussy's uncertainties and doubts over a subject inappropriate for him. There is little in Act 3 that would lead anyone to identify him as the composer, and virtually the only sections of the work with a harmonic idiom that was later to become characteristic of him are Rodrigue's and Chimène's mutual declaration of love at the start of Act 1, the orchestral prelude to Act 2 and the unexpected quiet interlude that precedes Rodrigue's mortal challenge to his beloved's father Don Gomez, who had shamed his own father. Debussy is less at home with the choral scene leading up to the angry conflict between the two initially friendly houses, the heroic and warlike atmosphere of much of Act 2, and the bombastic assembling of the royal court; but all these are tackled, if not with individuality, at least with vigour. Don Gomez's death scene is affecting, and the unaccompanied choral requiem for him makes an effective close to Act 2.

Unlike Pelléas, there are a number of extended set pieces for the singers, including Rodrigue's dutiful dilemma, Don Diègue's hymn to the concept of honour, Chimène's lament for her father and her final anguish as she is torn between love and hate for Rodrigue. As a performance and recording, this is in the highest class. Nagano's orchestra plays for him with finesse, and the work is cast from strength. Laurence Dale is a near-perfect Rodrigue – youthful, ardent and sensitive to changes of mood; Donna Brown makes a passionate Chimène, though occasionally just too close to the microphone for sudden outbursts; and José van Dam is his reliable self, with nobility in his voice. Clarity of enunciation throughout (except, at times, from the chorus) is to be applauded.

Léo Delibes French 1836-1891

GROVE A church organist until 1871, Delibes was drawn to the theatre, first writing light operettas in the style of his teacher Adolphe Adam (roughly one a year from 1856 to 1869), then becoming chorus master at the Théâtre-Lyrique and the Opéra. He is best known for his appealing classical ballets Coppélia (1870), with its charming character numbers, and the tuneful but more sophisticated Sylvia (1876), both admired by Tchaikovsky. Meyerbeer's influence is evident in his serious opera Jean de Nivelle (1880), and a gift for witty pastiche in his dances for Hugo's play Le roi s'amuse (1882). His masterpiece is Lakmé (1883), a highly successful opera indebted to Bizet and memorable for its oriental colour, strong characterization and fine melodies.

Coppélia

Coppélia[a]. Sylvia H
London Symphony Orchestra / Anatole Fistoulari; [a]Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra / Antál Dorati
Mercury Living Presence ③ 434 313-2MM3 Ⓜ
(173 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1957-58

The quality of sound here is astonishing for recordings over 40 years old. Nor do the attractions stop at there. These always were highly regarded performances of two of the most attractively tuneful ballets ever composed. Moreover, both conductors here had a great deal of experience in, and feeling for, the ballet style and this is evident in their handling of the scores. Both extract playing that is gracious and brilliant in turn, if just occasionally lacking the final degree of finesse, and in such passages as Fistoulari's vigorous 'Les chasseresses' or Dorati's 'Musique des automates' one can scarcely fail to be won over. It is only fair to mention that this recording of Sylvia is itself not absolutely complete, since it lacks the 'Pas des esclaves' and 'Variation-Valse' from the Act 3 'Divertissement'. On its own terms though, the reissue represents a most compelling offering.

Sylvia

Delibes Sylvia
Saint-Saëns Henry VIII – Ballet-divertissement
Razumovsky Sinfonia / Andrew Mogrelia
Naxos ② 8 553338/9 (114 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1995

Of Delibes's two full-length ballets, Coppélia is the more obviously popular, the one with the bigger tunes and the greater number of recordings. However, Sylvia is also a superbly crafted score, full of haunting melodies. Andrew Mogrelia's Naxos series is one to be collected and treasured: there is loving care applied to selection of tempos, shaping of phrases, orchestral balance and refinement of instrumental detail.

Here you thrill to Sylvia's Act 1 Fanfare, marvel at the control of tempo and refinement of instrumental detail in the 'Valse lente' and 'Entrée du sorcier', and revel in the sheer ebullience of Sylvia's return in Act 2. The inclusion of the ballet music from Saint-Saëns's Henry VIII was an admirably enterprising move, even though it doesn't amount to anything major apart from the 'Danse de la gitane', being essentially a collection of mock 'Olde Britishe' dances. All the same, a quite remarkable bargain.

Lakmé

Natalie Dessay sop Lakmé; Gregory Kunde ten Gérald; José van Dam bass-bar Nilakantha; Delphine Haidan mez Mallika; Franck Leguérinel bar Frédéric; Patricia Petibon sop Ellen; Xenia Konsek sop Rose; Bernadette Antoine sop Mistress Bentson; Charles Burles ten Hadji
Toulouse Capitole Chorus and Orchestra / Michel Plasson
EMI ② 556569-2 (144 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1997 ●

Opera audiences in 19th-century Paris may never have visited India, but they loved to dream about it. After the successes enjoyed by Les pêcheurs de perles and Le roi de Lahore Delibes knew what he was doing when he chose to set an adaptation of Pierre Loti's exotic Indian novel Rarahu and duly scored a hit with his opera Lakmé at the Opéra-Comique in 1883. The opera is nothing without a star in the title-role. Natalie Dessay is certainly that and yet she never fails to remember that Delibes's heroine must be fragile and sensitive. Her Bell Song, brilliantly sung, is also intent on telling a story. Her singing of the death scene, with its delicate fil de voce perfectly poised each time the high A comes round, is heartfelt and leaves no doubt that this is a Lakmé who deserves to go to heaven. EMI found a worthy tenor to partner her. Gregory Kunde, as Gérald, is at ease at the top of his voice. At the first entrance of the colonial Brits, Frédéric describes Gérald as a poet and Kunde lives up to the promise by phrasing his opening solo, 'Fantaisie aux divins mensonges', with poetic sensibility. In the duets he and Dessay are tender young love personified. The supporting cast is also a decent one.

Michel Plasson gives the music room to breathe and is able to conjure a dreamy atmosphere in the scenes of romance. His Toulouse orchestra is adequate, if not exceptional, and the recording is of a good standard. What reason is there to resist?

Additional recommendations

Lakmé

Sutherland Lakmé Vanzo Gérald
Monte-Carlo Opera Orchestra / Bonynge
Decca Double 460 741-2DF2 Ⓜ
(138 minutes: ADD: 4/99)

One for Sutherland fans (don't even try to understand her French) or those wanting a mid-price set. The largely French cast helps convey the spirit of this elusive score.

Lakmé

Robin Lakmé; L de Luca Gérald Ⓗ
Orchestra / Sebastien
Pearl mono ② GEMS0181 (139 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1951 ●●

This is an utter classic, outshining even the superb 1998 Natalie Dessay on EMI. Mado Robin was a famous Lakmé and one can hear why in her tender, plaintive and technically astonishing performance here. The transfer is exemplary.

Frederick Delius British 1862-1934

GROVE Delius's father lent him money to set up as a citrus grower in Florida (1884-86), where he had lessons with Thomas Ward; he then studied at the Leipzig Conservatory (1886-8) and met Grieg. He settled in Paris as a man of bohemian habits, a friend of Gauguin, Strindberg, Munch and others, until in 1897 he moved to Grez with Jelka Rosen, later his wife. There he remained.

He had written operas, orchestral pieces and much else before the move to Grez, but nearly all his regularly performed output dates from afterwards while looking back to the musical and other experiences of earlier years: the seamless flow of Wagner, the airier chromaticism of Grieg, the rich colouring of Strauss and Debussy, the existential independence of Nietzsche. His operas A Village Romeo and Juliet (1901) and Fennimore and Gerda (1910) are love stories cast in connected scenes and examining spiritual states within a natural world. Nature is important too in such orchestral pieces as In a Summer Garden (1908), A Song of the High Hills (with wordless chorus, 1911) or A Song of Summer (1930), though there are other works in which the characteristic rhapsodizing is made to serve symphonic forms, notably the Violin Concerto (1916) and three sonatas for violin and piano (1914, 1923, 1930). The choral works include two unaccompanied, wordless songs 'to be sung of a summer night on the water' (1917), the large-scale A Mass of Life with words from Nietzsche (1905) and a secular Requiem (1916). In the early 1920s he grew blind and paralysed as a result of syphilitic infection, and his last works were taken down by Eric Fenby.

Violin Concerto

Violin Concerto[a]. Piano Concerto in C minor[b]. On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring[c]. Brigg Fair[d]. Caprice and Elegy[e] [a]Tasmin Little vn [b]Jean-Rodolphe Kars pf [e]Julian Lloyd Webber vc [e]Bengt Forsberg pf [ac]Welsh National Opera Orchestra, [bd]London Symphony Orchestra / [d]Anthony Collins, [b]Alexander Gibson, [ac]Sir Charles Mackerras
Decca British Music Collection ② 470 190-2 Ⓜ
[a]Recorded 1991

The basic pace of Mackerras and Little's account of the Violin Concerto is faster than that of

Ralph Holmes (reviewed below), though progress is in no way metronomic. Decca's sound offers a closer view of both soloist and orchestra, and this immediacy goes hand in hand with the more purposeful manner. But after the relative vigour of the first movement, how gloriously the central section develops. Little and Mackerras breathe as one, even in the accompanied cadenza, which like Holmes has a properly ad lib feel to it. This account will undoubtedly win the Concerto and its composer new friends, and has the added bonus of some great couplings.

Orchestral Works (incl Violin Concerto)

Fantastic Dance. A Dance Rhapsody No 1[a]. A Dance Rhapsody No 2. A Song of the High Hills. Three Preludes. Zum Carnival
Maryetta Midgley sop Vernon Midgley ten Eric Parkin pf Ambrosian Singers
Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Eric Fenby, [a]Norman Del Mar
Unicorn-Kanchana Souvenir UKCD2071 Ⓜ
(65 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1981-90

Irmelin Prelude. A Song of Summer. A Late Lark. Piano Concerto in C minor[a]. Violin Concerto[b]
Anthony Rolfe Johnson ten Ralph Holmes vn Philip Fowke pf Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Eric Fenby, [a]Norman Del Mar, [b]Vernon Handley
Unicorn-Kanchana Souvenir UKCD2072 Ⓜ
(71 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1981-90

Koanga – La Calinda (arr Fenby). Idyll: Once I passed through a populous city. Songs of Sunset. A Village Romeo and Juliet – The Walk to the Paradise Garden[a]
Felicity Lott sop Sarah Walker mez Thomas Allen bar Ambrosian Singers
Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Eric Fenby, [a]Norman Del Mar
Unicorn-Kanchana Souvenir UKCD2073 Ⓜ
(73 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1981-90 ●

The unique insight that the late Eric Fenby would bring as an interpreter of Delius was the reason for many of these Unicorn recordings, but we owe the idea and its realization to their producer, the late Christopher Palmer. As well as providing Delians with some of the most illuminating text on the music, Palmer, in the studio, and especially in a work like A Song of the High Hills, was able to put his understanding (and Fenby's, of course) into practice. You don't need the score of A Song of the High Hills to tell you that the passage from 9'54" represents 'The wide far distance, the great solitude'. That to which you are listening – totally spellbound – could be nothing else (and by nobody else).

Ralph Holmes's recording of the Violin Concerto is a warm, leisurely reading. The Piano Concerto, as recorded here, is a grand showstopper in the best Romantic piano concerto tradition, yet Fowke and Del Mar alert you to all the Delian reverie in the making (the dynamic range of Fowke's piano is colossal). But the outlay for Vol 2 is justified by Anthony Rolfe Johnson alone, in the all too brief six minute-long A Late Lark ('one of Delius's works that is surely entirely without flaw', as Trevor Harvey put it in his original review).

In Vol 3, Fenby's control in Songs of Sunset does not always match his insight (choral work is often sloppy and too distantly recorded); the recent Hickox, or the 1957 Beecham is to be preferred. But without Fenby in the recording studio (or at Grez!), we would never have had Idyll: Whitman texts combined with a late reworking of music from an earlyish opera, Margot la Rouge, to provide a reflective then rapturous love duet that looks back to Delius's Paris as well as to his Paris – this makes Vol 3 indispensable, especially as sung and played here.

And a very considerable bonus to be found in Vol 3 is Del Mar's previously unissued Walk to the Paradise Garden. This is not the Beecham version for reduced orchestra, though it incorporates many of Beecham's dynamics and tempo indications. It is, most assuredly, a Walk on the grandest (11'00" to Beecham's 8'38"), most passionate scale (there's not a bar-line in earshot, either), and turns out to be yet another of these three discs' memorials to inspired Delians who died in our, but before their, time.

Appalachia etc

Appalachia, RTVII/2[d]. Brigg Fair, RTVI/16[a]. 🄷
Koanga[b] – La Calinda (arr Fenby). Hassan[c] – Closing scene. Irmelin Prelude, RTVI/27[b].
[c]Jan van der Gucht ten [c]Royal Opera House Chorus, Covent Garden; [d]BBC Chorus; [a]Symphony Orchestra; [bcd]London Philharmonic Orchestra /
Sir Thomas Beecham 🏵
Naxos Historical mono 8.110906 (66 minutes: AAD) Ⓢ
Recorded [a]1928-29 and 1938 ●

There always was a unique alchemy between the art of Sir Thomas Beecham and the music of Frederick Delius, and you can detect it in every bar of this remarkable January 1938 recording of Appalachia. It is, quite simply, a performance to cherish, its beaming dedication, wistful heartache and rapt wonder leaving the listener in no doubt about Sir Thomas's boundless love for a work that served as his introduction to the composer (he later recalled how the 1907 London première under Fritz Cassirer left him 'startled and electrified'). By July 1938, Beecham and the LPO had committed to disc the three remaining items that eventually made up The Delius Society's lavishly presented third and final volume of the composer's music issued by Columbia Records; suffice it to say, La Calinda skips along entrancingly here, while no true Delian could fail to respond to Beecham's ineffably poignant way with both the closing scene from Hassan and the lovely Irmelin Prelude.

Naxos's curtain-raiser, Brigg Fair, was recorded towards the end of the previous decade. Some seven months separated the two days required to produce a reading of unforgettable tenderness and bewitching poetry (the results of an even earlier session in July 1928 having been rejected altogether), although some will still hold an ever-so-slight preference for the second of Sir Thomas's three versions (a gloriously intuitive display with the newly formed RPO from November 1946).

David Lennick's transfers have been admirably managed, Appalachia now sounding rather more open and full-bodied than on a rival Dutton compilation. Throw in a lively and informative booklet-essay from Lyndon Jenkins, not to mention the absurdly low price-tag, and it should be abundantly clear that this is a self-recommending issue.

On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring

On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring. Brigg Fair. In a Summer Garden. Paris: The Song of a Great City. Summer Night on the River. A Village Romeo and Juliet – The Walk to the Paradise Garden
BBC Symphony Orchestra / Sir Andrew Davis
Warner Apex 8573-89084-2 Ⓢ
(77 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1992

This Brigg Fair is unique. What a lovely surprise to hear real London sparrows sharing the air space of St Augustine's Church with Delius's translated Lincolnshire larks (flute and clarinet) in the opening minutes of the work, albeit much more distantly. Very effective too are those almost still pools of string sound (early morning mists?), given the extended boundaries of this acoustic, and the familiar warmth and depth of tone Davis draws from the orchestra's strings. In the final magnificently broad climax (pealing bells, for once, very clear), you cannot fail to be impressed by the depth, coherence and articulacy of the sound – hallmarks, indeed, of the entire disc. Davis's strings come into their own in the Walk to the Paradise Garden. For In a Summer Garden, Davis mutes his strings more often than Delius asks; but the reading's delicacy of texture and hazy, suffusing warmth are difficult to resist.

Paris / Cello Concerto

Paris: Cello Concerto. The Song of a Great City. Double Concerto
Tasmin Little vn Raphael Wallfisch vc
Royal Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Charles Mackerras 🏵
Classics for Pleasure 575803-2 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓑ
Recorded early 1990s ∞

Mackerras's Paris, which opens this disc, is vividly characterised, with the dancing propelled to wild, whirling climaxes. Not even Beecham in 1934 was this uninhibited. Mackerras is not afraid to push the orchestra into genuine prestissimos in an instant, or relax down to the most lingering molto adagio, and the control at both extremes is total. The engineering paints a deceptively distant picture at the start, but as the city's nocturnal wheel begins to turn the whole orchestral fabric suddenly lights up before your amazed ears; the sheer immediacy of it all may be too much for some, but it aligns perfectly with Mackerras's uncompromisingly vital, impetuous reading of the score. This Paris has to be heard. And so it is with the Cello Concerto. Wallfisch and Mackerras manage to inject a fair measure of vigour into the work's faster moving sections and in the Allegramente of the finale, thus avoiding any uniformity of mood. This Allegramente now dances as well as sings; the pace sounds instinctively right. They also find plenty of space to relax, and the solo cello's musings at the start of the slow movement, for example, have a lovely improvisatory feel.

Tasmin Little joins them for the much underrated Double Concerto that, in the drive and energy of its outer sections here, often recalls the work that inspired it (the Brahms Double). Again this concerto receives a performance of great confidence, security and unanimity of purpose; and the expressive range of the soloists' playing lifts this heavenly meditation on to another level altogether. All this at budget price!

Additional recommendations
Orchestral Works 🄷
Brigg Fair – An English Rhapsody. Dance Rhapsody No 2. On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring. Summer Night on the River. A Song Before Summer. Intermezzo (arr Fenby). Irmelin Prelude. Sleighride. Summer Evening (ed & arr Beecham). Florida Suite (rev & ed Beecham) – Daybreak, Dance
Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Beecham
EMI Great Recordings of the Century
567552-2 (77 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ

Brigg Fair A Song Before Sunrise. Songs from the Norwegian. Hassan – excerpts. Dance Rhapsodies Nos 1 and 2. On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring. Summer Night on the River. Danish Songs. Irmelin Prelude. 🄷
Suddaby sop Thomas contr
Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Beecham
Dutton CDLX7028 (77 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ

Two superb reissues containing superlative performances from Beecham and the RPO, both beautifully remastered and at mid-price. At least one of these discs of these should be on every classical enthusiast's shelf.

Appalachia. In a Summer Garden. North Country Sketches 🄷
Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Beecham
Sony Classical SMK89429 (76 minutes: ADD: 2/02; recorded 1950s) Ⓜ

Delians will almost certainly want this CD. Keenly and clearly recorded. Beecham fully demonstrates his sensitivity for Delius's music.

Brigg Fair. In a Summer Garden. The Walk to the Paradise Garden. A Song of Summer. Summer Night on the River. A Song before Sunrise. Eventyr
Hallé Orchestra; London Philharmonic Orchestra / Handley

Classics for Pleasure 575 315-2 Ⓑ
(DDD: recorded 1981)
Handley keeps things moving with a springing rhythm and does not tend to overstress the Romantic side of Delius (unlike Barbirolli). This is a treasurable recording – one that can be lived with very easily – and comes warmly recommended.

In a Summer Garden. Brigg Fair. Paris.
A Village Romeo and Juliet – The Walk to the Paradise Garden. Two Pieces for Small Orchestra – On Hearing the First Cuckoo in Spring; Summer Night on the River
BBC Symphony Orchestra / A Davis
Warner Apex 85730-89084-2 Ⓢ
(77 minutes: DDD: 1/94)
Davis is a sensitive and elegant Delian, full of good ideas, scoring high marks in Brigg Fair and In a Summer Garden, the latter's achingly beautiful central melody floating on the breeze to perfection. The sound is ripe and true.

Cello Sonata

Delius Cello Sonata. Caprice and Elegy. Hassan – Serenade (arr Fenby). Romance
Grieg Cello Sonata in A minor, Op 36. Intermezzo in A minor, CW118
Julian Lloyd Webber vc Bengt Forsberg pf
Philips 454 458-2PH (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

The links between Grieg and Delius are many, which makes this a very apt and attractive coupling, bringing together all the works each composer wrote for this medium. This is Julian Lloyd Webber's second recording of the Delius Cello Sonata. The overall duration this time is almost two minutes shorter, and the easier flow goes with a lighter manner and a less forward balance for the cello. The result in this freely lyrical single-movement structure is more persuasive, with greater light and shade, and just as much warmth in the playing. Bengt Forsberg's variety of expression and idiomatic feeling for rubato consistently match those of his partner. The Caprice and Elegy of 1930 inspire equally free and spontaneous performances, and it is particularly good to have the tuneful Romance of 1898, which inexplicably remained neglected for 80 years till Lloyd Webber revived it. The Grieg Sonata, too, among the most inspired and intense of his longer works, prompts magnetic playing, again with more light and shade than is common, helped by not having the cello spotlit, in a natural recording acoustic. Though a very high proportion of the music here is reflective, the meditative intensity of the playing sustains it well.

Violin Sonatas

Violin Sonatas – B; Nos 1-3
Tasmin Little vn Piers Lane pf
Conifer Classics 75605 51315-2 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

Tasmin Little's Delian instincts are formidable, here amply confirmed by Conifer's rewarding coupling. The wonderful First Sonata receives big-hearted, confident advocacy here. These marvellously sensitive performers strike a near-ideal balance between flexibility and purposeful concentration, even by the standards of Holmes and Fenby. Little and Lane are not out of place in such august company. Likewise, the Second Sonata is given a commandingly articulate, thoughtful interpretation that never once threatens to hang fire. In the Third Sonata Little's playing glows with fervour and understanding. Moreover, she and Lane see to it that the fine Sonata in B major (1892) emerges in infinitely convincing fashion. To both outer movements they bring fiery propulsion as well as a firm sense of direction, while the haunting central processional of the lovely Andante molto tranquillo (which so impressed Grieg) captures the imagination. The recording is full-bodied, though the piano focus could be sharper within a church acoustic that is too expansive for such intimate repertoire. The sessions (as Little relates in her touching notes) were lent an extra poignancy by the news of Eric Fenby's death on the first day of recording.

Violin Sonatas Nos 1-3. Cello Sonata
Ralph Holmes vn Julian Lloyd Webber vc
Eric Fenby pf
Unicorn-Kanchana Souvenir UKCD2074 Ⓜ
(65 minutes: ADD/DDD). Recorded 1972-81

This is selfless, utterly dedicated music-making, always spontaneous-sounding yet never losing the organic thread of Delius's remarkable, free-flowing inspiration. There is a slight fragility to Holmes's distinctive, silvery tone that is extremely moving, and Fenby, though no virtuoso practitioner, accompanies with intuitive sympathy. The recording of the piano (the instrument used is the three-quarter Ibach grand left to Fenby by Delius himself) remains a touch boxy and wanting in bloom, though the balance is otherwise natural and the overall effect nicely intimate. In the Cello Sonata Lloyd Webber and Fenby adopt a mellow, notably ruminative approach.

A Mass of Life

A Mass of Life[a]. Requiem[ba]
[a]Joan Rodgers, [b]Rebecca Evans sops [a]Jean Rigby mez [a]Nigel Robson ten Peter Coleman-Wright bar
Waynflete Singers; Bournemouth Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos ② CHAN9515 (129 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996

This is only the third commercial recording of A Mass of Life. The previous two recordings were the 1952 Beecham (no longer available) and the 1971 Groves on EMI. You might imagine modern recording would best place this vast canvas between your loudspeakers. And yes, Hickox's dynamic peaks are marginally higher, his perspectives marginally wider and deeper. Actually, some of this has as much to do with Hickox's own pacing and shading as the engineering. In general, this 'idealized' light- and air-filled sound brings a sharper, bright presence for the chorus, and such things as the piccolo trilling atop the final 'Hymn to Joy'. What it doesn't bring is the sense of performers in a specific acoustic space. But the chorus shines in the prominent role which the Chandos balance gives them, with ringing attack for all entries where it is needed, and singing as confident as it is sensitive, even if one has to make the odd allowance for not quite perfect pitching on high (Delius's demands are extreme) and moments where they are too loud. The soloists are fine; Hickox's baritone has a good line in stirring, virile address, though little of Benjamin Luxon's nobility, inwardness and true legato. What makes the Hickox Mass preferable to the Groves (but only just) is the conductor's inspired handling of each part's central dance panels. Hickox makes you believe in them, with a judicious drive, lift to the rhythms, and really incisive, eager singing and playing. As a coupling, Hickox has only the second-ever commercial recording of the Requiem: more Nietzsche, but this time dogma not poetry, all the more unpalatable/embarrassing (regardless of your faith) for being in English, but containing much unique Delius.

Additional recommendation

Mass of Life H

Raisbeck sop Sinclair contr Craig ten Boyce bar London Philharmonic Choir and Orchestra / Beecham

Sony Classical mono ② SM2K89432 (111 minutes: ADD: recorded 1952-53) Ⓜ

A classic recording in a generally clear, full-bodied transfer. Beecham draws an incandescent performance from both choir and soloists; the persuasiveness of Beecham in Delius remains irresistible.

Sea Drift

Awards 1994

Sea Drift. Songs of Sunset.
Songs of Farewell
Sally Burgess mez Bryn Terfel bass-bar
Waynflete Singers; Southern Voices; Bournemouth Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos CHAN9214 (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1993 ●●●

Sea Drift is a sublime conjunction of Whitman's poetry and Delius's music describing love, loss and unhappy resignation, with the sea (as Christopher Palmer put it) as 'symbol and agent of parting'. Written in 1903-04 (the same years as Debussy's La mer), it is surely Delius's masterpiece; right from the swaying opening bars its spell is enduring and hypnotic. Hickox in his second recording of the work now gives us the finest recorded post-Beecham Sea Drift. The shaping of the opening falling woodwind figures at a slow tempo more than usually (and very beautifully) portends the sad turn of events; and the climax is broad and superbly co-ordinated. Terfel's bar-by-bar characterisation (and glorious voice), conveys the full expressive range of the role from impassioned appeal to gentle call without artifice; and the choral singing is superb. The whole is recorded with warmth, spaciousness, depth and clarity.

Songs

The Song of the High Hills, RTII/6[b]
Eventyr, 'Once upon a time', RTVI/23.
Sleigh ride (Winter night), RTVI/7. Five Songs from the Norwegian, RTV/5[a] (arr Holten). [a]Henriette Bonde-Hansen, [b]Helle Høyer Hansen sops [b]John Kjøller ten [b]Aarhus Chamber Choir; [b]Aarhus University Choir; Aarhus Symphony Orchestra / Bo Holten
Danacord DACOCD592 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded c2001 ●●●

Bo Holten and the excellent Aarhus Symphony Orchestra include here a collection of Delius works inspired by Norway, a country to which he was specially attracted. His first major visit was in 1887 during a summer vacation while studying at the Leipzig Conservatory, when he spent more than six weeks joyfully exploring fjords, moors and mountains.

Later that year his Leipzig contemporary, Christian Sinding, introduced him to Grieg, for whom as a Christmas present Delius wrote Sleigh Ride, a piano piece buried for many years that finally surfaced in the composer's orchestration in 1946 long after his death. It is a jolly little piece, not at all Delian in style, that by rights should have been a popular hit from the start; here it's given a delightful, lightly sprung performance.

The Five Songs from the Norwegian were written the following year in 1888 in gratitude for Grieg's intervention with Delius's father over giving him an allowance so as to devote himself to composition. Dedicated to Grieg's wife, they are charming pieces, setting poems by Bjornsen and others that Grieg himself had set, and are here made the more seductive in Bo Holten's sensitive orchestrations, with Henriette Bonde-Hansen the fresh, pure-toned soprano. The most ambitious Delius work inspired by Norway is The Song of the High Hills, the most substantial item on the disc. Though Beecham recorded it in the days of 78, it has been curiously neglected on disc when over its 25-minute span it offers some of the most hauntingly atmospheric music that Delius ever wrote, notably in the passages for wordless choir. Holten conducts a beautiful, refined performance which keeps the music moving, never letting it meander, building to powerful climaxes thrillingly recorded. With a wide dynamic range the sound is evocatively atmospheric, not least in the offstage choral passages.

Fennimore and Gerda – Intermezzo. Lebenstanz, RTVI/15. An Arabesque, RTII/7[bc]. Sakuntala[b]. The Page Sat in the Lofty Tower[a]. In Bliss we Walked with Laughter[a]. Two Brown Eyes[a]. I Hear in the Night[a]. Two Danish Songs, RTV/21 – The Violet[b]; Autumn[a]. Seven Danish Songs, RTIII/4[a]. Summer Landscape, RTV/24[b]

[a]Henriette Bonde-Hansen sop [b]Johan Reuter bar [c]Danish National Opera Chorus; [c]Aarhus Chamber Choir; Aarhus Symphony Orchestra / Bo Holten

Danacord DACOCD536 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included. Recorded 2000

This collection of Delius's Danish inspirations, beautifully performed and recorded, makes a delightful disc, including as it does rarities that are otherwise unavailable. Even if 'masterworks' is a bit of an exaggeration, the pieces here all show Delius at his most characteristic, drawing on his deep sympathy for Scandinavia and its culture.

Significantly, the performances under Bo Holten tend to be faster and often more passionate than those on rival recordings, such as in Unicorn's admirable Delius Collection.

An Arabesque dates from 1911, but all the other vocal items were written much earlier. In many ways the conventional picture we have of Delius, as the blind and paralysed composer of his later years, is misleading, failing to reflect what we know of the younger man, active and virile, a point that Bo Holten has clearly registered. It is good to have the Seven Danish Songs of 1897 as a group in Delius's own sensuous orchestrations. The self-quotations in the ballad-like 'Irmelin Rose' are the more telling in orchestral form, and the most beautiful song of all, 'Summer Nights', is magically transformed in its atmospheric evocation of a sunset.

Delius also orchestrated two separate Danish songs, 'The Violet' and Summer Landscape as well as Sakuntala, prompting Holten to orchestrate the five other Danish songs, which here form another orchestral cycle. These, too, are more beautiful than with piano, even though Holten is less distinctive than Delius himself in his use of orchestral colour, notably in woodwind writing. All these songs are sung in the original language, where the Unicorn series opted for the English translations which Delius either made himself or approved. The two singers here may not be as characterful as such British soloists as Felicity Lott, Sarah Walker or Thomas Allen (in An Arabesque), but they both have fresh young voices, clear and precise, with Henriette Bonde-Hansen shading her bright soprano down to the gentlest pianissimos. The choral singing, too, is excellent in An Arabesque.

The Fennimore and Gerda 'Intermezzo' (drawn from two of that opera's interludes) is relatively well known, but Lebenstanz ('Life's Dance'), inspired by a play of Helge Rode, is a rarity, otherwise available only on Unicorn conducted by Norman Del Mar. Here, too, Holten opts for marginally faster speeds in a piece depicting (in the composer's words) 'the turbulence, the joy, energy, great striving of youth'. The dance sections – one of them surprisingly Straussian – are punctuated by typically reflective passages, and the depiction of death at the end is peaceful and not at all tragic.

The Aarhus Symphony Orchestra respond warmly to Holten's idiomatic direction, and the refined playing is quite closely balanced in a helpful acoustic.

Five Partsongs (1887). Her ute skal gildet staa. Irmelin Rose (arr Lubin). On Craig Dhu. Wanderer's Song. Midsummer Song. The splendour falls on castle walls. Two Songs for Children. To be sung of a summer night on the water. A Village Romeo and Juliet – The dream of Sali and Vrenchen (arr Fenby). Appalachia – Oh, Honey, I am going down the river (arr Suchoff). Irmelin – Away; far away to the woods. Hassan – Chorus behind the scenes; Chorus of Beggars and Dancing Girls

Joanna Nolan sop Stephen Douse ten Andrew Ball pf Mark Brafield org Elysian Singers of London / Matthew Greenall

Somm Recordings SOMMCD210 (50 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included. Recorded 1992

Delius had a special relationship with the collective human voice, and the songs here are presented chronologically, which allows us to follow pleasurably the development of his style. The extracts from A Village Romeo and Juliet and Appalachia prolong what would otherwise be a rather brief encounter and their accompaniments also provide contrast of timbre, but they do need to be heard in context to 'take off'. The 'essential' Delius comes with On Craig Dhu – experience of nature not so much tinged by melancholy as perceived through it; a haunting evocation in grey; and the setting of Tennyson's The splendour falls on castle walls, as characteristically Delius as Britten's setting of it, in his Serenade, is Britten. Though the singing itself deserves a generally warm welcome, not all Delius's chromatic wanderings are as confidently charted as they might be. The sopranos seem the strongest contingent, and the ones most often in the expressive spotlight. Nor are the soloists ideal, the tenor sounding unhappy in the higher regions of the second of the two songs, To be sung of a summer night on the water. And on occasions, as in the first of those two songs, one might have wished for more varied pacing and dynamic shading from the conductor. But the world of Delius performance is one where devotees are used to taking the roundabouts with the swings, and this is the only all-Delius collection of its kind on the market.

A Village Romeo and Juliet

A Village Romeo and Juliet

Benjamin Luxon bar Manz; Noel Mangin bar Marti; Corin Manley treb Sali as a child; Wendy Eathorne

sop Vreli as a child; Robert Tear ten Sali; Elizabeth Harwood sop Vreli; John Shirley-Quirk bar Dark Fiddler; Stephen Varcoe bar First Peasant; Shooting Gallery Man; Bryn Evans bar Second Peasant; Felicity Palmer sop First Woman; Slim Girl; Mavis Beattie sop Second Woman; Doreen Price sop Gingerbread Woman; Elaine Barry sop Wheel of Fortune Woman; Pauline Stevens contr Cheap Jewellery Woman; Martyn Hill ten Showman; John Huw Davies bar Merry-Go-Round-Man; Sarah Walker contr Wild Girl; Paul Taylor ten Poor Horn Player; Franklyn Whiteley bass Hunchbacked Bass Player; Robert Bateman bar First Bargeman; John Noble bar Second Bargeman; Ian Partridge ten Third Bargeman; John Alldis Choir; Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Meredith Davies

EMI ② 575785-2 (138 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ

Includes an illustrated talk by Eric Fenby

Recorded 1971 OO

Central to this Swiss slant on the Romeo and Juliet story (based on a novella by Gottfried Keller) is a sustained sequence of duets between the lovers, Sali and Vreli, as their calf-love blossoms into something deeper: Davies' inspired pacing of the score avoids any risk of stagnation – the music never meanders, and its dramatic contrasts are sharply brought out. As much as it evokes Romeo and Juliet, the plot is a variant of Tristan and Isolde, leading to the final love-death as the lovers, in an ecstatic suicide pact, drift down the river in their sinking barge. Beecham's phrasing may be a degree more flexible than Davies', but Davies is, if anything, even more passionate, as at the climax of the great orchestral set-piece, 'The Walk to the Paradise Garden'. Davies is most successful at contrasting the love-duets with the vigorous writing, whether in the urgent opening prelude, the quarrel between the lovers' fathers, the choral writing in the dream sequence when the lovers imagine their wedding ceremony, and, above all, the lively fair scene. The plot unfolds with a feeling of inevitability, and the overall freshness is enhanced by the use of Tom Hammond's radically revised text for the libretto in place of the grotesquely stilted original by Delius himself in collaboration with his wife, Jelka.

Elizabeth Harwood and Robert Tear are both outstanding as Vreli and Sali, characterful and clearly focused. Benjamin Luxon and Noel Mangin can hardly be bettered as the warring fathers, dark and incisive, while John Shirley-Quirk as the Dark Fiddler – representing the spirit not of evil but of raw nature – is firm and forthright with an apt hint of the sinister. The rest of the cast includes many of the starriest names among British singers of the period, though none of them gets more than a few lines.

The 1971 recording, with the classic team of Christopher Bishop as producer and Christopher Parker as balance-engineer, still sounds well, with plenty of body. The evocative offstage effects are beautifully handled, even if the strings are not quite as sweet as they might be. The only serious snag is that there is no libretto. Instead, Eric Fenby provides a detailed synopsis, and as a supplement on the second disc comes a talk by him, with a fascinating reconstruction of how the blind and paralysed composer dictated his final inspirations – a terrifying exercise.

Henry Desmarest French 1661-1741

GROVE As a boy chorister in the royal chapel Desmarest became a disciple of Lully. He maintained court links and his first opera was given at Versailles in 1682. Later he was maître de chapelle at a Jesuit college. An amorous imbroglio led to his exile in 1699, and in 1701 he took a court post in Madrid. From 1707 he was surintendant de la musique to the Duke of Lorraine at Lunéville, where he expanded musical activities. He wrote c20 stage works; the tragédies lyriques, such as Iphigénie en Tauride (1704), use more adventurous harmony and more flexible recitative than Lully's. His other works include impressive grands motets, cantatas, airs and sonatas.

Grands Motets Lorrains

Grands Motets Lorrains – Usquequo, Domine; Lauda Jerusalem; Domine, ne in furore P

Sophie Daneman, Rebecca Ockenden sops Paul Agnew ten Laurent Slaars bar Arnaud Marzorati bass Les Arts Florissants / William Christie

Erato 8573-80223-2 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included. Recorded in 2000 OO

If Henry Desmarest has not yet joined other French Baroque composers among the ranks of the Great Rediscovered, here is a disc which ought to help him on his way. These three grands motets were composed between 1708 and 1715, the early years of his time as musical director to the court of the Duke of Lorraine. Scored for soloists, choir and orchestra, each is a multi-sectional psalm-setting lasting about 20 minutes. What is immediately striking is not only how strong-boned and well-written the music is, but also how contrasted; here are moments of supreme tenderness, powerful intensity, robust grandeur and uplifting rhythmic vigour. And if a tendency towards melancholy is unsurprising given that two of these psalm-texts are penitential, who is to say that we are not also witnessing a reflection of the unhappy circumstances of this composer's life?

Such music could not have fallen into better hands than Christie's. His talent – as in his opera conducting – is to see the work as a totality, with the result that the music never fails to punch its full expressive weight. With Sophie Daneman and Paul Agnew excellent among the soloists, and choral singing which remains unfailingly vivid and alert throughout, these are vibrant performances that do not put a foot wrong. The recording is clear and nicely balanced, though an unusual profusion of extraneous noises is an irritant. Even so, this is a must-buy for French Baroque fans.

James Dillon

Scottish b1950

GROVE Scottish composer. He studied music and linguistics at London University, but was self-taught as a composer. His music, influenced by Ferneyhough and Finnissy, is characterized by wild complexity and extreme instrumental demands. His early works are for solo instruments or small ensembles – Once Upon a Time for eight instruments (1980), East 11th St NY 10003 for six percussionists (1982) – but in Überschreiten for 16 instruments (1986) and his first orchestral score Helle Nacht (1987) he began to extend his techniques to larger forces.

Chamber Works

String Quartet No 2[a]. Parjanya-vata[b]. Traumwerk[c]. Vernal Showers[d]
[a]Arditti Quartet ([cd]Irvine Arditti vn David Alberman vn Garth Knox va [b]Rohan de Saram vc) [c]Graeme Jennings vn
[d]Nieuw Ensemble / Ed Spanjaard
Auvidis Montaigne MO782046 (67 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1993 Ⓕ

For a composer with James Dillon's avant-garde credentials, the title Vernal Showers might lead you to expect a send-up of English pastoralism. In fact, there's nothing the least frivolous or forbidding about this response to Coleridge's The Nightingale. The music invokes the glittering cascades of sudden downpours while the sun still shines, and even the nocturnal song of the nightingale, without compromising Dillon's very personal blend of inventiveness and carefully weighted structuring.

Parjanya-vata is an appropriate partner for Vernal Showers, its title involving two Sanskrit words for rain and wind. This exhilarating essay for solo cello is executed with charismatic brilliance by Rohan de Saram. That there is far more to his music than mere sound-effects is confirmed by the Second String Quartet, a fizzing firework display as exuberant as it is poetic and a supremely imaginative rethinking of the traditional quartet. In Traumwerk, 12 miniatures for two violins, Dillon seizes the opportunity to devise a sequence of sharply drawn character pieces whose variety of mood ranges from sly comedy to unbridled ferocity. As always with this composer, nothing about the medium – like the contrast between playing vibrato and non vibrato – is taken for granted. The persuasive technical and interpretative virtuosity of all the performers on this CD should not be taken for granted either, and the various recordings are all superb.

Ernö Dohnányi

Hungarian 1877-1960

GROVE Dohnányi studied with Thomán and Koessler at the Budapest Academy (1894-7) and came quickly to international eminence as both pianist and composer. After teaching at the Berlin Hochschule (1905-15) he returned to Budapest and worked there as pianist, teacher, conductor and composer. His influence reached generations in all spheres of musical life and he is considered one of the chief architects of 20th-century Hungarian musical culture; he championed the music of Bartók and Kodály. He also toured internationally as a pianist, ranking among the greatest of his time, and as a conductor (his pupils included Solti). He left Hungary in 1944 and in 1949 settled in the USA. His works are in a Brahmsian style, crossed with Lisztian virtuosity and thematic transformation; they include two symphonies (1901, 1944), two piano concertos (1898, 1947), two piano quintets (1895, 1914) and two violin concertos (1915, 1950), the popular Variations on a Nursery Song for piano and orchestra (1914) and three string quartets (1899, 1906, 1926).

Symphony No 1

Symphony No 1 in D minor, Op 9.
American Rhapsody, Op 47
BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Matthias Bamert
Chandos CHAN9647 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●

The First Symphony is a fascinating if uneven work. Sundry influences spontaneously spring to mind: Tchaikovsky, Brahms and Richard Strauss. The five-movement structure has its obvious models in Beethoven and Berlioz, but the scoring, although tending towards Wagnerian sonorities, is frequently individual, and so is the 23-year-old Dohnányi's command of symphonic argument. Bamert offers a broad reading, with much drama, most notably at the beginning of the Scherzo and the furious fugato passage 12'00" into the finale, where the BBC lower strings 'dig in' with a vengeance. Bamert and Chandos also offer us an excellent performance of the much later American Rhapsody (1950 as opposed to 1900 for the Symphony). Here, Dohnányi's sound world recalls the Delius of Appalachia and the Florida suite and his use of American traditional tunes are reminiscent of Charles Ives's Second Symphony. If all this sounds as if Dohnányi didn't have an original idea in his head, it is certainly not meant to. The references are intended to focus superficial similarities but should not mask the fact that Dohnányi had plenty to say, and said it well. As for the recording, it is in the demonstration class.

Variations on a Nursery Theme

Dohnányi Variations on a Nursery Theme, Op 25
Brahms Piano Concerto No 1 in D minor, Op 15
Mark Anderson pf Hungarian State Symphony Orchestra / Adám Fischer Ⓕ
Nimbus NI5349 (75 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1994

Mark Anderson gives a glittering performance of the Dohnányi, and a spontaneous one at that;

he is superbly accompanied by Adám Fischer and the Hungarian State SO. Nimbus's recording is admirable in everything but the backward placing of the woodwind in general and the bassoons in particular. One thing that the Dohnányi Variations share with the D minor Brahms Concerto is a passionate minor key opening. Again Fischer and his Hungarian orchestra are quite superb, the playing incisive and gloweringly vivid. It is a measure, too, of the accord that exists between conductor and soloist that the pianist enters the fray with the perfectly groomed musical manners of a soloist in a baroque concerto. And it is the logic of Anderson's playing, his sweet reasonableness, that holds the attention, even though Brahmsians may find Anderson a shade light-toned in bravura passages. The Brahms obviously faces tough competition, but the Dohnányi is without doubt a fine performance in its own right.

Variations on a Nursery Theme, Op 25^{a}
Der Schleier der Pierrette – Pierrot's Love-lament; Waltz-rondo; Merry Funeral March; Wedding waltz.
Suite in F sharp minor, Op 19.
^{a}Howard Shelley pf BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Matthias Bamert
Chandos CHAN9733 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998

Dohnányi's penchant for quality musical entertainment bore popular fruit with his perennially fresh Variations on a Nursery Theme. Howard Shelley's performance is a model of wit and style, blending in with the orchestra whenever the moment seems right and employing an ideal brand of rubato. Bamert's conducting is properly portentous in the Introduction and charming elsewhere, whether in the music-box delights of the fifth variation, the animated bustle of the sixth or the seventh's novel scoring (plenty for the bassoons and bass drum). Kocsis and Fischer's is still marginally the best version overall, but Shelley and Bamert are no less musical.

Lovely, too, is the F sharp minor Suite, especially the opening Andante con variazioni which seems to straddle the worlds of Dvořák and Elgar (try the serene string choirs from 9'35"). The stamping Scherzo brings to mind the Scherzo from Bruckner's Ninth, and the tuneful Rondo finale has a striking resemblance to a key passage in the Rondo-burleske in Mahler's Ninth.

Also included is the very first recording of The Veil of Pierrette, four scenes from a mimed entertainment dating from 1908-9. The best movement is the exuberant 'Wedding Waltz' (track 21), rumbustious music, carefree and beautifully scored. Chandos has come up with a dazzlingly realistic recording. A peach of a disc.

Piano Quintets

Piano Quintets^{a} – No 1 in C minor, Op 1; No 2 in E flat minor, Op 26. Suite in the Old Style, Op 24
^{a}Vanbrugh Quartet (Gregory Ellis, Elizabeth Charleson vns Simon Aspell va Christopher Marwood vc); Martin Roscoe pf
ASV CDDCA915 (70 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

Dohnányi's First Piano Quintet, Op 1, written when the composer was only 18, is a work of abounding confidence and energy that is played here with suitable verve and exuberance. Roscoe and the Vanbrugh Quartet luxuriate in lush, romantic textures in the first movement, and delight in the melodic exchanges of the warmly expressive Adagio. Moreover, their expression of Hungarian flavour, evident in the Scherzo's jaunty cross-rhythms and the engagingly dance-like finale, has considerable charm.

The Second Quintet, written some 19 years later, shows a striking advance in technique. Sensitive evocation of atmosphere in the first movement by Roscoe and the Vanbrugh Quartet highlights both Dohnányi's more searching harmonic language and his remarkably fresh and imaginative approach to form.

The performers deftly blend the Intermezzo's faintly Viennese character with the flamboyant toccata material, and the final movement's fusion of slow movement and finale is ingeniously turned from sombre minor to radiant major. Both the quintets display Dohnányi's considerable pianistic skills; the Suite in the Old Style provides further evidence with a highly effective display of the composer's parody of Baroque keyboard techniques. Roscoe's evident sympathy for his music contributes to this arrestingly persuasive account, which fully exploits the work's rich variety of style and technique.

String Quartets

Dohnányi String Quartets – No 2 in D flat, Op 15; No 3 in A minor, Op 33
Kodály Intermezzo
Lyric Quartet (Patricia Calnan, Harriet Davies vns Nick Barr va David Daniels vc) Ⓕ
ASV CDDCA985 (60 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1996

Dohnányi's output is nothing if not rich in contrasts: both slow movements of these appealing quartets are visited by animated, mood-changing faster sections, stormy and passionate in the Second Quartet and skittish in the Third. The earlier quartet is the more wholesomely romantic of the two, with a Presto acciacato second movement that recalls the orchestral storm sequence at the beginning of Wagner's Die Walküre. The Second Quartet's heart is in its poignant slow movement finale which incorporates references to previous movements. Dohnányi's musical language suggests something of Strauss, Brahms and Mendelssohn, with the Third Quartet's cynically argumentative first movement providing the grittiest musical activity on the disc. The earliest work programmed is by Kodály, a pleasant but uncharacteristic Intermezzo from 1905 that the Lyric Quartet performs – like everything else – with gusto and warmth.

Gaetano Donizetti

Italian 1797-1848

GROVE Donizetti was of humble origins but received help and a solid musical education (1806-14) from Mayr, producing apprentice operas and many sacred and instrumental works before establishing himself at Naples with La zingara (1822). Here regular conducting and a succession of new works (two to five operas a year) marked the real start of his career. With the international triumph of Anna Bolena (1830, Milan) he freed himself from Naples; the further successes of L'elisir d'amore and Lucrezia Borgia (1832, 1833, Milan), Marino Faliero (1835, Paris) and the archetype of Italian Romantic opera, Lucia di Lammermoor (1835, Naples), secured his pre-eminence. Some theatrical failures, however, as well as trouble with the censors and disappointment over losing the directorship of the Naples Conservatory to Mercadante, caused him to leave for Paris, where besides successful French versions of his earlier works he brought out in 1840 La fille du régiment and La favorite. His conducting of Rossini's Stabat mater (1842, Bologna) and enthusiasm in Vienna for Linda di Chamounix (1842) led to his appointment as Kapellmeister to the Austrian court. Declining health began to affect his work from this time, but in Don Pasquale (1843, Paris) he produced a comic masterpiece, and in the powerful Maria di Rohan (1843, Vienna), Dom Sébastien, roi di Portugal (1843, Paris) and Caterina Cornaro (1844, Naples) some of his finest serious music.

Donizetti's reputation rests on his operas: in comedy his position has never been challenged but in the tragic genre, though his work sums up a whole epoch, no single opera can be considered an unqualified masterpiece. His works survive through the grace and spontaneity of their melodies, their formal poise, their effortless dramatic pace, their fiery climaxes and above all the romantic vitality underlying their artifice. Like Bellini, Donizetti epitomized the Italian Romantic spirit of the 1830s. Having imitated Rossini's formal, florid style for ten years (1818-28) he gradually shed heavily embellished male-voice parts, conceiving melodies lyrically and allowing the drama to determine ensemble structures.

From 1839 his style was further enriched by fuller orchestration and subtler, more varied harmony. If he contributed nothing so distinctive to the post-Rossinian tradition as Bellini's 'heavenly' melody, he still showed a more fluent technique and a wider-ranging invention, from the brilliant to the expressive and sentimental. He was particularly responsive to the individual qualities of his singers, including Persiani (Lucia), Pasta and Ronzi de Begnis (Anna Bolena, Maria Stuarda, Roberto Devereux), the baritone Giorgio Ronconi and the tenors Fraschini and Moriani (L'elisir d'amore, Lucia).

Although his practical facility and readiness to adapt scores themselves constructed of 'spare-part' set forms once brought criticism, since 1950 revivals and reassessment as well as a fuller understanding of the theatrical practices of his day have restored Donizetti to critical and popular favour.

Concertos

Sinfonia in G minor (recons Päuler). Sonata in C minor (orch Hoffmann). Oboe Sonata in F (orch Hoffmann). Concerto for Violin, Cello and Orchestra in D minor (recons Wojciechowski). Cor Anglais Concerto in G. Clarinet Concertino in B flat (recons Meylan). Sinfonia in D minor (recons Andreae)
Budapest Camerata / László Kovács
Marco Polo 8 223701 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1994

This is an intriguing issue of instrumental concertos, recorded for the first time. As in his string quartets, Donizetti's dramatic flair and imaginative instrumentation provide the main points of interest, while the G major Concerto for cor anglais – a theme and variations – allows us to sample Donizetti's formal ingenuity and thematic invention. After a crisp performance of the buoyant G minor Sinfonia, the Budapest Camerata offers a group of solo concertos featuring a variety of instruments. The C minor flute Concertino and F major oboe Concertino – originally intended as instrumental sonatas – are presented in Wolfgang Hoffmann's sensitive orchestrations. Contrasts (textural, dramatic and dynamic) are well defined, with admirably clear recording. The exuberant allegros are not especially profound, but Donizetti's slow movements are often most effective. The D minor Concerto for violin, cello and orchestra is the longest and most impressive work here. The Budapest Camerata balances solo and ensemble forces with subtle refinement throughout this charming piece, whose brief Andante has genuine pathos, and smiling finale has engaging wit.

Anna Bolena

Maria Callas sop Anna Bolena; Nicola Rossi-Lemeni bass Enrico VIII; Giulietta Simionato mez Giovanna Seymour; Gianni Raimondi ten Riccardo Percy; Plinio Clabassi bass Rochefort; Gabriella Carturan mez Smeton; Luigi Rumbo ten Hervey H
Chorus and Orchestra of La Scala, Milan / Gianandrea Gavazzeni
EMI mono ② 566471-2 (140 minutes: ADD) Notes, text and translation included. Ⓜ
Recorded live in 1957

One of Callas's unique qualities was to inspire an audience with the sense of a great occasion, and to key-up a sympathetic conductor into the production of something to match her own intensity and the public's expectations. Here she gives one of her finest performances. The first impression is a vocal one, in the sense of the sheer beauty of sound. Then, in the first solo, 'Come innocente giovane', addressing Jane Seymour, she is so clean in the cut of the voice and the style of its usage, delicate in her fioriture, often exquisite in her shading, that anyone, ignorant of the Callas legend, would know immediately that this is an artist of patrician status. There are marvellous incidental moments, and magnificent crescendos, into, for instance, 'per pietà delmio spavento' and 'segnata è la mia sorte', culminating in the Tower scene.

Unfortunately, the singers at her side hardly measure up. Simionato has a splendid voice that nevertheless bumps as it goes into the low register and is not reliably steady in many passages, while the manner is too imperious and unresponsive. The tenor role has been reduced by Gavazzeni's cuts, but Gianni Raimondi makes limited impression in what remains; and, as the King, Rossi-Lemeni produces that big but somewhat woolly tone that became increasingly characteristic. Even so, the great ensembles still prove worthy of the event, and the recording, which is clear without harshness or other distortion, conveys the special quality of this memorable evening with remarkable vividness and fidelity. For those who insist on a modern recording, there is an imaginatively conducted 1994 performance on Nightingale Classics by Elio Boncompagni, with Edita Gruberová in the title-role. But this Callas/Gavazzeni set is in a different class altogether.

Don Pasquale

Renato Bruson bar Don Pasquale; Eva Mei sop Norina; Frank Lopardo ten Ernesto; Thomas Allen bar Malatesta; Alfredo Giacomotti bass NotaryBavarian Radio Chorus; Munich Radio Orchestra / Roberto Abbado
RCA Victor Red Seal ② 09026 61924-2
(120 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation Ⓕ
included. Recorded 1993

Roberto Abbado balances equably the witty and more serious sides of this score, finding a gratifying lightness in the 'A quel vecchio' section of the Act 1 finale and creating a delightful sense of expectancy as Pasquale preens himself while awaiting his intended bride. Abbado plays the score complete and respects Donizetti's intentions. This set has many strengths and few weaknesses. Pasquale is usually assigned to a veteran singer and with Bruson you hear a voice hardly touched by time and a technique still in perfect repair. Apart from weak low notes, he sings and acts the part with real face, and his vital diction is a pleasure to hear. He works well with Thomas Allen's nimble, wily Malatesta, an inspired piece of casting. Like Bruson, Allen sings every note truly and relishes his words.

Eva Mei's Norina is an ebullient creature with a smile in her tone. The edge to her voice seems just right for Norina though others may find it tends towards the acerbic under pressure. Her skills in coloratura are as exemplary as you would expect from a reigning Queen of Night. Lopardo is that rare thing, a tenor who can sing in an exquisite half-voice, yet has the metal in his tone to suggest something heroic in 'E se fia', the cabaletta to 'Cercherò lontana terra', which in turn is sung in a plangent, loving way, just right. The recording here is exemplary.

L'elisir d'amore

Angela Gheorghiu sop Adina; Roberto Alagna ten Nemorino; Roberto Scaltriti bar Belcore; Simone Alaimo bar Dulcamara; Elena Dan sop Giannetta; Chorus and Orchestra of the Opéra National de Lyon / Evelino Pidò
Decca ② 455 691-2DHO2 (123 minutes: DDD)
Notes, text and translation included Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

This work, ideally combining the needs of comedy and sentiment, has always been a favourite of opera goers. This set catches these contrasting moods to perfection under Pidò's alert, affectionate conducting, not least because the recording is based on live performances at the Lyon Opera. The main interest is on how our most sought-after operatic pairing fare in the central roles. Gheorghiu presented her credentials as Adina at Covent Garden prior to this recording; some found her dramatically a shade shrewish in the part, but Adina is a feisty, temperamental girl, and a touch of steel doesn't seem inappropriate. It makes her capitulation when she realizes the true depth of Nemorino's feelings that much more moving. She provides plenty of flirtatious fire in the early scenes and turns Nemorino away with determination, making her intentions clear in pointed attack in the recitative, but her concern for him is never far below the surface and comes to the fore in her colloquy with Dulcamara. All this is conveyed in singing that matches warmth with pointed diction and fleet technique, essential at Pidò's sometimes racy speeds.

Alagna's Nemorino is almost on the same level. He enjoys himself as the lovelorn yokel, one with a vulnerable soul as he shows at his moment of greatest heartbreak, 'Adina, credimi' in the Act 1 finale. His sense of fun is obvious in the bottle-shaking episode when he thinks he has found the elixir of the title. The two Italians in the lower roles are admirable. Scaltriti may not be as preening as some Belcores but he sings the part with a firmness that older singers miss. Alaimo is a naturally witty Dulcamara and never indulges in unwanted buffo mugging.

The Erato set, at mid-price, presents formidable opposition. Devia is a less wilful, less vivid Adina than Gheorghiu, but her style is, if possible, even more idiomatic. But as a whole the Decca sounds the more lifelike reading, worth every penny of the asking price.

L'elisir d'amore
Mariella Devia sop Adina; Roberto Alagna ten Nemorino; Pietro Spagnoli bar Belcore; Bruno Praticò bar Dulcamara; Francesca Provvisionato mez Giannetta; Tallis Chamber Choir; English Chamber Orchestra / Marcello Viotti
Erato ② 4509-98483-2 (129 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1992

This set is a delight, making one fall in love all over again with this delightful comedy of pastoral life. Roberto Alagna, disciple of Pavarotti, sings Nemorino with all his mentor's charm and a rather lighter tone appropriate to the role. He also evinces just the right sense of vulnerability and false bravado that lies at the heart of Nemorino's predicament. He is partnered by Mariella Devia who has every characteristic needed for the role of Adina. With a fine sense of buoyant rhythm, she sings fleetly and uses the coloratura to enhance her reading. She can spin a long, elegiac line where that is needed, and her pure yet full tone blends well with that of her colleagues. She also suggests all Adina's high spirits and flirtatious nature. The other principals, though not as amusing in their interpretations as some predecessors, enter into the ensemble feeling of the performance. All are helped by the lively but controlled conducting of Viotti and by the ideal recording.

L'elisir d'amore (sung in English)
Mary Plazas sop Adina; Barry Banks ten Nemorino; Ashley Holland bass Belcore; Andrew Shore bar Dulcamara; Helen Williams sop Giannetta
Geoffrey Mitchell Choir; Philharmonia Orchestra / David Parry
Chandos Opera in English Series ② CHAN3027
(133 minutes: DDD). Notes and text included Ⓕ
Recorded 1998

'Prima la musica' no doubt, but in this instance the words should perhaps take their share of the credit first. The late Arthur Jacobs, who was an expert on Arthur Sullivan, provides a translation that might almost be the work of W S Gilbert. A resourceful vocabulary and a keen ear for verbal rhythms are its main technical assets, and a natural sense of humour rather than the untiring facetiousness of a self-conscious clever-dick is the source of its wit. Dulcamara is of course a Gilbertian figure to start with, so the translator is not forcing an entrance for his hobby-horse, and any inventions are all in the spirit of the thing. The Gilbertian element emerges again when Andrew Shore, in the Barcarolle, sings his part of 'elderly Senator' in the tones of Sir Henry Lytton. Generally his portrayal is well sung and gracefully turned, as is Ashley Holland's Sergeant Belcore. The lovers have light, well-matched voices, Mary Plazas avoiding the pert, hard character-note and vocal tone that can make Adina so unsympathetic, and Barry Banks giving particular pleasure with the freedom and clarity of his upper notes.

The playing of the Philharmonia under David Parry calls for special remark: from the Overture onwards (with its delightfully chirruping woodwind) there are passages in the score that find a flavour, their own by rights but usually lost because not sought-out. The recording is one of the series' best.

La favorita

Fiorenza Cossotto mez Leonora; Luciano Pavarotti ten Fernando; Gabriel Bacquier bar Alfonso; Nicolai Ghiaurov bass Baldassare; Ileana Cotrubas sop Ines; Piero de Palma ten Don Gasparo; Chorus and Orchestra of the Teatro Comunale, Bologna / Richard Bonynge
Decca Grand Opera ③ 430 038-2DM3
(168 minutes: ADD). Text and translation included Ⓜ
Recorded 1974

La favorita's lack of popularity has been attributed to the lack of an important soprano role, which is a pity, for it really is a very fine opera. Though there are passages where it fails to rise to the situation, and unfortunately the final duet is one of them, it has much in it that goes to the heart within the drama, and it is richly supplied with melody and opportunities for fine singing. The opportunities are well taken here. The recording has Pavarotti in freshest voice. That understates it: his singing is phenomenal. Wherever you care to test it, it responds. Of the two best-known solos, 'Una vergine' in Act 1 is sung with graceful feeling for line and the shape of the verses; the voice is evenly produced, of beautifully pure quality and with an excitingly resonant top C sharp. Throughout the opera he gives himself sincerely to the role dramatically as well as vocally. Cossotto, who in her absolute prime was one of the most exciting singers ever heard, is just fractionally on the other side of it here; she still gives a magnificent performance, gentle as well as powerful, in a part she made very much her own at La Scala. The role of Alfonso attracted all the great baritones in the time when the opera was heard regularly. Here, Gabriel Bacquier sings with a somewhat colourless tone. Yet Alfonso emerges as a credible character, a man of feeling, whose 'A tanto amor' has, in context, a moving generosity of spirit and refinement of style. Ghiaurov brings sonority, Cotrubas sweetness, Piero de Palma character.

The chorus is poorly recorded but that may be to its advantage. The orchestra does well under Bonynge, especially in the 20-minute stretch of ballet music which would be 10 too many if less well played. Recorded sound is fine.

La fille du régiment

Joan Sutherland sop Marie; Luciano Pavarotti ten Tonio; Spiro Malas bass Sulpice; Monica Sinclair contr Marquise; Edith Coates contr Duchess; Jules Bruyère bass Hortensius; Eric Garrett bar Corporal; Alan Jones ten Peasant
Chorus and Orchestra of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden / Richard Bonynge
Decca ② 414 520-2DH2 (107 minutes: ADD)
Notes, text and translation included Ⓕ
Recorded 1968 OO

Even Joan Sutherland has rarely, if ever, made an opera recording so totally enjoyable and involving as this. With the same cast (including chorus and orchestra) as at Covent Garden, it was recorded immediately after a series of live performances in the Royal Opera House, and both the comedy and the pathos come over with an intensity born of communication with live audiences. That impression is the more vivid on this superb CD transfer. As with some of Decca's early CD transfers, you could do with more bands to separate items and it strikes one as odd not to indicate separately the most spectacular of Luciano Pavarotti's contributions, his brief but important solo in the finale to Act 1, which was the specific piece which prompted the much-advertised boast 'King of the High Cs'. For those who want to find it, it comes at 2'58" in band 13 of the first disc. Dazzling as the young Pavarotti's singing is, it is Sutherland's performance which, above all, gives glamour to the set, for here in the tomboy Marie she found a character through whom she could at once display her vocal brilliance, her ability to convey pathos and equally her sense of fun. The reunion of Marie with the men of her regiment and later with Tonio makes one of the most heartwarming operatic scenes on record.

The recording is one of Decca's most brilliant, not perhaps quite so clear on inner detail as some, but more atmospheric. Though there are one or two deliberately comic touches that approach the limit of vulgarity, the production is generally admirable. The sound at once takes one to the theatre, without any feeling of a cold, empty studio.

Lucia di Lammermoor

Maria Callas sop Lucia; Ferruccio Tagliavini ten Edgardo; Piero Cappuccilli bar Enrico; Bernard Ladysz bass Raimondo; Leonard del Ferro ten Arturo; Margreta Elkins mez Alisa; Renzo Casellato ten Normanno; Philharmonia Chorus and Orchestra / Tullio Serafin 🄷
EMI Callas Edition ② 556284-2 (142 minutes) Notes, text and translation included Ⓕ
Recorded 1959 ○○○

Callas was certainly more fallible here than in her first Lucia for Serafin in 1953, but the subtleties of interpretation are much greater; she is the very epitome of Scott's gentle, yet ardently intense heroine, and the special way she inflects words and notes lifts every passage in which she is concerned out of the ordinary gamut of soprano singing. In that sense she is unique, and this is certainly one of the first offerings to give to an innocent ear or a doubter to help convince them of Callas's greatness. The earlier part of the Mad scene provides the most convincing evidence of all. Then the pathos of 'Alfin son tua', even more that of 'Del ciel clemente' are here incredibly eloquent, and the coloratura is finer than it was in 1953, if not always so secure at the top. Tagliavini, after a rocky start, offers a secure, pleasing, involving Edgardo. Cappuccilli, then in his early prime, is a forceful but not insensitive Enrico, Bernard Ladysz a sound Raimondo. Serafin is a far more thoughtful, expressive Donizettian than his rivals on other sets, confirming this as the most persuasive account of the opera ever recorded.

Lucia di Lammermoor
Cheryl Studer sop Lucia; Plácido Domingo ten Edgardo; Juan Pons bar Enrico; Samuel Ramey bass Raimondo; Jennifer Larmore mez Alisa; Fernando de la Mora ten Arturo; Anthony Laciura ten Normanno; Ambrosian Opera Chorus; London Symphony Orchestra / Ion Marin
DG ② 459 491-2GTA2 (138 minutes: DDD)
Notes, text and translation included. Ⓜ
Recorded 1990

With Studer and Domingo in the leading roles, this version is certainly fit as a whole to stand alongside its eminent predecessors. The fine deep colours of the orchestra, the sturdy dramatic cohesion and well-wrought climaxes, are well brought out; passages traditionally omitted are in place (and deserve to be). The role of Lucia's confidante is sung with distinction by Jennifer Larmore, and though Juan Pons could do with more bite to his tone and Samuel Ramey with more expressiveness in his vocal acting these have their strengths too. Studer combines beautiful tone, technical accomplishment and touching pathos. Details include an extended cadenza in the Mad scene, which ends on a not too exposed high E flat (D being the ceiling elsewhere). Domingo triumphantly overcomes the difficulties such a role must pose at this stage of his career: Edgardo di Ravenswood in this recording is as firmly at the centre of the opera as is its eponymous heroine.

Additional recommendations
Lucia di Lamermoor
Callas Lucia di Stefano Edgardo
Berlin RIAS Symphony Orchestra / Karajan
EMI mono 566438-2 Ⓜ
(119 minutes: ADD: 2/91^R: live recording)

This is a live recording of a great event: two great musicians striking sparks off each other. Karajan directs a white-hot performance and Callas sings with huge passion.

Lucia di Lammermoor
Sills Lucia Bergonzi Edgardo
Orchestra / Schippers
Westminster ② 471 250-2GWM2 (ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1970 ○○

Sills's typical style is here: the tense commitment, wonderful use of hushed, intimate tone, but also that slightly fluttery quality and the fondness for very elaborate decorations. Devotees of Callas will not be won over, but for those seeking a thoroughly dramatic and full version of the score with a strong cast, this is a version to put very high on your list of recommendations.

Maria Stuarda

(Sung in English)
Janet Baker mez Maria Stuarda; Rosalind Plowright sop Elisabetta; David Rendall ten Leicester; John Tomlinson bass Talbot; Alan Opie bar Cecil; Angela Bostock sop Anna; English National Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Sir Charles Mackerras

Chandos Opera in English Series ② CHAN3017 Ⓜ
(136 minutes: ADD). Notes and English text included
Recorded live in 1982 ●

This revival celebrates the association of Janet Baker and Charles Mackerras within the context of the ENO company and one of its most memorable productions. For those who saw this, the set will call the stage back to mind with wonderful vividness; but the appeal goes well beyond that, preserving a performance stamped with the strong individuality that confers the status of a gramophone classic. This brought a personal triumph for Janet Baker and it impresses afresh by the distinctiveness of her vocal characterization. It is not every singer who reflects, or re-creates, the distinctive identities through vocal colour and 'registration'. Everyone who was there will remember the 'Royal bastard!' in confrontation with Elizabeth, but equally powerful, and more regal, is her command – 'Be silent! Leave me!' – to the Lord Chancellor of England who brings to Fotheringay news of her condemnation to death. By contrast, the quieter moments can be immensely moving, as, for instance, in the line in which she acknowledges an unexpected generosity in her great opponent. In that role, Rosalind Plowright gives what surely must have been one of the supreme performances of her career. The writing for Elizabeth makes immense demands of the singer, and in these fearsome opening solos the technical challenges are triumphantly met.

John Tomlinson's massive bass commands attention (which it does not then always reward with evenness of production). The male soloists have not the most grateful of roles, but Alan Opie's Cecil shows its quality in the duet with Elizabeth, and David Rendall endows the ineffectual Leicester with plenty of Italianate ardour. The chorus has limited opportunities, and has certainly been heard to better advantage on other occasions.

A word of warning must be added concerning texts which involve cuts and adaptations. The transpositions are defended as standard practice when an exceptional mezzo-soprano (such as Malibran) took a soprano role, in the present instance merely conforming to the lower orchestral pitch of Donizetti's time. However, it is unlikely that at this date the set would be bought or rejected with this kind of consideration foremost. What remains are the strong positives, most notably the vitality of Mackerras's conducting and the glory of Baker's singing. Also, for those to whom this is a priority, the opera is given in clear English.

Poliuto

Franco Corelli ten Poliuto; Maria Callas sop Paolina; Ettore Bastianini bar Severo; Nicola Zaccaria bass Callistene; Piero de Palma ten Nearco; Rinaldo Pelizzoni ten Felice; Virgilio Carbonari, Giuseppe Morresi basses Christians Chorus and Orchestra of La Scala, Milan / Antonino Votto Ⓗ
EMI mono ② 565448-2 (111 minutes: ADD) Notes, text and translation included Ⓜ
Recorded live in 1960

This is the first appearance of this recording in the official canon, by incorporation into EMI's Callas Edition; and the quality is certainly an improvement on the previous 'unofficial' incarnation. The sound is clear and faithful to the timbre of the voices, which are slightly favoured in the balance at the expense of the orchestra. With it comes unforgettable testimony to what was clearly a great night at La Scala. Its place in the Callas history owes less to the importance of this new role in her repertory than to the triumph of her return to the house she had left in high dudgeon in 1958. The part of Paolina in this Roman tragedy is restricted in opportunities and leaves the centre of the stage to the tenor. In other ways it suits her remarkably well, the Second Act in particular involving the heroine in grievous emotional stress with music that here runs deep enough to give it validity.

There is a big part for the chorus, which sings with fine Italian sonority. Nicola Zaccaria, La Scala's leading basso cantabile, has not quite the sumptuous quality of his predecessors, Pasero and Pinza, but is still in their tradition. Ettore Bastianini is rapturously received and, though wanting in polish and variety of expression, uses his firm and resonant voice to exciting effect. The tenor comprimario, Piero de Palma cuts a by no means inadequate vocal figure by the side of Corelli, who is mostly stupendous: it is not just the ring and range of voice that impress, but a genuinely responsive art, his aria 'Lasciando la terra' in Act 3 providing a fine example. It is for his part in the opera, quite as much as for Callas's, that the recording will be valued.

Rosmonda d'Inghilterra

Renée Fleming sop Rosmonda; Bruce Ford ten Enrico II; Nelly Miricioiu sop Leonora di Guienna; Alastair Miles bass Gualtiero Clifford; Diana Montague mez Arturo; Geoffrey Mitchell Choir; Philharmonia Orchestra / David Parry
Opera Rara ② ORC13 (150 minutes: DDD). Notes, text and translation included. Recorded 1994 Ⓕ

The performance of this, Donizetti's 41st opera, could hardly be improved. And there is scarcely more than a single item in which Donizetti seems not to be writing with genuine creativity. Parry conducts with what feels like a natural rightness and the playing of the Philharmonia is of unvaryingly high quality – the Overture is one of Donizetti's best, and the orchestral score shares interest on equable terms with the voice-parts. These include two virtuoso roles for sopranos, who in the final scene confront each other in duet. As Rosmonda, Renée Fleming shows once again that not only has she one of the most lovely voices of our time but that she is also a highly accomplished technician and a sympathetic stylist. Nelly Miricioiu is the older woman, the Queen whose music encompasses a wide range of emotions with an adaptable vocal character to match. She fits the Second Act more happily than the First, where for much of the time the tone appears to have lost its familiar incisive thrust. Bruce Ford is an excellent, incisive Enrico, and Alastair Miles makes an authoritative father and councillor as Clifford. The travesto role of Arturo is taken by the ever welcome Diana Montague, and it is good to find that a solo has been dutifully included for 'him' in Act 2, even if it is a less than inspired piece of music. The only complaint concerns balance, which sometimes accords prominence and recession in a somewhat arbitrary way. The opera and performance, however, are strong enough to take that on board.

John Dowland British c1563-1626

GROVE Dowland became a Catholic while serving the English ambassador in Paris (1580-84) and in 1588 graduated at Oxford. In 1592 he played the lute to the queen, then travelled in Europe, visiting the courts of Brunswick, Kassel, Nuremberg and cities in Italy, where he met Marenzio. He was back in London in 1597, then became a lutenist at the Danish court (1598-1603, 1605-6). On his return he served Lord Walden (1609-12) and eventually achieved his ambition, the post of court lutenist, in 1612. He had been awarded a doctorate by 1621 and played at James I's funeral in 1625. He was succeeded by his son Robert (c 1591-1641), also known for the lute collections he edited.

Though known in his day as a virtuoso lutenist and singer, Dowland was also a prolific, gifted composer of great originality. His greatest works are inspired by a deeply felt, tragic concept of life and a preoccupation with tears, sin, darkness and death. In the best of his 84 ayres for voice and lute (published mainly in 4 vols., 1597, 1600, 1603, 1612), he markedly raised the level of English song, matching perfectly in music the mood and emotion of the verse; in his best songs, such as In darknesse let mee dwell, he freed himself of almost all conventions, accompanying the singer's strange, beautiful melody with biting discords to express emotional intensity to an extent unsurpassed at the time. His 70-odd pieces for solo lute include intricate polyphonic fantasias, expressive dances and elaborate variation sets; foremost among his other instrumental music is the variation set Lachrimae, which contains the famous 'Semper Dowland semper dolens', characterizing his air of melancholy. But he could also write in a lighter vein, as in the ballett-like Fine Knacks for Ladies. He also wrote psalm settings and spiritual songs.

Lachrimae, or Seven Teares

Lachrimae, or Seaven Teares. P
First Booke of Songs[a] – Come heavy sleepe; Go crystall teares. Second Booke of Songs[a] – Sorrow stay; I saw my Lady weepe; Flow my teares
Paul O'Dette lte The King's Noyse
([a]Ellen Hargis sop Robert Mealy,
Scott Metcalfe, Margriet Tindemans vas
Emily Walhout bvn) David Douglass vn
Harmonia Mundi HMU90 7275 (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded c2001 ●●

The Seaven Teares are the heart of Lachrimae; the purpose of the other 14 items is unknown – were they intended to be played together with the Pavans, and if so, in what order?

This present recording is superb in every way. Ellen Hargis sings in sensitive response to her texts and her diction is almost clear enough to make the printed ones in the inlay booklet redundant. The violins of The King's Noyse have a rounder and less edgy sound than those of The Parley of Instruments, and their dynamic ebb and flow is as eloquent as that of Ellen Hargis's voice. The recording itself and the annotation are superb.

With so many options available you pays your money and you takes your choice. Our choice rests firmly with this recording.

Lute Works

A fancy, P73. Pavana Dowlandi Angli. Doulands rounde battell galyarde, P39. The Erle of Darbies galiard, P44. Mistris Norrishis delight, P77. A jig, P78. Galliard, P76. Une jeune fillette, P93. Gagliarda, P103. Squires galliard. A fancy, P72. Sir Henry Umptons funerall. Captayne Pipers galliard, P88. A fantasie, P1 Bacheler (arr ?) The Earl of Essex galliard, P89 Moritz, Landgrave of Hessen (arr Dowland?) Pavin Joachim Van Den Hove Pavana Lachrimae Holborne Hasellwoods galliard R Dowland Sir Thomas Monson, his Pavin and Galliard. Almande P
Paul O'Dette lte
Harmonia Mundi HMU90 7164 Ⓕ
(73 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1996

Given the odd transmission of John Dowland's lute music, any 'complete' recording of it is inevitably going to include a fair number of works that can have had little to do with him. Paul O'Dette has boldly put most of these together in his fifth and last volume, adding for good measure the three surviving works of the master's son, Robert Dowland. O'Dette is engagingly candid in expressing his views about the various works and their various degrees of authenticity. The only works he seems to think authentic are the Sir Thomas Monson pavan and galliard that survive only under the name of Robert Dowland. The collection is none the less fascinating for all that. They are nearly all thoroughly worthwhile pieces, some of them very good indeed; and he ends with what he considers a late adaptation of one of Dowland's most famous fantasies. O'Dette continues to show that in terms of sheer freedom of technique he is hard to challenge among today's lutenists: the often complicated counterpoint is always crystal clear; and he invariably conveys the strongest possible feeling for the formal design of the works. Anyone who is fascinated by the work of the prince of lutenists will want to have this disc.

Preludium, P98. Fantasias – P6; P71. Pavans – Lachrimae, P15; The Lady Russell's Pavan, P17; Pavana Johan Douland, P94; La mia Barbara, P95. Galliards – Frog Galliard, P23; Galliard (upon a galliard by Dan Bachelar), P28; The Lord Viscount Lisle, his Galliard, P38; The Earl of Essex, his Galliard, P42a; Galliard to Lachrimae, P46; A Galliard, P82; Galliard on 'Awake sweet love', P92. An Almand, P96. My Lord Willoughby's Welcome Home, P66a. Loth to departe, P69. The Shoemakers Wife, a Toy, P58. Coranto, P100. Come away, P60 🅿
Paul O'Dette lte
Harmonia Mundi HMU90 7163 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

Cadential trills played on one string are a recurrent problem for performers; the less well equipped use a rallentando or slurr them, whilst guitarists tend to play them across two strings. No one is more adept at delivering them cleanly and in tempo than O'Dette. It is in the suppleness of his phrasing, clarity of his contrapuntal lines and attention to the functional purpose of every note, that O'Dette is pre-eminent – and has the edge over Lindberg. This disc has all the virtues of its predecessors, and though it is doubtful that the Earl of Essex would have been happy to dance his galliard at O'Dette's pace, you can share the sentiment of its last track – you will be loath to leave it.

Lute Songs

The First Booke of Songes or Ayres – If my complaints could passions moue; Can she excuse my wrongs with vertues cloake; Deare if you change ile neuer chuse againe; Go Cristall teares; Sleepe wayward thoughts; All ye whom loue or fortune hath betraide; Come againe: sweet loue doth now enuite; Awake sweet loue thou art returnd. The Second Booke of Songs or Ayres – I saw my Lady weepe; Flow my teares fall from your springs; Sorrow sorrow stay, lend true repentant teares; Tymes eldest sonne, old age the heire of ease; Then sit thee down, and say thy 'Nunc Dimitis'; When others sings 'Venite exultemus'; If fluds of tears could clense my follies past; Fine knacks for Ladies, cheap, choise, braue and new; Come ye heavie states of night; Shall I sue, shall I seeke for grace 🅿
Paul Agnew ten Christopher Wilson lte
Metronome METCD1010 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1995

Love-songs and Sonnets of John Donne and Sir Philip Sidney 🅿
G Tessier In a grove most rich of shade. Dowland O sweet woods, the delight of solitarie-nesse. Sweete stay a while, why will you? Preludium. Morley Who is it that this darke night. Coprario Send home my long strayde eies to mee. A Ferrabosco II So breake off this last lamenting kisse. Corkine The Fire to see my woes for anger burneth. 'Tis true, 'tis day, what though it be? Hilton II A Hymne to God the Father. Anonymous Come live with me. So breake off this last lamenting kisse. Goe my flocke, goe get you hence. Goe and catch a fallinge star. O deere life when shall it be. Sir Philip Sidney's Lamentacion. Dearest love I doe not goe
Paul Agnew ten Christopher Wilson lte
Metronome METCD1006 (62 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts included. Recorded 1994

In the Dowland, Paul Agnew is light of step in the quicker songs, and he languishes longer than most over the variously sorrowful ones. Many of his choices now enjoy 'pop' status, but his inclusion of the beautiful trilogy of which 'Tymes eldest sonne' is the first part is particularly welcome. He receives the most sensitive of support from Wilson, clearly articulated, warm in tone, and perfectly complementary in completing the contrapuntal textures – neither intrusively nor coyly balanced with the voice. Dowland's lute songs have generated many fine recordings, as they richly deserve, and here is one more, beautifully presented, with a booklet containing all the texts.

Love is a familiar peg on which to hang a song recital, and if there is a further focus it is usually on the composer of the music; Agnew and Wilson turn the tables, for once, by spotlighting the writers of the texts, namely Sir Philip Sidney and John Donne. Sidney's sonnets Astrophel and Stella, written between 1581 and 1583, may have been addressed to the daughter of the Earl of Essex but she was unwillingly married to Lord Rich in 1581, so Sidney may have had in mind the daughter of Sir Francis Walsingham, whom he married in 1583. The emotional range of Donne's Songs and Sonets may also mirror the fluctuating fortunes of his own, basically happy marriage. The recording also includes two well-chosen lute solos by way of interludes from Wilson.

Guillaume Dufay French c1400-1474

GROVE Dufay was acknowledged by his contemporaries as the leading composer of his day. Having been trained as a choirboy at Cambrai Cathedral, where he probably studied under Loqueville, he seems to have entered the service of the Malatesta family in Pesaro some time before 1420. Several of his works from this period were written for important local events. After returning briefly to Cambrai and establishing links with Laon, where he held two benefices, he was a singer in the papal choir in Rome from 1428 until 1433, when he became associated with the Este family in Ferrara and the Dukes of Savoy. He rejoined the papal choir (1435-7), and composed the famous motet Nuper rosarum flores for the dedication of Brunelleschi's dome of Florence Cathedral in 1436, but spent his later years (apart from 1451-8, when he was again in Savoy) at Cambrai, where he was visited as a celebrity by such musicians as Binchois, Tinctoris and Ockeghem. Although he composed up to his death, most of his late works are lost.

Working in a period of relative stability in musical style, Dufay achieved distinction rather by consummate artistry than bold innovation. More than half his compositions, including most of his antiphons, hymns, Magnificats, sequences and single items of the Mass, are harmonizations of chant, with the melody usually in the upper part. Most of his motets are imposing compositions written to celebrate a political, social or religious event; four- and five-part textures, often alternating with duos, are common, two or more texts may be set simultaneously, and isorhythm is sometimes used. Others, in a three-voice, treble-dominated style, are more direct and intimate expressions of religious sentiment. Moving from early paired mass movements to the developing form of the cyclic tenor mass, he was apparently the first to base a cycle on a secular melody. Outstanding among his masses is the Missa 'Ave regina celorum', perhaps his last composition. He also composed secular songs, three-quarters of them rondeaux. As an artist of international fame, he is represented in some 70 MSS in many countries.

Complete secular music

Timothy Penrose counterten Rogers Covey-Crump, John Elwes, Paul Elliott tens Paul Hillier, Michael George bars
Medieval Ensemble of London / Peter Davies and Timothy Davies
L'Oiseau-Lyre 452 557-2OC5 (321 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1980

The passage of time has not diminished the grandeur of the achievement of the Medieval Ensemble of London. The opportunity of hearing the entire corpus of Dufay's songs from the same interpretative perspective is irreplaceable – it is doubtful that any record company today would be willing to undertake such an ambitious project. More than just the scope of Dufay's invention, it is its astonishing consistency that strikes the listener – nearly every song has something to delight, to intrigue, to teach. The rough chronology, traced from first to last, is a programme in itself, beginning with the jaunty, seemingly effortless songs of his youth, catchy and dazzling by turns, to the increasingly involving works of maturity, culminating in the sublime poise of his last years.. Although the ensemble doesn't always match Dufay's phenomenal consistency, it's hard to argue with a line-up that includes Paul Elliott, Rogers Covey-Crump and John Elwes, all of them in their prime. And yes, one can disagree with the odd phrase here, spot a fluffed note among the instrumentalists, or wonder at some surprising glitches in the CD transfer but with the last song, the beautiful, canonic Les doleurs lingering in the mind's ear, one accepts the series's limitations as its many virtues endure. Every serious collector should have this.

Sacred Music from Bologna

'Sacred Music from Bologna Q15'
O sancte Sebastiane. Supremum est mortalibus bonum. Vasilissa, ergo gaude. O gemma, lux et speculum. Kyrie, 'Fons bonitatis'. O beate Sebastiane. Gloria, Bologna Q15 No 107. Credo, Bologna Q15 No 108. Sanctus and Benedictus, Bologna Q15 No 104. Inclita stella maris. Agnus Dei, Bologna Q15 No 105. Gloria, 'Spiritus et alme'
The Clerks' Group (William Missin counterten Lucy Ballard alt Chris Watson, Matthew Vine tens Jonathan Arnold bass) / Edward Wickham bass
Signum SIGCD023 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, texts and translations included
Recorded c2002 ●

This recording focuses on sacred works by Dufay from a 15th-century manuscript preserved at Bologna and known as Q15. This is a complex source, compiled over a number of years in northern Italy, and containing a wide range of polyphonic repertory, including diverse works by the great Dufay.

This CD is not in any sense a reconstruction, but a carefully selected anthology of not necessarily very familiar pieces by Dufay. Indeed, this is a really superb recording: vocal lines are well shaped and the sonorities achieved through accuracy of ensemble and pacing result in performances that are decidedly sensual, even dance-like, at times.

Just try the four-voice Gloria or the isorhythmic motet Supremum est mortalibus bonum, in praise of peace. This extraordinary work composed to commemorate the signing of a peace treaty between the Pope and Holy Roman Emperor-elect in 1433 combines just about every musical technique and idiom available to a composer in the first half of the 15th century, complete with, in this interpretation by The Clerks' Group, improvised vocal flourishes on the block chords declaiming the names of the protagonists.

Vocal agility – notably in the faster-moving upper parts of Inclita stella maris – and a text-centred intensity of projection are hallmarks of this excellent group: only in the three-voice setting of O beate Sebastiane, a plea for delivery from the plague, does the approach seem too cool. Elsewhere, even in familiar texts such as the Sanctus, there is a real sense of engagement. If you have yet to discover the delights of Dufay, this is an excellent place to start; Dufay fans cannot fail to be delighted.

Missa S Jacobi

Awards 1999

Missa S Jacobi. Rite majorem Jacobum canamus. Balsamus et munda cera. Gloria 'Resurrexit dominus' and Credo 'Die Maria'. Apostolo glorioso
The Binchois Consort (Mark Chambers, David Gould, Fergus McLusky, Robin Tyson countertens James Gilchrist, Chris Watson, Andrew Carwood, Edwin Simpson tens) /

Andrew Kirkman
Hyperion CDA66997 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1997 ○○○

In what is only their second CD, The Binchois Consort shows absolute mastery of Dufay's difficult early style, with immaculate balance, wonderfully free phrasing, and crystalline clarity. Moreover in the Missa S Jacobi Andrew Kirkman shows an uncanny ability to set the perfect tempo every time, so that the music emerges with its full force. The Missa S Jacobi is an odd but supremely important work. It is one of two early Dufay Mass cycles that have rarely been recorded, partly because they are less obviously part of the grand tradition than his later four-voice cantus firmus Masses. And this one is particularly difficult because its many different textures and styles present a severe challenge if it is not to seem fragmented and incoherent. Here it stands as a glorious masterpiece, its nine movements spanning over 40 minutes, with the various styles acting as necessary contrast and culminating in the famous Communion that Heinrich Besseler many years ago argued was the earliest example of Fauxbourdon writing. Strangely, two of the motets work less well: both the earlier Rite majorem and the later Balsamus seem to go too fast for the details to have their full effect, perhaps because they are so strikingly different in style from the other works performed here. And it seems a touch perverse to use the now fashionable 'old French' pronunciation of Latin, particularly in a motet composed for a papal ceremony (even if the original singers would have been Franco-Flemish): in all his early motets the text seems centrally important, and this kind of pronunciation loses too many of the consonants. But the Italian-texted Apostolo glorioso is again quite superb, as is the astonishing Gloria and Credo pair.

Briefly, then, this is as close to a perfect Dufay CD as any available.

Magnificat sexti toni

Nuper rosarum flores. Alma redemptoris mater II. Letabundus. Ecclesie militantis. Magnificat sexti toni. Benedicamus Domino II. Recollectio Festorum Beate Marie Virginis: Plainchant for Vespers I
Pomerium / Alexander Blachly
Archiv Produktion 447 773-2AH (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1995-96

Pomerium here presents a new addition to our knowledge of Dufay's music, the set of plainchants he wrote for a new feast, the Recollection of the Feasts of the Virgin Mary, composed in 1458. The work is fascinating in many ways: as one of the very few cases of liturgical chant by a named composer, let alone the greatest composer of his age; as an example of Dufay's work in his full maturity (he was perhaps 60 years old at the time he composed it), and entirely different from what we know of his late polyphony; and as a case of unambiguously dated chant composition. Pomerium performs only the music for the First Vespers, a mere fragment of the whole feast. Perhaps there could have been more than four singers for these chants: elegant though the performance is, it hardly sounds like a cathedral schola. But the longer pieces are particularly persuasive: the hymn Gaude redempta and the Responsory Surge propera. For the rest, they provide the addition of two of Dufay's most famous motets and a group of very rarely heard polyphonic liturgical works, particularly the glorious Letabundus setting and the Magnificat in the sixth tone, which is sung with a superb degree of lucidity. Pomerium sings with men and women, showing an attractive vibrant energy, with everything neatly controlled. The sound in the Grotto Church of Notre Dame, New York, is well captured.

Paul Dukas

French 1865-1935

GROVE Dukas studied with Guiraud at the Paris Conservatoire (1881-89) and became a friend of Debussy, d'Indy and Bordes. His Franckian leanings are evident in his first published work, the overture Polyeucte (1891), though Beethoven is also suggested, as again in his Symphony in C (1896). But the symphonic scherzo L'apprenti sorcier (1897) is more individual, not least in its augmented-triad and diminished-7th harmonies, which influenced Stravinsky and Debussy. The next years were devoted to the opera Ariane et Barbe-Bleue (1907), though at the same time he produced two piano works of Beethovenian range and power: the Sonata in E flat minor and the Variations, interlude et final sur un thème de Rameau. Dukas self-criticism constricted his later output. Apart from the exotic ballet La péri (1912) he published only a few occasional works. He cultivated craftsmanship to an extreme degree and his orchestration has been widely admired and imitated. His voluminous criticism reveals an unusual breadth of sympathy and he was a conscientious editor of Beethoven, Couperin, Rameau and Scarlatti and an admired teacher at the Conservatoire.

The Sorcerer's Apprentice

The Sorcerer's Apprentice (L'apprenti sorcier)
Saint-Saëns Symphony No 3 in C minor, Op 78, 'Organ'
Simon Preston org Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / James Levine
DG 419 617-2GH (47 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Levine's account of Dukas' masterpiece is still the best in the catalogue. Levine chooses a fast basic tempo, but justifies his speed by the lightness of his touch and, of course, the clean articulation and rhythmic bounce of the Berlin Phil playing help considerably. The climax is thrilling, but Levine reserves something for the moment when the sorcerer returns to quell the flood. Levine must have had Disney's imagery in his mind in the closing pages of the story, for the picture of the crestfallen Mickey handing back the broom to his master springs readily to mind. In all, it provides a marvellous finish to an exhilarating listening experience. Levine's performance of Saint-Saëns' Third Symphony is also among the best available. The balance between the orchestra and organ, here played powerfully by Simon Preston, is well judged and the overall acoustic very convincing. Levine directs a grippingly individual reading, full of drama and with a consistently imaginative response to the score's detail. The organ entry in the finale is quite magnificent, the excitement of Preston thundering out the main theme physical in its impact. The music expands and blossoms magnificently, helped by the spectacular dynamic range of the recording.

Symphony in C major

Symphony in C. Polyeucte – overture
BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Yan Pascal Tortelier
Chandos CHAN9225 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993 ●

Before L'apprenti sorcier, the tradition Paul Dukas was following was that of César Franck, and he was also heavily influenced by the Wagnerianism which held French composers in thrall during that period. Both models can be discerned in the overture Polyeucte: nevertheless, and despite extensive Wagnerian use of the brass, there is a clarity (even delicacy in the third of its five sections) and an imaginative sense of colour which are individual to him. The finely crafted Symphony composed four years later, in 1896 – daringly in C major at a time when tonality was undergoing such general buffeting – shows Dukas as essentially a classicist, although the middle section of the central movement reveals that Nature romanticism had not passed him by. The eloquent performance here gives the vigorous first movement a splendid élan while also luxuriating in the Franckian secondary subjects, there is lovely warm, lyrical playing and sensitive nuance in the second movement, and the finale (even more Franckian in its harmonic thinking) bubbles over with nervous energy. Exemplary recording quality.

Piano Sonata in E flat minor

Dukas Piano Sonata in E flat minor
Dutilleux Piano Sonata Schmitt Deux mirages
John Ogdon pf
EMI Matrix 565996-2 (79 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1972

The main work here is the big Dukas Sonata, written at the turn of the century, and advanced for its time. It has always been hailed by French critics as a masterpiece, but despite that it is not very often performed, at least in this country. The sonata's Franckian harmonic and melodic traits are combined with a pianistic exuberance which suits Ogdon's temperament admirably, as does the demonic Scherzo, but this is also balanced by his air of mystery in its trio section and by his tonal purity in the quiet slow movement.

Ogdon's fluency and limpid clarity come to the fore in the Dutilleux Sonata, whose spiky first movement veers from fragile delicacy to pounding fortissimo chords; its slow movement (headed 'Lied') is deeply moving in its intensity. The first of Schmitt's Mirages, written in 1920 and published in memory of Debussy, is a haunting, elaborately textured elegy; the second, a ferocious rendering of the story of Mazeppa's tragic ride, was dedicated to Cortot. One wonders whether he would ever have had the technique to play it: Ogdon, however, revels in its enormous demands. This release brings home to us just how outstanding a pianist we lost.

John Dunstaple

British c1390-1453

GROVE Dunstaple is acknowledged as the most eminent of the Englishmen who strongly influenced the generation of Dufay and later continental composers. Little is certainly known about his career; he was probably not the John Dunstavylle who was at Hereford Cathedral, 1419-40, but may have been in the service of the Duke of Bedford before 1427. He was in the service of Queen Joan of Navarre, second wife of Henry IV, 1427-36, and was serviteur et familier domestique in the household of Henry, Duke of Gloucester, in 1438. In the late 1430s he held lands in northern France. There is evidence that he was also an astronomer. He was buried at StStephen's, Walbrook, where his epitaph described him as 'prince of music'.

Most of his surviving music is in continental sources. 51 compositions are consistently stated in MS sources to be his, but many others, anonymous or with conflicting ascriptions, are probably by him. Stylistically, his music can be divided into four categories: isorhythmic works in which a plainchant tenor forms the lowest of three or four parts; non-isorhythmic works based on a plainchant that may be in any of the three parts; works in 'free treble' or 'ballade' style, consisting of a freely composed melodic line (which may however incorporate traces of elaborated plainchant) and two slower supporting parts; and declamatory works in a syllabic style with careful accentuation of the text.

Two of the earliest mass cycles, Rex seculorum and Da gaudiorum premia, are ascribed to him in some sources and some of his other mass movements may originally have belonged to complete cycles. Most of his works are in three parts, except for the isorhythmic motets which are mostly in four, and, while nearly all begin in triple time, there is often a change to duple near the middle and sometimes a shorter return to triple towards the end. His melodies are characterised by stepwise and triadic movement, and the harmony, reflecting the English predilection for 3rds and 6ths, is predominantly consonant.

Vocal Works

Awards
1996

Descendi in ortum meum. Ave maris stella. Gloria in canon. Speciosa facta es. Sub tuam protectionem. Veni, Sancte spiritus / Veni creator spiritus. Albanus roseo rutilat / Quoque ferundus eras / Albanus domini laudus. Specialis virgo. Preco preheminencie / Precursor premittitur / textless / Inter natos mulierum. O crux gloriosa. Salve regina mater mire.
Missa Rex seculorum
Orlando Consort
Metronome METCD1009 (74 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included
Recorded 1995 ●●●

This disc contains three of Dunstaple's well-known motets – Preco preheminencie, Veni veni and Albanus – but the rest are rarely performed. For some of the delicious antiphons, it is hard to see why: Salve regina mater mire is particularly striking – one of those pieces that sounds far more impressive than it looks on the page. There are also some total novelties. The canonic Gloria was discovered in Russia: it is a massively inventive work that adds a substantial new dimension to our knowledge of Dunstaple. And Descendi in ortum meum, though discovered and published a quarter of a century ago, surely stands as the latest known work of its composer: a magnificent piece that builds an entirely new kind of edifice with the materials of his characteristic style. Most impressive of all, though, is the Mass, Rex seculorum, which ends the disc. This may or may not be by Dunstaple – which is probably why it has never been recorded. Whoever the composer, though, it is a key work in the history of the polyphonic mass cycle, brimming with invention. The Orlando Consort has a wonderfully forward style that beautifully matches the music and helps the listener to understand why Dunstaple achieved such an enormous reputation on the continental mainland. If they are occasionally a touch rough, these are classic performances that will be hard to challenge.

Henri Duparc

French 1848-1933

GROVE Duparc studied the piano and composition with Franck, writing works that he later destroyed; this loss, together with a crippling psychological condition that caused him to abandon composition at the age of 36, has resulted in a legacy of just 13 songs (composed 1868-84). An important influence is Wagner, seen in the ambitious harmonic structure of Chanson triste and the shifting chromaticism of Soupir. Yet Duparc's feeling for poetic atmosphere and the craftsmanship he used to communicate it, as in the sinister drama of La manoir de Rosemonde, were unique, giving the French mélodie a rare musical substance and emotional intensity. From 1885 he led a quiet life, remaining close to Ernest Chausson and cultivating his aesthetic sensibility through reading and drawing.

Mélodies

L'invitation au voyage. Sérénade florentine. Extase. Chanson triste. Le manoir de Rosemonde. Lamento. Au pays où se fait la guerre. La fuite. La vague et la cloche. Sérénade. Testament. Phidylé. Romance de Mignon. Elégie. Le galop. Soupir. La vie antérieure
Danielle Borst sop François Le Roux bar
Jeff Cohen pf
REM REM311049 (63 minutes: DDD). Texts and Ⓕ translations included. Recorded 1987

If you consider Duparc's songs the most rewarding in the French language you will rejoice at this issue. Without hesitation, we would say Le Roux's are the most successful performances of these masterpieces in miniature since the war. In his foreword to this issue the veteran composer Henri Sauguet comments: 'The interpretations of François Le Roux and Danielle Borst are remarkable, not just for their vocal qualities and their emotional commitment but also for their exemplary use of words, which illustrates perfectly the profound unity of poetry and music.' That almost says all that needs to be said, at any rate about Le Roux who has the lion's share of the burden. His voice can sometimes take on a rough edge but his understanding of the Duparc idiom is second to none, rivalling that of Panzéra and Bernac in the distant past, precisely because he realizes what French can convey when sung with scrupulous care over diction.

Added to that he and his admirable pianist, Jeff Cohen, seem almost always to find exactly the right tempo for each mélodie. Le Roux is partnered in La fuite by Borst, another dedicated Duparcian who catches some of its trance-like beauty. The recorded sound is ideal. A 'must' for anyone interested in great performances of mélodies.

Marcel Dupré

French 1886-1971

GROVE Dupré studied with Guilmant, Vierne and Widor at the Paris Conservatoire (1902-14), returning as professor of organ (1926-54) while also serving as organist of St Sulpice (1934-71) and appearing internationally as a recitalist. His works introduced a Lisztian virtuosity and a contemplative modality into organ music; he also wrote religious symphonic poems. Alain and Messiaen were among his pupils.

Organ Works

Complete Organ Works, Volume 9
Entrée, méditation, sortie, Op 62. Les nymphéas, Op 54. Suite bretonne, Op 21. Poème héroïque, Op 33 (arr cpsr)
Jeremy Filsell org
Guild GMCD7188 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded on the organ of St Boniface Episcopal Church, Florida, USA in 1998 ●

It's sometimes the case that the reputation of great composers rests on a handful of works. With Dupré it's the two symphonies, the Op 7 Preludes and Fugues and the Noël Variations for which he's best known, but these compositions form a tiny proportion of his entire output. One of the many benefits of Guild's series is the discovery of hidden treasures, and much of the music on Volume 9 deserves to be heard more frequently.

The revelation here is Les nymphéas. This is a beautiful work, even as original as Debussy's Images, Nocturnes or the quieter moments of Jeux. It would make a marvellous orchestral suite; indeed, much of Dupré's organ writing has a quasi-orchestral character, and reflects his love and knowledge of the vast tonal palette of 20th-century instruments. You can also tell that, like Messiaen, he was an experienced writer of piano and chamber music.

We're indebted to Filsell for his special arrangement of Les nymphéas for this CD, and for his excellent performances throughout this volume. The choice of the organ at St Boniface, Florida, was a good one as it provides sensuous colours for the softer movements, plus glockenspiel effects for the Suite bretonne. The playing is backed up by fine recorded sound and comprehensive programme notes. There's no doubt that this series is setting the standard for Dupré interpreters of the future and will be a landmark in the history of organ recordings.

Complete Organ Works, Volume 10
Le chemin de la croix, Op 29
Jeremy Filsell org
Guild GMCD7193 (56 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●●

Complete Organ Works, Volume 11
Vêpres du commun des fêtes de la Sainte-Vierge, Op 18. Choral et Fugue, Op 57. Regina coeli, Op 64
Vocal Quartet; Jeremy Filsell org
Guild GMCD7198 (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●●

Complete Organ Works, Volume 12
79 Chorales, Op 28
Jeremy Filsell org
Guild GMCD7203 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1998 ●●
All recorded on the organ of St Boniface Episcopal Church, Sarasota, Florida, USA

Thinking about 20th-century French music after Debussy and Ravel, the names of Messiaen and the members of Les Six would probably spring to mind. However, at the same time organists like Vierne, Tournemire, Alain, Langlais and Dupré himself were writing music every bit as original and as intense as the aforementioned composers. One of the many benefits of Guild's series (which concludes with these three volumes) is the opportunity to discover just how fine a composer Dupré was. Perhaps more than any of his contemporaries he managed to embrace both the sacred and the secular with utter conviction. Le chemin de la croix is one of his major works and is a landmark piece of musical drama. One can hear links with the Symphonie-Passion of six years earlier, and David Gammie in his comprehensive accompanying notes points out the influence of these works on Duruflé's Requiem and Messiaen's Les corps glorieux. Filsell gives a suitably dramatic performance with some telling rallentandos at climactic moments.

All three compositions on Volume 11 were inspired by Gregorian chant, and each movement is preceded on this CD by the singing of the verse on which it's based. The vocal quartet includes the CD's producer Adrian Peacock and Filsell himself – an inspired and appropriate piece of programming. Listening to Filsell's flowing, atmospheric playing it's easy to imagine oneself sitting in a vast, incense-laden Parisian church, with glorious improvised music coming from the west-end grand orgue.

Dupré is remembered for writing music of extreme technical complexity, but Volume 12 shows that he was well capable of composing pieces for organs and organists of modest resources. The 79 Chorales take hymn tunes which were all used by Bach as the basis for chorale-preludes. Many of Dupré's chorales are effective Bachian pastiches, but a handful of them have the unmistakable 20th-century French idiom. Again, Filsell's performances are beyond reproach, and he shows that Dupré was able to match JSB for solemnity and piety.

As is so often the case Naxos provides healthy competition, and Volume 11 of its Dupré series has a very fine performance of Le chemin de la croix from Mary Preston. She brings a greater clarity to the music, helped by the drier acoustic of the Meyerson Symphony Center at Dallas. However, Filsell in the more resonant acoustic of St Boniface Church, Sarasota, Florida brings more warmth, passion and drama to his interpretations, and this, coupled with Gammie's excellent insert-notes sways the balance in favour of the Guild series.

In all 12 volumes Filsell's playing has been consistently superb, and what has been most impressive is that his virtuosity has always been the servant of the music. The St Boniface organ may not have the éclat of a Cavaillé-Coll, but its clarity and attack enhance Dupré's complex textures, and the recordings are suitably warm and atmospheric. We must salute Filsell for what must surely rank as one of the greatest achievements in organ recordings.

Prelude and Fugue in F minor, Op 7 No 2. Cortège et Litanie, Op 19 No 2. Symphonie- Passion, Op 23. Symphony No 2 in C sharp minor, Op 26. Evocation, Op 37 – Allegro deciso
John Scott org
Hyperion CDA67047 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded on the organ of St Paul's Cathedral, London in 1998

This is an impressive release on every account. As we have come to expect from John Scott, the playing is superb – that perfect combination of technical virtuosity and intense musicianship which is so rare among organists – and numerous Hyperion recordings from the cavernous St Paul's over the past 15 years have fine-tuned its engineering to such an extent that we no longer admire the sound, per se, but find that the acoustic positively enhances it. That awesome echo, as the final chord of Scott's vehement account of the Symphonie-Passion is cast adrift to fend for itself in the cathedral's vastness, adds a tangible sense of presence. Yet the clarity is there; the precision of Scott's fingerwork is captured in microscopic detail in his stunning performance of the Second Symphony's 'Preludio' and 'Toccata' movements. The Prelude and Fugue receives a richly atmospheric performance which makes you wonder why it is that this deeply moving piece, with its strong melodic ties with the popular Requiem, has been so overshadowed by its companions. Musically, technically and emotionally these are truly distinguished recordings.

Le chemin de la croix, Op 29
Ben van Oosten org
Dabringhaus und Grimm MDG316 0953-2 Ⓕ
(62 minutes: DDD). Played on the Cavaillé-Coll Organ, Saint-Ouen, Rouen

Many collectors will instinctively be drawn to Ben van Oosten's choice of a genuine French organ. And not just any old French organ, but one of the finest extant Cavaillé-Colls captured in a recording of exemplary clarity, depth and presence. Against Jeremy Filsell's incisive precision and intensity (on Guild) van Oosten seems somewhat flabby and cumbersome. But his is a performance which exposes the very heart of Dupré's creation. The work was originally conceived as an improvisation to accompany spoken verses from Paul Claudel's Le chemin de la croix. Van Oosten re-creates a tangible feeling of a 'living improvisation' and portrays a compelling sense of emotional reflection and musical response to the drama of these 14 scenes. Despite rare opportunities for open exhibitions of virtuosity or bravura display, Le chemin de la croix places as daunting and formidable technical demands on the player as any of Dupré's works. But here those technical demands are overshadowed by van Oosten's powerful visionary zeal, hauntingly revealed in the portrait of the disconsolate Mary (Station IV), the nervous energy of Simon the Cyrenean as he attempts to bear the burden of the cross (Station V), and the compassion of Jesus as he comforts the tormented women of Jerusalem (Station VIII). A release to be wholeheartedly recommended whatever the competition.

Choral Works

Dupré La France au Calvaire, Op 49[a]
Alain O Salutaris Langlais Festival Alleluia
Messiaen O sacrum convivium!
[a]Helen Neeves sop [a]Catherine Denley mez
[a]Matthew Beale ten [a]Colin Campbell bar
Jeremy Filsell org Vasari Singers / Jeremy Backhouse
Guild GMCD7239 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded c2002 ●●

La France au Calvaire is an astonishing work, setting, to quote the booklet note, 'a curious libretto' by René Herval who, like Dupré, was a native of Rouen. Appalled by the devastation wrought on his native city during the Second World War, Dupré vents all his anger and passion into this 65-minute oratorio, its movements dedicated to six French saints and framed by a Prologue and Final. Principally known for his organ music, it might seem strange to question Dupré's use of the organ here as the sole means of instrumental accompaniment. But despite Jeremy Filsell's stunning virtuosity and brilliant handling of the not-always-perfectly-in-tune Douai Abbey organ, the score seems to cry out for an orchestra.

No such reservations about the performance: in a word, stunning. The bleak ugliness of Christ nailed to the cross is compellingly portrayed by Matthew Beale, Catherine Denley makes an arresting France appealing for forgiveness for her misguided people, Colin Campbell fulfils the dual roles of St Denis and the voice of Christ with suitable gravitas and authority, and Helen Neeves is a beautifully innocent St Clotilde (magically set against a decidedly Messiaenic organ backdrop).

As for Jeremy Backhouse and his superb Vasari Singers, they excel even by their own high standards. The three motets which share the disc seem in comparison a trifle disappointing. But that disappointment is only because the motets precede a work of extraordinary emotional impact and a performance of exceptional power.

Quatre motets, Op 9[a]. De profundis, Op 18. Ave verum, Op 34 No 1. La france au Calvaire, Op 49 – Final. Deux motets, Op 53
Vasari Singers / Jeremy Backhouse with Jeremy Filsell, [a]Ian Curror orgs
Guild GMCD7220 (80 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included

For all but a handful of devotees Marcel Dupré is inseparably associated with the organ. Dupré himself conceded this: 'I do not think of myself as a composer. I have specialised in the organ, and I do not have the reputation that composers have.' However, any thoughts that Dupré's choral music might merely be organ music with words are immediately quashed by even the briefest snatch of the extended De profundis (particularly the thrilling 'Et ipse redimet Israel' with the organ's great pillars of sound underpinning the richly textured and rhythmically exhilarating chorus). Here is truly impressive choral music. True, the organ does figure prominently, occasionally assuming a decidedly virtuoso role, but it is clearly always the servant of the choir, and for the most part it is the choral lines rather than the organ accompaniments which require the greatest virtuosity. To that end it is hard to imagine a choral group more ideally suited to the task. The Vasari Singers are one of the most accomplished small choral groups of our time and for this compelling, passionate, often deeply moving and always technically demanding music, every ounce of their artistry is called into play.

Guild's recording is wonderfully spacious yet crystal-clear, and Jeremy Filsell's organ support immaculate.

Maurice Duruflé

French 1902-1986

GROVE Duruflé studied with Tournemire, whose deputy at SteClotilde he became, and then at the Paris Conservatoire (1920-28) with Gigout and Dukas. In 1930 he was appointed organist of StEtienne-du-Mont and he toured internationally as a recitalist. His works are few, in a vivid modal style, and include a Requiem (1947).

Organ Works

'Veni Creator: The Complete Organ Music'
Scherzo, Op 2. Prélude, Adagio et Choral varié sur le thème de 'Veni Creator', Op 4. Suite, Op 5. Prélude et Fugue sur le nom d'Alain, Op 7. Fugue sur le thème du Carillon des Heures de la Cathédrale de Soissons, Op 12. Prélude sur l'Introït de l'Epiphanie, Op 13. Meditation, Op posth
Hans Fagius org
BIS BIS-CD1304 (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Played on the 1928 Frobenius organ at Århus Cathedral, Denmark. Recorded 2002

Listeners to his Requiem will recognise Duruflé's conservative and intensely personal musical language as heard in his organ music. The influence of Debussy, Dukas, Ravel, Tournemire and Vierne is evident, and like these composers Duruflé provides detailed performance indications. Hans Fagius, a former student of Duruflé's, scrupulously observes all the scores' markings, and this is one reason why he's now the top recommendation for this repertoire.

His performances have a flexible, seamless flow, and the playing has a slight understated quality which gives more clarity and impact than Eric Lebrun's flamboyant accounts. Fagius's interpretations are close in spirit to the recordings by the composer and his wife Marie-Madeleine Duruflé-Chevalier, and it's a shame that their authoritative performances are marred by poor sound quality. By contrast, BIS's recording of the 89-stop four-manual organ in Århus Cathedral is superbly realistic. The choice of this instrument was an inspired one; it possesses all the appropriate colours and it's set in a warm, generous acoustic.

Another bonus is the inclusion of the sensuous and recently discovered Meditation. Although the recordings by Lebrun and the Duruflés are very good, they must now stand aside and let this BIS disc take the place of honour, for this is a truly distinguished release of one of the finest corpus of organ music you'll ever hear.

Requiem

Duruflé Requiem, Op 9[a] Fauré Requiem, Op 48[b]
[a]Ann Murray mez [a]Thomas Allen bar [b]Mary Seers sop [b]Michael George bass [b]John Scott org
Corydon Singers; English Chamber Orchestra / Matthew Best
Hyperion CDA67070 (78 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded 1985-87

Matthew Best favours Duruflé's compromise version of his Requiem (with strings, harp and trumpets). The combination of chamber ensemble with solo organ lines (sometimes not entirely convincing) makes for some problems of balance – there is a lack of bass in parts of the Domine Jesu Christe, the trumpets' plainchant is overloud in the Kyrie, and the first 'Hosanna' in the Sanctus is inaudible; but for the performance itself there can be nothing but praise – soloists, chorus, orchestra and organ are all first-class – the Corydon Singers offer expressive singing, with a wide dynamic range and remarkably clear words; and Best shapes the work expressively and sensitively. In Fauré's Requiem Best uses either John Rutter's reconstruction of the pre-publication state of Fauré's score, or something very closely resembling it, but the resulting performance sounds quite different to Rutter's own (reviewed under Fauré). He chooses slightly but perceptibly slower speeds for a start (save in the In Paradisum). More significantly, he uses a larger, warmer string force which together with a spacious acoustic and exceptionally refined choral singing gives a honeyed glow to the music which many will find a very acceptable compromise between the slightly austere leanness of Rutter's own presentation of his edition and the somewhat cumbrous opacity of the 1900 score.

Duruflé Requiem. Prélude et Fugue sur le nom d'Alain, Op 7. Quatre Motets sur des thèmes grégoriens, Op 10 Fauré Requiem, Op 48. Cantique de Jean Racine, Op 11. Messe basse
Poulenc Mass in G. Salve Regina. Exultate Deo. Litanies à la vierge noire
Jonathon Bond, Andrew Brunt, Robert King trebs Benjamin Luxon bar Christopher Keyte bass
St John's College Choir, Cambridge; Academy of St Martin in the Fields / George Guest with Stephen Cleobury org
Double Decca ② 436 486-2DF2 Ⓜ
(149 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1969-76

Here is almost two-and-a-half hours of bliss. These are recordings to set aside for the time when, as the prayer says, 'the busy world is hushed'. Asked to characterise Fauré's and Duruflé's Requiems as compared with others, we might suggest words such as 'delicate', 'meditative', 'undramatic'; but that last would be a mistake. These performances certainly do not go out of their way to 'be' dramatic or anything else other than faithful to the music, but one is struck by the power exercised by those rare moments that rise to a forte and above. The choir is surely at its best, the trebles with their fine clear-cut, distinctive tone, the tenors (so important in the Fauré) graceful and refined without being precious, the altos exceptionally good, and only the basses just occasionally and briefly plummy or obtrusive in some way.

The Poulenc works further test a choir's virtuosity yet in the extremely difficult Mass, the choir seems secure, and in the Salve Regina they catch the necessary tenderness. The treble soloists sing beautifully, Christopher Keyte dramatises almost too convincingly in Duruflé's 'tremens factus', and Benjamin Luxon, his production less even, builds finely in Fauré's Libera me. These recordings have a vividness, certainly in the choral sound, that modern recordings generally lack.

Duruflé Requiem[a] Fauré Requiem, Op 48[b]
[a]Kiri Te Kanawa, [b]Lucia Popp sops Siegmund Nimsgern bass-bar Ambrosian Singers;
[a]Desborough School Choir; [a]New Philharmonia Orchestra, [b]Philharmonia Orchestra / Sir Andrew Davis
Sony Classical Essential Classics SBK67182 Ⓑ
(79 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1977

These recordings, made within six months of each other with substantially the same forces and in the same church, were issued separately but obviously go together. Both had outstandingly good reviews in Gramophone and although textural matters have arisen to enrich the choice and complicate the issue, if what were then regarded as the standard versions (in full orchestral score) are required, then the recommendations can remain. Davis's superiority over more recent versions is especially apparent in the Duruflé. His way with the opening is typical: the flow, the gentle wave-like motion, is beautifully caught and in the 'Libera me' he discovers the full richness of Duruflé's colours. Te Kanawa sings with feeling and incomparably lovely sound. There may be misgivings about the remastered sound, but it settles down (or one's ears do).

Henri Dutilleux

French 1916

GROVE Dutilleux studied with the Gallons, Büsser and Emmanuel at the Paris Conservatoire (1933-38), where he was appointed professor in 1970 after periods with French radio (1943-63) and at the Ecole Normale de Musique (from 1961). His first works suggest influences from Debussy, Ravel, Roussel and Honegger, but he developed as an isolated and independent figure, producing a relatively small output of great breadth and originality, predominantly of instrumental works; they include two symphonies (1950, 1959) and other orchestral pieces, piano music and the string quartet Ainsi la nuit (1976).

Concertos

Cello Concerto, 'Tout un monde lointain'.
Métaboles. Mystère de l'instant
Boris Pergamenschikov vc BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Yan Pascal Tortelier
Chandos CHAN9565 (60 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

This is the third issue in Chandos's Dutilleux series with the BBC Phil and Yan Pascal Tortelier. The virtues of those earlier issues remain evident here, with meticulously prepared, well-played performances, and recordings carefully adapted to the coloristic subtlety and textural delicacy of the music. Métaboles is particularly tricky to bring off, but this version is admirable in the way it builds through some dangerously episodic writing to underline the power of the principal climaxes, though a more sharply delineated sound picture could have reinforced these contrasts even more appropriately. Boris Pergamenschikov is an eloquent soloist in the Cello Concerto. Tortelier's account of Mystère de l'instant – using a full orchestral complement of strings – is excellently done. As with Métaboles, the structure is shaped with great flexibility and feeling for its ebb and flow, and this emerges as a highly dramatic score, despite the inherent reticence of Dutilleux's style.

Cello Concerto, 'Tout un monde lointain'
Violin Concerto, 'L'arbre des songes'.
Pierre Amoyal vn Lynn Harrell vc French National Orchestra / Charles Dutoit
Decca 444 398-2DH (51 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993

The Cello Concerto, first performed in 1970, was written for Rostropovich, and Lynn Harrell boldly confronts this formidable precedent; there is certainly no sense of undue reticence or constraint in his playing. The many technical challenges present no problems: more significantly, Harrell the interpreter has the full measure of the music's tricky blend of boldness and delicacy. From the start of the 'very free and flexible' first movement the undertones of mystery and menace which reflect the music's source in Baudelaire's poetry are fully in evidence, and Harrell has the advantage of first-class recorded sound. The cello is placed well forward, but the orchestra is never recessed to compensate.

The Violin Concerto builds on the sultry, surreal Baudelairean spirit of the Cello Concerto – the 'tree' of the title seems tropical, the 'dreams' mainly unquiet – and Pierre Amoyal, with admirable support from Dutoit and the FNO, succeeds brilliantly in shaping the rhapsodic solo line with a mixture of intensity and fantasy, so that the piece works well as both structure and expression. Here, too, the production team has ensured that the concerto's rich textures can be heard without strain or artificiality.

The whole enterprise can be warmly recommended. A great little package.

Dutilleux Violin Concerto, 'L'arbre des songes'. Timbres, espace, mouvement. Deux Sonnets de Jean Cassou (orch cpsr) Alain (orch Dutilleux) Prière pour nous autres charnels
Olivier Charlier vn Martyn Hill ten Neal Davies bar
BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Yan Pascal Tortelier
Chandos CHAN9504 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1996 ●

Timbres, espace, mouvement (1978, revised 1991) can be counted as Dutilleux's best orchestral composition, at once rooted in tradition yet persistently sceptical about conventional 'symphonic' values. It's a tricky score to bring off, and Tortelier is successful in negotiating its twists and turns of form. In the Violin Concerto (1985) Tortelier again favours a symphonic approach, and very effective it is too, with a soloist who is authoritative without being overly self-assertive. In the rival Decca recording (reviewed below) Pierre Amoyal is more intense in tone, with a volatility from which all sense of effort has not been completely purged. Is the Charlier/Tortelier version too staid, or does this richly perfumed music demand a response that keeps its more flamboyant qualities under firmer control than that provided by the Decca team? Amoyal and Dutoit make the more immediate impact, but it could be that Charlier and Tortelier prove more satisfying in the longer run. The Chandos disc also includes Dutilleux's orchestral arrangement of his Cassou settings, and also his orchestration, made in 1944, of Jehan Alain's touching prayer. Well-characterised contributions from Martyn Hill and Neal Davies complete this valuable release.

Complete Symphonies

Awards
1994

Symphonies – No 1; No 2, 'Le double'
BBC Philharmonic Orchestra / Yan Pascal Tortelier
Chandos CHAN9194 Ⓕ
(60 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1993 ●●●

This pair of relatively early works, completed in 1951 and 1959 respectively, show him poised to inherit the Honegger/Martinů strand of the symphonic tradition. Yet, while an almost Simpsonian élan in the first movement of No 2 promises a rich vein for further exploration, the Stravinskian strategies of the finale, ending with a virtual recomposition of the chorale that concludes the Symphonies of Wind Instruments, reveals a more modernist tendency, and leads away from the well-made, tonally-resolving symphony altogether. With their broad thematic vistas and persuasive adaptations of traditional forms, Dutilleux's symphonies offer considerable rewards to interpreters and listeners alike. Yan Pascal Tortelier and the BBC Philharmonic allow the music all the space it needs in strongly characterised, rhythmically well-sprung performances with uniformly excellent solo playing in No 2, and the sound is rich and natural.

Symphony No 1

Symphony No 1. Cello Concerto, 'Tout un monde lointain'[a]. Timbres, espace, mouvement
[a]Jean-Guihen Queyras vc Bordeaux-Aquitaine National Orchestra / Hans Graf
Arte Nova 74321 92813-2 (80 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ

The traditional French virtues of lightness, elegance, wit and so on are all very well, but they don't take us far with Dutilleux's music on their own. It's wonderfully inspiriting to hear, albeit under an Austrian conductor, an orchestra from the long underfunded French provinces finding this music's power, passion and eloquence.

Hans Graf enjoys Dutilleux's confidence, and from this recording it's easy to see why. The detail is all here, but so is the control of long paragraphs – few recordings of the slow movement of the First Symphony have moved this reviewer as much as this one. The sound may not have quite the brilliance of the Chandos set, but do we always have to have brilliance?

Similarly, Jean-Guihen Queyras may not produce Rostropovich's matchless tone high up on the A string; but he has his own things to say and says them with authority. In Timbres, espace, mouvement, Graf impresses on us the sheer curiousness of many of the textures, just as van Gogh's 1889 picture La nuit étoilée, which inspired the work, stands far apart from so much contemporary painting.

The First Symphony is especially welcome. Amid all the congratulations after its first public performance in 1952, Pierre Boulez pointedly turned his back on the composer. The usual explanation is that Dutilleux, eschewing the 12-note system, was clearly one of those who were, in Boulez's words, 'inadequate to the times'. Or was the younger man all too aware of this music's quality? Happily, these fences have been mended since. But the work is undoubtedly a masterpiece and the final resolution on to D flat major one of the great moments of 20th-century music.

Chamber Works

Piano Sonata[a]. Ainsi la Nuit[b]. Les citations[c]. Figures de résonances[d]. Trois préludes[e].
Deux sonnets de Jean Cassou[f]. Trois strophes sur le nom de Sacher[g]
[f]Gilles Cachemaille bar [c]Maurice Bourgue ob
[g]David Geringas vc [c]Bernard Cazauran db
[c]Bernard Balet perc [c]Huguette Dreyfus hpd
[ade]Geneviève Joy, [df]Henri Dutilleux pfs
[b]Sine Nomine Quartet (Patrick Genet, François Gottraux vns Nicolas Pache va Mars Jaermann vc)
Ultima ② 8573 88047-2 (88 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1988

The pieces on these discs cover a wide range of compositional concerns, from the atmospheric piano writing of the Trois préludes and Figures de résonances, through the use of quotations in Les citations, to the memories of the Second World War embodied in the Deux sonnets de Jean Cassou (subsequently developed so memorably in his orchestral work The Shadows of Time). Dutilleux is dismissive about his own piano technique, and it's true that, for all Gilles Cachemaille's persuasive advocacy, the Sonnets do come over better in their original orchestral garb. Otherwise the performances are excellent in every respect. Dutilleux has recently spoken highly of the Arditti's 1993 version of Ainsi la nuit, but this one by the Quatuor Sine Nomine, where the crucial dynamic contrasts are well observed, also retains his favour. Geringas is tidier in the Trois strophes than Haimovitz, though not always as vigorous.

Geneviève Joy remains without equal in the Piano Sonata written for her, both in execution and in understanding – it's worth noting that the movement durations of this 1988 performance are still only a few seconds away from those of her first recording, made in 1955! The strong architecture and profound poetry of this wonderful work have never been so memorably caught.

The Shadows of Time

The Shadows of Time[a]. Cello Concerto, 'Tout un monde lointain'[b]. Métaboles.
[a]Joel Esher, [a]Rachael Plotkin, [a]Jordan Swaim trebs; [b]Arto Noras vc
Boston Symphony Orchestra / Seiji Ozawa
Warner Élatus 09274-9830-2 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
[a]Recorded live in 1998

Boldly, Warner gambled that the interest and appeal of the first substantial work by Henri Dutilleux for almost a decade would justify this issue of a CD single. We can only commend the enterprise and the finely engineered recording. The Shadows of Time is an unambiguously emotional, even angry work, and may well stand as the musical testament of a composer who, while seeking to celebrate 'the unity of time and place' (as his brief note accompanying the disc puts it), can only do so from the basis of considerable pessimism about the ability of the real world to achieve the kind of harmonious, classical ideals to which he, as an artist, aspires. Pessimism and anger are most explicit in the way the first and last sections depict the inexorable passage of time, and in the increasing density and urgency of the orchestral lament which explodes out of a central episode in which childrens' voices repeat the questions, 'Why us? Why the star?'. This is a reference to Anne Frank and 'all the innocent children of the world', Dutilleux declares, yet there is nothing mawkish here, rather an almost Wozzeck-like pathos in the way the music searches for consolation without, in the end, quite achieving it. By the time of these performances Ozawa, his orchestra and the three assured young singers, had achieved absolute authority in this often testing music. The result is a moving and memorable document of a very special occasion, and a very special work.

In short, this set makes a great introduction to one of Europe's most distinguished living composers. The Cello Concerto is almost a modern classic, with Arto Noras a fine soloist, and Métaboles is a vivid concerto for orchestra. Thoroughly recommended.

Antonin Dvořák Bohemian 1841-1904

Dvořák studied with Antonín Liehmann GROVE and at the Prague Organ School (1857-9). A capable viola player, he joined the band that became the nucleus of the new Provisional Theatre orchestra, conducted from 1866 by Smetana. Private teaching and mainly composing occupied him from 1873. He won the Austrian State Stipendium three times (1874, 1876-7), gaining the attention of Brahms, who secured the publisher Simrock for some of his works in 1878. Foreign performances multiplied, notably of the Slavonic Dances, the Sixth Symphony and the Stabat mater, and with them further commissions. Particularly well received in England, Dvořák wrote The Spectre's Bride (1884) and the Requiem Mass (1890) for Birmingham, the Seventh Symphony for the Philharmonic Society (1885) and St Ludmilla for Leeds (1886), besides receiving an honorary doctorate from Cambridge. He visited Russia in 1890, continued to launch new works in Prague and London and began teaching at the Prague Conservatory in 1891 (where Joseph Suk was among his most gifted pupils). Before leaving for the USA he toured Bohemia playing the new Dumky Trio. As director of the National Conservatory in New York (1892-5) he taught composition, meanwhile producing the well-known Ninth Symphony ('From the New World'), the String Quartet in F, the String Quintet in E flat and the Cello Concerto. Financial strain and family ties took him back to Prague, where he began to write symphonic poems and finally had his efforts at dramatic music rewarded with the success of the fairytale opera Rusalka (1901). The recipient of honours and awards from all sides, he remained a modest man of simple tastes, loyal to his nationality.

In matters of style Dvořák was neither conservative nor radical. His works display the influences of folk music, mainly Czech (furiant and dumky dance traits, polka rhythms, immediate repetition of an initial bar) but also ones that might equally be seen as American (pentatonic themes, flattened 7ths); Classical composers whom he admired, including Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven and Schubert; Wagner, whose harmony and use of leitmotifs attracted him; and his close friend Brahms (notably his piano writing and mastery of symphonic form). Despite his fascination with opera, he lacked a natural instinct for drama for all their admirable wit and lyricism, his last five stage works rank lower than his finest instrumental music. Here his predilection for classical procedures reached its highest level of achievement, notably in the epic Seventh Symphony, the most closely argued of his orchestral works, and the Cello Concerto, the crowning item in that instrument's repertory, with its characteristic richness and eloquence, as well as in the popular and appealing Ninth Symphony and the colourful Slavonic Dances and Slavonic Rhapsodies. Among his chamber works, landmarks are the String Sextet in A Op 48, a work in his national style which attracted particular attention abroad; the F minor Piano Trio Op 65, one of the climaxes of the more serious, classically 'Brahmsian' side of his output – unlike the E minor Op 90, a highly original series of dumka movements alternately brooding and spirited; the exuberant Op 81 Piano Quintet; and several of the string quartets, notably the popular 'American' Op 96, with its pentatonic leanings, and the two late works, the deeply felt op.106 in G and the warm and satisfying Op 105 in A flat.

Cello Concerto

Dvořák Cello Concerto in B minor, B191
Tchaikovsky Variations on a Rococo Theme, Op 33
Mstislav Rostropovich vc Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Herbert von Karajan
DG The Originals 447 413-2GOR Ⓜ
(60 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1968 ●●●

This splendid disc offers a coupling that has justifiably held its place in the catalogue at full price (both on LP and CD) for over 30 years. The upper surface of the CD itself is made to look like a miniature reproduction of the original yellow label LP – complete with light reflecting off the simulated black vinyl surface. There have been a number of outstanding recordings of the Dvořák Concerto since this DG record was made, but none to match it for the warmth of lyrical feeling, the sheer strength of personality of the cello playing and the distinction of the partnership between Karajan and Rostropovich. Any moments of romantic licence from the latter, who is obviously deeply in love with the music, are set against Karajan's overall grip on the proceedings. The orchestral playing is superb. You have only to listen to the beautiful introduction of the secondary theme of the first movement by the Principal Horn to realise that the BPO is going to match its illustrious soloist in eloquence, while Rostropovich's many moments of poetic introspection never for a moment interfere with the sense of a spontaneous forward flow. The recording is as near perfect as any made by DG in that vintage analogue era. The CD transfer has freshened the original and gives the cello a highly realistic presence, and if the passionate fortissimo violins lose just a fraction in fullness, and there seems to be, comparably, just a slight loss of resonance in the bass, the sound picture has an impressively clear and vivid focus.

In the coupled Tchaikovsky Rococo Variations, Rostropovich uses the published score rather than the original version. However, he plays with such masterly Russian fervour and elegance that any criticism is disarmed. The music itself continually demonstrates Tchaikovsky's astonishing lyrical fecundity, as one tune leads to another, all growing organically from the charming 'rococo' theme. The recording here is marvellously refined. The description 'legendary' is not a whit too strong for a disc of this calibre.

Dvořák Cello Concerto in B minor, B191[a]
Schumann Cello Concerto in A minor, Op 129[b]
Tchaikovsky Pezzo capriccioso in B minor, Op 62[c]
Mstislav Rostropovich vc [a]USSR State Symphony Orchestra / Evgeni Svetlanov; [b]London Symphony Orchestra; [c]English Chamber Orchestra / [bc]Benjamin Britten
BBC Legends/IMG Artists [ab]mono BBCL4110-2 Ⓕ
(71 minutes: ADD)
Recorded live in [a]1968, [b]1961 and [c]1968 ●

Truly legendary performances are rare, but this heroic account of the Dvořák Concerto deserves its place on collectors' shelves alongside such classics as Mravinsky's Shostakovich Eighth or Horenstein's Mahler Symphony of a Thousand. This concert offers us a piece of history in sound that raises questions about music and politics, music and personality, music and identity.

In the Cold War era, no Western tour by Russian artists was entirely without political resonance, and this London Prom took place on the very day that Soviet tanks rolled into Prague. With demonstrators outside the Royal Albert Hall, there was also dissent within. The performers might not have been directly to blame, yet had they not been dispatched knowingly, as cultural ambassadors? Svetlanov, at least, was something of an apparatchik. Moreover, the programme featured the Dvořák Concerto – an intensely nostalgic and nationalistic score, a natural focus for strong emotions.

On this privately sourced, somewhat compressed-sounding mono tape, you can hear the unease as Svetlanov and his raw-toned band tear into the work as if determined to get it over with as quickly as possible. It is the cellist, already in tears, whose transparently honest playing wins the audience over, as his own sense of guilt and fury is transmuted into a potent requiem for the Czech Spring. The restated second subject is forcefully projected, suitably gutsy and passionate at the start, but it is the development which strikes deepest. Never has the first theme's metamorphosis from resolute, relatively short-breathed march to elegy struck home so movingly. The finale is almost too rushed until the tender – here, unmistakably tragic – coda arrives, presenting an extreme and all the more moving contrast.

The Schumann, though scarcely epoch-making in the same way, was recorded on the occasion of the cellist's first visit to the Aldeburgh Festival. It receives a glorious interpretation. The sound, considerably more refined and open, is still mono only with the orchestra rather backwardly placed. Strongly recommended.

Dvořák Cello Concerto Herbert Cello Concerto No 2 in E minor, Op 30 Yo-Yo Ma vc New York Philharmonic Orchestra / Kurt Masur
Sony Classical SK67173 (61 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

Ma's and Masur's version of the Dvořák is among the very finest, matched by few and outshining most, including Ma's own previous version with Maazel and the Berlin Philharmonic (also available on Sony Classical). It is fascinating to compare Ma's two versions, the newer one more readily conveying weight of expression despite the less spotlit placing of the soloist, more disciplined yet more spontaneous-sounding. This time Ma's expressiveness is simpler and more noble, and the recording (made in Avery Fisher Hall, New York), once a trouble-spot for engineers, is fuller and more open than the Berlin one, cleaner in tuttis, with only a touch of unwanted dryness on high violins. Ma and Masur together encompass the work's astonishingly full expressive range, making it the more bitingly dramatic with high dynamic contrasts. The Victor Herbert Concerto here receives a high-powered performance, but one which does not overload the romantic element with sentiment, whether in the brilliant and vigorous outer movements or in the warmly lyrical slow movement. Ma's use of rubato is perfectly judged, with the slow movement made the more tender at a flowing speed. The finale is then given a quicksilver performance, both brilliant and urgent.

Herbert's concerto, first given in 1894, was almost certainly what prompted Dvořák to write his own concerto later that same year, triumphantly demonstrating the viability of the genre.

Additional recommendations

Cello Concerto 🄷
Coupling: Symphony No 9
Casals vc Czech Philharmonic Orchestra / Szell
Dutton CDEA5002 (74 minutes: ADD: 1/96) Ⓑ

Casals's legendary 1937 account of the Dvořák, described at the time as 'seemingly played with a sword rather than a bow', still exercises a powerful effect. Szell's powerful performance of the New World makes this transfer particularly desirable.

Coupling: Elgar Cello Concerto.
Fournier vc Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Szell; Wallenstein
DG Galleria 423 881-2GGA Ⓜ
(65 minutes: ADD: 11/88)

The third of Fournier's three accounts, and for some the most satisfying. Of the dozens of recordings of this work, this still stands as a first-class recommendation.

Couplings: Bruch Kol Nidrei. Tchaikovsky Variations on a Rococo Theme.
Starker vc London Symphony Orchestra / Dorati
Mercury Living Presence 432 001-2MM Ⓜ
(64 minutes: DDD: 3/91)

Janos Starker's admirers will not want to be without this issue, for there is much that is eloquent and moving in the Dvořák. The recorded sound is a little harsh, though.

Couplings: Saint-Saëns Cello Concerto No 1. Le Carnival des animaux – excerpt. Fauré Elégie. Berceuse. Ravel Pièce en forme de habanera. Debussy Rêverie.
Fournier vc Lush, Moore pfs Philharmonia / Kubelík; Susskind 🄷
Testament SBT1016 (77 minutes: ADD: 7/93) Ⓕ

This is the first (1948) of Fournier's three recordings of the Dvořák. Here Fournier's customarily aristocratic, beautifully fashioned playing has an extra quality of spirituality and strength of communication which lift his performance to truly great heights.

Violin Concerto

Dvořák Violin Concerto in A minor, B108. Mazurek, B90 Sarasate Concert Fantasy on Carmen, Op 25. Zigeunerweisen, Op 20
Akiko Suwanai vn Budapest Festival Orchestra / Iván Fischer
Philips 464 531-2PH (55 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●●●

No one could doubt the virtuoso flair of Akiko Suwanai the moment she starts playing Sarasate's Zigeunerweisen. This is just the sort of persuasive playing that this sequence of Liszt-inspired gypsy doodlings demands, if it is not to seem too long and self-indulgent. In 1990 Suwanai was the youngest-ever winner of the Tchaikovsky Competition in Moscow, and though she has made few discs she plainly has just the qualities to make her a magnetic recording artist.

As in Zigeunerweisen, so in the parallel Sarasate Fantasy based on Bizet's themes in Carmen, she uses the most daring dynamic and tonal range, in extreme pianissimos seeming to be communing with herself. In a big concert hall such an extreme would hardly project, but recording is different, and the result is magical, with the boldness of her rhythmic attack just as impressive.

Dvořák's dance-based Mazurek makes an apt and colourful link to the main work in which Suwanai is even more daring, urgent and volatile, than Maxim Vengerov. None of the artists on this disc may be Slavonic, but this is a version of the Violin Concerto which, at speeds on the fast side, notably in the finale, brings out the Slavonic flavours more vividly than ever, with Fischer and his superb Hungarian orchestra matching the fiery energy of the soloist.

Again this is a performance marked by daringly extreme pianissimos, notably in the opening statement of the main theme in the slow movement, a hushed meditation no less intense for being taken at a naturally flowing speed, bringing an overall timing a full two minutes less than in Vengerov's weightier version. The finale is marked Allegro non troppo, where you could well argue that Suwanai's very fast speed is a genuine Presto, relating the movement to the hectic fling of Dvořák's G minor Slavonic Dance. A marginally more relaxed speed – with Vengerov and others – allows more spring in the furiant rhythms, but the excitement of such a daring approach as Suwanai's is undeniable.

The recording is excellent, as we have come to expect of Philips issues from this source, with the soloist only marginally spotlit.

Dvořák Violin Concerto[a] Elgar Violin Sonata in E minor, Op 82[b]
Maxim Vengerov vn [b]Revital Chachamov pf
[a]New York Philharmonic Orchestra / Kurt Masur
Teldec 4509 96300-2 (58 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded [b]1995 and [a]live in 1997 ●●●

This makes a winning coupling, unexpected though it may be. Maxim Vengerov, always an inspirational artist, gives positive, passionate performances of both works, finding a purposeful logic in music that can in lesser hands seem wayward. He is helped in the Dvořák Violin Concerto by being recorded live (in Avery Fisher Hall): though the orchestra sound a little congested, the violin is beautifully caught, the daringly wide dynamic and tonal range of Vengerov's playing on his 1723 Stradivarius being fully exploited. He is masterly in conveying the sharp changes of mood in this unconventionally shaped work, at one moment purposeful, at another deeply reflective. This, more than most rivals – even Tasmin Little and Itzhak Perlman – conveys an improvisational quality, intensifying the Slavonic flavours, making the music sparkle, bringing out the fun and fantasy.

The slow movement is yearningly beautiful, heartstoppingly tender thanks to Vengerov's use of the subtlest half-tones, while the finale is as light and resilient as a Slavonic dance. In this, Masur is the most sympathetic accompanist, persuading his American players to evoke the music's Czech flavours.

In some ways, particularly for the British listener, the Elgar Sonata is an even more exciting choice of work, and certainly it gives wonderful promise of what this inspired young virtuoso will do when he tackles the Elgar Violin Concerto, as surely he must. Outstanding.

Additional recommendations
Violin Concerto
Coupling: Suk Fantasy
Suk vn Czech Philharmonic Orchestra / Ançerl
Supraphon SU1928-2 (69 minutes: ADD: 6/64[R]) Ⓜ

A distinguished performance from this all-Czech line-up.

Coupling: Romance in F minor
Perlman vn London Philharmonic Orchestra / Barenboim
EMI 747168-2 (45 minutes: ADD: 1/88) Ⓕ

A performance full of warmth, virtuosity and eloquence. The disc also has the benefit of the gloriously played Romance.

Coupling: Glazunov Violin Concerto.
Zimmermann vn London Philharmonic Orchestra / Welser-Möst
EMI 754872-2 (52 minutes: DDD: 3/94) Ⓕ

A fresh, relatively lightweight rather than full-blown Romantic approach marks Zimmermann's account out as a refreshing alternative.

Piano Concerto

Dvořák Piano Concerto in G minor, B63
Schumann Piano Concerto in A minor, Op 54
Paolo Giacometti pf Arnhem Philharmonic Orchestra / Michel Tilkin
Channel Classics CCS17898 Ⓕ
(71 minutes: DDD). Recorded c2002

To say that Paolo Giacometti measures up well to the classic versions is to say a great deal. His playing has all the energy, sparkle, poetry and technical finish you could wish for. He approaches the Dvořák with an admirable mixture of respect and enjoyment. And his Schumann is as urgent as the composer's markings suggest it should be, yet without sacrificing natural characterisation for the sake of making that point. Nor do the Dutch orchestra and conductor sound in any way out of their depth; on the contrary, they are clearly as engaged as their soloist in warm, lively music-making. The Channel Classics recording is also rich and well balanced.

Giacometti's is one of the best concerto discs this reviewer has heard in a long while, and if the Schumann/Dvořák coupling is just what you're looking for, there's no need to hesitate.

Czech Suite

Czech Suite, B93. Festival March, B88. The Hero's Song, B199. Hussite, B132
Polish National Radio Symphony Orchestra / Antoni Wit
Naxos 8 553005 (65 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded 1993-94

Wit's achievement, especially in The Hero's Song, is considerable. This colourful, rather sprawling tone-poem was Dvořák's last orchestral work and is not an easy piece to bring off. Wit finds genuine nobility in it, while his gentle, mellow way with the lovely Czech Suite also gives much pleasure. The opening 'Praeludium' is just a touch sleepy, but there is no want of lyrical affection or rhythmic bounce elsewhere and the whole performance radiates an idiomatic, old-world charm that really is most appealing. As for the Hussite overture, Wit's clear-headed reading impressively combines dignity and excitement. Given such finely disciplined orchestral playing, the results are again both eloquent and characterful. All of which just leaves the rousing Festival March of 1879, splendidly done here, with the excellent Katowice brass sounding resplendent in their introductory call-to-arms. Recordings throughout possess a most agreeable bloom and transparency.

Legends

Legends, B122. Nocturne in B, B47. Miniatures, B149. Prague Waltzes, B99
Budapest Festival Orchestra / Iván Fischer

Philips 464 647-2PH (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●●

Dvořák's 1881 Legends are like Brahmsian Slavonic Dances – intimate music, mostly reflective and invariably light-hearted. One might also think in terms of the scherzos from Dvořák's symphonic and chamber pieces, where elements of the dance are weighted with a certain gravitas. The eighth Legend occasionally anticipates the Seventh Symphony's Scherzo, and the sixth, parts of the Eighth Symphony. This is the Dvořák of woodland and foliage, eventful, piquantly scored and with generously nostalgic codas.

Iván Fischer has often professed a deep fondness for 'Dvořák miniatures', and his affection registers afresh in performances that combine certain old-style expressive devices (lots of violin portamentos) with taut execution and acute feeling for the shape of a phrase. In the fourth, at the point where the main subject reappears on the strings (4'36"), Fischer grants unusual prominence to the trumpet countermelody. The second's gorgeous opening shows the Budapest strings off to fine advantage, and the ninth's arched first subject benefits from Fischer's sense of musical line. Two of the best alternative versions – Kubelík on DG (indivisibly wedded to Dvořák's Stabat mater) and Karel Sejna (Supraphon) – are taken from analogue sources, whereas Jiri Bělohlávek's 1996 recording for the Czech label Clarton is, like Fischer's, captured in fine digital sound. Bělohlávek's strength lies primarily with the natural responses of his players, virtues that he harnesses in performances that are as warm and self-effacing as the music itself. Fischer is more of an ideas man, and if some of his charm sounds more applied than Bělohlávek's, that's not to suggest that it is in any way superficial or phoney. In short, Fischer's performances have real character. Sir Charles Mackerras and Raymond Leppard also run this new Philips release pretty close, though the Budapest orchestra's added flavouring is hard to resist.

The remainder of Fischer's programme is somewhat lighter, excepting the beautiful Nocturne which Dvořák re-worked from earlier chamber-music sources. Fischer's performance is seamless and fluid, noticeably swifter than Dorati's Detroit recording for Decca and just a fraction less sensitive. Choosing between the two inclines one marginally towards the Dorati, but in the case of the Prague Waltzes, Fischer's extra gaiety and panache win the day.

No sensitive listener will fail to respond to this enchanting programme, especially as the playing and conducting are so consistently imaginative. To call it 'light' music is to court the misguided notion that the Legends (in particular) fail to tap our deeper responses. 'Gentle' would be a better word and, once you've taken the music to heart – which is not difficult – 'indispensable' would be another.

Additional recommendation
Legends
Coupling: Stabat mater.
English Chamber Orchestra / Kubelík; various artists
DG 453 025-2GTA2 ② (129 minutes: ADD: 8/77^{R}) Ⓜ
Newly-minted conducting from a great Dvořákian, with the ECO responding to the manner born.

Slavonic Dances, B83 and B147

Chamber Orchestra of Europe / Nikolaus Harnoncourt
Teldec 8573-81038-2 (73 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 2001 ●●

Each dance on this exciting disc is granted its rightful, rustic character. The furiants really move (Harnoncourt's readings of Op 46 Nos 1 and 8 are among the fastest on disc) and the Dumka of No 2 oscillates between tender reflection and feverish high spirits.

Harnoncourt's high energy levels never preclude delicacy, or transparency or even the occasional suggestion of sentiment. Tempo relations have been thought through to the last semiquaver though in general they're more dramatic than rival Iván Fischer's (Philips). That Harnoncourt loves this music is beyond doubt, and that he understands it beyond question. Harnoncourt delves among Dvořák's inner voices, pulling them to the fore like a magician freeing a rabbit, while others seem happier to let the music speak for itself.

The Chamber Orchestra of Europe play superbly, all swelling curves and attenuated lines, with their pooled individuality shedding fresh light on virtually every piece. If you don't know the music, Harnoncourt will make you love it. And if you do know it, he'll make you love it even more.

Slavonic Dances
Cleveland Orchestra / George Szell
Sony Classical Essential Classics SBK48161 Ⓑ
(74 minutes: ADD)
Recorded 1963-65

This reissue is something of a revelation. Both discs have been lovingly remastered and the quality is an amazing improvement over the old LPs. The remastering engineers seem to have discovered a whole 'bottom octave' in the sound, which before had appeared to lack richness and weight to support the brilliant upper range. The Slavonic Dances are offered as Szell recorded them, with no repeats cut, so the phenomenal orchestral virtuosity is revealed in all its glory. There is much evidence of the conductor's many captivatingly affectionate touches of rubato and, throughout, this large orchestra follows Szell's every whim, with playing full of lyrical fervour and subtlety of nuance, wonderful precision and a lilting rhythmic pulse. The recordings were made within the acoustics of Cleveland's Severance Hall, usually a pair of dances at a time. The result is infectiously spontaneous and we cannot recommend this disc too highly; even if the close balance prevents any real pianissimos to register, the dynamic range of the music-making is still conveyed.

Additional recommendations

Slavonic Dances

Czech Philharmonic Orchestra / Sejna

Supraphon SU1916-2 (72 minutes: ADD: 11/61^{R}) Ⓜ

Sejna secures some wonderfully lithe and vivacious playing from his superb Czech band – an exhilarating treat.

Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra / Kubelík

DG Eloquence 469 760-2 Ⓑ
(71 minutes: ADD) ●
Also available on DG Trio ③ Ⓜ 469 366-2GTR3
(coupled with Dvořák Overtures, Symphonic Variations and Tone poems)

Inspirationally re-creative, scrupulously prepared performances under Kubelík's intensely charismatic direction.

Complete Symphonies

No 1 in C minor, B9, 'The Bells of Zlonice'; No 2 in B flat, B12; No 3 in E flat, B34; No 4 in D minor, B41; No 5 in F, B54; No 6 in D, B112; No 7 in D minor, B141; No 8 in G, B163; No 9 in E minor, B178, 'From the New World'

Symphonies Nos 1-9. Scherzo capriccioso, B131. Overtures – In Nature's Realm, B168; Carnival, B169; My Home, B125a

London Symphony Orchestra / István Kertész

Decca ⑥ 430 046-2DC6 (431 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1963-66 ●●

István Kertész recorded the Dvořák symphonies during the mid-1960s and his integral cycle was quick to achieve classic status, with his exhilarating and vital account of the Eighth Symphony rapidly becoming a special landmark in the catalogue. The original LPs, with their distinctive Bruegel reproduction sleeves are now collectors' items in their own right, but these magnificent interpretations became available again in 1992, in glitteringly refined digitally remastered sound, and it is a tribute to the memory of this tragically short-lived conductor that this cycle continues to set the standard by which all others are judged. Kertész was the first conductor to attract serious collectors to the early Dvořák symphonies which, even today are not performed as often as they should be; and his jubilant advocacy of the unfamiliar First Symphony, composed in the composer's 24th year, has never been superseded. This work offers surprising insights into the development of Dvořák's mature style, as does the Second Symphony. Kertész shows that Symphonies Nos 3 and 4 have much more earthy resilience than many commentators might have us believe, insisting that Dvořák's preoccupation with the music of Wagner and Liszt had reached its zenith during this period. The challenging rhetoric of the Fourth has never found a more glorious resolution than here, with Kertész drawing playing of quite gripping intensity from the LSO.

The Fifth Symphony, and to a still greater extent, its glorious successor, Symphony No 6, both reveal Dvořák's clear affinity with the music of Brahms. Kertész's superb reading of the Sixth, however, shows just how individual and naturally expressive this underrated work actually is, whilst the playing in the great climax of the opening movement and the vigorous final peroration remains tremendously exciting, even almost 30 years after the recording first appeared. In the great final trilogy, Kertész triumphs nobly with the craggy resilience of the Seventh Symphony, and his buoyant ardour brings a dynamic thrust and momentum to the Eighth Symphony, whereas his New World is by turns indomitable and searchingly lyrical. The six-disc set also offers assertive and brilliant readings of the Overtures Carnival, In nature's realm and the rarely heard My home, together with a lucid and heroic account of the Scherzo capriccioso. These definitive performances have been skilfully reprocessed, the sound is astonishingly good, even by modern standards, and the playing of the London Symphony Orchestra is often daringly brilliant under the charismatic direction of one of this century's masters of the podium.

Additional recommendations

Complete Symphonies

Coupling: Carnival Overture. The Wood Dove. Scherzo capriccioso.

Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra; Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra / Kubelík

DG 463 158-2GB6 ⑥ (425 minutes: ADD: 10/88) Ⓑ

Kubelík's accounts of the last three symphonies have long been highly praised for their freshness, natural lyrical warmth and lack of self-conscious idiosyncrasy, and the earlier works show much the same qualities.

Symphonies Nos 1-3

Philips Duo ② 446 527-2PM2 Ⓜ
(140 minutes: ADD: 3/96)

Symphonies Nos 4-6

Coupling: Hussite. My Home.
Philips Duo ② 446 530-2PM2 Ⓜ
(149 minutes: ADD: 3/96)

Symphonies Nos 7-9

Coupling: Legends
Philips Duo ② 456 327-2PM2 Ⓜ
(158 minutes: ADD: 1/70^{R}, 3/73^{R})

London Symphony Orchestra / Rowicki; London Philharmonic Orchestra / Leppard

Plentiful character, infectious dedication and trenchant symphonic strength are the hallmarks of Rowicki's underrated cycle, one of the unsung treasures of the Philips catalogue.

Symphonies Nos 3 and 7

Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Myung-Whun Chung

DG 449 207-2GH (71 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995 ●

An impressive coupling. Myung-Whun Chung takes an affectionately fleet-of-foot view of the Third Symphony. With the Vienna Philharmonic on their toes throughout (and audibly enjoying themselves), Chung's reading is notable for its newly minted freshness and intelligent sense of proportion. So we find that the opening Allegro moderato emerges in shapely, sensitive fashion, yet with no lack of cumulative intensity at its close. In the ideally flowing slow movement Chung locates both dignity and drama. Again, phrasing is always imaginative and thoughtful, while the stately central processional has never sounded more luminously refined. The performance of the Seventh is an interpretation of red-blooded fervour and rugged contrasts, whose dramatic impact is greatly heightened by the burnished glow of the VPO's contribution, to say nothing of DG's enormously ripe close-knit sound. In Chung's pungently characterful, ever flexible hands, the first movement progresses with pleasing dignity and purpose, nowhere more striking than in the coda where his decision not to press ahead too soon pays handsome dividends. Equally, Chung sees to it that the sublime second subject really takes wing both times round, the Viennese warmth and charm much in evidence. The succeeding Poco adagio is distinctive, with an almost Brucknerian hush and concentration. Whatever Chung's Scherzo slightly lacks in home-grown, idiomatic lilt, the arresting vigour and clean-limbed transparency of the playing provide fair compensation. What's more, the anxious Trio is voiced with unusual clarity, its many subtle details set in bold relief. The storm-tossed finale is magnificent, a conception of irresistible rigour and muscular conviction.

Symphony No 5

Symphony No 5. Othello, B174. Scherzo capriccioso
Oslo Philharmonic Orchestra / Mariss Jansons
EMI 749995-2 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1989 ●

Of all the romantic composers, it is probably Dvořák who best evokes a sunlit, unspoiled and relatively untroubled picture of 19th century country life. Light and warmth radiate from his Fifth Symphony, composed in just six weeks when he was in his early thirties. It has been called his 'Pastoral Symphony', and it is easy to see why, especially in a performance as fresh and sunny as this. Mariss Jansons brings out the expressiveness and heart of the music without exaggerating the good spirits and playful humour that are so characteristic of the composer, and one would single out for praise the fine wind playing of the Oslo Philharmonic Orchestra (and not least its golden-toned horns) were it not for the fact that the strings are no less satisfying. The lyrical Andante con moto brings out the fine interplay of the instrumental writing, the bouncy Scherzo is uninhibited without going over the top and the exciting finale has plenty of momentum. The other two pieces are nicely done, the Scherzo capriccioso having both lilt and vigour and the rarely played Othello overture (a late work) being a suitably dramatic response to Shakespeare's tragedy. The recording is warm and clear.

Additional recommendation
Symphony No 5
Coupling: Three Slavonic Rhapsodies
Czech Philharmonic Orchestra / Sejna
Supraphon SU1917-2 (75 minutes: ADD: 4/58^{R}) Ⓜ

Irreproachably idiomatic music-making, evincing both tingling vitality and fresh-faced wonder – a classic, life-enhancing document.

Symphony No 6

Symphony No 6. The Wild Dove
Czech Philharmonic Orchestra / Jiří Bělohlávek
Chandos CHAN9170 (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992

Bělohlávek has referred to his Czech orchestra's 'singing art of playing' and its 'mellow sound' and it is indeed Bohemia's woods, fields and wildlife, rather than energetic village green festivities, that linger in the memory here. Perhaps you shouldn't expect a Czech Philharmonic performance to 'go' or leap about excitedly in the manner of Kertész's with the LSO; in these days of high adrenalin, high contrast and high definition, there's a lot to be said for a less assertive and vigorous approach, always artlessly sung, and for this orchestra's Old World timbres a Brahmsian fireside glow, for example, to the Symphony's first movement second subject on cellos and horns (beautifully eased in by Bělohlávek). These horns, always more rounded in tone than their rasping counterparts in London (Kertész), bear an obvious family resemblance to the woodwind, not only in timbre, but also in the use of vibrato (again, that 'singing art of playing'). And the 'silver moon' flute is one of this disc's principal joys. Bělohlávek also projects the drama of The wild dove with relish. Chandos, as ever, guarantees a sepia-toned warmth throughout.

Symphonies Nos 6 and 8
Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Myung-Whun Chung
DG 469 046-2GH (77 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1999 ●●

Drawing playing of infectious eagerness and disarming poise from his distinguished band, Myung-Whun Chung directs an exhilaratingly purposeful and memorably fresh account of the Sixth. The wonderful opening Allegro non tanto at once sets the template for Chung's mobile, yet affectionately pliant approach. Unfortunately there's no repeat, but, by way of compensation, Chung does impart a riveting expectancy to the start of the development section: try from the sempre molto tranquillo marking at bar 191 (3'49") through to fig D (4'50") – just one of many paragraphs that readily stir the imagination. Likewise, the succeeding Adagio enshrines an unusually flowing conception, though there's no gainsaying the flexibility and poetry of Chung's conducting, not to mention the chamber-like intimacy and concentration of the VPO's sublimely poised response (such heart-warming dolce tone from the first violins).

Chung's Scherzo must be just about the swiftest on disc. With the VPO absolutely on its toes, the effect is undeniably exciting, though more of those delicious ben marcato violas cutting through the texture at 0'40", 1'52" and 6'03" would have been welcome. On the other hand, Chung's dare-devil tempo does throw into sharper relief both the blissful innocence of the Trio (with its sublime piccolo writing) as well as the deceptively relaxed launch pad of the finale. The latter movement is paced to perfection, its giddy coda as thrillingly judged as any. In fact Chung's Sixth is the best we've had in years, meriting a place way up there alongside the likes of Kubelík, Rowicki and Ančerl.

Chung's earlier Gothenburg SO Eighth for BIS was full of good things, but this April 1999 remake operates at an altogether higher level of intensity. The first movement is a generously moulded, spontaneous-sounding affair, its sunshine and storm gauged with arresting flair. The slow movement, though not as distinctive as Harnoncourt's 'back to nature' restoration, is very fine indeed, its dark-hued eloquence counterbalanced by a touching lyrical simplicity. Elsewhere, the Allegretto grazioso is a great success, its Trio etched with open-mouthed wonder, while the scampering coda fairly chortles with mischief. The finale, too, brings plenty of incident, not least that grandly theatrical ritenuto for the trombones' four-bar flourish at fig M or 4'45" (by no means the only instance where memories of Talich and Kubelík came flooding back).

DG's sound is immensely ripe and full-bodied, this great orchestra's burnished glow and mahogany-like timbre exceptionally well captured. However, some tuttis (especially in the Eighth) may fall a little too aggressively on the ears for some tastes, and at times the ample Musikverein acoustic precludes the last ounce of clarity. No matter, Chung's remains a cherishable pairing overall.

Additional recommendations

Symphony No 6

Coupling: Symphony No 7
Czech Philharmonic Orchestra / Sejna
Supraphon SU1918-2 (74 minutes: ADD: $6/54^{R}$) Ⓜ

Sejna's Sixth remains a miracle of joyous musicality and endearing spontaneity; the Seventh is less compelling, though still worthwhile.

Coupling: Janáček Sinfonietta
Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra / Kubelík
Orfeo C552011B (70 minutes: ADD:
recorded live 1981) Ⓕ

A cherishable document captured in wholly acceptable sound and a must-buy for all devotees of this conductor. Live performance lends the Sixth an easy, free-wheeling spontaneity and a songful poetry that his studio version lacks. The slow movement is an especial delight.

Coupling: Hussite. My Home. Carnival
Czech Philharmonic Orchestra / Ançerl
Supraphon 11 1926-2 (75 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ

One of the most distinguished versions of a simply glorious symphony – intelligent observation and purposeful thrust in perfect accord.

The Wild Dove

Coupling: The Water Goblin. The Noon Witch. The Golden Spinning-Wheel
Czech Philharmonic Orchestra / Chalabala
Supraphon SU3056-2 (80 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ

Extraordinarily atmospheric readings, full of narrative flair – The Water Goblin enjoys particularly fervent advocacy.

Symphony No 7

Symphonies Nos 7-9[a]. Symphonic Variations, B70[b]
[a]Concertgebouw Orchestra; [b]London Symphony Orchestra / Sir Colin Davis
Philips Duo ② 438 347-2PM2 (139 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Recorded [a]1975-78, [b]1968 OO

Colin Davis's magnificent Amsterdam Dvořák Seventh remains one of the most compellingly taut available: gloriously played and paced to perfection, it has a dark, searing intensity wholly apt for this, the Czech master's most tragic utterance; certainly, only a select handful of rivals on disc have matched this performance's irresistible symphonic drive. The Eighth is excellent, too: it is notable for its keen vigour, textural transparency and unfailing sense of purpose – only a little more nudging affection might not have gone amiss. Davis's finely-sculpted New World (first-movement repeat included) is another powerful, involving affair – the sublimely articulate orchestral response alone ensures enormous pleasure. Although not as endearingly flexible or evocative a reading as some would prefer, Davis's directness is always refreshing and never brusque. The result: an impressively cogent, concentrated conception. Apart from some distractingly close balancing in the finale of No 8, all three symphonies are blessed with Philips engineering of the highest analogue quality. Davis's 1968 version of the masterly Symphonic Variations is very fine: sounding admirably fresh still, it's an effective and unfussy rendering.

Symphony No 7. Nocturne in B, B47.
The Water Goblin
Czech Philharmonic Orchestra / Jiří Bělohlávek
Chandos CHAN9391 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1992

Bělohlávek is a lucid, sure-footed guide through Dvořák's mightiest symphonic utterance, and his sympathetic direction combines both warm-hearted naturalness as well as total fidelity to the score (dynamics are scrupulously attended to throughout). If it sounds just a little under-energized next to other vividly dramatic accounts, the sheer unforced eloquence and lyrical fervour of the playing always give enormous pleasure. Certainly, the first movement's secondary material glows with affectionate warmth, whilst the sublime Poco adagio emerges seamlessly, its songful rapture and nostalgic vein captured as to the manner born by this great orchestra (listen out for some gorgeous work from the principal flute, clarinet and horn). The Scherzo trips along with an infectious, rhythmic spring, as well as an engaging poise and clarity; moreover, the dark-hued unsettling Trio (a casualty in so many rival performances) is handled with equal perception. The finale, too, is immensely pleasing, marrying symphonic thrust with weighty rhetoric rather in the manner of Colin Davis's distinguished Amsterdam account. The closing bars are very broad and imposing indeed. All in all, a performance of considerable dignity and no mean stature, benefiting from vibrant Chandos engineering. The symphony is followed by a long-breathed, slumbering account of the Nocturne (gloriously played by the Czech PO strings) and the disc concludes with a fine Water goblin. Again, the orchestral response is as disciplined and poised as you could hope to hear.

Additional recommendation
Symphony No 7
London Symphony Orchestra / C Davis
LSO Live LSO0014 (40 minutes: DDD) Ⓢ
Recorded live in 2001

> Davis masterminds a performance of imposing authority. His approach is more flexible and generously expressive than his outstanding 1975 account (reviewed above) but there's absolutely no want of symphonic thrust. That set still reigns supreme but at the price this is definitely one to snap up.

Symphony No 8

Symphony No 8. The wood dove
Scottish National Orchestra / Neeme Järvi
Chandos CHAN8666 (57 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1987

Järvi and the SNO's account of the Eighth Symphony underlines the expressive warmth of the piece, the rhapsodic freedom of invention rather than any symphonic tautness. That the result seems so warm and natural is due above all to the responsiveness of the SNO players who seem to feel Järvi's wonderfully free rubato and affectionate moulding of phrase with collective spontaneity. It is a joy to have the sort of rubato you expect from a soloist so freshly transferred to an orchestra without any feeling of mannerism. The score, of course, to take an obvious example, is marked allegro con brio from the first bar, and anyone wanting a more firmly structured reading will be happier with a version such as the Davis/Philips. But Järvi is here doing no more than follow a long-established performing tradition, and one which in a performance such as his – always purposeful, marked by strong dramatic contrasts – hardly sounds wayward, persuasive rather. Though he allows himself fair breadth, Järvi's speeds are never eccentric. The finale is marginally slower than usual, but Järvi's relaxation goes with a control of tension that almost suggests the telling of a story, easy and natural in its sharp changes of mood. In all four movements the incidental delights are many, with charm a regular ingredient. In The Wood Dove, as in the symphony, Järvi's feeling for the rhapsodic side of Dvořák's invention makes for a persuasive performance, warm and colourful. The Chandos sound has a characteristic bloom.

Symphonies Nos 8 and 9
Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra / Rafael Kubelík
DG The Originals 447 412-2GOR Ⓜ
(73 minutes: ADD). Recorded 1972

These accounts are quite magnificent and their claims on the allegiance of collectors remain strong. Their freshness and vigour remind one of what it was like to hear these symphonies for the first time. The atmosphere is authentic in feeling and the sense of nature seems uncommonly acute. Kubelík has captured the enthusiasm of his players and generates a sense of excitement and poetry. The playing of the Berlin Philharmonic is marvellously eloquent and, as is often the case, a joy in itself. The woodwinds phrase with great poetic feeling and imagination, and all the departments of this great orchestra respond with sensitivity and virtuosity. The recording has great dynamic range and encompasses the most featherweight string pianissimos to the fullest orchestral tutti without discomfort. The listener is placed well back in the hall so that the woodwind, though they blend beautifully, may seem a little too recessed for some tastes, though it should be said that there is no lack of vividness, power or impact. The balance and the timbre of each instrument is natural and truthful; nothing is made larger than life and Kubelík has a natural warmth and flexibility. This will remain high on any list of recommendations for it has a vernal freshness that is wholly reviving.

Additional recommendations
Symphony No 8
Coupling: Cello Concerto^{a}
Hallé Orchestra / Barbirolli
^{a}Tortelier vc ^{a}LSO / ^{a}Previn
HMV Classics HMV5 73454-2 Ⓢ
(75 minutes: ADD: 5/79^{R})

> The Eighth shows the inimitable Hallé/Barbirolli partnership at its most inspirationally fresh. Here is truly life-enhancing, hugely spontaneous music-making.

Coupling: The Noon Witch
Concertgebouw / Harnoncourt
Teldec 3984 24487-2 (51 minutes: DDD: 12/99) Ⓕ

A typical Harnoncourt interpretation with a freshness of approach and attention to colour and detail that spell winner.

Symphony No 9, 'From the New World'

Symphony No 9[a]. American Suite[b]
[a]Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra / Kyrill Kondrashin; [b]Royal Philharmonic Orchestra / Antál Dorati
Decca 430 702-2DM (63 minutes: DDD) Ⓜ
Recorded 1979-83

Kondrashin's New World caused something of a sensation when originally transferred to CD. Here was a supreme example of the clear advantages of the new medium over the old and the metaphor of a veil being drawn back between listener and performers could almost be extended to a curtain: the impact and definition of the sound is really quite remarkable and the acoustics of the Sofiensaal in Vienna are presented as ideal for this score. The upper strings have brilliance without edginess, the brass – with characteristically bright VPO trumpets – has fine sonority as well as great presence, the bass is firm, full and rich and the ambience brings luminosity and bloom to the woodwind without clouding.

Symphonies Nos 8 and 9
Budapest Festival Orchestra / Iván Fischer Ⓕ
Philips 464 640-2PH (78 minutes: DDD) ●●

Ten years ago Fischer recorded the Eighth Symphony with the same orchestra at the same venue. In terms of timings, the two readings are remarkably similar, and yet the newer performance is warmer, more malleable and significantly more spontaneous. Both employ expressive string slides (a Fischer characteristic in Slavic music), most noticeably at the end of the Scherzo, where a snappy portamento on fiddles is echoed by the brass. Philips' recording has an extended dynamic range and a fuller, closer string sound.

While the Eighth, then, is given a bouncy, lyrical performance, 'localised' with the odd gypsy inflection, the New World, on the other hand, is intense and energetic. Indeed, it's some tribute to Fischer's musical perception that he views the two works in entirely different terms. Small dynamic details invariably tell with a new-found freshness. Just try sampling the difference between forte and sforzando among the basses in the first movement and the softness of the second subject, for once a genuine ppp. These and similar markings register even if you're not following the music with a score. Accents, too, are keenly observed, articulation is carefully judged and the string choirs have real bite. Indeed, there isn't a more enjoyable digital New World on the current market, although Kurt Masur's beautifully considered 1991 New York Philharmonic performance makes a fine alternative. It's not as energetically driven as Fischer's, but as an interpretation it's extremely well balanced. As is Harnoncourt who, though more obviously idiosyncratic than Fischer, brings a host of personalised insights to both symphonies. But Fischer's CD is a consistent joy and is thoroughly recommended.

Dvořák Symphony No 9. American Suite in A, B190
Smetana Má vlast – Vltava
Prague Symphony Orchestra / Libor Pešek
Classic fM The Full Works 75605 57043-2 Ⓜ
(71 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1998

Symphony No 9. The Water Goblin, Op 107
Royal Concertgebouw Orchestra / Nikolaus Harnoncourt
Teldec 3984-25254-2 (64 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded live in October 1999 ●

Harnoncourt has some distinguished Concertgebouw forebears, not least structure-conscious Sir Colin Davis and combustible Antál Dorati (both Philips). This, though, beats them all. Auspicious happenings register within the first few pages: carefully drawn woodwind lines; basses that calm meticulously from fierce fortissimo to tense pianissimo; provocative bassoons and an effortless passage into the lovely flute melody at 2'58". At the start of the development section piano violins really are played leggiero (lightly), a significant detail that most rivals gloss over. Middle and lower voices are granted their full flavour and the violin desks are divided. Harnoncourt's Largo is something of a minor miracle. Undulating clarinets register against shimmering string tremolandos and, beyond the beautifully judged approach to the Meno passage (bar 78), you suddenly hear quiet second-violin pizzicato chords (7'00") that you almost never notice in concert. The finale itself never sags, and for the home strait Harnoncourt treads a course somewhere between the printed Allegro con fuoco and the expressive broadening that Dvořák later sanctioned. Most admirable about Harnoncourt's Dvořák is its close proximity to nature: barely a minute passes that isn't somewhere touched by verdure or sunshine.

Compared to Pešek's earlier recording with the Royal Liverpool Philharmonic, his Prague Symphony re-make is faster, fresher and more spontaneous. Again, the first-movement repeat is observed and while some speeds catch the Prague players sounding somewhat hard-pressed a compensating sense of excitement suits the impulsive nature of the music. Pesek's 10'12" Largo is at times more like a Larghetto (Harnoncourt clocks up 12'17") but the mood is right (more elegiac than solemn) and the finale is full of vigour. For recording quality, Teldec yields the greater warmth, Classic FM the sharper 'edge'.

For the couplings, Harnoncourt gives us The Water Goblin, the most folk-like of Dvořák's Erben tone-poems where, as in the Symphony, middle voices rise to the fore and the stamping outer sections are played with great rhythmic bite. Pešek makes winsome music of the lovely American Suite, adding a forthright 'Vltava' (faster by a minute than his Liverpool recording) into the bargain. First-timers will find nothing to complain about here, but if you think that you know the New World back-to-front then Harnoncourt will have you thinking again.

Additional recommendations

Symphony No 9
Coupling: Slavonic Dances, B83: Nos 6, 8 ; B147: No 2
New York Philharmonic Orchestra / Masur
Apex 8573-89085-2 (60 minutes: DDD: No 9 recorded live in 1991) Ⓢ●

> A superb bargain-price alternative to Fischer's reading. The slow movement is particularly outstanding, with Masur's straight, simple phrasing conveying a deeply emotional intensity. Though recorded live, Masur achieves a precision of ensemble to rival that of a studio performance.

Coupling: Othello. In Nature's Realm.
Czech Philharmonic Orchestra / Ançerl
Supraphon SU3662-2 (70 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ

> A truly great, remarkably unforced interpretation, consistently illuminating and displaying an iron grip unmatched on disc.

Coupling: Beethoven Leonore Overture No 3.
Prokofiev The Love for Three Oranges – Suite
BBC Symphony Orchestra / Kempe
BBC Legends/IMG Artists BBCL4056-2 (71 minutes: ADD: recorded live in 1975) Ⓜ

> A visionary reading, deeply meditative in the slow movement – the BBC SO are on exceptional form, bringing pianissimos of breathtaking delicacy. The extreme dynamic contrasts are beautifully caught and the sound is vivid and fresh.

Symphonies Nos 7-9
Couplings: Romance in F minor^{a}. Symphonic Variations
^{a}Gonley vn; ^{a}English Chamber Orchestra, LPO / Mackerras
Classics for Pleasure ② 575761-2 Ⓑ
(150 minutes: DDD)

> These are winning performances – rhythms delightfully sprung, detail closely observed and completely without point scoring. The Seventh and Eighth are the gems here, but the rest in no way disappoints.

Piano Quintet in A

Piano Quintet in A, B155a. Piano Quartet No 2 in E flat, B162
András Schiff pf Panocha Quartet (Jiří Panocha, aPavel Zejfart vns Miroslav Sehnoutka va Jaroslav Kulhan vc)
Teldec 0630-17142-2 (72 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997

The ease of musical passage in Dvořák's Second Piano Quartet was confirmed by the composer himself, who once confessed that the melodies positively 'surged' upon him. Indeed, the endless cello line that opens the second movement would have done even Wagner proud (in principle if not in style) and the dramatic opening Allegro con fuoco is similarly well endowed in terms of melody. Any sensitive listener sampling the first movement's haunting coda will encounter some of the most ravishing modulations in the whole of Dvořák's voluminous output. András Schiff and the Panocha Quartet seem acutely alive to most of this varied musical incident. Articulation is crisp (especially from the pianist) and the general approach is rhythmically alert, with lively characterization all round in the 'folky' finale. The better-known Second Piano Quintet is rather more relaxed, though Schiff's detail-studded playing again engages one's interest and the important first-movement repeat allows us a few seconds' worth of extra music that most rival versions omit. Generally, the pianist has the strongest musical voice; very occasionally with the Panocha inner voices could be more clearly defined.

Piano Quintet in A, B155. String Quintet in G, B49
Gaudier Ensemble (Marieke Blankestijn, Lesley Hatfield vns Iris Juda va Christoph Marks vc Stephen William db Susan Tomes pf)
Hyperion CDA66796 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1995

The pianist here is Susan Tomes, who matches even Pressler in imagination, encouraging a performance lighter than that for DG, full of mercurial contrasts that seem entirely apt. For example, in the second movement Dumka there is more light and shade, and the Scherzo sparkles even more, leading to a jaunty, exuberant finale. The G major String Quintet, the earliest of the two which Dvořák wrote, the one with extra double-bass, is similarly lighter than the Chilingirian Quartet on Chandos. The Chilingirian is just as strongly characterised as the Gaudier, with a firmer, fuller tone. Marieke Blankestijn's violin is thinner than Levon Chilingirian's, but it can be just as beautiful, as in the lovely high-floating second subject of the slow movement. A fine disc.

Piano Quintet^{a}. Piano Quartet No 2 in E flat, B162
Menahem Pressler pf Emerson Quartet (Eugene Drucker, ^{a}Philip Setzer vns Lawrence Dutton va David Finckel vc)
DG 439 868-2GH (75 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1993

If the Piano Quintet with its wealth of memorable melody is by far the better-known, Pressler and the Emersons demonstrate how the Piano Quartet, sketched immediately after the other work and completed two years later in 1889, is just as rich in invention and in some ways even more distinctive in its thematic material. If there is one movement that above all proves a revelation, it is the Lento of the Quartet. Opening with a duet for cello and piano, it is here played with a rapt, hushed concentration to put it among the very finest of Dvořák inspirations. The performance of the Quintet, too, is comparably positive in its characterization.

Many will prefer the easier, even warmer reading from Domus in the Piano Quartet, which is neatly if not so generously coupled with the much earlier Piano Quartet in D, B53. In this music it is not always the high-powered reading that makes its mark most persuasively, and the Hyperion sound for Domus is far warmer than the DG New York recording for this disc, which gives an unpleasant edge to high violins, making the full ensemble rather abrasive. None the less, if the volume is curbed, one can readily enjoy these passionate and intense accounts of two of Dvořák's most striking chamber works.

String Quintet in G

String Quintets – G, B49; E flat, B180.
Intermezzo in B, B49
Chilingirian Quartet (Levon Chilingirian, Mark Butler vns Louise Williams va Philip De Groote vc); Simon Rowland-Jones va Duncan McTier db
Chandos CHAN9046 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1990-91

Dvořák's G major String Quintet is thoroughly engaging. Originally in five movements, Dvořák subsequently removed the 'Intermezzo' second movement, revising and publishing it separately eight years later as the haunting Nocturne for string orchestra. Enterprisingly, this Chandos disc includes that 'Intermezzo' in its original string quintet garb. The E flat Quintet from 1893, on the other hand, is a wholly mature masterpiece. Completed in just over two months during Dvořák's American sojourn, it replaces the double-bass of the earlier Quintet with the infinitely more subtle option of a second viola. Brimful of the most delightfully fresh, tuneful invention, the score also shares many melodic and harmonic traits with the popular American Quartet – its immediate predecessor.

The Chilingirian Quartet, ideally abetted by double-bassist Duncan McTier and violist Simon Rowland-Jones, are enthusiastic, big-hearted proponents of all this lovely material, and the excellent Chandos recording offers both a realistic perspective and beguiling warmth.

Additional recommendation
String Quintet in G
Coupling: Serenade, Op 44.
Lincoln Center Chamber Music Society / Shifrin
Delos DE3152 (66 minutes: DDD: 8/95) Ⓕ

A strongly communicative, memorably perceptive reading of a marvellous work, expertly engineered into the bargain.

Piano Quartets

Piano Quartets – No 1 in D, B53; No 2 in E flat, B162
Domus (Krysia Osostowicz vn Timothy Boulton va Richard Lester vc Susan Tomes pf)
Hyperion CDA66287 Ⓕ
(70 minutes: DDD)
Recorded 1987

These are two very enjoyable works. Hans Keller's description of the opening pages of the E flat Quartet as 'childish' is staggering – this from the leading campaigner against 'posthumous critical torture'! Childlike would be much more suitable, and this appealing characteristic is well brought out by the members of Domus: Susan Tomes's descent from incisive fortissimo clarity to pianissimo mystery in the opening bars is a delight, and fully prophetic of the kind of musicianship we're to hear. Two other unforgettable moments from this performance: the lovely return of the first movement second subject, with its heart-easing B major/E flat major modulation – very sensitive use of rubato here – and cellist Richard Lester's richly expressive solos at the beginning of the Lento. The D major Quartet is a delightful, if not fully mature piece – it does tend to rely rather heavily on sequence and repetition. Domus makes sure we don't miss any of its virtues, but it doesn't force anything: the timing in the magical opening shift from D major to B major is finely judged, and Dvořák's wonderfully effortless melodies are affectionately shaped and shaded; admirable too the way Susan Tomes finds so much beauty in what often looks like conventionally decorative piano writing. In general the sound is very pleasing, intimate enough to draw one right into the performances without being intimidating, even in the somewhat histrionic second theme of the E flat Quartet's Lento. A richly rewarding disc.

Piano Quartet No 2 in E flat, B162[a]. Violin Sonatina in G, B183[b]. Four Romantic Pieces, B150[b]
Isaac Stern vn [a]Jaime Laredo va [a]Yo-Yo Ma vc
[a]Emanuel Ax, [b]Robert McDonald pfs
Sony Classical SK62597 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996 ◉

This Sony production of the great E flat Piano Quartet fully matches the rival Schiff/Panocha recording (recorded later but released earlier), although it is perhaps rather less natural in terms of overall aural perspective: Sony's close-miked recorded balance is in contrast to the recital-hall sound stage favoured by Teldec.

Schiff is a more colourful player than Emanuel Ax (occasionally to the point of affectation), but Ax's crisp, dancing pianism is just as effective and his handling of the assertive episodes in the first two movements never stints on drama. The Czech strings are marginally sweeter than their American counterparts, the Americans more gently inflected, whereas Yo-Yo Ma's handling of the winding melody that opens the second movement has an achromatic, inward quality that is uniquely distinctive. Schiff's recording honours the finale's repeat (Ax's doesn't) but neither team opts to play the long exposition repeat in the first movement.

Teldec's near-ideal coupling of Dvořák's Second Piano Quintet – also the choice of Menahem Pressler with the Emerson Quartet – will please economy-conscious collectors who require the two masterpieces on the same CD.

Domus and Josef Suk offer the likeable but less memorable First Piano Quartet. Both discs feature fine performances (Domus's is the more intimately stated option), but it would be a great shame to miss out on Stern's Indian summer recordings of the two violin works, especially as Robert McDonald's accompaniments are models of discreet musical reportage. The piano parts of either work have never been more perceptively played, though Stern's melding of impishness and tonal chastity is no less seductive. A sparing use of portamento signals his vintage pedigree, though expressive overkill is never on the agenda. True, the tonal grain in Stern's playing was tougher a few years earlier, but the gain in wisdom and repose more than compensates.

Complete String Quartets

No 1 in A, B8; No 2 in B flat, B17; No 3 in D, B18; No 4 in E minor, B19; No 5 in F minor, B37; No 6 in A minor, B40; No 7 in A minor, B45; No 8 in E, B57; No 9 in D minor, B75; No 10 in E flat, B92; No 11 in C, B121; No 12 in F, B179, 'American'; No 13 in G, B192; No 14 in A flat, B193

String Quartets Nos 1-14; F, B120 (Fragment). Cypresses, B152. Quartettsatz. Two Waltzes, B105
Prague Quartet (Břetislav Novotny, Karel Přibyl vns Lubomír Malý va Jan Sírc vc)
DG ⑨ 463 165-2GB9 (589 minutes: ADD) Ⓑ
Recorded 1975-77 OO

Like Schubert, Dvořák turned to the string quartet early in his career. The three complete quartets included in Vol 1 (Nos 1-3) show considerable facility in writing for strings (after all, Dvořák was a violinist), but it took him some time to arrive at a fully idiomatic quartet style. Dvořák also had to learn to rein in his natural expansiveness: the Third Quartet spins out its modest material to an astonishing 70 minutes – the first movement alone is longer than the whole American Quartet! The outer movements of the No 4 in E minor (Vol 2) show him concentrating admirably, though the later shortened version of the central Andante religioso is a considerable improvement. So the interest of Vol 1 (three discs) is largely musicological. Despite this, with playing so fresh and authoritative even the impossibly long-winded Third Quartet has rewards to offer. Each performance has a strong sense of purpose, but that doesn't mean an inability to enjoy all those charming Dvořákian byways. Technically the playing is admirable, though you may be surprised at the scrunch at the climax of No 1's slow movement – very untypical. Nevertheless, the enjoyment increases strongly through Vol 2. The violin cavatina in the Andante of the Fifth Quartet has just the right gentle lilt. Listening to the Prague in the first movement of No 7 one realises how what looks on the page like very simple music can come glowingly to life in the right hands – and the way they handle the slightly tricky poco più mosso at the second subject is very impressive. The finest work in Vol 2 (discs 4-6) is undoubtedly the D minor Quartet, No 9. Volume 3 contains three gems: the E flat Quartet (No 10), the American and No 13 in G major – the outstanding work of the collection. The Prague are very sensitive to dynamic contrast (Dvořák's markings are often surprisingly detailed).

Don't let the size of this set put you off. There's plenty of fine music on these nine well-filled discs, all of it more than well performed and the recordings are generally creditable.

String Quartet No 12

String Quartets Nos 12 and 13
Vlach Quartet, Prague (Jana Vlachová, Ondřej Kukal vns Petr Verner va Mikael Ericsson vc) Ⓢ
Naxos 8 553371 (69 minutes: DDD). Recorded 1995

On the face of it, the Vlach Quartet's credentials would seem to be impeccable – the group's leader, Jana Vlachová, is the daughter of the great Josef Vlach – and, indeed, the players make a most pleasing impression on this vividly recorded Naxos coupling. They certainly produce a beguilingly rich, beautifully blended sound and bring to this music a big-hearted, songful fervour as well as textural mastery. What is more, Dvořák's characteristic, chugging cross-rhythms are handled with particular felicity. Interpretatively, their approach contrasts strongly with other readings in that the Vlach team adopt a coaxing, lyrically expressive stance (with the gorgeous slow movement of the American a highlight). In the case of the masterly G major Quartet, these gifted newcomers show fresh insights (they are especially perceptive in those wistful reminiscences at the heart of the finale).

Additional recommendation
String Quartet Nos 12, 'American', and 13
Lindsay Quartet
ASV CDDCA797 (66 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Utterly dedicated, typically probing accounts from the Lindsays; the great G major Quartet comes off especially well here.

Piano Trios

Piano Trios – No 3 in F minor, B130; No 4 in E minor, B166, 'Dumky'
Florestan Trio (Anthony Marwood vn Richard Lester vc Susan Tomes pf)
Hyperion CDA66895 (68 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1996

A favourite and appropriate pairing – Dvořák's most passionate chamber work in harness with one of his most genial. The F minor Piano Trio (1883) was contemporaneous with the death of Dvořák's mother; it anticipates something of the storm and stress that characterises the great D minor Seventh Symphony (1884-5) and the Florestan Trio serves it well. All three players allow themselves plenty of expressive leeway and yet the musical line is neither distorted nor stretched too far. The second movement Allegretto is truly grazioso and the qualifying meno mosso perfectly judged. The finale is buoyant rather than especially rustic, whereas the more overtly colourful Dumky Trio inspires a sense of play and a vivid suggestion of local colour. Throughout the performance, the manifest 'song and dance' elements of the score (heartfelt melodies alternating with folk-style faster music) are keenly projected. The recordings are first-rate, as are the insert-notes. If you're after a subtle, musically perceptive coupling of these two works, then you could hardly do better.

Violin Sonata in F

Violin Sonata in F, B106. Ballad in D minor, B139. Four Romantic Pieces, B150. Violin Sonatina in G, B183. Nocturne in B, B48a (arr cpsr)
Anthony Marwood vn Susan Tomes pf
Hyperion CDA66934 (67 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Recorded 1997 ◉

This delectable release enshrines music-making of sensitivity and eloquence. Marwood may not produce as luscious a sound as that of some of his rivals, but his subtly variegated tone colouring more than compensates; Tomes, too, displays the deftest touch throughout. The F major Sonata receives a wonderfully pliable reading, full of imaginative touches. You will especially warm to their unhurried, yet purposeful way with the opening movement (Dvořák's ma non troppo marking ideally judged). The beautiful ensuing Poco sostenuto has both Brahmsian warmth and hushed intimacy; the finale is joyous and articulate. Marwood's and Tomes's account of the captivating Sonatina is less 'glamorous' and high-powered than the Gil and Orli Shahams' 1995 account on DG – and altogether more personable as a result. Similarly, the second of the Four Romantic Pieces has an earthy tang reminiscent of Janáček, while the Allegro appassionato third movement unfolds with just the right flowing ardour. Hyperion also offers the haunting Nocturne in B major and a sombre, vividly characterised Ballad in D minor. This anthology must now take the palm, not least in view of the marvellously balanced recording.

Additional recommendation
Violin Sonata. Violin Sonatina. Romantic Pieces
Shaham, G vn Shaham, O pf
DG 449 820-2GH (52 minutes: DDD: 5/97) Ⓕ
Highly proficient, sensitive playing from the brother-and-sister partnership of the Shahams.

Requiem Mass

Requiem Mass, B165. Mass in D, B153
Pilar Lorengar sop Neil Ritchie treb Erzsébet Komlóssy contr Andrew Giles counterten Robert Ilosfalvy, Alan Byers tens Tom Krause bar Robert Morton bass Nicholas Cleobury org Ambrosian Singers; Christ Church Cathedral Choir, Oxford / Simon Preston; London Symphony Orchestra / István Kertész
Double Decca ② 448 089-2DF2 (138 minutes: ADD) Ⓜ
Texts and translations included. Recorded 1968
Requiem Mass also available on Decca Ⓜ ② 468 487-2DL2 (coupled with Kodály Psalmus hungaricus)

Kertész's Requiem dates from 1968 and on all counts but one, it surpasses Karel Ančerl's classic 1959 set, reissued on DG in 1995 and coupled with Fischer-Dieskau's 1960 set of Dvořák's Biblical Songs with Jörg Demus. The exception is the rather too soft-grained singing of Pilar Lorengar as compared with the clear, more vibrant soprano of Maria Stader. But Lorengar's singing is particularly sensitive and appealing in the quieter passages. The lovely quality of Robert Ilósfalvy's voice tells beautifully in 'Liber scriptus proferetur' and in the opening section of the quartet, 'Recordare, Jesu pie'. Dvořák distributes short passages among the soloists impartially. They combine beautifully in the quartet, and the chorus with them in 'Pie Jesu Domine'. The hero of the occasion is Kertész. He gets choral singing and orchestral playing of the finest quality. It is abundantly evident that he cherishes a great love for this work. The Mass in D (sung in the original version with organ) sits well with the Requiem; Simon Preston produces a fine, well-balanced performance, with the Christ Church choristers on excellent form.

Stabat mater

Stabat mater. Psalm 149
Lívia Aghová sop Marga Schiml contr Aldo Baldin ten Luděk Vele bass Prague Children's Choir; Prague Philharmonic Choir; Czech Philharmonic Orchestra / Jiří Bělohlávek
Chandos ② CHAN8985/6 (96 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, texts and translations included
Recorded 1991 ◉

The 10 sections of the Stabat mater are well laid out for the different vocal and instrumental forces and so avoid the monotony which might seem inherent in this contemplative and deeply sombre text. This performance was recorded in Prague Castle, and in it we feel the full dignity and drama of the work, an oratorio in all but name. The four solo singers convey genuine fervour and one feels that their sound, which is quite unlike that of British singers, must be akin to what the composer originally imagined. If they are a touch operatic, that doesn't sound misplaced and they perform well together, as in the second verse quartet 'Quis est homo'. The choral singing is no less impressive, and indeed the whole performance under Bělohlávek gets the balance right between reverent simplicity and intensity of feeling. Psalm 149 is a setting of 'Sing unto the Lord a new song' for chorus and orchestra and its celebratory mood provides a fine complement to the other work.

Additional recommendations

Stabat mater

Coupling: Legends

Mathis sop Reynolds mez Ochman ten Shirley-Quirk bar Bavarian Radio Chorus and Symphony Orchestra; English Chamber Orchestra / Kubelík

DG 453 025-2GTA2 ② (129 minutes: ADD: 3/78^{R}) Ⓜ

This warm-hearted work well deserves all the care and attention lavished upon it by the performers, who respond with evident enthusiasm to Kubelík's inspiring direction.

Stabat mater

Zvetkova sop Donose mez Botha ten Scandiuzzi bass Saxon State Opera Theatre Chor; Staatskapelle Dresden / Sinopoli

DG ② 471 033-2GH2 (88 minutes: DDD: rec 2000) Ⓕ

A very appealing performance; Sinopoli draws a more operatic response – both colourful and dramatic – than is usual from his forces, and his soloists are superb.

Mass in D

Dvořák Mass in D, Op 86 Eben Prague Te Deum 1989 Janáček Our Father

Dagmar Masková sop Marta Benacková mez Walter Coppola ten Peter Mikulás bass Lydie Härtelová hp Josef Ksica org Prague Chamber Choir / Josef Pancík

ECM New Series 449 508-2 (59 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included. Recorded 1993

This imaginative coupling brings together three fine pieces of Czech church music in skilled and sympathetic interpretations. Dvořák's Mass has received a number of good recorded performances; this one, in the original 1887 version with organ, has a very well-matched quartet of soloists who blend smoothly with each other and with the chamber choir. It is a work of particular intimacy and charm, and these qualities mark this performance. Janáček's setting of the Lord's Prayer dates from 1906, and is in turn a meditative piece, not without vivid illustrative touches appropriate to a work originally designed to accompany a sequence of devotional pictures; and Petr Eben's Prague Te Deum coincided, in 1969, with a moment of apparent release from political oppression. It has something of Janáček's suddenness in the invention, and a graceful melodic manner. Each of these works is in its way inward, personal and reflective, but they all share a Czech character.

Songs

Awards 2001

Dvořák Four Songs, B124. In Folk Tone, B146. Eight Love Songs, B160 Janáček Moravian Folk Poetry in Songs Martinů New Miniatures. Mélodies pour une amie de mon pays. Lullaby. Seven Songs on One Page. New Slovak Songs

Magdalena Kožená mez Graham Johnson pf

DG 463 472-2GH Ⓕ

(68 minutes: DDD). Texts and translations included

Recorded 1998 ●●●

For most of us, the songs of what was Czechoslovakia have amounted, in direct knowledge, to a few by Dvořák, principally Songs my mother taught me, and though not included here, the programme is never short of interest. The basis of folk-melody is common to all, much of the distinctive character of each lying in the writing for piano. Probably no accompanist in the world today would bring a surer insight and rightness of touch to this relatively unfamiliar music, and in the young Czech mezzo Graham Johnson has a singer to whom it is home-ground. Kožená's expressive powers would probably have to be judged by a Czech speaker: they are not of the kind which supersede language or which send one eagerly to consult text and translation. That is not to say she is bland, and certainly her diction is remarkably clear. But the great gift of her singing at present is the exceptional beauty of her voice, rich, firmly placed, ample in power and range, and now in its freshest bloom. For many, these songs and this singer will be a most welcome discovery.

Gypsy Melodies, B104. In Folk Tone, B146. Love Songs, B160. Biblical Songs, B185

Dagmar Pecková mez Irwin Gage pf

Supraphon SU3437-2 (69 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ

Texts and translations included. Recorded 2000

These four cycles make an excellent and generous coupling, with Dagmar Pecková, brilliantly supported by Irwin Gage, a most persuasive advocate. Hers is an ideal voice, unmistakably Slavonic in timbre, yet firm and pure as well as rich. She retains a freshness specially apt for the songs inviting a girlish manner, including Dvořák's most famous song, the fourth of the seven Gypsy Melodies, 'Songs my mother taught me', sounding fresh and new.

The four cycles represent the full span of Dvořák's career. The eight Love Songs, B160 may officially date from 1888, but Dvořák in fact reworked a selection from 18 songs he had written passionately at high speed over 20 years earlier – charming pieces which already reveal his unquenchable lyrical gift. Next chronologically are the Gypsy Songs of 1800, bold and colourful, here nicely contrasted by Pecková and Gage with four simpler, less exotic songs, In Folk Tone, of six years later. Last and longest is the cycle of ten Biblical Songs, written in the United States in 1894, when he was feeling homesick. They are more often sung by male singers, gaining from weight and gravity, but here with the mezzo, Pecková, they prove just as moving and intense. The sound is clear and well balanced.

The Jacobin

Václav Zítek bar Bohuš; Vilém Přibyl ten Jiří; Daniela Sounová sop Terinka; Karel Průša bass

Count Vilém; René Tuček bar Adolf; Marcela Machotková sop Julie; Karel Berman bass Filip; Beno Blachut ten Benda; Ivana Mixová mez Lotinka Kantilena Children's Chorus; Kühn Chorus; Brno State Philharmonic Orchestra / Jiří Pinkas
Supraphon ② 11 2190-2 (155 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1977

This was the first (and, so far, only) recording of Dvořák's charming village comedy – for the Jacobin of the title is not here a political activist but a young man, Bohuš, returning from exile in Paris to his stuffy old father, Count Vilém. The sub-plots include all manner of misunderstandings, and set in the middle of them is the touching figure of Benda, the fussy, rather pedantic but wholly moving music-master. Dvořák is known to have had in mind his own boyhood teacher, Antonín Liehmann, whose daughter gives her name, Terinka, to Benda's daughter. Beno Blachut celebrated his 64th birthday during the making of this set. His was a long career, as well as one of great distinction; he is still well able to get round the lines of this part, and gives an affecting picture of the old musician, never more so than in the rehearsing of the welcome ode. This is an idea that has cropped up in opera before, but it is charmingly handled here.

Václav Zítek sings Bohuš pleasantly and Marcela Machotková trips away lightly as Julie. Vilém Přibyl sounds less than his most energetic, though his voice is in good fettle; and there is some lack of drive from Jiří Pinkas, who might have done more to bring out the often witty touches in Dvořák's scoring. Never mind: this revived version of a delightful piece can be safely recommended.

Kate and the Devil

Anna Barová contr Kate; Richard Novák bass Devil Marbuel; Miloš Ježil ten Shepherd Jirka; Daniela Suryová contr Kate's mother; Jaroslav Horáček bass Lucifer; Jan Hladík bass Devil the Gate-keeper; Aleš Stáva bass Devil the Guard; Brigita Sulcová sop Princess; Natália Romanová sop Chambermaid; Pavel Kamas bass Marshall; Oldřich Polášek ten Musician Brno Janáček Opera Chorus and Orchestra / Jiří Pinkas
Supraphon ② 11 1800-2 (119 minutes: AAD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1979

Though this was never one of the best Supraphon recordings, it is perfectly serviceable. The plot is complicated, and broadly speaking concerns the bossy Kate who, finding herself a wallflower at the village hop, angrily declares that she would dance with the Devil himself. Up there duly pops a junior devil, Marbuel, who carries her off to hell, where her ceaseless chatter wearies Lucifer himself. The diabolical company is only too happy to allow the shepherd Jirka to remove her again. Jirka, attractively sung by Miloš Ježil, also manages to help the wicked but later repentant Princess to escape the Devil's clutches, and all ends well. The work has a proper coherence, and much good humour besides. Anna Barová's Kate is strong and full of character, but manages not to exclude the charm that should underlie her rantings at Marbuel, who is handsomely sung by Richard Novák. Brigita Sulcová similarly makes much of the not very sympathetic Princess. Jaroslav Horáček enjoys himself hugely as Lucifer and Jiří Pinkas accompanies them well.

Rusalka

Awards 1999

Renée Fleming sop Rusalka; Ben Heppner ten Prince; Franz Hawlata bass Watergnome; Dolora Zajick mez Witch; Eva Urbanová sop Foreign Princess; Iván Kusnjer bar Hunter, Gamekeeper; Zdena Kloubová sop Turnspit; Lívia Aghová sop First Woodsprite; Dana Burešová mez Second Woodsprite; Hana Minutillo contr Third Woodsprite Kühn Mixed Choir; Czech Philharmonic Orchestra / Sir Charles Mackerras
Decca ③ 460 568-2DHO3 (163 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1998 ○○○

Renée Fleming's tender and heart-warming account of Rusalka's Invocation to the Moon reflects the fact that the role of the lovelorn water-nymph, taken by her in a highly successful production at the Met in New York, has become one of her favourites. Ben Heppner also has a special relationship with the opera, for the role of the Prince was the first he studied in depth as a student. He has sung it repeatedly since then, often opposite Renée Fleming, and both he and Mackerras have long harboured the ambition to make a complete recording.

The joy of this magnificent set, which won Gramophone's Record of the Year 1999, is that in almost every way it fulfils every expectation and more, offering a recording with glowing sound that more than ever before reveals the richness and subtlety of Dvořák's score. As interpreted by Fleming and Mackerras, Rusalka's big aria at the start of Act 3, when having been rejected by the Prince, she seeks consolation in returning to the water, is as poignantly beautiful as the more celebrated Invocation to the Moon in Act 1, when she laments over loving a human. In addition, the climactic moments bring glorious top-notes, firm and true up to B flat and B. Heppner, like Fleming, conveys his special affection for this music, unstrained up to top C, combining heroic power with lyric beauty.

Dolora Zajick as the Witch, Jezibaba, is characterful and fruity. Franz Hawlata as the Watergnome, Rusalka's father, is firm and dark, bringing a Wagnerian weight to the role. The engineers also thrillingly capture the off-stage effects so important in this opera, with the Watergnome balefully calling from the lake.

Even the smaller roles have been cast from strength, all of them fresh, true and idiomatic. Strikingly, there is not a hint of a Slavonic wobble from any of the singers. In the orchestra, too, the Czech horns are consistently rich and firm. And if anyone is worried about having four non-Czech principals, they are as idiomatic as any rivals.

The final glory of the set lies in the warmly understanding conducting of Charles Mackerras. In every way this matches and even outshines his supreme achievement in the Decca series of Janáček operas. In those you had the Vienna Philharmonic, but here the Czech Philharmonic is both a degree more idiomatic and just as opulent in tone, with superb solo work. The balance between voices and orchestra is well managed, with voices never drowned.

Rusalka
Milada Subrtová sop Rusalka; Eduard Haken bass Watergnome; Marie Ovčačíková contr Witch; Ivo Zídek ten Prince; Alena Míková mez Foreign Princess; Jadwiga Wysoczanská sop First Woodsprite; Eva Hlobilová sop Second Woodsprite; Věra Krilová contr Third Woodsprite; Ivana Mixová sop Turnspit; Václav Bednář bar Hunter, Gamekeeper Prague National Theatre Chorus and Orchestra / Zdeněk Chalabala
Supraphon ② SU0013-2 (149 minutes: ADD) Ⓕ
Notes, text and translation included
Recorded 1961 ●

This excellent set boasts Eduard Haken, one of the great interpreters of the Watergnome, in robust voice, infusing the character with a rueful gentleness as well as a firmness of utterance. Ivo Zídek as the Prince was in his mid-thirties and in his prime at the time of this recording, singing ardently and tenderly and with a grace of phrasing that matches him well to Milada Subrtová's Rusalka. Hers is a beautiful performance, sensitive to the character's charm as well as to her fragility and pathos. The Slavonic tradition of the old watersprite legend places her in the line of the suffering heroine and it is a measure of Dvořák's success that her delicate appeal holds throughout quite a long opera, and her sinuous but never oversensual lines and the piercing harmony associated with her give her a unique appeal. Subrtová sings the part with unfaltering sensitivity. Zdeněk Chalabala, who died only a couple of months after completing this recording, handles the score with great tenderness and an affection that shines through every bar. This is a beautiful performance. The recording comes up remarkably well, too.

Sir George Dyson

British 1883-1964

GROVE Dyson studied at the Royal College of Music (1900-04) and later taught there (director from 1938), and at several schools. His works include choral and orchestral pieces (notably The Canterbury Pilgrims, 1931) and books.

The Canterbury Pilgrims

Awards 1997

The Canterbury Pilgrims. In Honour of the City. At the Tabard Inn
Yvonne Kenny sop Robert Tear ten Stephen Roberts bar London Symphony Chorus and Orchestra / Richard Hickox
Chandos ② CHAN9531 Ⓕ
(118 minutes: DDD)
Texts included. Recorded 1996 ●●●

It seems extraordinary that Dyson's Canterbury Pilgrims had to wait so long for a première recording. This superb offering from Hickox of this full-length cantata based on the Prologue to Chaucer's Canterbury Tales bears out its reputation as Dyson's masterpiece. This is a fresh, openly tuneful work, aptly exuberant in its celebration of Chaucer. Following the scheme of Chaucer's Prologue, Dyson in his 12 movements, plus Envoi, presents a sequence of portraits, deftly varying the forces used, with the three soloists well contrasted in their characterisations and with the chorus acting as both narrator and commentator, providing an emotional focus for the whole work in two heightened sequences, the sixth and twelfth movements, moving and noble portraits of the two characters who aroused Dyson's deepest sympathy, the Clerk of Oxenford and the Poor Parson of a Town. If the idiom is undemanding, with occasional echoes of Vaughan Williams's A Sea Symphony and with passages reminiscent of Rachmaninov's The Bells, the cantata sustains its length well.

Outstanding among the soloists is Robert Tear who not only characterises brilliantly but sings with admirable fullness and warmth. The beautiful, fading close, when Tear as the Knight begins the first tale, moving slowly off-stage, is most atmospherically done. Yvonne Kenny and Stephen Roberts sing well too, but are less distinctive both in timbre and expression.

The London Symphony Chorus sings with incandescent tone, superbly recorded, and the orchestra brings out the clarity and colourfulness of Dyson's instrumentation.

Quo Vadis

Quo Vadis
Cheryl Barker sop Jean Rigby mez Philip Langridge ten Roderick Williams bar Royal Welsh College of Music and Drama Chamber Choir; BBC National Chorus and Orchestra of Wales / Richard Hickox
Chandos ② CHAN10061 (102 minutes: DDD) Ⓕ
Text and translation included. Recorded c2002 ●●

Like so many British composers Dyson, even before he died in 1962, suffered neglect through writing in a conservative idiom that critics were all too ready to label 'out of date'. Originally written for the Three Choirs Festival in Hereford in 1939, its first performance was cancelled because of the outbreak of war, and it was only given its première in Hereford a decade later. Dyson draws on the widest array of sources, boldly picking out passages from such poets as Campion, Vaughan, Herrick, Shelley, Newman and Bridges in an elaborate kaleidoscope, mixing them together in all but one of the nine substantial movements, even rearranging individual lines from Wordsworth's Intimations of Immortality. He also includes such well-known hymns as God be in my head and New every morning without hinting at the respective hymn-tunes.

